This Law of Lycurgus hath beene approoued by diuers, to the end, that (the more facillie) the woman might invre hir selfe to the maners of her husband, comming then into his power from her yonger yeares. For, as Aristotle saith in his Oeconomie: The diuersity of manners & conditions, do hinder amitie and true Loue. Neuertheless I do not alow this Law of Aristotle, that grants a man twenty years more then a Woman (vnder reuerence and authoritie due to so worthy a Man) and my reason is, because wee see, that when a man attaineth to threescore years of age, albeit he can then beget: yet so it is (and that most commonly) if hee passe on further, the rest of his daies are so laden with diseases and passions, that if the Woman bee then at the yeares of Fortie, he is then to her, rather a burdenous paine and trouble, then as a Husband of consolation.

Arist. in Oecon.

The Authors reason against Aristotles yeares of marriage.

Therefore, when there is a lesse difference in their yeares, their affections do mortifie themselues (as it were) both together at one time, and their willes and intentions grow to more conformitie, then when there is such great inequalitie in their ages. I denie not, but that the man ought to bee the eldest; but it sufficeth, if it be by the space of eight or ten yeares, and the Woman sixeteene, seauenteene, or more, hauing respect vnto the Ages and Liues of these our present dayes.

The man should be eldest then the Woman.

Also, I dare maintaine, that a man ought to take a Wife which is yong, welfeatured, and a Maide, rather then a widowe, or one in yeares, formerly moulded vnto anothers manners and humors: because it is most certaine, that in soft & tender youth, much better and easily may be imprinted, euen such maners and conditions as the Husband would wish, (with absolute priuiledge of Obedience) then in rugged, stubborne, or aged sullen Nature.

A Maide in yong yeares is fitter for a man then a Widdow.

To this purpose we haue a notable example, in Timotheus the cunning & excellent Flute-player; and who for mony made no spare of his skill, for the instruction of youth in his singuler qualitie. He obserued it as a custome, before he wold accept of any Scholler; to know, if formerly he had practised any beginning of the Art, for he wold take more then halfe the price doubled of such, then of them that knewe nothing therein. And his reason was, because he should take more paines to briole such a one, of an euil apprehension alreadie learned, then hee could any way doo, by direct teaching such as formerly knew not a note. This example serueth well for widdowes, that formerly haue beene taught and enstructed by others: and therefore, do require the more difficult labour, to chaunge the bad Tunes, and strange conceits, learned or practised in their first Husbands daies. In which respect (and verie iustly) I preferre the Marriage of Maids, before that of Widdowes; because, beside what els hath beene, and yet further may bee alledged, womē do contain a singuler loue and memory of them, with whome they had their first acquaintance.

Of Timotheus the skilfull player on Flutes.

An euill Custome once learnd, is not easily cured.

A note for Widdowes.

Marriage of maids, preferred before that of Widdowes.

Now, as concerning Parentage and a wealthie Dowrie with a VVoman, I read, that a yong Grecian went to Pittacus, one of the seuen Sages of Greece, to craue his Counsell in the case of marriage, vsing these wordes; I am offered my choise of two women in marriage; the one is equal to me in goods & parentage, the other exceedeth mee very farre, which of them is fittest for mee to elect? Pittacus returned him this answere: See yonder are two children, practising to play at defence with Cudgels, go vnto them, and they will giue thee Counsell. He did so: and as he approched neere the Boyes, who were laying their heads together, concerning their owne play: When they saw the young man come, that exceeded them so much in strength and stature, imagining he came to play with them, they laide downe the weapons, saying; Euerie man shoulde play with his equall. By which childish precept or admonition, hee perceiued that hee ought to marrie his equall.

Of a Wiues parentage & riches in marriage, the case aduised by wise Pittacus.

Equality is the fittest thing in marriage.

Plutarch

Plutarch, his graue aduise concerning marriage.

Plutarch, in his Treatise of nursing Children, saith: A man ought not to marry his Sonne to a Woman richer then himselfe, neither of any greater condition. For (saith he) he that allies himselfe, where he is exceeded in wealth; in stead of begetting Kinred, purchaseth Maisters and Commanders. And when a rich Woman marries herselfe to a poore Man; pride alwaies will haue the supremacy in her braine, liuing altogether vnruly and incompatible, only by the contempt she hath of her Husband. The Philosopher Menander saide: A poore Man that matcheth himselfe with a rich Wife, giues himselfe in marriage to the woman, and not she to him.

Lycurgus his Law against dowries in Marriage.

Lycurgus appointed a Law to the Lacedemonians, that they should marry their Daughters without any dowries; to the end, that each one should endow themselues with vertues, and onely (therefore) to be required in marriage. Now, albeit this Law seemed rigorous to some, yet (for all that) it was very allowable; being kept in one body, as well as in another. And then, if the Father had no Mony or other goods in marriage with his Wife: hee was the lesse obliged to giue any with his Daughter; and hereby it was the better knowne, that when a Man sought to be married, whether he did it in respect of riches, or no. But it were a great deale of lost labour, in seeking now to perswade this among vs: considering, that men are so well acquainted with this abuse, as marriage (in these daies) is procured for nothing else.

A hard matter to be perswaded in these dayes.

Notwithstanding, I will still maintaine, that when a rich Man desireth Marriage; he should not greedily gape after riches, but rather to enioy a noble and vertuous Wife. Taking example by Alexander the Great, who although he was a mighty King, as is wel enough knowne: yet he tooke to Wife Barsina, the Daughter of Arbassus, without any riches; but she was young, vertuous, and of royall descent, and hee that is most rich, should most seeke after this vtility. So shall he be sure to auoyd al discontentment, for, by setting Monies aside, which couer many vices: such strange deformities would appear naked and manifest, which else cannot be seene, men being blinded with Auarice; for they are so cunningly dissembled, that though they are apparant, yet they will not be discerned. I mislike not, that in equall nobleness, a man should make his best election, & please his affections to his own contentment: euen as I vtterly condemne him, that (for Wealth) can be content to take a vile and infamous Wife.

Example of great Alexanders marriage

Mony couers many foule imperfections.

I shall not need to labour my selfe in this matter, because the very earth herein is a Schoole-maister to vs, for, if we sow in a sharpe ground, and not prepared: it will bring forth fruit that hath no sauour, although our Seede be neuer so good and delicate. On the contrary, sow Seede (of lesse reliishable) in a well husbanded ground, and it will yeelde fruit most perfect and excellent. In like manner, to haue good and absolute Horses, we must make our election in a well tride breede or race; much more then should we haue care of our Children and Successours. Truelie, in my iudgement, a man makes very slender account of himselfe, and badly satisfieth his owne Obligation for which he was borne: if hee leaue not to his Children as Noble a Linage, as he was Heire to by his Father; which he cannot doe, in giuing them a Mother of worse condition then himselfe. Moreouer, if he haue any care of his owne honor and reputation, he will encrease more Wealth and Dignity to his Children, then he receiued from his Father. How highly then doth a man stand charged, and greatly indebted; to leaue a good Issue behinde him, and of true borne blood? Yea, much greater then was left to himselfe, for auoyding al occasion, of giuing his Children cause to complaine of him.

An example deriued from the earth.

Example of Horses.

How carefull a man ought to be in choise of his wife.

Paulus Æmilius declareth, that Manesteus the Athenian, Sonne to Iphicrates, the excellent Captaine, whose Mother was of mean condition and poor birth, which the saide Iphicrates had taken in marriage, was demaunded; which hee loued best, either his Father or Mother? He answered: My Mother. They that mooued the question, wondring heereat, desired to vnderstand his reason. Because (quoth he) my Father, in regard of himselfe, hath made me a Native of Thrace, and the Sonne of a poore Mother: but she hath made mee an Athenian borne, and the Sonne of a famous Captaine.

Of Manesteus the Athenian, Sonne to Iphicrates, and his worthy answere.

As

Of beauty & blackneſſe, a meane betweene both

As concerning beauty, ſetting aſide their opinions, who ſay, that choyſe ſhould be made of one neither foule or faire, but a meane betweene both: I ſay, that euermore (to our vttermoſt power) make a faire Wife our eye-marke, prouided ſhe be vertuous, as we haue formerly ſaid. For otherwiſe, my aduiſe is, rather to take a vertuous homely one, then a faire one, of proud and bad Nature. And the reaſon of chuſing a faire Wife, onely is this; in regard of generation and poſterity, and to haue beautifull Children. Virgill declareth, that the Goddeſſe Iuno, making great promiſes to Æolus, ſaid: She would giue him one of her goodlieſt Nimphs, becauſe ſhe might bring him beautifull Children. Archidamus, King of Athens, was condemned in a great amercement of Money, becauſe he had married a Woman of little ſtature, the Iudges ſaying; that he would leaue thē a race of little Kings, and of no conſtitution. This which I haue ſaid, is not by way of commaund, but of councell, which may be accepted and done, without any difficulty, or exception of perſons. For marriage vnited with a homely Wife, is as holy as that of the faireſt, and with the poore, as with the rich, with a Widdow, as with a Maide: becauſe vniuerſally, where nature and charity is, all different thinges haue equality, and good conformity.

Iuno her promiſe to Aeolus

The Authors intent in this caſe.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the cordiall loue and amity, which ought to be in Marriage: With ſome examples of loue among the married.

Marriage where, and to what end inſtituted.

LOue and Charity betweene two vnited bodies, deſerueth to be commended, becauſe Marriage is ſo excellent a thing: as well in reſpect of him, that inſtituted it, which was GOD, as the place of inſtitution, which was Paradiſe, and that proceeding from it; to wit, the propagation and perpetuity of mankind, with remedy againſt all ſenſuall appetites, and wicked concupiſences. All other loues in this humaine life, with what men ſoeuer they be; are meere improper loues: but this is Diuine, and (in truth) it is that, which makes vnion both of Soule and Body, for ſo is it ſealed and confirmed, by power of ſupreame prerogatiue. And there is nothing elſe, that betweene two thus conioyned, can be ſo particularly proper; becauſe both heart and body are common, betweene a good and loyall married couple. Which cannot bee ſo in other amities, that ſmall thinges can ſoone deſtroy, and ſlender triſles ſeparate; nay, which is much worſe, the longeſt continuance therof is but for little time. The proofe heereof hath daily beene ſeene, for few haue continued to death, becauſe the will of man is ſo mutable: as a new friend can eaſily thruſt an old one out of his place. But true and intire loue betweene Man and Wife, cannot bee ſundred, neyther by infirmity, pouerty, misfortune, or diſfauour, for nothing but death only can be the deuider. Nay, it ſeemeth alſo to continue after death, as hath beene noted in ſome worthy widdowed perſons, whoſe examples are infinite.

The body and Soule is vnited together in marriage.

Coniugall loue hath continued after death.

Among whom, and deſeruing beſt conſideration of all other, the loue of Adam and Eua hath moſt eminence: conſidering, that the fruit of life being forbidden them, Adam notwithſtanding, to pleaſe his Wife, expoſed and ſubmitted himſelfe to all perrill. When Paulina, Wife to the wiſe and learned Seneca of Cardona, heard that cruell Nero had put her Husband to death, and that he had choſen his owne death, by making inciſion into his veines: ſhee would not onely beare him company in death, but alſo in the very ſame manner of dying, and therefore ſliced her veines, according as it was done vnto Seneca. When Nero had intelligence therof, and knew that this enſued from inuiolable loue: he cauſed great ſpeede to be made, to ſaue her in the perill of death. For, being euen vpon expiring, he cauſed her veines to be bound vp, & kept her that ſhee could not dye: by meanes whereof, the good Lady liued all the reſt of her time in great affliction, and colourleſſe, in ſigne of the loyall loue ſhe bare to her Husband. We read in the liues of the Emperors, that Lucius

The incomparable loue of Adam and Eua.

The rare loue of Paulina, wife to learned Seneca.

The loue of Triata to her Husband Lucius Vitellius.

Lucius Vitellius, Brother to the Emperour Vitellius, being benighted in a dangerous battaile: his Wife, named Triata, loued him so perfectly, as she entred disguised among the Souldiers, to beare her Husband company, and to assist him in life or death, fighting more valiantly then any of the rest. Thus did her intire loue make her forget feminin weakenesse, life and safety.

The loue of King Darius to his faire Q. Roxana.

Quintus Curtius reporteth, that King Darius being conquered by Alexander, and spoiled of a great part of his Kingdome: endured it with stout courage and patiently, without trouble, or shewing the least signe of sadnesse. But when newes was brought him, that his Queene and Wife was dead: to shew that hee loued her more then his royal dignitie; he wrong his hands, and could not containe, but wept bitterly. Ouid, Iuuinall, Martiall, and others, speaking of the worthy Wife to King Admetus, doe say: That shee (to giue life to her sickely Husband) slew her selfe, hauing heard answere from the Oracle, that his life should bee saued, if one of his dearest friends would dye for him. Notwithstanding, in the small credit giuen to Poets: I should haue spared this example, if holy Saint Hierome had not made mention thereof. The younger Pliny writeth in a Letter of his, that a Fisher-man was sicke of a grieuous and incurable disease, whereby he endured daily extreame Agonies. Which his Wife beholding with great compassion, louing him sincerely, seeing all hope of helpe vtterlie lost, & no remedy to be found, though all meanes possible had beene sought for: she councelled her Husband, not to liue any longer in this tormenting paine, but saide vnto him; that seeing he must needes dye, he should bid death welcome, and so end all grieuance. The Husband liked well of her aduise, and yeelded thereto, and they both getting vp on a high Rocke, the Wife bound her selfe fast to her Husband, and throwing themselues head-long downe, were bruised in many peeces.

The loue of queen Alcesta to her Husband Admetus

The loue of a poore Fisher-man and his wife, euen to the death.

Of a poore labouring man and his wife in the Kingdome of Naples.

Baptista Fulgosa declareth, that a poore labouring man in the Kingdome of Naples, trauailing along by the Sea side with his Wife: she chaunced to stay a while behind him, about some vrgent businesse. In which time of tarriance there arriued a Foist of Moores, who bearing her aboard: the poore man had no more sight of her, but onely of the Foyst, which launched off into the Sea, whereby hee conceiued, that the Moores had carried his Wife away with them. Hereupon, confounded with greefe, he threw himselfe into the Sea, and swum after the Foist, crying vnto them which were within it, that seeing they had taken his Wife from him; they would be pleased to take him also. Which made them take him vp into the Gally, to the no little amazement of the Moores, and great comfort, (though in floods of teare) of the woman. Afterward, they were both brought before the King of Thunis, to whom the Vessell belonged, and the whole Story beeing related to him, which mooued his mind to such great compassion: as he not onely deliuered them, but also sent them home againe.

The loue of Artemisia to her Husband Mausolus.

To speake likewise of the loue which Artemisia bare to her Husband Mausolus: wee must then consider, what a glorious Sepulcher shee builded for him, calling it Mausoleo, after his name, and rancked among the 7. wonders of the world, only for the costly workmanship thereof. The loue of Tiberius Graechus to his Wife, was likewise very admirable, and although the example bee stale and common, recited at large by Valerius Maximus, yet may we not well spare to speake thereof. He hauing found two Serpents, in the Bed Chamber where hee vsed to take his rest: desired to know the augury thereof, whereto he had answere. That he must needes kill one of them, yet with this caution: that if he killed the Male-Serpent, then he should dye before his Wife; but if the Female, then his wife should dye, and he remaine aliue. Whereupon, he louing his wife much better then himselfe, made effectuall demonstration thereof; when he chose rather to dye, then to behold the death of his Wife: for he slew the Male-Serpent, and dyed himselfe, leauing her to suruiue a widdow. But it is to be doubted, whether she was the most happie of both, in hauing such a Husband, or infortunate in the losse of him. Now, as concerning a two-fold Argument, where-whereby to approoue the ſinceritie of loue, to wit: a woman to kill her ſelfe, for greefe and feare of her Husbands death, or elſe, to mourne in ſuch contriſting manner, as death to enſue vpon meere ſorrow.

The loue of Tiberius Graechus to his wife.

A double Argument of loue.

Concerning the firſt of theſe, wee haue already related in the ſtory of fair Alceſta; and for the other, we haue a notable example in Iulia, the Daughter to Iulius Cæſar, and Wife to Pompey. The garment of her husband being brought vnto her, gaſhed and all bloody with a wound which he had receiued: ſhe imagining her Husband to be ſlaine, before ſhe had leyſure to heare the cauſe thereof, fell into ſuch a ſtrange conceipt and alteration; as her vnderſtanding was quite loſt, and being immediatly deliuered of a Childe (where-with ſhe had long gone great) inſtantly died. And her death ended the worlds peace, which (by her meanes) was preſerued in the kinred of Iulius Cæſar the Father, and Pompey her Husband. The loyalty of Lucretia towards her Husband, is ſo notable, as now it were needleſſe to report it: for, loathing to liue defamed, after her chaſt body was adulterated, ſhe reſoluedly ſlew her ſelfe. The loue of the wife to Count Fernand Gonçales, is alſo very memorable, & likewiſe the meanes whereby ſhe deceiued the king: for ſhe remained Priſoner in the habite of a man, while her Husband fled, and ſaued his life in her womans garments. There are infinit examples to this purpoſe, which (for auoyding prolixitie) I forbeare to ſet down, and although (by our lawes) none are allowed to kill themſelues: yet are theſe examples worthy to be noted & conſidered, conſidering they were performed by Paganes and Gentiles, not hauing any light or knowledge of our Faith.

The loue of Iulia, daughter to Cæſar, and Wife to Pompey.

The loue of the Romaine Lucretia.

The Wife of Count Fernand Gonſales.

CHAP. XV.

Of diuers cuſtomes, which our ancient forefathers obſerued in their Marriages.

MArriage contracteth it ſelfe, with the ſole conſent of the man and woman: but to the end, that this conſent might be the better authoriſed, and remaine in intire perfection; it was thought requiſite, to ſhew the ſame by wordes and outward ſignes, becauſe none but God onely knoweth and vnderſtandeth our harts, & hence it proceeded, that men inſtituted many ceremonies and ſollemne wordes. As for thoſe which are obſerued among Chriſtians; they are ſo euident and notorious, as there is no need to ſpeak of thē. Wherefore, I will onely diſcourſe of ſome cuſtomes, which barbarous nations, and the Romaines alſo vſed in their marriages, the diuerſity whereof (it may be) will yeild ſome pleaſure.

Single conſent is the act of Marriage.

The ancient Romaines, according to Cicero, were married in two kinds, and they had two manner of wiues or women, anſwerable to the diuers ceremonies of their marriages: the one was more common then the other, and ſhe named her ſelfe Matrone; the other was ſtiled Mother of the family. Of this latter kind, it ſeemeth that they were maried, as (well-neere) Chriſtians now adaies are. For the Husband would demaund of the woman, if ſhe would bee Mother & Miſtreſſe of his Family; and ſhe anſwering, yea; gaue her conſent. She likewiſe then demanded of him, if he would be Father of the Family, and he anſwering alſo, yea: then they took and ioyned their hands together, and this form of marriage was held for lawfull. By this meanes, the wife attained to ſuch place in her husbands houſe & family, as ſhe ſhould haue had, if ſhe had bin a Daughter of the ſame houſe: for now ſhe was ranked in the number of the ſame linage, & (as a daughter) came to ſucceed in hir husbands inheritance. Hereof Boetius ſpeaketh more amply, in the ſecond of Ciceroes Topicks. The other ceremonie was more common, & by ordinary words: and ſuch weomen were not accepted as mothers of families, albeit they were termed Matrones.

Cicero in Topic. Two kinds of Marriage among the Romaines.

The firſt kind of Marriage.

Boetius in ſecund. Topic. Cicero. The ſecond kind of Marriage.

The Romaines had alſo this cuſtome, that bringing the new married wife to her Husbands dwelling; ſhe muſt ſtay at the doore, and not enter, vntill ſhee were (perforce) drawn in. Giuing therby to vnderſtand, that ſhe went by conſtraint to the place, where ſhee was to looſe her virginity. When they gaue the wife into her husbands power, they firſt cauſed her to ſit downe in her mothers lap; frō whence the husband muſt forcibly forcibly fetch her, while the Daughter held faſt her Mother with ſtrong embracings. This they obſerued as an auncient memory of the Romaines, when they forcibly fetcht the Sabine Virgines from their mothers: by means of which rapture, it ſucceeded well to Rome, and greatly encreaſed their people. And yet before they proceeded thus farre, it was an order eſtabliſhed; that the Bride ſhould touch both Fire and Water, which Ceremony they vſed (according to Plutarch and Lactantius) as ſignifying generation by theſe two Elements, becauſe they are the two principall generatiue cauſes of all thinges. Others ſay, it was done to the end, to ſhew the wife ſincerity of heart, and loyalty by her to be kept: becauſe water waſheth away all vncleanneſſe, and bad mixions are purged by fire, as wee may diſcerne in Mettals. They held likewiſe (as a very euill preſage or augury) any marriages made in the month of May; in regard of ſome vanities and ſuperſtitions remaining among them, which are largely reported by Ouid and Plutarch.

Another cuſtome of the Romaines.

The Sabine virgins brought perforce from their mothers

Plutar in Prob. Lact. in lib. 1. de Inſtit. Diuin.

Ouid de Faſt. Plutar. in Prob.

They had alſo another Cuſtome, that when the Bride entred the doore of her Husbands houſe: he ſhould ſay (with a loude voyce) Caia Cecilia, and ſhe, Caio Cecilio. This they obſerued, becauſe Tarquinius Priſcus, ſeauenth K. of the Romaines, had a wife moſt chaſt, wiſe, and endued with many vertues, who was named Caia Cecilia, but before ſhe came to Rome, ſhee was called Tanaquill: and therefore the Husband pronounced theſe wordes, to put his Wife in minde of that vertuous Woman, that was a Crowne and honour to her Husband. There went one alſo before the Bride, home to the doore of her Husbands dwelling, carrying a diſtaffe laden with Flaxe, and a Spindle hanging by; to put her in minde, that ſhe ſhould exerciſe ſpinning: Pliny is the Authour that ſpeaketh theſe things.

Caia Cecilia. Caio Cecilio.

Huſwifely inſtruction.

Plin. in lib. 8. Cap. 40.

Theſe Romaines had yet another cuſtome, that when a man married a widdow; the ſollemnity was kept on a feaſtiuall day; but if he wedded a Maide; then it was kept on an ordinary working day. Macrobius and Plutarch are the Authors hereof; and Plutarch ſaith, that the nuptiall celebration made on the Feaſt-day, was expreſſely ſo done: becauſe the people beeing then buſied at playes and recreations, ſhould take no knowledge when Widdowes were ſecondly married. Contrariwiſe, the weddings of Maides were ſolemnized on working daies, becauſe they ſhould be ſeene and knowne generally. But Macrobius affirmeth, that Maides nuptials were not performed on feaſtiuall daies; becauſe (as we haue already ſaide) of the Ceremonie, of forcibly fetching them from their mothers laps, which could not be done vpon any feaſt day.

Of Marriage and what daies

Macrob. lib. 4. Plutar. in Prob.

I forbeare to ſpeake of other ſollemnities and Ceremonies among the Romaines, to come to them of the Babylonians, whoſe forme of marrying their Maids was thus. On a certaine daie in the yeare, the Maides were brought into a publike place of the Citie, where marriage was graunted to them that were the faireſt: but not any dowrie to be giuen with the Maide, for thee was then deliuered to him that would giue moſt Mony for her. The ſame order they obſerued in the ſecond degree of beautie, and ſo in all other degrees, to the very meaneſt and ſimpleſt: who if they could not bee married without Mony, they then muſt giue it, that had the faireſt Wiues, by which meanes, ſome vnſightly and hard fauoured Maides, were as well married as the brighteſt beauty, without bringing any Mony with them. Marcus Antonius Sabellicus ſaith, that this was alſo a Cuſtome among the ancient Venetians: but then you muſt vnderſtand, that ſuch as were of meaneſt handſomnes, brought no dowries with them, neither did they receiue any, or bought them, but took them freely.

Of marriages amongſt the Babylonians.

Wiues had for the moſt Mony.

Marcus Antonius Sabellicus.

The ancient French-men, becauſe their Daughters ſhould not complaine of beeing married againſt their wils, they had a Cuſtome, that at ſuch time as their Daughters were fit for marriage; they would inuite a great number of young men to a Banquet: but they were men of ſuch qualitie, as might each way be anſwerable to their owne condition. In this Banquet time, the maid had free leaue to elect a Husband among the inuited: and, for a publique ſigne, where, and on whom her affecti-

An ancient Cuſtome among the French, for marrying their Daughters.

on

A marriage Custome in Affrica.

on was placed, shee brought him a Bason of Water to wash his hands. In a Citty of Affrica, called Leptina, they had a Custome, that the first day of a Brides comming to her Husbands house; she should send to borrow an earthen pot of her Mother in Law, and she would returne answere of lending her none. This was done to no other end, but to teach her obedience to her Husbands Mother: and having so hard an answere at the first motion, to expect no better, but on good desert. The * Massagetæ tooke each Man a Wife in Marriage; and yet notwithstanding, one Woman was common to all, and all the Weomen common to any one. Eusebius saith, that the ancient Bretons had the like Custome. The Arabians of Arabia Felix, had an ancient wont, that a married Woman was common to al her Husbands kinred. And Strabo saith, that when any of them went to her, he would leaue a Ring or Iewell at the entrance of her doore; that if any other should come, he might know the place was already taken vp, and he not enter, for this was especially respected among them: beside, he was punnished with death, that made vse of any Woman not of his owne kinred.

* People of Scythia in Asia beyond the Caspian Sea.

Eusseb de Euan prep. lib. 5.

Strabo concerning the Arabians.

It fortuned, that a Woman highlie endued with beauty, was often visited (in that kind) by her Husbands kinred, and she beeing importuned by so frequent visitation: left a Ring at her doore, that whosoeuer should come, might suppose the place to be alreadie supplied. This honest deceipt endured many daies together, & no man could get entrance, till at the last, all her husbands kinred being (one day) assembled in a certaine place: one of them closely slipt away, intending to visite her, in such an assurance of any other. But finding the Ring at the doore, and remembring that hee had left all the kinred else (but himselfe) together: hee supposed some Adulterer to haue intruded; whereupon he ran to aduertise her Husband and the rest. But they being entred, found her alone at her worke, and she confessed to them, the cause of thus deceiuing them, and keeping her selfe onely to her Husband. When they had well considered thereon, and found her intention to bee grounded on vertue, for auoyding of dishonest conuersation, arising by such number of her Husbands kinred, to liue in the greater temperance and chastity, sworne enemie to the brutall vsage and Custome of the Countrey: their own reason confirmed her honorable minde, and in stead of condemning, they highly commended her.

A pretty Story incident to the purpose.

An admirable vertue in an Heathen woman, for loue to her Husband.

CHAP. XVI.

¶ Who were the first Inuenters of Letters, and of Latine Syllables.

IT is not to bee doubted, but (among all the Inuentions of Men) that of Letters was the best and chiefest: for, to present iudgement, they deliuer things long since past, and communicate businesses which are furthest off; nay more, they make a Man (almost) immortall, so that, if it were not for Letters, there had neuer beene so many wise men in the World. Therefore the Latines are highly beholding to Nicostrata, Daughter to Ionius, King of Arcadia, who after the death of her Husband (by whom shee had her Sonne Euander) leauing Arcadia; came into Italie, and made her stay on the Mount called Pallatine, or Palatium, neer to the Riuer of Tyber, where now Rome standeth. There she builded a Castle, whereof she made her Sonne Euander Lord, and then shee married with Faunus, King of the Laurentines. She being excellent and skilful, in foretelling matters to ensue; most learned in the Greeke Carracters; and endued with an extraordinary ingenious spirit: inuented nineteene newe Carracters of Letters, which she her selfe taught to the grosse and vulgar people.

Letters the best of all other inuentions.

Nicostrata the first Inuentresse of Letters.

After her, one named Syluius, Maister of the Plaies or sportes, found out the Letters H. K. and Q. albeit they are no Letters, but Aspirations. The Greekes afterward, in the time of Saint Augustine, found and receiued the two Letters X and Z. And so they all were ranked ranked together, euen in such manner, as now we haue them. The people wondring at the wisedome of their Lady Nicostrata, named her a Goddesse while she liued, and began to render honours to her, as to a Diuinity. After her death, they erected a Temple to her in Rome, neere the Capitall, and dedicated it to her name.

Syluius the Maister of the Sports.

Dyonisius Lycinius the Romaine, a man very ingenious, found and deuised (afterward) the order of Syllables. For which inuention, they made him a Statue, and exalted it in meete place, and for his honour.

Dyonisius Lycinius the Inuenter of Syllables.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Valasca, a Lady of Bohemia, who hauing procured all the Ladies in the kingdome, to kill their Fathers, Husbands, Brethren and Children; gouerned Bohemia the space of seauen yeares.

LEt me quicken your memory, with some-thing spoken in the two and twentith Chapter of our first Booke, where speaking of the Amazones. Æneas Syluius (who was Pope Pius the second) is remembred, concerning his Historie of the Bohemians, and the Women of that Countrey. Among whom Valasca, a Lady of incomparable Spirit, deserueth to haue her Historie not vtterly forgotten: because it is very memorable, and why shee conceiued such great hatred against the Bohemians.

Valasca, a worthy Ladie of Bohemia.

You must know then, that Crocus, second Duke of the Bohemians, dying without issue Male: his Daughter Libussa (accounted for one of the Sybilles) with fauour and applauses of the common people, was established in the royall seate of her Father, and gouerned the Prouince for many yeares, to the generall liking of euery one. At length, hauing giuen a very vpright sentence, of some possession belonging to a powerful Lord: the (growing much displeased with the iudgement) mooued the people against her, saying: That it was a very vnworthy case, and the people greatly to be blamed, being of such a great and Noble Nation, that they should be subiected to the gouernment of a woman. Libussa obtaining silence of those hot seditious Vp-starts, told them; that she knew well enough their new desseigne and continued deliberation: yet they took her ouer-thwtt in satisfying their will. Wherefore, she prayed them to meet together the day following, and shee would labour to content them in all things, for she desired their contentment aboue all things else. The morrow being come, the popularity flocked together in mightie troops, and being (from all parts) congregated in a principall place, and they all attentiue to heare Libussa, the Princesse began to speake in this manner.

Libussa heire to the Kingdome of Bohemia.

The people mooued against Libussa, in regard of her sexe.

You know (Bohemians) that (to this day) I haue bin to you a milde & peaceable Lady and Mistresse, without offending any one of you, much lesse vsurping vpon your goods: whereby you iustly conceiue, that you had not me as a Dutchesse, but rather as a Mother. Neuertheleese, for ought I can perceiue, mine administration hath beene scarce pleasing to ye, whereat I do not much meruaile: for herein you imitate all other men, who neuer are satisfied, but can rather wish for a milde and iust Gouernour, then they know how to keepe him when they haue him. For mine owne part, very gladlie doe I (at this instant) set yee at libertie: and as you desire a man, to rule and awe ye after his manner; so am I contented that you shall haue such a one. Wherefore, take my white Palfray, and bridling and adorning him in his best furniture, bring him forth on this plaine, whence he may take his way whether he will alone. But cease not you to follow him, till you see him stay before a man, feeding vpon a table of Iron; whom bring hither with you, and he shall bee your Prince, and my Husband.

The Oration of Libussa before all the people.

These words were pleasing to them all, and furnishing the Horsse; as Libussa had directed, so they suffered him to wander loose, and they following after. The Horsse hauing gone the distance of tenne Miles, stayed at a River called Biell, and there hee stood gazing on a Country Boore; named * Primislaus, to whom hee shewed many many Horſe-trickes, whinnowing and leaping before him, as if he would haue made open notice, that he knew him to be his Maiſter. The Bohemians, as well Nobles as Plebeians, ranne quickly to the place, and hauing ſaluted the plaine Villager, ſaid vnto him: Mount vpon this Horſe, and goe with vs to the Princeſſe Libuſſa, for thee requireth you as her Husband, and the Bohemians will accept ye as their Prince. Primiſlaus, although he was ruſtical, yet notwithſtanding (as it is a generall deſire to rule, and no man but will conceite himſelfe worthy enough of it:) vſed them very courteouſly, and ſaide; hee was ready to obey them, in whatſoeuer they would commaund him. And hauing heard he muſt goe viſite Libuſſa, it beeing a long iourney (as he ſuppoſed) to her, and not hauing broken his faſt that day: hee turned his Ploughſhare or Coulter, where-with hee had laboured in the fielde, and ſetting Bread and Cheeſe thereon, fell hartilie to feeding. This was an euident Teſtimony to the Bohemians, of the words vſed by Libuſſa to them: whereat beeing ſomewhat amazed, they dutifullie attended vntill he had dined. When he had ended, hee mounted vpon the Horſe, and they conducted him to the Citty; where he martied the Dutcheſſe Libuſſa, who ſo long as ſhee liued, was partly gouerned by the aduiſe of her Husband. But ſhe beeing dead, the Kingdome remained to Primiſlaus, and and ſo the authority of women ceaſed, which (till that time) was made very famous by Libuſſa.

* Of this Primislaus, the [illegible] Duke of [illegible], mention is made by Baptiſta Fulgoſius, in his 2. booke of Memorable actions.

This meketh me to remember Q. Cincinnatus, who from the Plough, was called to the Office of Dictator.

But then Valaſca, a young Lady, and of high courage, equalling any of the Amazones, who had ſerued Libuſſa as Secretarie to her cloſeſt counſels: ſhee could not endure that the power of Weomen ſhould thus bee dejected, but aſſembling her company on a daie in ſecret, ſhe vttered theſe, or the like ſpeeches.

The Oration of Valaſca to all her Noble Sisters.

My deare Siſters, we haue left our great and royall Miſtreſſe, who alwaies maintained the ſubiection of Men, and neuer could endure that they ſhould be Maiſters: but liued like an Empreſſe, & we (with her) as if we were Queens. But now we ſee (miſerable that we are) how wee muſt be curbed all the reſt of our dayes, vnder the ſlauiſh yoake of Males; whereby we ſhall be in a much worſe condition then Slaues, except wee can regaine our former freedome. Whereof if you conſidered as deepely as I doe, and that all your harts were like to mine: I would not doubt, but that eaſily wee might recouer our firſt condition. I haue beene (as you all well know) of moſt priuate counſell with Libuſſa, and haue learned her beſt knowledge, both in Enchantments, and compounding Druggeries, fit and conuenient for our purpoſe. If then you will yeelde to follow me; without faile we will haue a new regency ouer Men. All the Weomen hauing heard Valaſca, thought well of her ſprightlie motion, and conſenting to her aduiſe, the conſpiracy was inſtantly plotted againſt the men.

Valaſcaes counſell fully allowed.

While theſe affaires were thus working, one night Primiſlaus had a dream, that a virgine gaue him blood to drink, and he (hauing learned of Libuſſa, as alſo by others inſtructions, ſundry ſecrets of diuination) growing fearefull of this dreame: was carefull to foreſee, and remedy al harms before hand, that might prelage any future perill. And calling al the greateſt Lords of his land to conſultation, his maine intention was; to repreſſe the ouer-bold liberty of Women, and to reſtraine them within ſtricter bounds. For the Ladies of the countrey had a cuſtome to ride great horſes, to run, louſt, draw the Bow, hunt, and throw Darts: in breefe, they made vſe of all exerciſes, that were conuenient for Men onelie. Which made the Gentlemen generally, to deſpiſe the humor of their baſe minded Prince: telling him: that women, by their ſoupleneſſe of body, and gallantry of ſpirit, were much more worthy to be cheriſhed & loued, then men of ſottiſh and idle diſpoſition. Valaſca (all this while) ceaſed not day and night, ſtill to harten on the coniured Siſter-hood, and effectually prepared the Tragicall act, threatned againſt the Mens liues: giuing them diuers Beuarages and Enchantments, to diuert their affecting thoughts from mē, winning (day by day) many married wiues, to ranke themſelues in this band and faction.

The Dreame of Primiſlaus.

A Cuſtome obſerued by the women of Bohemia.

The care and endeuour of Valaſca, in proſecutiō of her purpoſe.

And at length, when they had leuied a good

The bloody Stratagem of Valasca.

good and sufficient number, as well of married as vnmarried: the Stratagem was this, that in one night, Women shold kill their Fathers, Husbands, Brethren, & Male Children, as they lay sleeping in their Beds, by potions purposely prepared for thē. Which being accordingly performed, the women were all in Armes, and mustering at a place appointed by Valasca, which was not far from the Citty of Praga, where conquering some that made resistance; they went on to Vissagrada, for Primislaus made there his abiding, and there they purposed to entrap him. But perceiuing they could not surprize the Fortresse, they with-drew to a Mountain (a place naturally very strong) and there they builded a Castle, that they named Dieuize, to wit; The Mountaine of Virgins, for (in their language) Virgines are termed Dieuize. To all such as escaped this bloody massacre, this exploit seemed strange and abhominable: for they saw how their number daily encreased, and feared that all the rest would flocke vnto them. Whereupon, they made it knowne to Primislaus, that they were readie, and likewise resolued, to giue battell to these new vpstart Amazones: willing him to march forth with his Army, and they would ioyne their forces with him. The Prince gaue them to vnderstand, that (as then) he could not goe foorth; because the Gods had aduertised him, that all such should dye, as instantly offended the Women, and therefore the busines must be referred to some other apter time. But they (making no account of this answere) hauing prouided a powerfull Army of their owne; went directly to Dieuize, where comming to handy-strokes with Valasca, all the men were discomfited, not without great losse and slaughter of the most part of them. The Ladies that carried themselues worthily in this daies seruice, wer named Malada, Nodea, Suata, Verasta, Radzca, Zastana, and Trastana, and to each of them was giuen (as a deserued guerdon of their valour) rich Chaines and Bracelets of Gold; and of the great booties won by them, they were all recompenced according to their merites. Valasca slew in this conflict seuen of the very chiefest enemies, beside many other of meaner quality, and euery one supposed her to be a Goddesse.

The Mount of Virgins.

War purposed against the women.

A happy and fauorable day for the women, preuailing valiantly against the men.

After this ouerthrow of the Bohemians, they had not the boldnesse to molest the women any way. For the bold on in their valiant resolution, making daily fallies out vpon the borders, spoiling and burning in such wise, that they were dreaded ech day more then other. And being become Mistresses (as cleere) of all Bohemia, they were enforced to haue Commerce, Traffike and communication with men, or else their estate would grow to nothing. Whereupon, they were contented to marry, notwithstanding a law made among the to the contrary. Adding to this law, that their Daughters should be nurtured and instructed among themselues: but the sons should be kept by their fathers, hauing first their right eies put out, and those fingers cut off, which wee call Thumbes; because (if they should be men, they should not be able to shoot in a Bow, or manage any other Armes against their Mothers. Indeed, Valasca hauing vexed Bohemia the space of 7. yeares, and brought it (almost) wholly tributary to her: was beguiled by Primislaus. For he wrote Letters vnto her, wherein he signified, that those Lordes and Gentlemen which had moued war against her; did it without his consent, and to his great disliking, which made him the better pleased, with such their punishment as they had iustly receiued. Moreouer, that he held her as his deare daughter, not enuying her gouernment of Bohemia: because she had bin secretary to his Wife, and had (with such wisedome and courage) maintained her rule fully seuen yeares. That he felt himselfe now aged, and was become vnable to sway his people, and his Son not being of conuenient age, for gouernment of so weighty a charge: hee entreated her to come to Vissagrade, and he would surrender the Fortes into her power, by meanes whereof she should wholly subdue Bohemia. Prouided, that she would (afterward) allow such a part or portion to his Sonne, as her selfe should thinke fit of, and as hee himselfe (at first) had allowed, by Libussa her Princesse & Mistris, which he referred to her owne trust only. As for himselfe, he was well pleased to return to his first condition, to dwell againe in the Village, from whence hee came much against his mind. For he accounted it very reasonable, and an act of duty; that as hee had receiued his Scepter from a Woman; so he should render it againe to a woman.

The Bohemians driue not out the women.

Pp 2 con-

Valasca was deceiued by the false Letter from Primislaus.

This Letter beeing sealed and sent, was not a little pleasing to Valasca, for she beleeuing ouer-lightly (according to the Nature of her sexe) sent a Squadron of her armed Ladies, to take possession of those impregnable places: whereinto being entred, they were entertained with dances, feasts, and plaies. Primislaus inuited them to a Banquet in his Pallace, and in the meane while, as they sate at the Tables; a great troop of well armed Gallants (which hadde beene closely ambushed for the purpose) rushed into the Hall, where the vnfortunate Ladies were all slaine by them: which beeing done, the power of Primislaus (being a very potent Army) marched foorth-with to Diuuize.

All the Ladies slain by treason.

Valasca hauing notice of this strange mishap, stood as one confounded with amazement, and putting on her Armour presently; issued forth of her Castle, mounted on a Courser, that seemed to breath Fire, hee was so full of Spirit. Many of her worthiest Ladies followed her; but she was the first that encountred the Army: where discouering more valiancy then I am able to expresse, beeing ouerthrowne in the thickest crowd of enemies, shee there ended her daies. Her famous followers, hearing the death of their peereleſſe Queene and Mistresse: fought stoutlie and courageously, not in any hope of conquest, but rather to be reuenged on the false treason of men, so that the conflict was very furious and cruell. But loosing the day, they were put to flight, and the Vissagradians pursuing them: got into the Castle as soone as they, where closing fast the gates, they made a mercileſſe slaughter of the Weomen.

Valasca slaine in the midst of her enemies, and all her Ladies quite vanquished.

Thus was Behemia deliuered from the Dominion of Weomen, and Valasca (worthy to be ranked among the most illustrous Weomen) was allowed no buriall, but left as foode to the beastes and Fowles of the Ayre.

Behemia deliuered from womens gouernment

CHAP. XVIII.

Who were the first Inuenters and deuisers of Hospitals; At what time, and vpon what occasion.

IT is not found recorded in any Histories, either Iewish, Ægyptian, Grecian, Romaine, or of other Nation, that at any time they founded or builded any Hospitals, for entertainment and releefe of poor needy people, sicke, lame, impotent, past labour, and for the nourishing of children, exposed and forsaken of Father and Mother: but since the Christian Faith was receiued among men. For, in former times, such as were lame and maimed; slew themselues, despairing to find any charity among men. Such as were weake and sickly, hauing no meanes to helpe themselues: did make a publike sale of their liues, to share in some part of the price, and being recouered; both they and their posterity were made Slaues. As for Orphane Children, they (by Ciuill Lawes) were slaues to such as paid for their education: And these were Pagans Hospitals in ancient daies. The world was then flint-harted, beholding what men suffered, without any pitty or compassion.

Pagans without Charitie, and no Hospitals of releef, but since Christianity began.

Paganes Hospitals.

No man would then know the diuersity of torments, wherwith poor Christians were continually afflicted. And because some imagined, that death was such a punnishment, as gaue end to all the calamities of this world: to preuent such pittie, they would plucke forth an eie, or break a bone in the thigh, of such as were Christians, And, though the bone tooke no hold againe, but easilie might be heard by crackling: yet must they be sent into the Mines to dig in the earth, and performe other labours that were insupportable. These persecutions ceased, when Constantine the great had attained to the Romaine Empire (by his valour and magnanimity) who was a Christian, and he reuoked all Edictes against Cruell Edicts made against Christians.

Constantine the Great.

By what meanes Christians were discouered.

against the Christians, and then Charity began to be publikely exercised. For in former times, Christians were noted by their good liues (and Charity which they extended to the poore) whereof there was then great store: in regard of the confiscation of their goods, and the forenamed mutilations, that Countries were (in a manner) couered with people, and Almes would not stretch to help so many.

Euseb. Hist. Eccles. Lib. 10.

Heere you must consider, that scarsly the sixt part of the people (at the most) were then Christians: for the Paganes (that hated them) would giue them nothing, and there were none else but Christians to relieue them; the distribution of whose meanes became so shortned, as they had labour enough to prouide for themselues. And that which most augmented the poore in number, was the preseruation of Christians frō persecution, who durst make shew of themselues, after the Coronation of Great Constantine, and had expressed their Charity, by buying the liberty of slaues, that were become Christians, and being expulsed by their Maisters, had no releese, but what they got by begging.

Toto titul. de Episc. & Cler.

Hereupon, the Christians (to continue their charitable disposition) at the instance of their Bishops, entreated the Emperor, that care and respect might be had of the poore, and Hospitals to be builded, wherein the aged, poore, maimed, Orphanes, Weomen, Widdowes, and people eyther past, or vnable to labor, might be relieued. Whereto he condiscended, himselfe first beginning to build many, & gaue command, that the like should be done thoroughout his Empire: which yet was not performed, but in those places where the Christians most abounded. Thirty yeares after, his Nephew Iulian cōming to the Empire, albeit he was no Christian, but an Apostata: yet notwithstanding, he continued on the building and erection of Hospitals. As may be found in his Epistles, which he wrote to Byshops and Proconsuls, and to the Cities of Asia, saying. They might be ashamed, in not following the example of Christians, who founded Temples and Hospitals for them of their Religion; but in them was found no Charity, but all Couetousnesse. After the death of this Iulian, who raigned but two years; Idolatry began to shrinke by little and little, so that there was hardly any place in our Hemisphere, but it became well stored with Christians, by which means (the Christians being no more persecuted) they had opportunity to found many Hospitals, according to their Countries and dwellings. Bishops and Popes builded some in Rome, and prouided great reuennues for them. The Emperors in the East, in Italy, and an infinite number of other Princes in diuers Prouinces, as at this day is to be seene.

Emperours & Bishops, charitable in building hospitals

In the end, by course of time, those Hospitals sufficed not, to entertaine so many as were brought thither, and the Children forsaken of their Parents. Which Gratian the Emperour perceiuing (who raigned the yeare of Christ, 380.) He made ordenances, whereby was appointed, that euery Orphane-Childe, should remaine as a Slaue to his Fosterer, and Nourisher. Within a while after, the Emperor Valens gaue generall authoritie, to take vp all begging Vagabonds, that were not sicke or impotent; and to make them serue as Slaues. Prohibiting also, that none should goe into Woods or Forrestes, to liue there as Hermits: for he caused a great number to suffer death, that were retired thither, and he would haue no one liue idly, but all to take paines. In imitation (then) of this good Emperour Valens, such as haue the charge of Hospitals, and admitting poore people into them, for their releefe and gouernment ought to be carefull, that if they be sick and vnable to labour; then to entertaine them, or else to send them backe. For otherwise, they feede on goods giuen, against the will of the Founder, and contrary (indeede) to all equity: because they must allow of none, but the poore and needy, incapable of labour; and such are to be enquired after, whose modesty wronges their misery, and conceales them from open knowledge, while loytering wretches (by friendship) eate vp their right.

Orphane Children appointed to be Slaues.

Young and healthfull Beggers and Hermits made Slaues.

Now, as there are many inhumanities and rude behauiours, acknowledged to be done among the Turkes, and others that pertake in the Mahometane Law; yet most true it is, that they are amners;

The Emperor Constantine, first began the building of Hospitals.

Iulian the Apostata ordained Hospitals

The care of Hospitallers.

and willingly giue to the poore of their owne Sect, and haue founded, and yet doe builde many Hoſpitals of great Reuenewes: becauſe they are nothing ſo carefull, to leaue their Heires ſuch extremity of wealth, as we are in theſe parts of the world. For (well-neere) all of them, that eyther know how to manage Armes, or exerciſe any eſtate or condition, haue wages of the Prince. Such as are duputed to gouerne the goods of their Hoſpitals, are commonly Hermits, who ſtay not till any come to offer them themſelues: but goe to meete trauailers on the way, entreating them to come and accept a lodging, with promiſe of kinde entertainment, which accordingly is performed. And if they be lame, vnable, or ſick; they remaine there ſo long as they pleaſe. When they paſſe on farther, free leaue is granted them; & all the recompence required of them, is to pray to God for the founders ſoule. Their Hoſpitals are commonly builded on the chiefe and greateſt waies of Citties, and in places where Villages are moſt remote, and where water can hardly be found, preſuming vpon their larger merit. Beſide, many of the common people will feed dumb creatures, as wild Birds & beaſts; yea, Fiſhes in the Riuers, throwing in Bread or Corne, to ſuſtaine them for mans vſe.

The Turks are charitable, & not careful to leaue their heires rich.

Entertainmẽt in the Turkiſh Hoſpitals.

Of the Turkiſh Hoſpitals, there is one at the entrance of Mare Maiore, comming from Boſphorus, which a Daughter to the Emperour Solyman, the wife to Ruſtane Baſcha builded, and hath more then eight thouſand Ducates of annual rent. There is another, founded by a Baſcha, in the Iſle of Phermena, not far from Delos in Greece; which was in the time of Mahomet the ſecond, that conquered Conſtantinople. This Hoſpitall hath the reuennues of twelue thouſand ducates, and there are receiued all diſeaſed perſons, and others, without any exception of religion, poor or rich: They go to waſh themſelues in the hot Baths, which are ſulphurous, and neere adioyning to the Hoſpitall. But rarelie or ſildome in any other Hoſpitals within the Turkes Dominions, and founded by them; are any other entertained, then of their owne Religion. As concerning ſuch, as (in Antiquity) were

A verie rich Hoſpitall of the Turkes.

An Hoſpitall of free acceſſe of all, ſicke or ſound.

founded by Chriſtians, and are in theſe Lands ſubiected to the Turkes: all ſorts of people are there receiued and welcomed: and where any ſuch are, commonly a Moſque or Temple for Turkes is builded neere vnto it; as is to be ſeen on Mount Sinai, and elſe-where.

Hoſpitals erected by Chriſtians, in lands conquered by Turkes.

There is one in Conſtantinople, begun by Mahomet the ſecond, and finiſhed by Baiazeth his Sonne: which hath the reuennues of threeſcore thouſand Ducates. Another is in the ſame Cittie, of twelue thouſand Ducates annuall rent, founded by Solyman. Oreanes, the Son of Othoman, ſecond Emp. of the Turkes, builded another, in the yeare 1335. in a Towne named Plagiary, not farre from Callipolis, whoſe rentage is thirtie thouſand Ducates: Onely to this end, that poore people may there be entertained and lodged, and all other paſſengers; praying to God for his Fathers Soule, and ſixe of his Brethren, put to death by him, that hee might raigne alone in the more ſafe aſſurance.

The hoſpitals in Conſtantinople.

Oreanes, the Murderer of his ſixe Brethren.

A Perſian King, about the yeare 1550. cauſed a Moſquee to be builded in Armenia, with an Hoſpitall, endowing it with forty thouſand Ducates rent, at the Mountaine, on the top whereof Noahs Arke ſtayed. All ſuch as come to this Hoſpitall, going for deuotion to the ſaid Mountaine, be they Chriſtians (for there they haue a Chappell) Turkes, Moores, Arabes, or Scythians, of what Nation or Religion ſoeuer they be, ſicke or ſound; there they are entertained after the Armenian manner, three dayes and three nights, without payment for any thing. In Fez, the Capitall Citty of the Kingdome (the people beeing great obſeruers of the Mahometane Law) there are fiue faire Hoſpitals, endued with great reuenues, not onely for releefe of the poore: but alſo to teach and nouriſh (freely) yong poore Children in good Letters, or in Diuinity.

A rich Hoſpitall in Armenia, of moſt free and liberall entertainment for all commers.

Fiue goodly Hoſpitals in the Citty of Fez.

Theuet writeth (as likewiſe I haue vnderſtood by others, that haue beene in Quinſay, a Citty whereof we haue formerly related) that there is an Hoſpital of more then an hundred thouſand Ducates Reuennues, truely yearely paid. There, all perſons, of what Nation, religion, or ſexe ſoeuer they be, are enter-entertained; prouided that they be diſeaſed, or impotent; and there they are releeued with all thinges neceſſary, vntill ſuch time as they ſhal be able to trauaile. I neuer read or heard, that Idolatrous people had any Hoſpitals except this: but there needeth little admiration thereat, becauſe they are a people ful of great humanity and courteſie. Let not the Turkes then, and others, make their vaunt, that they were the firſt which inuented and builded Hoſpitals: for the honour is only due to the Chriſtians of the Primitiue Church.

Theuet. in Lib. 12. Cap. 18.

An Hoſpitall in an Idolaterous Country

CHAP. XIX.

Of an Embaſſage, which was ſent to Hippocrates the Phyſitian, by the Cõmonwealth of the Abderites, to come and ſuccour their Law-maker & King Democritus, whom they imagined to be a Foole, and out of his wit.

BEfore the Romaines hadde made Greece tributary there were great ſtore of Common-weals, Iſlands, Cities, & People, that liued according to their owne Lawes, without depending on any other, then ſuch as they elected to commaund ouer them: who (for the moſt part) were Phyloſophers, men of good life, renowned, & of great erudition. Theſe men were called Law-Makers or Kings, as Lycurgus who commanded ouer the Lacedemonians; Demetrius Phalereus, ouer the Athenians; Epaminondas ouer the Thebanes, and the like of many others. During this good pollicie among the Græcians, ther was a great and goodly Cittie and Commonwealth in Thrace, ſcituate on the Sea, called Abdera, the Prince and Ruler whereof, was deceaſed. Whilet they remained in ſuſpence, who ſhould bee elected into his place, that might be an honeſt man, not auaricious, carrying himſelfe with Princes, and neighbouring people louingly, and no affecter of warres: they did ſet downe their reſolution, that a Law-maker muſt bee endued with ſuch perfections, and ſuch a one would be moſt beneficiall to their Comm onwealth. For, albeit Cicero ſaith, that the Abderites had not ouer-much vnderſtanding: yet it appeared, that in the election of this Law-maker, they ſhewed themſelues to haue more wit then the Romaines had. For among ſo many braue and valiaunt men, as aſpired to this high eſtate, they made choiſe of one, named Democritus, one of the moſt Learned men in his time, vertuous, little caring for worldly goods, and had far trauailed; yea, he ſurpaſſed Plato, who then liued, and bare him great enuy.

The great freedome and libertie of Greece, vnder the gouernement of Phyloſophers

Abdera of Thrace.

Cicer. in lib. de Natu. Deorum.

Democritus his Nature & life

This Democritus was not choſen for his Wealth, becauſe he was poore; nor yet by fauour, as hauing any Kindred in this great Common-wealth: for hee was a Myleſian, Sonne to a verie famous and rich man, named Anthenocritus, who had ſuch ſubſtantiall meanes, that hee maintained a whole day the Army of Xerxes, when it came into Greece, and the number of men in the ſaide Armie, was tenne times ſeauenteene hundered thouſande men.

Anthenocritus, Father to Democritus.

Diog. Laert. de Democrit.

This Anthenocritus, left many Children, the youngeſt whereof, was Democritus, who would haue nothing but money (& no other worldly poſſeſsions) but not to put to Vſurie, or ſpend fooliſhly, but to ſerue his trauailes in the Worlde, in Countries where he knew were Learned men, that taught good Sciences and Vertues, and he obtained this degree among the Abderites, onely by his good Fame, as formerly hath bin ſaid.

He had trauailed thorow the very chiefeſt parts of the world; as into Egypt, Caldea, Perſia, and into the Indiaes, to heare the Gymnoſophiſts. And hauing Learned ſo much as hee could, hee returned home into his owne Country very poor; and hauing conſumed all his Patrimony; a Brother of his, named Damaſes, in charity receiued him, and maintained him for ſome ſmall time: but it was not long (after his returne but his wiſedome and great Knowledge began to bee knowne. For, hee had Learned that there was a God; that there was a Creation, & ſhold be an ending of the World; and he wanted very little of the ſame beleefe, which the true Church of God hath. Hee publiſhed many Bookes, which diſcourſed of things Naturall and Morrall. In briefe; he wrote of all the Sciences, and ſo Learnedly, that his Fame flew into many places.

The trauailes of Democritus.

The great wiſedom and Learning of Democritus.

ces. So that the Abderites (with good aduiſe and counſell) ſent for him to their Cittie, to be commanded by him. He finding the Cittie wholly deuided, and embrouilled with factions, proceeded ſo dexterioufly, that he brought them al to vnity, and made them good friends. He found alſo the Common-wealth full of vices, and abounding in Luxury, which (by good Lawes) he reformed, and exerciſed Iuſtice as well on the rich as poore. He found the meanes likewiſe to accord certaine Neighboring Prouinces, which warred on the Abderites. He inſtituted Gouernors in all places on the frontiers; as alſo on the Seacoaſts, ſuch as were honeſt minded men, and not Ambitious. Which being done, hee liued with the Cittizens ſome yeares; and perceyuing them to be well reformed, and that they had no more need of his lawes, hee made his retirement to a ſollitarie place, to attend on his Phyloſophy, highly contemning all matters of the worlde, which are nothing but true vanities; well knowing, that they deſerued not to be ſorrowd for, becauſe Heraclitus did nothing elſe; and daily therfore he laughed them to ſcorn.

The cõming of Democritus to the Abderites.

The pollicie of Democritus.

The retreate of Democritus from the Abderites.

Without the City, and verie neere vnto the wals, there was a tree, which wee commonly call a Plane-tree, ſomewhat low, yet extending his branches very amply: vnder which, he ſat vpon a ſtone continually alone, hauing no other garment but a long gowne of courſe ſtuffe, barefooted, his viſage pale, with a long beard, & his body very meager. Somwhat neer vnto him, there ran a riuer diſcending out of a neighboring little hill, wheron ſtood a temple dedicated to the nimphs, round enuironed with wild Vines, hauing good ſtore of Bookes by him, and diuerſitie of creatures, whereof he diſſected ſome, ſetting inſtantly downe what his experience taught him. At other times, he wold ruminate and confer with his vnderſtãding, things that he had both ſeen and read: & when he was weary with Anatomizing, hee would walke abroad; and returning home again, quietly ſet him down. Now as this place, was not farre off from the chiefe Lady gate of the Cittie, & Hauen of the Sea: ſo could he both heare & ſee the weeping and wraſtling of the thicke leafed trees, being round planted about his field Cabinet, as alſo of people ſuffering Shipwrack, mourning for their Parents, Kindred, Merchandizes, or other loſſes. If contentions happened among any men, ſome being preſently ſlain in the place, greeuouſly wounded, or ſuch like dangerous accidents: others looſing goods, either by proceſſe in Law, or inconuenience of fire, or mortality of cattle, or ſome contagious diſeaſe hapning among men; at all theſe caſualties and accidents he made a mockery and laughter. He would do the like, when he ſaw a man heartily reioyce, that his Shippe (richly Laden) was ſafely arriued in the Hauen, and made a good aduenture. To be ſhort, all humain actions which came to his knowledge, whither they had good or euill ſucceſſe, he would laugh at them.

The place where he made his abiding.

How he ſpent his time daily

What ſights he dayly beheld.

Democritus laughed at all accidents whatſoeuer.

This hauing many times bin obſerued by the Abderites, and ſuppoſing him to be trobled in his vnderſtanding, they began (by little and little) to wax weary of him, and the whole Country to be offended at him. Whereupon, they entred into conſultation, to vnderſtand their beſt maner of proceeding in this caſe, and the more part of the beſt aduiſed, were deſirous of remedy, imagining that it was but ſome diſeaſe in the braine, which procured his extraordinary laughters. In which reſpect it was thought conuenient, to craue the iudgement of ſome skilful Phiſition, ſuch as was Hippocrates of Coos, who dwelt an 150. miles from thence, and had doone many verie famous cures. Among which (not long before) he recouered Perdiccas King of Macedon, who was falne into an extreame meagerneſſe of al his bodie; & (withall) was become ſo melancholy, that he would not ſee any body, but ſate penſiuely alone, void of all appetite for food or reſt, ſo that his diſeaſe was reputed incureable. Neuertheleſſe, Hippocrates (by his induſtry) found out the cauſe of his ſickneſſe, to wit; That hee was amorous of one of his Fathers Concubines formerly deceaſed, named Phylas, and in regard of naturall ſhame or baſhfulneſſe, he would not diſcouer it to any one. Yet it being at length perceiued by ſom neer about him; by the learned skill of Hippocrates, he was quickly cured. Moreouer, he had deliuered the whole Countrey of Selauonia frõ a peſtilence, after he vnderſtood by the Ambaſſadors, which the K. of that Land ſent vnto him, what windes blew there with greateſt power. Manie other excellẽt cures (almoſt diuine) are further

Democritus was ſuppoſed by the Abderites to be mad

Perdiccas, K. of Macedon, extreamlie diſeaſed.

The Peſtilence cured by Hippocrates

Ambassadors from the Abderites conferring with Hippocrates.

ther alledged to bee performed by him: which caused the Abderites, without procrastinating any longer time to send their Ambassadors to him, entreating him to come and helpe their Law-Maker Democritus.

Amelesseagoras being the chief in this Legation, a woorthy Orator, and most intirely affecting his Countrey: spake in few words to Hippocrates, according as followeth, to wit; the Common-wealth of the Abderites wished him all prosperitie, and humbly entreated him to take so much paine, as to come to their Cittie to visit Democritus their Law-maker, whom they immagined to be sicke in spirit; and that except some present remedie might be had, they expected nothing more thē their generall ruine. But especially, they stood in feare of loosing him, because he made no account of any thing in the world, nor of himselfe; watching both night and day, laughing and mocking at all things whatsoeuer, not any thing appearing to be acceptable to him. If men were addicted to Merchandize, or were maried, or preached, or taught in schoole; If any commanded, or obeyed, or deliuered any message, or were constituted in dignities, or deposed from them; If anie were sicke, whole, wounded, cured, dead, or any such like accidents, still he made a scorn of them, and laughed at them. The like would he doo, when he saw men reioice at any good occasiō, or sit in peace, or fight, or lament. Hee would talke of Hell, and what was done there, setting the same downe in writing. Hee taught also, that the aire was full of Attomies, which he tearmed to be such bodies, as the Sunne doth represent by his beames, passing thorough any Glasse windowes: and that there were many worlds all corruptible. He was verie attentiue in listening to the songs of Birds, rising very often in the night time, singing songes in a bigge and Bace voice. He said also, that wisedome did sometime slie to many hie and loftie matters, and that there were infinite Democrites, who held the same opinion with him.

All things alike to Democritus.

What Attomies are, according to Democritus, and some other of his opinion.

Now, in consideration of all these thinges, and by this his daily manner of behauiour, waiting and consuming both his body and spirit, the Abderites conceiued, that hee was transported from his right sences, and that by his recouerie, he should

10

20

30

40

50

acquire great fame and reputation, accompanied also with as ample a recompence, as himselfe should deeme to bee conuenient, because they made more esteeme of Democritus his health, then if all the Houses and Walles of their Citie were couered with pure Gold. And the more to prouoke him to this iourney, he added, that hee should not come thither as a Physitian, but as a New-founder of so great a Cittie and Common-wealth, & that he should not heale one priuat man only, but a whole Cittie. And withall, he should bee receiued as their Law-maker, conseruer and Iudge, all things being reputed and ordered, as effected by his Art and singuler experience. Neither was it a Cittie onely, that made this humble requeste vnto him, but all Greece, the Princesse of Prouinces, of all Vertues, and of all Sciences in the wide Vniuerse, to cure and recouer him, in whom Wisedome her selfe consisted.

How highly the Abderites accounted of Democritus.

Great perswasions in Amelesseagoras.

Proceeding further in perswasions, he told him, that he was neere allied to the said Democritus; because, that they both tooke Originall from the race of the Goddes. For Democritus was descended of Hercules, and Hippocrates of Æsculapius, sonne to Apollo. Moreouer, that Philopoemenes, a famous Cittizen and Captaine of the Abderites, had already prepared a lodging for his entertainement, though not equall to his high deserning, yet with heart and good will: and they stood charged to prese t him ten talents, which valewed then (according to the supputation of Budæus) fiue thousand Escues Couronnez, at thirty sixe Sols to the Crowne, which only was to defray the charges of his iourney.

Democritus & Hippocrates descended in race from the Gods.

Ten Talents prepared for Hippocrates.

Hippocrates hauing attentiuely heard all that Amelesseagoras had said, was very pensiue, not knowing what to do. For on the one side, hee had (but fewe dayes before) married a faire and sweete young Ladie, whom he was loath to leaue, as fearing least she should do him some displeasure for parting from her so soone, & in the Nonage of their marriage. Another reason withheld him, which was the performing of certaine Sacrifices, which were vowed (from time to time of al Antiquitie) by them of the Ile of Coos, to the Goddes of their Countrey, wherein he had promised his assistance, as beeing a man that held the place of most emi-

Hippocrates Iealous of his wife but lately married.

in

nence in the Isle, and was verie especially beloued.

Pre meditations of Hippocrates.

Besides, daily and continually arriued in this Island, great store of people, of all qualities and sexes; some for recouery of their health, being sent thither by others, that had formerly found good successe; & others, as Deputies from diuers great Kings and Monarches, to fetch him to their Courts: as (not long before) hee was to Artaxerxes, King of all the East, and many more. In briefe, hee referred it till the next morning, to aunswere the request of the Abderites: for now it waxed somewhat late, and towards Sun-setting, wherefore the Ambassadors went to their rest.

The Resolution of Hippocrates.

Hippocrates considered a great part of the Night, what best became him to do in this case. For, he held it fit and reasonable; yea, and appertaining to his Honor, to go and see Democritus, a man of so great authority in Greece: whom if his skill could recouer, hee should win as a friend, and no meane reputation beside. As for his faire wife by him so lately maried, he referred her to the trust of a faith full and intimate friend, named Dionisius. Then, taking order for all his Domestick affaires, and assisting in the Sacrifices, for his safer sayling to the Abderites, and not knowing how long he should stay in this Voyage, he resolued to accept their earnest request. So on the morrow, hee sent for Amelesseagoras, and the other Ambassadors, to whom he said: He did not a little meruaile, that so great a commonweale as that of the Abderites, was so much troubled about the sickenesse of one onely man, as if a man were their whole Cittie. Neuertheless, hee did truly account them to be most happie, who knew and vnderstood, that men of Vertue were found Ramparts, Bulwarks, and Defences. His opinion also was, that Arts and Sciences were perticuler guifts of the Goddes, and men were but the Workemanship of Nature, neyther was it the Cittie of the Abderites, that called him to this iourney, but Nature, to help her worke, which now was falne into very great daunger, to the end, that shee should not perish by so greeuous a disease.

Hippocrates his answer to the Ambassadors.

Nature calleth for the Physitions helpe, & not men.

As for the ten Talents, which should be presented to him, he desired the Legates to bestow them elsewhere: because he would do as much without Money, as with it, being neuer subiect to such a pernitious sickenesse, as Auarice is. For, (quoth he) the Art of Physicke sets not it selfe to sale for money; and such men as do receiue salarie, do make Slaues of the Sciences, which (of themselues) are free and liberall.

Hippocrates no way couetous

Moreouer, hee gaue them to vnderstand (to shew how little he esteemed riches) that it was not long since, when he made refusall to the mighty King Xerxes, for visiting his Court, Country, & great Armies, which were afflicted with certaine popular and deadly Diseases: for which, there could not any remedie bee found; notwithstanding, the Kinges abounding in wealth and pomp, & whereof no meane offers were made, whereby both he and his might haue been rich for euer, if hee had pleased to make acceptance of them. Cities, Townes, and Prouinces, wherein are heaped & hoorded more riches then can bee imagined, they are to me (quoth he) trifles, and of no Value: for I euer preferred Vertue before vice, to wit; the loue of my countrey, and all Greece. Hereupon, he promised, that within verie few dayes hee would set to Sea, and visite Democritus; but he could not now depart with the ambassadours, instantly to vndergo so great a voyage, as was 150. miles by Sea, till he had don his duty in the Sacrifices, which were to be performed to their Countrey Gods; the solemnity and Feast whereof, would be ended in few daies.

King Xerxes refused by Hippocrates.

Hippocrates his promise to the Ambassadors.

In like manner, he would take Order for the publicke affaires, and some priuate occasions of his owne. So the Ambassadors tooke their leaue, returning backe with great contentment, and leauing the ten Talents with Hippocrates, notwithstanding his many and often refusals.

CHAP.

CHAP. XX.

How Hippocrates founde Democritus continually laughing: and of the Conference they had together.

HIppocrates beeing willing to keep his promise, tooke order for al his owne businesse; but aboue all, for the care and gouernement of his new married Wife, whome he left with his friend Dionisius, and in whom he reposed great confidence. For this opinion was crept into his brain, that no Woman in the world could be chast: which was found expressely set downe in one of his Letters that he somtime wrote to the same friend Dionisius. He wrote also to his friend Damagetus, a Rhodian, entreating him to lend him a Shippe, that safely might bring him to the Abderites, aduising him (but by way of mockery) to tel the Rhodians, that they should heedefully keepe themselues from laughing indifferently either at good or euill, least they should be imagined mad and foolish, as Democritus was. Also, that they should not be sad or weepe, without very great occasion: for (in common opinion) they would thereby fall into the disease, called Melancholy, which procureth alienation of iudgment, with a certain kind of feare. Therefore, they should obserue a Mediocritie, aswell in laughing as in weeping, as hee himselfe both had done, and would do.

Id est, In deede, or will.

A mockage giuen by Hippocrates.

Damagetus sent him a Ship, wherein he sailed so prosperously, that (without any hinderance) hee arriued in the Port of Abdera, in few dayes sayling; where hee was expected with earnest affection, and entertained with as great honor and reuerence, as if he had beene a God. Afterward, he was conducted to the place, where Democritus made his abode out of the Cittie, and found him in the same estate, as Anaxagoras hadde formerly told him. He would not suddenly intrude into his presence, but through the boughes and branches of Trees, that rounde

Hippocrates saileth to Abdera, and there arriueth.

Hippocrates obserued the behauiour of Democritus.

inuironed his Cabinet, obserued his actions with good iudgement, considering duly what he did. One while, he saw him writing, another while reading, & afterward walking: when, entering into his lodging, Hippocrates (so reuerently as might be) saluted him. So soone as Democritus perceiued him, he sayde; God saue you mine Hoste. Hippocrates answered, And you Sir also, being a most wise and worthy man, which he performed with very humble reuerence. Democritus was somewhat ashamed, that hee could not tearme him by his name; and therefore entreated that he would tell it him. Hippocrates replied, that hee was called a Physition. Then Democritus doubted that he was Hippocrates, although he had neuer till then seene him, and saide: Hee was the Flower of the Æsculapians, and his great renowne had reached vnto his poore abiding.

The flutterions betweene the two Philosophers.

Growing on to further questionings, he enquired, what occasion had brought him thither? Shewing him his seat to sit downe by him, and all his roome, which was couered with greene braunches of Trees, affirming, that he esteemed it better then a Royal Pallace, subiect vnto the instability of Fortune.

Their further interlocutions.

When they had sitten a while togither, he desired him to tell him in trueth: if he were come to him about any perticuler businesse, or for some publicke cause? Wishing him to conceale nothing from him, for he would assist him to his vttermost. Hippocrates answered, that (in trueth) he had no other errand to that place but only to see and conferre with a most Wiseman, according as his country had giuen him in charge. Then Democritus offered to prepare him a lodging, to entertaine and Feast him as his good guest. But Hippocrates told him, that he had alreadie taken vp his lodging with Philopœmenes, and demaunded if he knew him? Democritus replied, that he knew him verie well, and that he was the sonne of Damon, and his dwelling was neere vnto the Fountaine Hermandra; he hauing beene a friend to his predecessours, as also hee continued so still to himselfe. All this while Hippocrates heedfully noted, whither his spirit did any way wander, or no; and to know assuredly the state of his vnderstanding, he desired him to tell him what the Argument was, which hee had written

Philopœmenes, the Sonne of Damon.

A Discourse of folly, written by Democritus.

written in a Booke lying open before him? Democritus hauing paused a little space, answered; That it was of Follie. Is it then against the City, replied Hippocrates? Against what Cittie answered Democritus? By which words, Hippocrates wel perceiued, that he had waded too farre in speech, and offended the whole Common-wealth of the Abderites, and had also discouered the cause wherefore hee was come to see him. Wherefore, concealing what he thought, he sayde to Democritus, that he would be loath to offend him, but prayed to resolue him what he could write concerning Follie? Democritus answered; that hee had written what Folly is, and what hee conceyued, concerning the engendering thereof in the spirits of men, and how it was to be auoyded. Then shewing him diuers creatures by him, which he had dissected in forme of Anatomies, hee tolde him; That he had not so done, as to correct or contemne the workes of God, but onely to finde out the seate, and the Nature of anger or choller. For he was not ignorant, that when this humour redounded (neuer so little) in the bodie, it caused furious actions, and that al creatures had it; but in some lesse, and in others more: and when it attained to superabundance, it begot diseases in the spirit.

How Folly is begotten in the body of man.

Then Hippocrates lifting vp his eyes to Heauen, was much better confirmed then before, only by the Wisedome of Democritus, admyring his happinesse, and telling him that hee might boast of the chiefest felicity among men, rendering him a reason for his words. Because (quoth he) that we cannot compasse the meanes, to obtain the like leysure as you haue. And why (quoth Democritus) cannot you haue the like leysure? Because (replied Hippocrates) domesticall affaires care for worldly goods, which are necessarie to be had and kept, for our Children, expences, diseases, frailties, and mortalities which happen, with multitude of seruants, women, and other such like matters, do deprriue vs of those leisurable times, to pursue occasions of benefit and profit.

Hippocrates confirmed in knowledg by Democritus.

Sollicitude for worldlie goods, is a Phylosophers hinderance.

So soone as Democritus had heard these words, he fell into an extraordinary Laughter, leauing al other actions whatsoeuer. And Hippocrates demanded of him, the reason of his laughter, and whither he had spoken wel or ill, which made him Laugh much more vehemently; and many of the chiefest Cittizens, both hearing and seeing it, greeuing that so great a man should in this manner be scorned, they verily beleeued, that Democritus was mad, and no further doubt was now to be made thereof. And therefore, in affliction of mind, some rent their haire, others wept, and some smote themselues vpon their faces.

Hippocrates would know the cause of Democritus his laughter.

Hippocrates pursuing still his purpose, desired Democritus once more to yeelde him a reason for his ouer-abounding Laughter, and whether any thing done by him, might occasion the same? to the end (quoth he) that I may correct my selfe, from giuing you any such offence heereafter. Democritus replied, swearing by Hercules, that if he would take occasion to make him forbeare, or to reproue him for laughing, he protested, that hee should performe the best cure that euer he had done.

The laughing of Democritus not to be cured.

Why (quoth Hippocrates) are you not to be reprehended, when you Laugh at the death of a man? Or when you see him sicke, or acting folly, or in choller, rauing, murthering, and such like most miserable accidents committed by him? The like also you do, in his very best fortunes, or what felicities of the Worlde soeuer befall him: so that (in you) there appeareth no difference betweene good and euill.

You haue sayde verie true, answered Democritus, and yet you seeme to be ignorant in the true cause of my laughing. But if you knew, or could discern it, you would finde, that the cure thereof extendeth not onely to them of your Countrey, but euen to your owne selfe; and you would gaine much more profite thereby, then you can do by your sending for hither. And when I giue you to vnderstand, that my laughing proceedeth from those vanities, wherein men spend all their life time, yea, more then ridiculous: methinkes (in recompence thereof) you should enstruct mee in the Art of Physicke.

The true cause of Democritus his laughing.

And let mee now tell yee (Learned Hippocrates) that I Laugh and mocke, when I see a man filled with Follies, and emptie of all Vertuous actions, carrying himselfe foolishly in all his courses, seeking for Golde and Siluer in all quarters of

A Discourse concerning search after gold & siluer.

of the World, hauing no end in his Ambition, but is mollested with daylie Trauailes, to the end, that hee may be esteemed more in reputation, and fauoured of fortune.

Hee delueth into the earth, making deep Trenches and waies vnder ground, beeing daily in great perrill and daunger of the earthes falling vppon him, continuing in this drudging exercise all his life time, euen like a Laborious Journyman, searching and following the veines of the Mettalles, which manie times hee cannot finde: or, if hee finde them, they are oftentimes verie short, or so difficult to followe, that the cost is tenne times more, then the profite ensuing thereby.

More cost then profit

And dooth not this deserue Laughter? For, when they dare so much hurt the earth (which they call their common Mother) and vse her as a despightfull Enemie, whom they should hold in great admiration and reuerence, for suffering them to walke vp and downe vppon her bosome, I thinke it a matter well beseeming Laughter, to affect what is closelie hidden in her intrailes, and yet to do her such manifest iniury.

The Earth, the common Mother of all men.

Some do loue Dogges, others Horses: Some desire to command and be obeyed in manie Prouinces: and yet themselues will knowe no Obedience: Some marrie Wiues, hauing long time before verie dearely loued them: & yet (in a short while after) forsake and hate them; begetting Children, with much care and cost for their education; yet when they grow great, and past Correction, they despise them, wil not see them, but leaue them Naked vnto the Worlds mercie. Doo not these behauiours expresse their intollerable follies? When men liue in peace, then they couet war, detesting all quietnesse; Deposing their Kinges, and aduancing others in their sted; murdering some men, to begette Children of their Wiues, seeking in the ground for Gold and Siluer, and hauing found them, buy them of the earth; and with the fruites thereof, striue to make mony againe. How many strange varieties of humors are men in? When they are poore and needie, then they seeke for riches; and when they haue them, they hide them vnder ground, to burie them in the place from whence they first cam, or else wastfully spend them. O wise Hippocrates! I Laugh at these things, beeing done to such ill purpose: but much more when no good euent succeedeth of thē. Ther is no truth or Iustice found among them for they plead daily one against another: the Son against the Father and Mother, Brother against Brother, Kindred and Friendes of the same qualitie. And al these things they do, to compasse Riches, whereof (after death) they can be no possessors. And yet notwithstanding, they will kill one another dailie for wealth, commit all vnlawfull Actions; contemning both the poor, their frends, and Countrey.

Variable contrarieties in the affections of men.

The malice of men one against another.

The deformity of mans life.

They make great account of manie senseleese things, esteeming them to bee part of their treasure; as Statues, Picturs, painted Tables, and other moueables of like matter, which they buy at deer rates, being so dexteriously wrought, as nothing but speech wanteth in them; & yet they hate liuing persons that do speake to them. Others, do affect laborious and difficult things: for such as dwel on firme Land, desire to remoue thence to Watry Iflands, and hauing remained there but a while; then they must needs returne to their first abiding, being no way constant or stable in their desires. They commend courage and strength in warlicke actions, yet are daily conquered themselues by Auarice and wickednesse, at euerie change hapning in their bodies, or sickenesse of minde. In briefe, they are as deformed in their liues, as Thersites the Greeke was in his body. And for conclusion (worthy Hippocrates) me thinkes you should not reprehend my laughing, perceiuing so many vanities in men; for no man will mocke his owne follie, but at that which hee discerneth in another, and so they do iustly mock one another. The Drunkard calles him a Glutton, whom he knowes to be sober. Many men loue the Sea; others Husbandry: briefely they cannot agree in their Trades and professions, much lesse in their liues and actions.

Senseleese things esteemed aboue liuing men.

No estate or condition liuing contentedly.

Hippocrates hauing heard Democritus to speake in this maner, without anie pre-meditation: but readily deliuered from his Mouth: and as no man could better vtter his minde, to declare the Vanitie of humaine condition, full of so manie ridiculous contrarieties, made anſwere: That the neceſsitie of thinges, compelled men to many of theſe actions and variant willes in one another: the principall cauſe enſuing from the diuine permiſsion, to the end, that men might not bee ydle, becauſe there is not anie thing more odious to the Goddes, then ſloath and neglect. And as in Nature there is not any thing ſtable or firme; euen ſo, the vnderſtanding of man (which is round circkled and ſhut vp with naturall thinges) is not ſo certaine and immoueable, as daily to fore-ſee future inconueniences. What would a man do, ioyning in Marriage where he dearly affecteth, if hee foreſaw death to bee the cauſe of their ſeparation? Or the Father and Mother, Nurſing their Children tenderly, knewe the houre of their Mortalitie and ſubiection to death? Would a Husbandman beſtow his ſeed in the ground, if he could fore-tell that it woulde yeelde him no encreaſe? Or a Merchant vndertake Nauigation, if hee ſaw his owne Shippe-wracke before his eyes? Woulde a King accept of Regall Authority, if he were ſure of depoſing, and caſting out from his dignitie? Or a Magiſtrate ſeated in honor afterward reiected, and toſſed vp and downe (like a Tennis Ball) at the peoples pleaſure? Alas, woorthy Democritus, each man thinketh, that whatſoeuer hee enterprizeth, ſhall ſucceede to happie and fortunate ſucceſſe. Neither is there any need of ſuch apprehenſion, or any ſtrong imagination, that pernicious accidents muſt neede waite on mens enterprizes: For, then no man would aduenture on anie thing, but euery one would ſtand ſtupid, confounded with fearefulneſſe. Why do ye not now (quoth he to Democritus) mocke and laugh at theſe words of mine, as you did before, and ſtill doo at all things?

Democritus hauing heard Diuine Hippocrates, excuſed himſelfe thus; That his vnderſtanding was but groſſe and rough hammered, and could not well comprehend what hee had formerlie declared, concerning the perturbations & tranquilitie of the minde. Inſomuch, that if men would gouerne their actions by diſcretion and prouidence; they wold not declare themſelues to be fooles, neither ſhoulde hee haue any further cauſe of laughter. But (quoth he) they ſwell proudly, and ſo glorie in their doings, as if (in this life) they were immortall, onlie through defect of vnderſtanding, beeing harde to bee enſtructed in ſuch difficult points. It were ſufficient to make them wiſe and well-gouerned, if they woulde but ſet before their own eyes, the change or viciſsitude of all worldly thinges, finding nothing firme and ſtable, the whole world dooing nothing elſe, but gire and wheele about: ſo that he which is aloſte to day, on the morrow following is remoued lower: and hee that ſate on one ſide, is hurled to another. And not conſidering this ſlippery buſineſſe, they fall eaſily into verie great inconueniences & troubles: coueting things of no profite, and by greedie thirſting after them, tumble headlong into manie miſerable Calamities.

So that, if no man would attempt more, then what his ſtrength could ablie ſtand vnder, and he beare awaie without perrill, he would lead a much better contented life; and men hauing learned to know themſelues, would limit a mediocrity, not an infinitie to their ambition. Then they woulde conſider, that nature hath ſufficient to adminiſter what is neceſſarie for this life, without ſeeking ouer-painfully, after ſuperfluities and vnprofitable thinges, which bring nothing with them, but great greefe and molleſtation.

Like as a bodie that is growne groſſe, fat, and well fed, is ſooneſt ſuſpected to fall into ſome grieuous diſeaſe: euen ſo, fareth it with great riches, which are ſubiect to ſtore of trauerſes and mutations. There are many, who take no heede of that which happeneth to others, only by bad conuerſation; and therefore, do ouerthrow themſelues in the ſame maner, thorough their owne fault, not fore-ſeeing daungers manifeſt, and not hidden; dreaming otherwiſe on length of life by them. Theſe are the thinges (O men more then mad, quoth he) that yeilds me matter of laughter, by ſueffring the pains of your Impieties; as of your Auarices, inſatiable deſires, enmities, conſpiracies, deceits, enuies, and other Vices; which (in regard of their multiplicitie) are impoſsible to be declared; beſides your diſſimulations and fallacies, in conuerſing together, bearing deadly hatred one to another, yet ſhaddowing it with lies, flying S'oth & carelesneſſe hateſull to the Gods.

Excellent reaſons alleadged by Hippocrates.

The euent of things cannot be auoyded.

The anſwere of Democritus to Hippocrates.

The infinite ambition in men, the cauſe of all euils.

The beneſite of knowing our ſelues.

A familiar compariſon betweene the body & riches

Vices ordinary and common among men.

ing out into all voluptuous turpitude of life, and transgressing all Lawes, both of nature and ciuility.

Many things are pleasing to them, and when they are forborne but a while, they returne againe afresh vnto them. As oftentimes they doe, who shun and despise Nauigation, yet afterwardes doo vndertake it againe, leauing off Husbandrie, which at the first was their only exercise. When they are young, they thinke it long till they attaine vnto age; and when they are arriued to it, then they lament, and finde many irkesom discommodities in it.

No man truly satisfied with his own condition.

Princes commend a priuate life, and a priuate man hath an itching humor after Royaltie. The Magistrate praiseth the Handi-crafts mans condition: and the other would gladly be in his Office, to be reuerenced and obeyed as the Magistrat is. And what is the reason of all these disturbances, but that no man will take knowledge of himselfe, as hee ought to doo? Some take delight in destroying Townes and Cities, to erect other in contrary places, spoiling one country vnreasonably, to inrich themselues in another immeasurably. In all these things, they differ very little from Children; in whom there is neither counsell or iudgement, and resemble brutish creatures, only this excepted, that they can containe themselues within the Lawes of nature, which men either cannot, or wil not do.

A delight deseruing little cõmendation

When shal we see a Lyon hiding gold in the ground? Or a Bull contending for a fatter pasture? When the wilde Boare is thirsty, hee will drinke no more then sufficeth nature. When the woolfe hath fild his belly, to get him a stomack again, hee walketh about from place to place; but man eateth and drinketh both night and day, neuer satisfied with too much repletion. These creatures couet no carnall coniunction, but at certain times and seasons in the yeare: but man at all times and all houres, giuing license to his owne voluptuous fleshlinesse, ruinating thereby the health of his body. And is it not a matter deseruing laughter, to see an Amorous foole writh his arms, weep, houl, and torment himselfe, for a mishapen slut, foule, hard fauoured, and vnsightly, forsaking bright beauty in her sweetest delicacy? And yet for al these grosse imperfections, I thinke Physicke affordeth not any remedie.

Brute beastes do behaue themselues better then men.

Affection, is a blinded Folly.

You cannot note such mallice in me, as daily you may discerne in others; for they kil one another, and I do but dissect and Anatomize poore Beastes, to seeke the cause of these distempers, Vanities, and worldly follies: yet such proofe were better made on mens bodies, if my kind Nature could endure it; and but that I am a louer of man, and of his good. You may easily obserue, how the world it selfe is hatefull to men, compacting so manie calamities in him, as with them he is continually vexed. For man, from the houre of his birth is weake and sickly. When he sucks for his nourishment, hee is vnprofitable, and vnable to gouerne himselfe. Growing greater, he practiseth vnhappinesse, and then, hath neede of a Ruler. Comming to manly yeares, hee waxeth bolde and sturdy; and descending into Old age, he declareth his owne miserie, remembering his labours and calamities passed, all which, hee brought with him from the wombe of his Mother. Heere their Conference was interrupted, by the comming in of one, that broght certaine Bookes; but a signe being giuen him to lay downe the Bookes, and depart; they fell againe to their former discourse. But Democritus fearing, lest he had already wearied Hippocrates, with so long and diuers causes of his Laughter, entreated his fauourable patience yet a little longer, and then he should iudge if he were mad, acording as many others imagined.

The wretched and miserable estate of men.

Democritus proceedeth his discourse.

To approue my former speeches (qd. he) let vs cast our eies into diuers Courts and priuat houses, where dangerous actions are committed, that are not brought to open euidence. In many Courts, Iudges giue sentence according to their own pleasure, offering too much wrong to innocents, & poor despised soules. Notaries and Scriueners on the other side, they alter the Iudges sentences, or (for money) lose their deeds. Som make false monies; others forge counterfet waights & measures. Some abuse their parents, yea, corrupt their owne Sisters; & others, frame lying Pasquils and rimes, disgracing men & women of vertuous life, & extolling such as are lewd and vicious. Some rob in the night time, breaking Doores and Windowes: And Magistrates ordaine Lawes against stealing, yet are the greatest Theeues themselues. Some hang Concerning Iudges.

Notaries and Scriueners.

Coynes and Waights.

False Libels.

Robbing and Thieuing.

Desperation

Great inconstancy in the actions of mé

Proud nakednesse.

False witnes.

Pride in women, to see & be seene.

Of Physick & Physitians.

Ignoraunce, Enuie, and Ingrautude.

The end of the Conference, between Democritus & Hippocrates.

themselues, or otherwise woorke their owne deathes, for not obtaining what they would haue, or else in meer despair. Among men, there are many that affect Dauncing, Singing, Laughing, and frequenting of Feasts and Bankets, while others sit Sighing, Mourning, & lamenting, hauing neither meate or drinke to fill their hungry bellies.

There are some, that haue no other delight, but to bee cloathed in rich and sumptuous Garments, neuer caring to couer and adorne their minds, but only with wicked and execrable vices. Some run, trot about, seeke and call into their houses, Knights of the Post (aswe terme them, with false witnesse to ouer-throwe an honest meaning man: and albeit the Iudges knowe it well enough, yet (for bribes) they winke at it, and suffer false contracts, to preuaile against right and equity.

The most part of Weomen, if they bee desirous of walking abroad, manie houres are too few, in decking and adorning themselues, only to appeare beautifull in the eyes of other men: but while they abide within doores, they care not how vnhandsome and sluttish they bee, where rather they should be in their best brauery, only to be liking and acceptable in the eyes of their Husbands.

Seeing then (quoth hee) that the Spirits of men are so variable, and full of intemperance, why shoulde not I Laugh? Surely, I am of the minde, that Physicke is offensiue to them, and in regarde of their ill Temper, euery thing is irkesom, and folly seemeth to be Wisedome vnto them.

There are many parts in your Art of Physicke, which suffer blame openly, either thorough ignorance, enuie, or ingratitude. Some sicke men, recouering their health, most commonly do attribute their cure to those Goddes vnto whom they haue deuoted themselues; or to fortune, or to their owne naturall disposition: neuer minding the Physition, who tooke great paines in purging Humors of dangerous quality, and bringing them to a more milde constitution. But you know these things much better then I do, because you haue made iudicious experience of them.

Many other speeches passed betweene them, to approue that his Laughter was to good purpose: but because the Reader may gesse them by former relation, I spare further proceeding in them. In pronouncing his words, hee seemed rather a God then a man, and his desire was to be heard, without molestation. It waxed now somewhat late, and it appeared, that time had tutord either to allow of seperation. Wherefore, Hippocrates most humbly thanking Democritus, for instructing him in the causes of his Laughter, and what else he had learned by his wittie discourse, wished, that he were as free as he, without charge of a wife and family, on condition hee might liue like another Democritus.

Hippocrates with-drawing into the Citie, to his kinde Hoste Philopoemenes, was no sooner there arriued, but the greater part of the Honourablest persons came to visit him, to vnderstand the estate and health of their Law maker. In few Wordes he told them, that in the body of Democritus he could find no infirmity, albeit he made too slight account of his own person, either in order of diet, garments, and other necessaries. Much lesse defect was to be found in his minde: for he was verily perswaded, that the whole worlde contained not a man more wise, learned, and honest, then hee. And the Commonwealth was badly informed, to immagine him mad, or out of his senses, because he laughed (ordinarily) as well at good as euill: for his Laughter proceeded from iust occasion, to witte; The vanity and presumption of men, promising themselues (for the most part) eternity in this world. Howbeit, the life of man (as euery one well knoweth) is but a dreame, soone passing away. Hee recited also to them, his sententious sayings, in such rare method, and excellent Order, as all the hearers confessed their great errour, in holding the wisest man in the world for a foole.

The Noblemen resorted to Hippocrates.

The report of Hippocrates, concerning his iudgment of Democritus.

On the morrow, Sacrifices were offered to the Goddesse Pallas, in thankefull manner, because shee had pleased to preserue the helth of Democritus; presenting (beside) great & rich gifts to Hippocrates, for the great paines and trauel he had taken. After many refusalles, he said vnto them, that he remained verie highlie obliged vnto them, for causing him to conferre with the Wisest man in the worlde: for he had many infirmities in his spirit, wherewhereof he was vtterly ignorant, till hee talked with him; and they might haue caused verie manie pernitious accidents, but that his graue Counsell had giuen them remedy; and therefore, hee rather ought to reward Democritus, as a gracious Benefector. So, being brought aboord his Shippe by the Abderites, he set saile, and returned home vnto the Isle of Coos.

Sacrifices to the Goddesse Pallas.

The departure of Hippocrates from the Abderites.

This Hippocrates liued afterward like a Woorthie man, and in great reputation, hauing written threescore and seauen Bookes of the Art of Physick, which yet to this day are holde in great estimation, as beeing most learnedly composed; yea, such hath beene their Authoritie, that all cases pleaded before Iudges, if they were determined by Hippocrates, al Lawyers allowd them as a denifitiue sentence, without informing themselues by any other naturall reason.

The authority of Hippocrates his workes and writings.

The whole Art of Physicke is grounded vpon that which hee hath written; and is the onely reason, why that Science was reduced into an Art. Not onely was he in great credite and estimation during his life time in Greece, but likewise in many remote Nations where that credite liueth still: For his Workes are read not onely in Asia and Europe, but likewise in Affrica, amongest the Moores, Iewes, Arabes, and Indians, where Commentaries are daily made on his Bookes.

The life and vertues of Hippocrates.

Hee was neuer seene to be in Choller, neither more sadde or ioyfull at one time then another. Hee was very charitable to the poore, Benigne, Affable, Liberall, and Laborious. Hee was so beloued in many Prouinces, that (on a time) the Athenians being prouoked by vniust Ambition, denounced Warre against the Isle of Coos: but (for his sake only) the Thessalians and other people, sent their Ambassadours to succor them with men, and all meanes else. And also in respect of him, the Athenians would not come to Handie-blowes: but calling to minde, that hee had once deliuered their Cittie from the Pestilence, graunted them peace, and accepted him amongst the number of their Cittizens, to enioy the same priuiledges, allowing him besides, a great pension yearely, out of the publicke Treasury. Hee died in the hundred and eleauenth yeare of his age, leauing two Sonnes behinde him, verie famous Physitions, to wit, Thessalus and Draco.

The death & children of Hippocrates.

He had a great number of Schollers, whom he wold neuer license to practise, or graunt them his Letters, till they had first taken their Oaths in the Temple, before the Altar of Apollo, to abbreuiate diseases to their vttermost power; to giue no counsell, neither to suffer any to poyson any bodie, or cause women to be deliuered of abortiue children. To be secret in infirmities, as wel concerning women as men, without lusting after women, or young Maids, being vnder their cure: nor to report any thing spoken by them, or done in their houses, after their entrance. Also, that they should teach their Arte freely, and without reward to others, according as he had taught it them; and aboue all things else, that they should feare God. It is not aboue fortie years since, that his Sepulchre was found in the Isle of Coos, his Natiue Countrey, which the Emperour Theodosius had builded in his honor, betweene two Hilles, in a verie deepe Quagmyre, which was 860. yeares after his decease. Whereby wee may well perceiue, that Soranus is a lyer, who would haue his Tombe to be in Macedonia. He is alwaies pictured with his head couered, as a signe of his Nobility.

The Oath giuen by Hippocrates to his Schollers.

The Sepulcher of Hippocrates.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the two most excellent Painters in those times, Apelles and Protogenes.

HAuing formerly spoken of the woorthy Art of Painting, it may seeme absurd, that two Chapters should bee inserted, concerning one and the same subiect. But in mine owne excuse, I must alledge the mens dignitie of whom I am nowe to speake, deseruing well a Chapter by themselues, for better impression in the Readers minds: Apelles, who was tearmed the chiefe or Prince in the Art of Painting, learned this Science vnder a Woorthie man, named Pamphilius, whose cunning was so absolute, as hee would accept of no Scholler, at lesse rate then an Attique Talent by the yeare, which valewed sixe hundred Crownes of our Money nowe. In the time of this Apelles, there was another most famous Painter, named Protogenes, so prompt and skilful in this Art, as supremacy in excellency could not be discerned in either. In regard whereof, and Apelles hauing credible intelligence of his great renowne, he resolued to goe see him, & sayled thence to Rhodes, wher Protogenes made his abiding. Being there arriued (with purpose not to be knowne, no not to Protogenes himselfe) he cam to the doore of his dwelling, at such time as Protogenes was gone abroad. Entring into his Worke-house, he demanded of an aged woman where he was, saying, hee would haue spoken with him. Who shal I say (quoth the old woman) inquired for him? Then Apelles tooke a Pensil, which he found lying by an vnwrought Table, and said to the old woman. Thou mayst tell Protogenes when hee commeth, that he which did this in this Table, came hither to see him. And as he spake the wordes, he drew a strait line so curious and elaborate, as the like could not haue been done by the hand of any other Workeman, and so departed.

The Authors excuse for this chapter.

Pamphilius the Maister of Apelles.

Protogenes being returned home vnto his house, and told by the Olde woman as she was commaunded; hee looked on the Table, and perceiuing the rare perfection of the Line, he presently said, Apelles hath done this, for no other mã could do it. Then tooke he another Pensill, and vpon the Line which Apelles made, he drew one of another colour, so delicate small, thinne, and slender, and with such true proportion, as none but himselfe could performe the like, commaunding the Old woman, that when Apelles returned thither, she should shew it him and tell him, that this was his workmanship whom he came to see. Soone after, Apelles came againe to the shop, Protogenes being absent; and the Olde-woman shewed him the Table as her Maister had giuen him in charge. Apelles being much ashamed to see such an aduantage aboue him, tooke a Pensill, and on the chiefe subtilty of the line, which Protogenes had made vppon his (although it seemed inuisible to the eie, it was so ouercuriously drawne) yet notwithstanding, by the dexterious skill of his hand, in a third colour, he formed another Line, so subtle and ingenious, that it deuided the two formost thorow the midst; and was also set downe with such exceeding perfection, as no space was left to draw another. Protogenes comming home againe, and beholding what was done, confessed himselfe conquered, and ran suddenly to the Port to finde Apelles, to honour and giue him entertainment. Afterward, this Table, with the three lines onely, was reputed as a myracle, and long time kept in Rome, being (for the admirable Art expressed therein) brought thither, and it remained there in Cæsars time, when by casualty of fire it was burned.

Apelles had this custome, when he had finished any rare piece of Worke, to set it in open sight at his doore, for al by-passengers to behold it: then would he hide himselfe aptly behinde it, to hear if (with reason) any one could reproue it, so to vnderstand the peoples iudgement. Once it happened, that his cunning was controlled by a Shoo maker, because the Latchet of a shoo was not well painted. Alwayes he wrote vnder his Tables, these especiall words; Appelles did this, and yet did it not, giuing thereby to vnderstande, that he held not his work for perfect and compleate.

This excellent man, liued in the time of Alexander, the greatest King that euer was, by whom he was so commended, & held in such high honor, that he prohibited by publicke Edict, no Painter should draw his picture but Apelles onely. Nor did he hold it any disgrace to his maiesty, oftentimes to go and sit by him, as hee was painting in his Shop, which is a notable Argument, that this Arte was in great reputation in those times, and that Apelles was most excellent, & not meanly esteemed and loued by Alexander. For Apelles hauing (by his commaund) drawne to the life, and naked; one of his fauorits, a choise Lady, named Campaspe, found her to be so faire, and of such perfection, that he grew extraordinarily inamored of hir. Which comming vnto the knowledge of Alexander, though he loued the Lady dearly, & aboue the rest of his Concubins, yet he concluded to take hir from himselfe, & giue hir in marriage to Apelles. Nor is this act vnworthie to be ranked in the number of his greatest victories, Protogenes another famous Painter.

Apelles cam to see Protogenes.

Protogenes knew Apelles by his line.

Apelles his second visitatiõ of Protogenes.

The curious Table vnfortunately burned.

A custom obserued by Apelles.

Apelles reproued by a shoo maker.

Apelles liued in Alexanders time.

The loue of Alexander to Apelles.

tories: considering, that, conquering his owne affections (which euermore is the worthyest triumph) he could rob himselfe of a faire friend, to bestow her vpon another. Some say, that by this Campaspe, Apelles painted the Picture of Venus.

Ptolomy King of Egypt, an enemy to Apelles.

He was so skilfull in naturall portraiture, that Ptolomie, King of Ægypt, and one of the Successours to Alexander, enuying the fame and vertues of Apelles; made a sumptuous Feast, whereto, treacherously, and in the Kings name, Apelles was inuited, and came. Ptolomy being highly offended, angerly demaunded of him; Who had beene the cause of his presence there? Which when Apelles heard; suddenly he tooke a coale out of the fire, and, without returning any other answere: presently drew the figure of a face, which euery one (there present) knew to resemble a follower of the Kinges, named Planus. Many other meruailous thinges in Painting, were performed by him, which would aske ouer-long time to recount. For Histories doe relate, that he painted such things, as were not to be painted: as the beames of the Sun, Lightning, Thunder, and such like impossibilities. His workes were so rare and singuler, that a Table, wherin Venus was figured, rising out of the Sea, and which was placed in Iulius Cæsars Temple by Octauius, happening afterward to be defaced in some perticuler part; no man durst attempt to amend what was mard, knowing no meanes to conforme it to the first perfection.

Admirable things painted by Apelles.

Works of Apelles left imperfect, no man could finish them.

About the ending of his daies, he began to draw another peece of Venus, so faire and curiously proportioned: that dying before he had finished it, no man could be found, that would enterprise to perfect it, according to the beginning. At another time, he had painted a Horse, so neere to the life; that other Painters (hauing drawne the like Figures, and desirous to make experience of the most perfect) would take liuing Horses out of the Stable, and set them before their owne handye worke, for comparison. But when they brought them before that done by Apelles: they would beginne to stirre, whinnow and snuffle, as if the other had been a liuing Horse indeede, whereby Apelles carried the excellence from all the other Painters. Nor was his worthinesse of spirit discerned by his Painting onely; but also in his good discoursing. For Protogenes, praising and extolling him beyond all other Painters; Apelles answered. You are as skilfull a Maister in the Art as I am; but you haue one fault, that ye will tire your selfe with Painting. Declaring heereby, that ouer great diligence and continuall labour (exceeding duty) is hurtfull: because it wasteth, oppresseth, and confoundeth the Spirit, when a man shall so assiduately continue at his worke, and giue the minde no breathing time, in some other pleasing exercises. A Painter shewed him one of his pieces, & vaunted, that he had done it in such a short named time; whereto Apelles answered: I saw that by thy workmanship, though thou hadst not told me.

Apelles apt & ready in discourse.

Ouer much labour dulleth the Spirit.

We may speake somewhat of Protogenes, and of his cunning skil in Painting, albeit it were matter enough to his glory, to declare no more then that which Demetrius did, at his siedge before Rhodes. For he might very easilie haue entred the Citty, if he would haue fiered it in a certaine place: but hee would by no meanes yeild thereto, or that any fire should be put in that place; because he well knew, that in the very same part of the Citty, was a Table wrought by the hand of Protogenes. And he rather chose, to faile in surprisall of the Citty; then to burne that Table, such was his great esteeme and loue to it. The day before the Citty was besiedged, Protogenes beeing in a Garden (at his worke) without the Wals, was taken by the Souldiers of Demetrius: for though hee knew the Armies comming, yet would hee not giue ouer his businesse begun. Being brought before Demetrius, the King demanded of him; with what assurance he durst so securely trust himselfe without the Cittie? I am certaine (quoth Protogenes) that thy Warre is against the Rhodians, and not against the Arts. Whereupon, Demetrius gaue him in guard to diuers of his trustiest Souldiours, that no man might wrong him in perfecting his worke, and oftentimes went himselfe to see him.

Concerning the worthy skill of Protogenes.

Rhodes besieged by Demetrius.

There haue beene in this Art, many choise and singuler Work men, exceeding

The names of many verie rare and singuler Painters.

ding possibility to name them all, and therefore we will but glaunce at some: As Aristides, of Thebes; Asclepiadorus, of Alexandria, very skilfull also in the Mathematiques; Nichomachus, of Athens, Sonne to Aristodemus; Paneus, Brother to Phidias, and many other, of whom Pliny speaketh in his fiue & thirtith Booke. And because that men only shall not boast of their figularity in this Art; we can alledge some women likewise, very famous therein, and that haue exceeded extraordinarily: as Thimaretta, Daughter to Myeon of Athens; shee painted the Figure of Dyana in a Table, which was long time preserued in Ephesus. We may not forget Irene, Calypso, and a Virgine named Lala Cyzicena, as also Olympia, and others. True it is, that in our time there are very excellent men: but I must be silent therein, least in speaking of some one or two; I should doe iniury to the Women very skilfull in Painting.

CHAP. XXII.

Of what forme a Man ought to bee, to appeare thereby in his best shape and proportion.

SEeing we haue spoken in diuers kinds, of Painters excelling in their Art: me-thinkes it cannot varry farre from our purpose, to speak of the great and chiefest Painter, euen the former and Creator of all things, who obserued a rule and true proportion of Art, in the composition of Man. Among other mernailes, which we are to consider in mans composing; we must first know that he is framed of so perfect a measure, and each part so well compassed (as we shal instantly declare) that our ancient Architects and Builders, had especiall regard, to the proportion obserued by God, in the creation of Man, whereby they shaped their order and composition, for building Houses, Churches, Castles, Towers, Shippes, and Instruments for Warre, and from thence deriued their first proportions. And in contemplating, and well considering the measures of Mans stature, each member after other: they found out such a compasse, as they could thereby direct their labour, and forme the order of wonderfull buildings. Which I must confesse, as well in our Moderne, as in our Ancients, discoursing hereof, and deliuered by their owne writings: especially Vitruuius, albeit experience doth herein best teach vs.

The true rule & proportion in composition of man, obserued as a method for al other matters.

Now, part of this proportion by them found and considered, was, that in the stature of man there is no certain measure or arrest, because some are greater then other. Neuertheless, our elders iudged, that to forme a man of apt and perfect greatnesse; it required but sixe foote in length, or else not to exceede seauen: because such as haue surpassed this rule, went contrary to the naturall course.

No certaine measure in the stature of man.

In like manner, Vegetius, speaking of what stature men should be elected for War-seruice, saith: That the Consull Marius would chuse his Tyrons, (which were new or Fresh-water Souldiours, as we tearme them) of six foot in height, or (at the least) fiue foot and ten inches, which are the ten partes of twelue portions in a foot. And for conformitie in these thinges, Vitruuius further saith; That the foote of a man maketh the sixt part of his length. Neuertheless, this rule taken by the common foot, is vncertain: for I haue seen Men & womē more great, then seuen times the length of their feet would reach to. To agree then with Vitruuius and Vegetius together; we must know, that Vitruuius meant Geometricall feet, which contained foure hand-breadths, or handfuls, each handfull to haue foure fingers breadth, and each finger foure Barley graines in length. For all Authours, both Auncient and Moderne, writing on this Argument, doe assure vs, that the measuring foote, consisteth of the greatnesse of twelue points, which we tearme inches. Of these feete then a man ought to haue sixe, to be of good height, and he that reacheth to seauen, is very taule, and whosoeuer exceedeth seauen foote, should be called a Gyant, and monstrous: according to the rule of the most wise Marcus Varro, recited by Aulus Gellius. Whereun-

The Consull Marius in election of his Souldiers.

The agreement of Vitruuius and Vegetius.

The allowed height of a Man.

to

to Suetonius conſenteth in the life of Octauius, ſpeaking of his forme, where he ſaith, that he was of little ſtature: yet notwithſtanding, it could not be perceiued, in regard of equall proportion in his members; but when he was neer another of tauler ſtature thē he. Yet he ſaith, that his meaſure was fiue foote and nine inches, and by reaſon of this want in the ſixt foote, he was called little.

The proportion of the mēbers in their due length.

Let vs come now to the proportion of the members, and how much (one with another) ought to haue in their length. In the firſt place, the auncient Philoſophers found out, that the round & circular figure (as being the moſt abſolute of all other) is perfectly in man. For a man lying on the ground, his face towards Heauen, his armes and handes extended ſo wide as can bee, and likewiſe his legges and feete: open then a compaſſe of ſixe foote in breadth, and ſet one of the points directly on his nauell, as in a Center, and turne the compaſſe round about by his furtheſt reach; and it will make a round and perfect circle, taking iuſt meaſure by the endes of the feete and hands. This is a rule certaine, and common in all men, by a good and well commenſured proportion. Vitruuius ſpeaketh it in the place before alleadged, and the like doe many other Authours beſide. Pliny writeth, that the figure or forme of a man, is angulare and quadrangulare, becauſe in opening his armes, and extending his fingers, the largeneſſe is found, according to the meſure of the mā in length. Hence enſueth it, that holding his feete together, and his Armes abroad extended; he is a quadrangle of foure equall lines. For one paſſeth in him by the Crowne of the head; a ſecond, by the Soles of his feete; a third, by one of his hands; and the fourth, by the other.

Plin. in Lib. 22 Cap 3.

The figure of a man Angulare and Quadrangulare.

The members meaſured with the whole body together.

But comming to the members proportion ioyntly together, and likewiſe of all the body with them; there is found ſome difference, betweene our Authours Ancient and Moderne. Vitruuius ſaith, that the face of a Man, meaſuring it from the neather part of the Chin, to the firſt roote of Haire towardes the fore-head; ſhould containe the length of a tenth part of the whole bodie. And that the length of the hand, from the Wriſt to the top of the middle Finger; is likewiſe the tenth part of a Man. And from the top of the fore-head, to the beginning of the Breaſt; containeth a ſixt part. Alſo from the Crowne of the head, to the ſame vpper part of the breaſt; is a fourth part. They deuided alſo the face, into three equall portions; one to begin at the tip of the Chin, and mounting vp ſo farre as the Noſthrils; then from thence, vp to the eye-browes the ſecond; the third and laſt, is from the Eye-browes, vp to the roote of the haire. The foote (as we haue ſaid) is reputed to be the ſixt part of the whole body. The Cubite (which reacheth from the Elbow, to the top of the middle Finger) is the fourth part; And likewiſe the Breaſt another fourth part. Behold what auncient Writers haue held as a rule, which they deriued from Vitruuius, according to his Countrey.

The face of man deuided into three equall proportions.

Now, this rule ought to be in a man, to haue good proportion and diſpoſition in all his members. I ſpeake this, becauſe there is not any other rule, bee it neuer ſo great, but it hath ſome exception. Wherefore, this here named, is not found alike in all men, but yet in the greater part of them; ſo that, he which ſhall be found moſt conformable to this rule, hath euer the beſt ſhape and diſpoſition. There are many other proportions among the members of man, and from one to another, all which would be too tedious to declare. Neuertheleſſe (according to my wonted order) I will ſpeake of ſome of them briefelie. Among theſe, obſerue this, that the very greateſt ioynt of the biggeſt Finger or Thomb, termed an inch; is the meaſure of the mouthes height, when it is fully open, I meane in ſuch as can eaſily, and without any grieuance, open their mouths. Againe, the ſame ioynt, is the perfect meaſure from the tippe of the Chin, iuſt to the Iawes or Chaps, when the mouth is ſhut. The other leſſer ioynt of this inch or Thomb, that is to ſay; where the naile is, is the diſtance betweene the vpper Lippe, and the tip of the Noſe. The great ioynt of the other next Finger, which the Latines called Index, the pointing Finger, or fore-finger; containeth the length of the fore-head or front, taking meaſure

The beſt allowance for good proportion in a man.

Many proportions among the members of man, by ample diſcription.

Of the meaſures in the fingers.

from

frō the height of the eye-browes, to the first root of haire. That which remaineth of this Index, or fore-finger, to the tippe of the Naile, where are two other ioyntes; is the iust length of the Nose, from the end to the eye-browes. The great ioynt of the bigge or middle finger, which is that in the midst of the hand; is the distance from the tippe of the Chin, to the beginning of the nose. And the whole intire hand, is equall to the greatnesse of the face. All the lesser ioynts in the Fingers, hold like measure to the greatnesse of the Naile, which is the moity of all those lesser ioynts: Wherefore, it is a wonderfull thing, to behold, and obserue the proportions which are in man, and the reasons of them. Moreouer, the height of the fore-head, the length of the nose, as also of the lippes, are euermore equall: And the distance which is between the heele and the Instup; is also equall to that betweene the Instup, and the top of the toes.

The true length of the Nose.

The greatnes of the face.

The for-head, nose, and lips.

The heele & Instup.

We haue already said, that the face ought to be the tenth part of the body, so that the whole stature be deuided into tenne partes, or faces, becausе our auncients made this obseruation. For, from the height or crowne of the head, so farre as the Nosthrils; is one tenth part. From the toppe of the Nose, to the height of the Breast; is a second. From thence, to the mouth of the stomacke; is a third. From the stomacke, to the Nauell; is a fourth. From the Nauell, to the secrets; is a fist; and there is the halfe moity of a Mans true stature. From which place also, to the sole of the foote, are fiue other partes. One beginneth in the middest of the Thighes chiefest greatnesse; the second, descendeth thence to the top of the knee: and the rest going downeward, deuide themselues into three other parts. The grossenesse of a man at his wast or girdle; should be the halfe of his height or length. Notwithstanding, as we haue formerly said, although this proportion bee not found alike in all men: yet it is infallible, that he who is equall to this iust measure in all parts, shall be the comliest and most compleat man. For in former times, those auncient Sculptures, Image-makers, Caruers, and others skilfull in the like Artes, duely weighing and considering these rules: made Statues of many pieces, & of diuers proportions, which when they were ioyned together: they appeared as conforme and agreeable, as if they had bin made all in one piece. The Moderne men of our times, haue taken another rule in this diuision of man: for they haue deuided him into nine parts or faces, and the third part of a face. The principall among them, is Phillip de Bourgongne, a singuler Caruer, who maketh his diuision thus. From the top or Crowne of the head, so farre as the Front; he maketh a third part of the face. A second third part, is from the beginning of the Front, so farre as the tip of the Chinne. From thence, to the height of the Breast, is a third part. From the Breast, to the Stomacke; is a fourth. From the Stomacke, to the Nauell; is a fist. From the Nauell, to the secret parts, is a sixt. From thence, the length of the Thigh to the knee, containeth two other third partes, which make seauen and eight. From the ioynt of the knee downeward, to the sole of the foote, are reputed two other third parts: which make (in all) nine faces, and one other third part. This may be seene and well considered, according to truth, to satisfie some for their further contentment: and this is the rule, obserued and helde by our Moderne men. It is further to be noted and considered, that in the composition and quantity of the members; a very seemely and conuenable proportion is obserued, euen as in a most wonderfull Hermony.

The rules of ancient Artists.

Modern men differing from our ancients.

Phillip of Burgundy, his diuision of man.

The measure of the body into ten parts equally obserued.

The fiue parts vpward.

The fiue parts downeward.

The girdle or wast of a man

Let indifferēt iudgement make triall of both.

Pliny saith, that till the yeares of one and twentie, a man commonly encreaseth in height, and thence-forward groweth in grossenesse, but not in height. Further he saith, that when a Child is three yeares old, he hath receiued the perfect increasing, in halfe of that which he can further increase. Likewise hee saith, that the humours of a sound and healthfull bodie, beeing answerable in proportion; should containe such weight and poise as followeth. Blood should containe eight equall partes in weight: Fleame should weigh foure partes: Chollour two: And Melancholie one, but no more. And so it seemeth, that one doubleth it

Plin. in lib. 9. cap. 7.

Of growing in height and grossenesse.

The weight of the humors in man.

The Authors Concluſion.

it ſelfe vpon the other, euen from the meaneſt to the greateſt. To conclude, this admirable piece of workemanſhip, contemplating and duely conſidering it ſelfe, ought to moone a man, to loue and praiſe the Worke-man which is God himſelfe. And ſeeing wee haue ſo faire a preparation in our bodily Fabricke or ſtructure: reaſon iuſtly requireth, that we ſhold order our manners, according to the perfection of our Soule, to make her appeare the more faire, beeing lodged in a perfect, compleate, and well porportioned body.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of three Princes in our time, and not long ſince, who ended their daies very miſerably, for diſobeying, and euill entreating their Fathers.

THere needeth no doubt to be made, but many diſorderly perſons doe liue in this World, that dare exalt thẽſelues againſt their Parents, and others Superiours, to whom they owe obedience. Which queſtionleſſe enſueth not, but by the ſollicitation of the Deuill, couetous to make many of his faction, and to weare his Liuery, willingly yeelding themſelues to partake in his torments. I ſpeake this, becauſe I purpoſe to handle in this Chapter, the Hiſtories of three wicked Children; the one of thẽ being a Chriſtian, and the other two of Mahomets Religion, that carried themſelues towardes their Fathers and other Kinred, ſo inhumainly, and without cauſe, as can ſcarcely (with modeſty) bee expreſſed, procuring thereby, their owne miſerable ending, which happened not about a thouſand or twelue hundred yeares ſince; but euen in our time: To ſhew the Reader, that this Age of ours is as full of wickednеſſe and ingratitude, (deedes onely proceeding from the Deuill) as any in former times was euer heard of; wherefore I will begin with the Chriſtian.

The Deuill is the Authour and Father of Parricides.

This Age as wicked as any of the former.

The firſt Hiſtory.

Such as haue read the Hiſtories of Phillip de Commines, who wrote the actions of King Lewes the eleauenth, and of his Capitall Enemy, Charles Duke of Burgundy: do finde, that a Duke of Gueldres, a man of vertue, entreating his Subiects benignely, and enriched with the feare of God; had a Sonne named Adolphe, who was newly married to the Duke of Bourbons Daughter. He behaued himſelfe fiercely to her, albeit thee was of the blood Royall of France, and allied to the moſt potent Duke of Bourgongne. Moreouer, grieuing that his Father liued ſo long, his ambition ſtretched ſo farre, as to be Duke of Gueldres in ſtead of his Father. And that hee might the ſooner attaine thereto, this deteſtable Sonne, one night when his Father would haue gone to his reſt; ſurprized him, and cauſed him to be led fiue miles thence, bare-foote and bare-legde, locking him vp in the Tower of a Caſtle, which was buildee in a Marſhy place, round engirt with Waters, and ſubiect to little or no light at all. Sixe months he kept him there in this eſtate, very baſely lodged, and not ſeeing any fire in all that weary time.

Adolphe, Son to the Duke of Gueldres.

Adolphe ſurpriſed his father, and made him priſoner.

The Duke of Cleues hauing heard of this monſtrous dealing; in amity would aduenture for the Priſoners deliuerance: in regard, that the Duke of Gueldres (in his ſecond Nuptials) had married the Siſter to the ſaid Duke of Cleues. Adolphe would heare no friendly perſwaſions; whereuppon, theſe two Lords entred into cruell Warres, but all in vaine. The Duke of Bourgongne alſo imployed his paines, to make an agreement betweene the Sonne and Father: but he could ſpeede no better then the other: When the Duke of Bourgongne perceiued the young foole to be ſo head-ſtrong, accepting of no remonſtrances, which both the Pope and he had ſent vnto him: he made preparation of warre againſt him. Adolphe well knowing, that hee was to deale with one more terrible and powerfull then himſelfe: withdrew his Father frõ Priſon, and led him to the ſaide Duke, who yet againe endeuoured to accord them. The grieuances beeing heard on either ſide; the Father, as hauing loſt al iudgement, by the inſolencies of his Sonne: prouoked, and dared the proud youth to ſingle Combate, vntill ſilence was inpoſed on him.

The Duke of Cleues ſeeke th to reſtore the wronged priſoner.

The Duke of Bourgongne prepared warre.

The Father called the [illegible] to ſingle Combate.

In

PAGINATION INCORRECT

An agreement betweene the Father and Sonne.

In the end, the Duke of Bourgongne appointed (fauouring the Sonne, as his neere Kinſ-man) that the Dutchy of Gueldres ſhould remaine ſoly to him: a ſmall Citty excepted, named Graue, ioyning to the Countrey of Brabrant, which valued the Reuennue of three thouſand Florins. Other three thouſand ſhould bee leuied on the Dutchy, making (in all) ſixe thouſand Florins, which the Father ſhould haue paid him yearely, and the Sonne to enioy al the reſt: with this condition, that he ſhold be inſtituted Gouernor of Bourgongne, with the accuſtomed gages. Phillip de Commines, who hath written this Hiſtory, was deputed (with the other Lords) to make knowne to Adolphe the Sonne, what was determined by the Duke of Bourgongne. But the Sonne, liſtning to euill counſell, ſaid: That hee would no way accept of theſe conditions, but had rather throw his Father into a Well, with his head forward, and then to caſt in himſelfe after. Moreouer, (quoth he) my Father hath beene Duke foure and twenty yeares, and it is now high time that I ſhould be Duke. Willinglie I will giue him three thouſand Florins yearely, vpon condition, that neyther he nor his Wife, ſhall at any time hereafter enter into the ſaide Dutchy: but liue in ſome place ſo ſecured, as neuer to budge thence, or to be made impoſſible for their euer leauing it.

Strange and vile ſpeeches of a Sonne.

While theſe matters were thus in mannaging, the people of Amiens, and other Townes ſeated on the Riuer of Somme, reuolted from obedience to the Duke of Bourgongne: for the morgaged Mony which he had on the ſaid places, had beene conſigned by King Lewes the eleauenth, who would not take, but laboured daily to keepe thoſe Townes, as beſt beſeemed both him and them.

Adolphe the Sonne taken Priſoner.

The Duke of Bourgongne, aduertiſed of thoſe Cities reuolt, being then at Orlans; with-drew to Hedin, and commanded a Guard to lay hold on Adolphe, and Meaſures were immediatly appointed for the purpoſe. Afterward, the Duke of Bourgongne being buſied about theſe affaires; forgot the agreement. But ſo did not the young Gueldrois, for he left his Allemaigne habite, & took one after the French faſhion, wherein he fled away ſecretly, to get into his own country. But as he was to paſſe a Port neere to Namures, hee payed a Florin for his paſſage, and a Prieſt eſpying him; was ſuſpitious of him, and demaunding of a Marriner, came more neer him. When knowing him, he was carried Priſoner to the Caſtle of Namures: where he remained till the Duke of Bourgongnes death, ſuffering many ſhamefull ignominies. His Father dyed a yeare after his taking Priſoner, and inſtituted the Duke of Bourgongne his heire, quite diſinheriting his owne Sonne.

Adolphe eſcapeth by flight.

Adolphe taken Priſoner againe.

The men of Gaunte, touched with the ſame vice, reuolted (after the ſaid Duke of Bourgongnes death) againſt their Lady and Inheritrixe Marie: taking the young ingratefull Lord out of Priſon, and allowing him to bee their Chiefe. But iuſt vengeance made no long delay, for within a while after, beeing bad accompanied, hee was ſlaine before the Towne of Tornay. Wherein God accompliſhed his owne words, ſaying: The diſobedient to their Parents, ſhall neuer finiſh halfe their years. Behold, the end of this wicked youth, who liued in litle eaſe, after the perſecution of his father, and finiſhed his daies vnfortunately; not leauing any heire to his great Wealth, but the man that was his Capitall Enemy. For afterward, they of the houſe of Bourgongne, did continually enioy the Dutchy of Gueldres, and other Seigneuries, euen as they do to this preſent day.

Adolphe ſlaine before Tornay.

The ſecond Hiſtory.

This manner of miſuſing Fathers, was as cuſtommarie (and more) among the Mahumatiſts, as among Chriſtians, and they no more exempted from Diuine puniſhment, then Chriſtians. For they haue knowledge of the old Teſtament, as well as Chriſtians; where they ſee the Commaundements which God made, concerning the obedience due to Parents, and what threatnings doe depend vpon the contrary. Wherfore, thirty two yeares after our firſt Hiſtory, Baiazeth raigned in Turky, who, after he had won the victory againſt the Polonians and Venetians, raigned then thirty yeares. Being then old and decrepite, hauing made peace with all his Neighbours, and enioying countleſſe Riches: he was poyſoned, by the procurement of his Sonne, named Selim, in the Citty of Dumatecha, ſeituate in the the Countrey of Thrace, whether hee had retyred himselfe, there to finish the remainder of his daies. This detestable deede, was committed by a Iew, his Phisition, named Hamon, whom Baizeth most confidently trusted for his health.

Baiazeth poyſoned by the meanes of his Sonne Sthm.

His Father being dead, and he possessed of his Treasures: he gaue Money in great aboundance to his men of war, that had enstaulled him in the Throne Royall: for his elder Brother Zizim, beeing voyd of any meanes to make head against him, was then fledde to Rhodes. He caused two other of his Brethren to be cruelly massacred, and fiue of his Nephewes. Moreouer, Mustapha, a Man of great authoritie, who wrought all that he could doe to his vttermost, for exalting him to the Empire, he made no spare of him also. In briefe, his cruelties were so great and horrible, that all men waxing generally fearefull of him: for a long space together, few or none durst appeare in his presence. At length, this wicked Parricide, hauing raigned nine yeares, ended his dayes at Ciurle, (which is a Village in Thrace) by a Pestilentiall Vlcer that bred in his reines: as a manifest vengeance, which plagued him with vnspeakable torments, for the space of a whole yeare together. Where-with beeing enraged, and put out of his senses, he dyed, cursing both God and Mahomet: to the no little ioy of all the East parts, which he had resolued whollie to ruinate. He dyed in the same place, where (some few yeares before) hee came with bold resistance against his Father: as well worthy (doubtlesse) to end his dayes there, where hee entred into disobedience against his Father.

The massacre which Selim made of his Brethren and Kinred.

The miserable death of Selim, as a iust iudgement of God.

The third History.

Muleasses king of Thunis, a man very learned.

Fiue and twenty yeares after this our second Historie, another, named Muleasses, King of Thunis in Affrica, an especially obseruer of Mahomets Law, and a great Philosopher, following the Religion of Auerroes, fearing least Barbarossa (Admiral to Sultan Soliman, Emperour of the Turkes) that couered the Sea with a mightie Nauall Army, would come and deiect him from his kingdome (as once before he had done, and was re-seated therein againe, by the Emperour Charles the fift, great Grand-Father to the King of Spaine, now raigning) sailed thence into Sicilie, to meete the saide Emperour Charles at Gennes, and to craue succour of him. To guard his Kingdome, while hee was imployed in this vrgent businesse; hee left the most faithfull men he could then thinke on; to wit, one named Mahomet, as Gouernour of the Cittie, and another, called Corsegua, otherwise Phares, whom he constituted Captaine of the Castle, and appointed his Sonne Amydas, as chiefe Commaunder of all his forces, to defend Thunis against the Turkes and Numidians. Being on the Sea, to craue ayde of the Imperiall Maiesty; hee was repulsed by contrarie Windes, and driuen into Naples, where the Vice-Roy feasted him very honourably. There, was Muleasses not a little wondred at, in regard of his curious diet, fashion of Apparrell, with such strange and exquisite perfumes, as wee haue already else-where related.

The care of Muleasses for his kingdome in his absence.

The strange curiosity of Muleasses.

While he was thus at Naples, where the Emperour had commaunded his soiourning, after that Barbarossa had (in vaine) besiedged the Castle of Nice; he receiued certaine newes out of Affrica, that his Sonne Amydas had cut the throates of his Friendes and fauorites, and possessed himselfe of the Cittie. This matter so hammered in his head, that he bethought himselfe of leuying an Army of Men, and (in short time) he got together som eighteen hundred, which he caused to be embarqued, and to prepare for the Goulette. For hee was perswaded, that (as yet) he might ouer-maister his Sonne, because hee could not yet enable all his Forces: moreouer, this forwardnesse was well liked by the Vice-Roy, Don Pedro de Toledo.

Amydas proueth false to his Father.

The reason why his Sonne Amydas thus possessed himselfe of the Kingdome, was thorough a false report, (which some enemies to Muleasses had spread abroad) that he was so sicke at Naples; as death ensued thereon, and that before he dyed, hee was become a Christian, and had receiued Baptisme. And this was the cause, that Amydas beeing presented to them of Thunis, was receiued as their King, and at his entrance, he caused some to bee slain and massacred, for opposing themselues ſelues againſt him, by vncertaintie of theſe tydings of his Fathers death. But Muleaſſes made what haſt he could on the Sea, with his fore-named ſlender troupe of men, and paſſed by the Goulette: where he was aduiſed by the Emperours Lieutenant, named Thoarre, not (too raſhlie) to put himſelfe into the handes of the Affricanes and Numidians, till firſt he was aſſured of their good will towards him.

False reports are very dangereus.

The entrance of the King in blood.

Neuertheleſſe, he ſuffered himſelfe to bee led by ſome Traytours about him, who perſwaded him; that euerie one would embrace him, ſo ſoone as they ſaw him, and very ioyfullie bid him welcome, and that Amydas his Sonne (confounded with ſhame) would take himſelfe to flight. Herevpon, he went directly to Thunis, where ſome number of the people met him, with Knives about their neckes, hanging ready at their throats (as it is a cuſtome among thoſe Affricanes, euen to this day) declaring by their humiliation, and proffered ſeruice, that they deſired pardon.

Muleaſſes leaueth good counſell, and followeth bad

Thus, by deſpiſing the counſell of Tooarre, and others that had an honeſt care of him, to miſtruſt Ambuſcadoes that might be laid for him, and (doubtleſſe) were already prepared: he went on to the Cittie, where he was no ſooner arriued; but the Affricanes ſet vpon him, ſlew aboue fifteene hundred of his Men, putting the reſt to flight, and Muleaſſes among them. But by the extreame ſweete ſmell of his vnguents and Perfumes, he was diſcouered; and beeing taken, was brought to his Sonne Amydas, who cauſed his eyes to be put out with an hot burning Iron, and kept him blinde in Priſon moſt miſerably.

An vnkinde welcome to Muleaſſes.

Amydas cauſed his fathers eyes to be cruelly put out, and kept him priſoner.

The like did he to his two Brethren, Nahahell and Abdelas, who were taken with Muleaſſes. In ſome ſhort while after, there hapned a ſedition in Thunis, during which troubles, Muleaſſes chanced to eſcape thence, by the meanes of a Woman, who had kept him certaine daies in a Ditch, couered with Straw. From thence hee got ſafely into Sitilie, where he liued blinde long time, at the charges of the Sicilians, by commandement of the Emperor: All theſe things happened in the yeare 1547.

Muleaſſes eſcaped out of Priſon.

As concerning Amydas, he liued but 4. years after he had committed this deteſtable Act: in all which time, hee was continually moleſted with warres, by the Vice-Roy of Argier, aſſiſted with the Turkiſh forces; and enforced to yeilde himſelfe tributary, paying well-neere as much as his Kingdome valued. From the day that hee cauſed his Fathers eyes to bee put out, he felt himſelfe continually afflicted, with an extreame head-ake, and Impoſtumations in his eyes: whereby he loſt all ioy, and became blind of one of his eyes, whereof he dyed. All which thinges ſucceeded to him by Diuine permiſſion, in iuſt vengeance of theſe cruelties, which he had exerciſed on his owne Father. Thus was the ending of theſe three Parricides.

The wretched and miſerable end of Amydas

CHAP. XXIIII.

From whence it enſueth, that ſome dreams are ſad and ſorrowfull; And others ioyfull and pleaſing.

A Dream, is that which appeareth to vs as we are ſleeping, not by the function of the eyes; but by imagination. Some of thoſe Dreames doe make vs contented and ioyfull, leauing the body iocond, and well diſpoſed at waking. Contrariwiſe, there are others ſad, and offenſiue, that for diuers daies (after ſuch dreams) procureth a melancholie languiſhment, both in the Soule and Body, making men vncapable of receiuing any delight.

The deſinitiõ of Dreames.

Many haue preſaged by theſe dreams, both of good lucke or bad, which ſoone after ſhould happen vnto them. Some ignorant people haue not ſpared to ſay, that they are the Soules of deceaſed perſons; or Angelles, which doe aduertiſe Men, of ſuch thinges as ſhall enſue vnto them. My purpoſe is not to diſcuſſe, if the Soules of the deceaſed haue (at any time) time) returned againe into this world; for I leaue that to bee diſcided by learned Diuines: though ſome would approoue by Text of holie Scripture, that ſome Soules haue returned into their Bodies, and appeared to others. But becauſe theſe are extraordinarie matters, and muſt needes enſue miraculouſlie; I forbeare to ſpeake of them; and will not trouble my ſelfe any longer, but to diſcourſe of the cauſes naturall, both concerning pleaſing Dreames, and ſuch as are turbulent and offenſiue.

The opinion of ignorance, concerning Dreames.

Diuers meats that are the cauſe of melancholie dreames.

Dioſcorides, Plinie, and Galen doe ſay, that there are diuers kindes of Meates, which doe engender and cauſe ſorrowfull Dreames: As Beanes, Long-Peaſon, Lentilles, Colewortes, Garlike, Onions, Leekes, Cheſ-nuts, and all opening Rootes; as Raddiſh, Carrets, Skirrets and Parſnips. The Fleſh of a Hart, Boare, old Hare, and Beefe; alſo, of a Crane, Gooſe, Drake, Ducke, Buſtard, and diuers other Water-Fowles, as well wilde as tame; and all troubled Wines. Nor is there any doubt to bee made, but that commonly, according to ſuch meates as we vſe in our feeding (raiſing fumes anſwerable to their ſeuerall qualities) that Dreames are begotten of the ſame Nature.

The cauſes of ſad Dreames, or thoſe of other nature.

All theſe meates before mentioned, with many other which I haue omitted; doe engender euill humours, and are Chollericke, Melancholicke, and Phlegmaticke. It is neceſſarie then, that the Bodie of that man, who hath long time vſed theſe Viandes; ſhould be of the temper of the ſaide humours, and that the manners and actions of the Soule, ſhould follow the temperature of the bodie.

Galen is of this opinion, and hath written a Booke thereof expreſly. Likewiſe, ſuch men, as haue ſuſtained ſome notable loſſe, eyther in their Honour, Body, Goods, Parents, Kinred, or Friendes: and oftentimes (in their Dreames) they haue verie fearefull and mournefull Apparitions. For many times it comes to paſſe, that men dreame in the night time, ſeeming to ſpeake, ſee, vnderſtand, negotiate in the precedent dayes affaires: or elſe on ſome thing whereto they bear great affection, or which they deſire for to ſhunne.

Diuerſity of Dreames in the night time.

Now, wee are to vnderſtand the contrary, in ſuch as vſe good and wholſome ſuſtentation, for by thoſe ſound & ſweete vapours, which doe aſcend vp into the braine, proceeding from meates of facile and ſubtile digeſtion; ioyfull and pleaſing Dreames are engendred. As we may note in ſuch as are drunke with drinking good Wine, how pleaſant and facetious they are. Whereas on the contrarie, they that are in like caſe by drinking bad Wine; doe diſpleaſing actions, and hatefull to be ſeene. In like manner, they that are troubled with no cares, but are addicted to delights, without apprehenſion of harmes, and enioying all things that they can wiſh for: they haue no dreams at all, or if they chance to dreame; it is of ioyfull and pleaſing thinges, as all merrie diſpoſed perſons vſe to doe, that are in good health.

By feeding on good meates, good dreams are occaſioned.

Obſeruations concerning Anny-ſeede, Saffron, &c.

They that eate Anny-ſeede after ſupper, or when they are going to bed; or haue fed on Saffron, or drinke with Baulme, Bourage or Bugloſe in their drinke: not onely will haue a ſharpe and ſubtile Spirit, but alſo will dreame on very acceptable thinges. There is a certaine vnguent, found commonly readie prepared by Apothecaries, which is called Populeon, or Pampilion, in regard of the luyce of Poplar leaues or buddes mingled therein; if the temples be rubbed there-with and chafed, the Liuer-veines, the branches of the great Artery, and the ſoles of the feet: it is not only the prouocation of ſound ſleepe, but it cauſeth facetious and delightfull Dreames alſo. As the like doe all meates of greene colour, and Hearbes, exeept Cole-worts: As Morell, or Night-ſhade, commonly called Solanum; the Thorne-Apple, called Seramonia. Some ſay, that the teeth of a Horſe, vngueldeed, hung about a mans Necke, or his right Arme; is a preſent remedie, if he bee vſed to dreame euill dreames.

An oyntment called Pepueon, or Pampilion.

Cardanus ſaith, that himſelfe made an Oyntment, compounded in this maner. The fat of young Infants, taken out of their Graue; the luyce of Parſely; of Reagall or Aconitum; of Cinckfoyle, called Pentaphyllon: wherewith if

A ſtrange Oyntment made by Cardanus.

Strange sights and apparitions.

Morbus Gallicus.

Of Dreames that doe presage and foretell diseases.

Of Fire.

Of Smoake, Mists, and Darkenesse.

Of Raine.

Of Snow, Haile & Ices.

The Ayre is the cause of Dreames sometimes.

Of Dreames that haue happened in successe.

Of Bloud.

Of Bathes.

Of Thirst.

Of Hunger.

Of the soules sickenesse.

Of great weight.

Dreames that declare good or euill health some Weomen and weake persons had chaft the Braine-pan; it is almost incredible to speake, what, and how many thinges they did perswade themselues to see. One while, matters of delight, as Theaters, Gardens, Fish-pondes, Garments, Ornaments, Daunces, goodly young Children, and lying with him or her, of whom they were most desirous. Other-whiles, they seemed to see Kinges and Magistrates, with their Guardes and Attendants; yea, all the glory and pompe of mankind, with many other excellent things, such as we see in Paintings, farre greater then euer Nature made them. Contrariwise, at other times they did see verie heauie sighes; as Rauens, Scritch-owles, Prisons, Deserts, and Torments. In all which is no wonder, although the vnguent bee poysonous; for the like may bee done by naturall thinges. I am well assured, that in a disease (knowen to bee too frequent) when the parties haue beene persecuted with knots and bunches; yet being annointed with the Fat or Grease of man, they haue found their nightly affliction to be greatly qualified, and by reason of pleasing Dreames, haue awaked with ioy and contentment.

Hauing spoken concerning the qualitie of Dreames, occasioned and proceeding from sustentation, as also some other thinges exteriourly applied: I will now speake of such, as doe predestinate sickenesse and diseases, and that by naturall causes. Hippocrates himselfe giueth admonishment to a Phisition, to be heerein very carefull. For, if a Man doe Dreame, that hee seeth Fire: it denoteth the Dreamer to be abounding in Choller, or of a chollerick humour and disposition; whereby hee is very apt to fall into hot and burning diseases. He that dreameth hee seeth Smoake, Mists, or profound darkenesse; is much disposed to Melancholly sicknesses. To dreame of Raine, and moysture; betokeneth the abounding of cold humours. To dreame of Snow, Haile, and Ices; signifieth the redundance of Phlegme to be most cold. How beit (many times) when men do dream of such things; the season is apt and disposed thereto. For the constitution of the ayre, hath such power ouer our humaine bodies: that it impresseth both in the body and soule, the present qualities and dispositions thereof.

Galen, in his Booke of Dreames, declareth diuers Histories, and (among others) one of a Man; who dreamed, that his left thigh was transformed into a Marble-stone: and within short while after (by a dead Palsie) he lost vtterly the vse of that member. An Athlete or wrastler, dreaming that he was a in vessell full of Blood, and so deepe therein, that scarcely the top of his head could be seene: Galen gathered by this dream, that he had great neede of taking some blood from him; by meanes whereof, he was cured of a great and deadly disease. Others dreamed, that they were bathing themselues in Baths of hot water: the Phisition Prognosticated vpon this Dreame, that the patient must bee freed from this disease, by indicatorie Sweatings, which thereon followed, and whereby he won great reputation. In like manner, it happeneth to such as are very thirsty, who dreame that they drink insatiably: and hungry men, that they eate, but neuer be satisfied. It appeareth by these thinges, that during this time of sleep, the Soule should and doth enter into the deepest parts of the body, and hauing neglected the externall sense; it tasteth the Coporall sicknesse, and attributes to it selfe full possession therof, by imagination of those thinges which are instantly desired. Wherefore, whosoeuer dreameth that hee is pressed and charged with a great burden: there is no doubt, but that his animall faculties are oppressed, by a great multitude of humours. Contrariwise, such as dreame they fly in the Ayre, Runne, Leape, and Dance disposedly: denoteth a light body, exempt from the superaboundaunce of vicious humours. Such as dreame that they see, and are in Dunghilles, Sinckes, and such like filthy places: they must needs bee possessed with putride, foule, and noysome humours. But they, to whom it appeares, that they are conuersant in Pleasaunt, Sweete, and delightfull places: good humours doe abounde in them, and it is a signe of health.

Beside these forenamed dreames, I will not heere inferre, that there are none

Dreames grounded on naturall causes, none but such as are grounded on some naturall causes; but on the Grace of GOD especially, who graunteth aduise to some Men, to expresse such thinges for the benefit and good of others. As happened to Galen the Phisition, who had a Man in cure, that had an Artery in his ankle-bone halfe cut in sunder, whereby hee lost all his blood, before any remedy could bee applyed to him. He writeth, that he was aduertised in his sleepe (by some God or Angell) that he should cut the Arterie quite in sunder, and the ends would retire to each side, and so locke together againe. When he awaked, he executed what his dream had represented to him, and by that meanes cured the man. Hauing spoken sufficiently on Dreames, founded on naturall reasons; in the ensuing Chapter I will alleadge some, which haue hapned to diuers Princes, by the speciall Grace of God, and altogether against the order of Nature.

A Dreame that Galen had

CHAP. XXV.

¶ Histories of the Dreames of some Princes, which Dreames afterward came to purpose.

PRinces, great Lords, Prelats, and others, which had charges by Grace especiall and diuine; haue often been admonished in matters that they should doe. As we read of an Angell, or Dæmon, that appeared (in the forme of the Goddesse Pallas) to Antonius, Phisition to Augustus, admonishing him; that although Augustus was sicke, yet he should not faile to be present in the battell, which was on the morrow to be giuen by Brutus and Cassius, and that he should there abide in his Tent. Which he would haue done, but by the Phisitions deepe perswasions to the contrary. For it came to passe, that the Enemies Souldies won the Tents, where (questionlesse) they had slaine Augustus, if he had beene present there. So by this dreame hee preuented his death, won the day, and remained Sole-Monarch of the Romeine Empire: and, vnder his raigne, was borne the Redeemer of the world.

The dreame of Antonius, Phisition to Augustus Cæsar

Quintus Curtius declareth in the life of Alexander, that when he maintained his siedge before the Citty of Tyre, he being entred for succour of the Carthagenians, who saide they were descended of the Tyrians: concluded to raise his siedge, as despairing of euer surprizing it. But in a Dreame, a Satyre appeared to him, after whom hee followed, as he fled before him into a Chamber. His Interpreters tolde him; that this was a certaine fore-warning, to continue his siedge for longer dayes before the Citty, and that hee should surely take it. Which fell out to bee true; and this successe had long time beene foretold by an holy Prophet; who said, that a Greeke should gouerne in that Countrey.

The Dreame of Alexander.

The holy Scriptures are full of Dreames, whereby diuers Princes haue beene admonished, both for their own and their peoples Welfare. As Abimelech, King of Gerar, who was possessed of Abrahams Wife, supposing she had beene his Sister onely. But he was fore-warned sleeping, that he shold attempt nothing against her modestie, least hee incurred the indignation of God, and he obeyed. Another Ægyptian King, by Dreames which Ioseph interpreted to him, while he was kept as a Slaue and Prisoner in his land: found neuertheless the assistance of God, to shunne his owne ruine, and death of his people, by a barrennesse in his kingdome, which should continue for seauen yeares, after as many yeares of plenty. By meanes whereof, he made such prouision of Graine: as hee had sufficient to feede his people, during those fore-told seauen yeares, whereas else he had wanted prouision for his people.

The Dreame of Abimelech, King of Gerar.

The dreames of Pharaoh, King of Egypt.

Katherine de Medicis, Queene of Fraunce, and Wife to King Henrie the second, dreamed (the day before the said King was wounded to death) that shee saw him very sickely, holding downe his head, as hee walked a-long the streetes of Paris, beeing followed by infinite number of his people, that lamented for him. Hereupon, most earnestly shee entreated him, and (as is ſaid) with wringing handes, vppon her knees; not to aduenture in the rank of Tilters on that day. But he, giuing no credit to her wordes, the laſt day of the Feaſting, for the marriage of Madame Margaret his Siſter, to Emanuell Phillibert, Duke of Sauoy; entred into the Liſtes for her Honour. And running to breake a Launce againſt a bold and worthy Knight, to wit; the Count of Montgomerie: happened to bee wounded; for in the Launces breaking on both ſides, a ſhiuer or ſplinter entred by the ſight of his Helmet, and ſtrucke very farre into his head. The King dyed ſoone after of this wound, aged about fortie yeares, leauing his Kingdome wofullie mourning for him.

The Dreame of Katherine de Medicis Q. of France.

We may note the Dreame of this great Princeſſe, and how it happened; whereof (doubtleſſe) God gaue premonition by his good Angell, both for her good, and the whole Realme of France. But the King beeing opinitiue, would rather follow the vanities of the World, then the good aduertiſements of his Wife; and by his deceaſe, the people of France ſuffered many calamities.

The Dreame of Henry the third, King of France.

His Sonne, King Henrie the third, three dayes before he was murdered at Saint Clou; beheld (in a Dreame) all his Royall Ornaments, to wit; his Linnen Veſture, Sandales, Dalmatian roab, Mantle of Azure Sattin, the great and leſſer Crownes, Scepter and Hand of Iuſtice, Sword and guilt Spurres; all bloody, and made foule with the feete of religious Men, and other people, and that hee himſelfe was very angry with the Sexton, of the Abbey of Saint Denis. And albeit good aduiſe was giuen him (according to the daunger of his Dreame) to ſtand ſecurelie vpon his Guard; yet ſo it fell out, as a thing permitted by Heauen, that hee could not auoide the fatall chance, but was ſlaine, whatſoeuer ſtrong Guard was then about him.

Calphurnia her Dreame, concerning Cæſars death.

Calphurnia, Wife to the adopted Father of Cæſar, hauing dreamed, that ſhe beheld Cæſar ſlaine and maſſacred; gaue him notice thereof. But he, in ſtead of conuerting it to his benefit, deſpiſed the dreame; and went iocondly to the Senate the day following, where the Dreame ſorted to wofull effect. To conclude, good or euill Dreames, doe oftenеſt proceede by our vſe of good or bad meates, and ſuch affection as we imprint in our vnderſtanding, as alſo euill humours that poſſeſſe our bodies; and we neede not enquire (ouer curiouſly) what they may ſeeme to ſignifie: except it be of Phiſitions, who thereby doe gather ſome coniecture of the parties health. As for the Dreames of Kinges, Princes, Monarches, Magiſtrates, and ſuch like perſons, that hold ſome degree ouer the people, and in the Church, on whom (often-times) dependeth the good or euill, that any Realme or Prouince is to ſuffer: they are not alwayes to bee contemned; but with great diſcretion and iudgement to bee conſidered. For I am of opinion, with learned Volatteranus, who hath left the ſame written, that (many times) any perſon going to his reſt, not cloyed with bad affections, nor ſuperfluitie of foode, but beeing vertuouſly minded, and healthfully diſpoſed: his Soule (in ſleeping) many fore-ſee many thinges to come. For the Soule, which (of it ſelfe) is Diuine and Celeſtiall, beeing not offended with any wicked cogitations, or ouer bad meates: is at free liberty, and beſt of all performeth her actions when the body ſleepeth, and not being buſied with any other matters.

The Authors Concluſion and opinion of Dreames.

CHAP. XXVI.

Strange Hiſtories, of three ſeuerall perſons, that by one diſeaſe, called Melancholie, fell into admirable imaginations.

IN this Chapter, I muſt preſent a Melancholie ſickneſſe to ye, hapning to two men; the one being deſcribed by Ætius, a Greeke Phiſition, and the other of an Aduocate of Paris, whoſe name I muſt conceale, as Houllier hath done. The one, ſo farre loſt his iudgement, as hee verily beleeued and affirmed, that he had no head. The other imagiimagined himselfe to be dead; and therefore would not eat any thing. How they were both healed, not by Medicaments, but contrarie perswasions, is the charge that I haue vndertaken; and therefore, I will begin with him, that was perswaded he had no head.

Aetius and Houllier both Phiſitions.

A man that supposed him selfe to haue no head.

I am not ignorant, that many wil hardly credit such accidents to happen, to wit, that a man (by length of time) thoulde suppose himselfe to haue no head; albeit by the very Organs of the head, he saw, heard, spake, dranke, and fed euen then as all other men do. But we doo not see daily, how this trabilious, or Melancholy matter worketh in som men; y a, with more pernitious and false imaginations, then these two. As he who not long since thoght he had a Sance-bel in his head or braine. Another, who verily beleeued, that he was King of the Gaules. And a Bourguignon Scholler, remaining at Paris neere to the Church of Saint Iulian, who desired the Physitions, not to hinder his soule, from flying out of Purgatorie into heauen, because he said he was dead. And another, who said, to preuent beeing a Cuckold, he must needes kill himselfe; and thereupon, hangde himselfe about two yeares since, beside diuers other examples of the like Nature.

Aetius Serm 1. Tetrab. 2. cap. 9

Now concerning this man, who was of this headlesse opinion, to thinke that he had no head on his bodie, he was seene and visited by great store of verie famous Physitions, who could find out no remedie for him. Notwithstanding, one among the rest, named Photinus, deuised this helpe, to make him weare a Cask or Head-piece, of Lead, which was of great waight, yet fit for his head. This deuise was accordingly performed; and when they did put it on his head, it was done by two men, without any other Cap or lining; yet warily preseruing the Leade from doing any harme, and fastned verie strongly vnder his chinne. Hereupon, he would say many times that his Heade did ake: and so long they continued this waight on his head, that he became to be perswaded he had a head. For, they vsed to say vnto him, that seeing hee sayd his head did ake, it must needes follow, that hee had a Head. Thus the inuention of Photinus, had happie successe.

A head-piece of Lead, to helpe a Melancholy man

In the yeare, 1550. the month of August, a man of good quality & means, by profession an Aduocate, fell into such a Melancholly alienation of his vnderstanding, that he saide and beleeued himselfe to be dead. In regard whereof, he woulde neither speake, eate, laugh, nor walke any whether, but still kept his bed. His wife requested many Physitions to his cure: but no one could perswade him to receiue any thing, no, not to eate or drinke any sustentation, wherby to maintaine life, hee yeelding no other reason, but that he was dead, and dead Folkes vsed not to eate any thing.

An Aduocate that perswaded himselfe to be dead.

At length, he grew to be so faint and weake, as each houre after other, his expiration was expected. But as manie times it commeth to passe, that God sendeth succour, when (to men) there appeares no meanes of remedie or hope; euen so now it fortuned, that a Nephewe to the sicke mans Wife, suddenly there arriued, that newly came from Bourges, where he studied the Lawes, in hope to haue some money of his Aunt (which he greatly wanted) but hee found her much perplexed, and his Vnckle in weak estate of his vnderstanding. But ye must first consider, that hauing beene at Paris with his Father, who was a worthy Attorney at the Chastelet, hee droue him out of doores, and would not entertaine him; because (by much straining himselfe) he had not aboue three weekes before) sent him his quarterly exhibition, which hee had wasted and consumed. His retirement was now to his Vnckle by the Mothers side, whom he found in such estate, as hath formerly bin declared.

A yong Lawyer of Bourges.

After he had labored to perswade his Vnckle (by Learned, witty, & eloquent Orations) to fall to feeding, and coulde not preuaile, hee concluded to vse some cunning, whereby he might help him to his health. And being well skild in naturall causes, he thought it more fitting to ease this immaginary Malady by familiar perswasion, then any other course beside. And as merry-minded Schollers haue alwayes a readinesse in wit, ioyfull without care, and a louiall humour: so hee goes and hides himselfe in a Chamber neere to his sicke Vnckle, where putting on a Winding sheet, after the manner of dead men, readye for interment, (only his face discouered) he was broght forth, and laid vpon a Table in his vncles Chamber, so as the sicke man might very con-conueniently see him. Foure Tapers of wax were set lighted about him; and all the Children and Seruants of the house stood weeping by him, where both Father and Maister might easily beholde them. In briefe, euerie thing was so Artificially acted, as not any bodie which beheld this deceit, could hardly contain himselfe from Laughing, no not the wife of the sicke man, albeit shee was so extreamly afflicted; or the Scholler himselfe, inuenter of the stratagem, perceyuing euery one about him, to make such strange and counterfet faces.

The young Lawier taketh in hande to cure his Melancholy Vnkle.

The young schollers witty deuice.

Approbation of the Scholler to be dead

The pacient or sicke person, wondring what this matter might meane, demaunded of his Wife, who it was that lay vpon the Table? Whereto she answered, that it was her deceased Nephewe, who comming (ouer-hastily) from his studies to see him; and grieuing at his dangerous disease, was dead with griefe; and partly a Pluriſie, which tooke him by the way; therefore, she had thus prepared his bodie, and stayed but for the Bearers to fetch him to Church for buriall. But Wife (quoth the sicke-man) how can he be dead, considering I see him nowe to laugh, and his eyes are wide open? Husband (quoth she) dead men vse to laugh, euen as you see my poore Nephew doth. The sicke man would beleeue nothing, till he had wrought experience on himselfe. Wherefore, calling for a Glasse to beholde his owne face, hee therewith forced himselfe to Laugh, and Laughing, both acknowledged, and was fullie perswaded, that dead men did Laugh: and this was the first steppe to his recouerie.

The Scholler taught the sicke man how to eate.

This first Scene thus acted by our Comedian Scholler, hee felt his stomacke to waxe hungry, and verie desirous hee was both of meate and drinke, for he had lien three houres in this manner extended on the Table, and called for some good thing to eate. And indeede, he had good reason for it, for hee came fasting from Bourges, without any Foode, not hauing either purſe or pennie, for his whole quarterage was spent and gone. There was not any thing readie in the house, because euerie one was in greefe and mourning; but sending forth to the Cookes, a roasted Capon was presently brought him, which hee quickly deuoured with a pint of Wine, sitting vp (for the time) as men vse to do. This beeing well noted by the sicke man, that a dead man shut vp in a Winding sheet, should feed with so good a stomacke, hee asked his wife whither dead men did eat or no? Yes Husband (quoth she) with excellent appetite, and they do also see verie plainly. Which made him forthwith to call for victuals, to try if he being dead, could eate as his fellow dead men did. One ran quickly to the Cookes againe, and bringing good meat, it was cut readily for him and put into his mouth, so that feeding gently, drinking, and doing all other actions of a mā with good iudgment, thence forward he made no more refusall of his meate, whereby this Melancholy Cogitation, by little and little, left him. But most certaine is it, that had not this Inuention of the Scholler preuayled, want of food, and suppoſition of death, would haue brought immagination, to too true a conclusion.

The sicke man eating by imitation found recouery of health.

The Scholler (by his Vnckle Aduocate) was reconciled to his offended Father, and obtained Licenſe for his pleading: so that comming to the bar, in the Court of Le petit Chaſtelet (a Court of very ancient Record) he prooued one of the best, and most esteemed of his profeſſion. This History being reduced into a quaint Comedie, was acted one Night (by Gentlemen) before King Charles the ninth, my selfe being then there present.

A young Gentleman, of good & noble diſcent, in the higher parts of Lymoſine, hadde tydinges brought him, that a Wilde Boare haunted neere to his abyding, which made him suddenly steppe forth, with diuers of his fathers seruants, himselfe carrying an halfe Pike in his hand; and the rest, such Weapons as they could sooneſt lay holde on, in hope to kill the sauage Boare. Hauing got good knowledge where hee lurked, he & his followers prepared thither, and the Boare perceiuing his immediate danger, made directly toward the young Gentleman. that scarsely knewe how to defend himselfe with his halfe Pike; & (by great chance) ran betweene his legges, and ouerthrew him, offering afterward for to wound him with his tusks. But one of his fathers men, a Baker by profeſsion, & indued with good corage, hauing a Lance in his hand, ranne therewith so directlie into into the Boares throat, that he ſtirred no further, but lay there quite dead. The young Gentleman, in his fall giuen him by the Boar, had conceiued a very ſtrãge and vnheard of apprehenſion, to wit; that the Boare had deuoured one of his legs, albeit, he ſuſtained no harme but his fall: and this conceite continued in him for the ſpace of two yeares. In all his other actions, he was of very good iudgement, this onely excepted for naturally he was addicted to deuotion, not ſuffering a day to paſſe him, without hearing Maſſe, faſting all the ordinary daies appointed by the Church; highly affecting Religious Men, eſpecially, thoſe of the Franciſcan Order. And verie deſirous hee was, to make himſelf one in their profeſsion: but hee had heard, that they would receiue none borne with any deformity of body, as Crooke backt, Cripple, Lame, or that wanted any member. This perſwaſion ouer-ruled him, ran entering into that Order; becauſe he ſuppoſed himſelfe to haue but one Legge, although he walked vp and downe as well as other men; yet ſtill this falſe immagination preuayled in him, that the Boare had eaten vp one of his legges.

The third History of a yong Gentleman of Lymoſine and his hunting of a wilde Boare.

A ſtrange immegination in the young Gentleman.

It happened afterwards verie luckily, that two Friers of the Franciſcane Order, trauailing thorow the Country, vpon a day, when the Sunne was neere ſetting, came vnto his Fathers gate, where they deſired both Almes and lodging for that Night: which was graunted them; and they ſupped with the young Gentleman, as one who was verie gladde to ſee them.

How the yong Gentleman was cured of his melancholy conceit

After Supper, each man betook himſelfe to his Chamber, both the religious Friers remaining ſtill in the roome, by a good fire; and thether came the young Gentleman againe ſecretly, not willing to be eſpied by any of the houſe. He fell into Communication with the Fryers, of his long continued Deuotion, and intent to be one of their Order: but he was depriued of all meanes, becauſe hee had but one legge; and the other was deuoured by the Boare. The holy men, looking earneſtly on him, demanded, if either of his Legges was Artificiall, which ſuſtained his bodie, and deſired him to ſhew them which was it. Then perceyuing immediatly the error of his imagination, they perſwaded him to beleeue no ſuch falſhood; for this was but an illuſion of Sathan, to hinder him in the way to ſaluation. So, with many other goodly remonſtrances, which they had with him for the ſpace of two houres, and the delight he receiued therein, without the leaſt omiſsion, he began to fall from his melancholy opinion; ſo that on the morrow, he told euery one that now he had two Legges. At length, notwithſtanding the Counſell and perſwaſion, both of his Father, Kindred, and Friendes, to the contrary, he entred into Religion, & within the yeare of his approbation, died in the Conuent: for I am perſwaded, that his ſoft Nature could not endure the ſtrict Rules of that Order, which are too ſeuere.

The Authour both ſaw, and perfectly knew the gentleman, and this Hiſtorie to be true.

There is nothing more certaine, then that for theſe melancholy diſeaſes, wherein immagination and reaſon are any way wounded, all remedies Phyſicall do profit nothing, but onely contrary perſwaſions, oppoſite to the conceite falſely imagined, as may bee gathered by the three Hiſtories fore-mentioned. Nor need we heere alledge, that if irkeſome remedies had beene applied to the young Gentlemans Legge, they might (perhaps) haue made him to finde his follie, as I haue knowne ſome in like caſe, which proued in vaine: but I am of the minde, that the Religious men tooke the beſt courſe In like manner, when the common people are mooued by ſedition (which is a beaſt with manie heades) and touched with a melancholy furie: nothing can ſooner reduce them to good ſence and vnderſtanding, then the Vertuous power of perſwaſions and Orations. By which meanes alſo, the alienation of iudgment is quickliеſt cured: and Cicero is of the ſame opinion.

Concerning the nature of theſe melancholy diſeaſes

To appeaſe a diſcontented multitude.

CHAP.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

CHAP. XXVII.

Of a strange manner of Bannishment, vsed by the Athenians, by vertue whereof, manie of the verie cheefest men among them, were likewise sometimes banished, although they had committed no offence.

THE Common-wealth and Gouernment of Athens (according as we haue already described) was one of the most potent and famous in the Would. For after, they wold accept of no more Kings, but reduced all to Libertie: they yeelded a great number of men, excellent both in Learning and Armes, where-with all Histories are plentifully stored.

Kinges suppresst damōg the Athenians.

Amongst all other commendable Lawes and Customes, which they kept for their owne conseruation, and maintenance of their rule and libertie, there was one very strange, which yet appeared to them proper and necessary, to reproue and chastise the ambition & ouergreat boldnesse, in some of their chiefest Commanders, who made themselues so great, that meaner men might not withstand them, or attaine vnto the like Authority.

The people might banish whomsoeuer they pleased for the space of ten yeares.

At a certaine time, the people (vnder whom, all estates and conditions of the Cittie were comprized) had power and faculties to banish (although it were without cause) for the space of ten yeares, any one of their principall heads, euen such as they pleased, or stoode most in doubt of, that he would possesse himself of their Dominion, or becom a Tyrant vnto the Common-weale; or if a common Hatred were conceiued against him, which they performed in this manner.

The order & manner obserued in their banishment.

The Magistrats, to whom this Negotiation was deliuered by Commission; making a conuocation of the people, gaue to euerie one of them a little stone, or small Tile-slate; and his name whome they would haue to bee banished, each man must write vpon the Tile, and then deliuer it backe to the Magistrates. These little stones or Tiles (but some tearme them shelles) were by the Greeks termed Ostraci; and thereon, this kinde of exile or banishment, was called Ostracismus. When all these stones were laid togither with the peoples Inscriptions on them, they made an account of them: and if it chanced, that they amounted not to the number of sixe thousand (for in such assemblies, no man stood bound to deliuer in his bulletine except himselfe pleased) for that yeare there was no banishment graunted. But if they rose to sixe thousand and more, then they counted aside, the names of them that were written on the Tiles; and hee that had the most voyces (although he were the verie honestest man, or of greatest Wealth and Honor in the Cittie) he was immediately banished for ten years space, without any remission. Neuertheless, no man might do him any wrong in his goodes or possesions: but his Seruants might gouern and order all things, according to his direction.

Ostracismus, the Athenians banishment.

No repect of persons in this order of exile.

Now, albeit this Law was induced, to correct and punish not only the vicious, but to appease popular enuy against the mightiest, and to take away all ambition: yet it might so come to passe, that the people enioying this priuiledge and Authority, should banish such, from whom most profit and honor had come to their Common-weale whereby they shoulde fall into the sinne of ingratitude. And indeed it prooued true, for (by the same means Themistocles was banished, a most excellent Captaine, by whose Counsell and dilligence, Xerxes was vanquished, expelled out of Greece, and his nauall armie quite defeated: not only Athens being set at libertie by him, but all Greece likewise. With the same Wages also was Simon the Athenian rewarded, liuing at the same time, who so many times had fought for the freedome of his countrey. Especially, he did such an acte of honour and vertue, as no man (before him) had done the like. For, hee won the battaile by Sea against the Persians; wherein hee tooke two hundred Gallies. Afterward, and the same day, hee had no sooner atchieued this victorie: but bringing his Armie on Land, and Marshalling them in good order, he fought against the rest of the Persians, that had landed before in great

The reason of this Lawes first institution.

Themistocles banished by this Law.

Simon the Athenian so banished.

Simons victories both by Sea & Land, and his admirable Liberality.

great number, and foyling them likewise, was conquered both by Sea and Lande. Beside these deeds of Vertue, he was verie liberall of his goods, wherewith Fortune had greatly enriched him. For hee laid open his great Farmes and Gardens, that euery man might pertake of such blessing as were there: giuing also (but verie secretly) great Almes to poor people of the Citty. Hee gaue an expresse charge to all his seruants, that if they met (on the way) any people more aged then themselues, and not well Cloathed, to despoile themselues of their better Garments, and to chaunge for their woorse. Moreouer, each Feast day (allowed by Order) he feasted all the poore Beggers of the Cittie: and in this maner, he spent all the wealth left him by his Father Miltiades. Neuertheless, all these Liberalities and worthy deeds, could not defend and saue him from this exile, and ingratitude of his Countrey, as is testified by Cratinus the Commicall Poet, and Georgias Leontinus.

His noble Charity.

Cratinus, and Georgias Leontinus.

In like manner, Aristides, the Sonne of Lysimachus, was most vniustly banished; which Aristides, for his Vertues and sanctitie of life, was called Iustus: yet could not hee liue without the peoples feare and suspition. But in this case there happened a very notable and worthy accident; for, at the time when the people gaue their opinion for his banishment, according vnto their wonted Custome: one of the Cittizens, that neither could write, or knew Aristides, but only by his fame, came to Aristides himselfe, to entreat him to write the name of Aristides on the stone, because he would giue his voice for his banishment. Aristides wondering at this matter (for he dreampt not on any such vnkindnesse towardes him) saide vnto him; Tell mee good man, hath Aristides done thee any displeasure? No, (quoth the Cittizen) but only it offendeth me, that I heare him euerie where tearmed [Aristides the Iust.] Thus doth Plutarch set it downe; but Paulus Æmilius sayeth; that the Cittizen answered him; I know not Aristides; and yet methinkes I cannot endure him, because (with such dilligence) he hath got the honor, to be called Iust. All which notwithstanding, Aristides made him no answere, but wrote his own name vppon the stone; and though the people were thus leagued against him, hee was not a iot offended at his Countrey, but willingly went forth in banishment, saying; I desire of the Goddes, that the Athenians may neuer know any such necessitie, as (at any time) to stand in neede of Aristides. But the Athenians well declared their owne errour, in exiling such a woorthie man: for before, the ten yeares were expired, yea, within six yeares, by will and consent of the people, hee was reuoked from exile. After which repeale, he did many admirable deeds of Armes, being present at the batteil on the Sea, neer Salamina, where Xerxes was foyled; and likewise at that place, where hee conquered Mardonius. Thus this exile (as I haue formerly saide) happened euermore to the best and most eminent men. Neuertheless, albeit the harme was great; yet it carried with it a certaine kinde of honor and dignity, in regard of the fear and enuie generally conceyued, least they should become Tyraunts, as Pisistratus was.

A notable accident concerning Aristides, surnamed Iustus, by an ignoraunt Cittizen.

Difference between Plutarch, and Paulus Emilius.

The words of Aristides at his banishing.

Aristides repealed from banishment.

Mardonius a Captaine belonging to Xerxes.

Plutarch reporteth, that while Athens flourished in power, wealth, and military exercise, there were two great men; the one, named Nicias, and the other Alcibiades, who were in all things curious and ambitious after glory, enuying greatlie one another. When the fore-mentioned time of Ostraciſme drewe neere, and the people prepared for their woonted custome, each of these great men grewe fearefull of himselfe, and laboured with their vtmost dilligent endeuour, to hinder their fal into such an inconuenience. At the same time liued in Athens, one named Hyperbolus, a man of base condition yet very proud, but much more seditious. He perceiuing the humors of Nicias and Alcibiades, essayed by all means possible, to sow discord and contentions between them, hoping thereby to winne himselfe reputation; and pre-supposing also, that (by reason of their enmity) one of them should be banished by the Ostraciſme, & he (in meane time) attaine to the place of his greatnesse, to haue eminency & command in the Citty.

Plutarch concerning Nicias & Alcibiades.

Hyperbolus, a man of meane quality.

But this intent comming to the others knowledge, and each of them accounting it shame, that a man of such base quality should equall himselfe with them, pacified their spleenes secretly, and became louing friends; choosing rather to bridle their owne rancor, then to suffer such such a scandall vnto the state in generall. They further contriued, to woorke with the people in such manner, that Hyperbolus should be banished by the Ostracism, and followed their intent so dilligentlie, that they preuailed therin, requiting him with the same measure, which he meated to others.

Nicias and Alcibiades make themselues Friends.

Hyperbolus banished from Athens.

The people were not a litle well pleased heerewith, to see so vile a person excluded, after so many worthy and excellent men. But at length, these pleasures turned to anger and discontentment, & that in such sort, as the Law of Ostracism for euer after, found imbarment.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of many worthy and famous men, that by the ingratitude of their Countries, endured Banishment.

Histories are well filled with ingratitudes, which ancient and memorable Cities haue returned to such mē, as haue done them notable Seruices, and holpen them in their greatest necessities. Wherefore, we wil shew some examples, to the studious affecters of Histories, how frequent a thing this hath bin in former times.

Ingratitude of famous Cities.

The great Father of the Latin toong, and Soueraigne Orator therein, that deliuered Rome from the perillous coniuration of Cataline, was yet notwithstanding banished, at the instance & procurement of Clodius his sworne enemie: whose exile was so much bemoaned in Rome, that there were aboue twenty thousande persons, which chaunged their habites into mourning Garments, and thereby, caused his restoring to his former Liberrie, to their great ioy, and his high Honour. Demosthenes likewise, the Prince of Greek eloquence, and Defender of his Country Athens, was banished by the Athenians, who albeit they had founde iust occasion for o do, yet it could pleade no sufficiency, to depriue themselues of so worthy a mans presence.

M. Tul. Cicero, banished by the means of his enemie Clodius.

Demosthenes banished by the Athenians.

He was excessiuely grieued, to see himselfe banished from his Countrey, & that in such sort, as he departed in wonderfull Melancholy. And meeting some Athenians at his issuing forth, that were his capital enimies, he stood greatly in doubt of them: yet did they offer him no offence, but rather ayded and comforted him, with all such thinges as were needefull for him. Which when he had duelie considered, and saw himselfe reproued, because he had grieued so much for parting from his Countrey, he saide vnto them: Wou'd'ye not haue me lament, seeing my selfe banished from my Countrey, where a mans enemies are such, as he may account himself happy, when (forsaking his friends) he trusteth most to them.

The words of Demosthenes to his Countrymen.

Metellus, sur-named Numidicus, in recompence of his victorie obtaind against Jugurth, King of the Numidians, was banished out of Rome, because he wold not accord vnto a Law, wherof a proffer was made him. Hannball, after he had performed as much, as a good Citizen possibly could do for the good of his Country, & albeit he was the most excellent Captain of his time, yet could he not be permitted to liue securely in his Country, but being banished thence, was constraind to wander thorow the world. Renowned Camillus was vniustly banished from the Citty of Rome, euen then when the Gaules surprized it, and had besieged the Capitoll. Wherefore, during his exile, hee was made Dictatour, and chiefest Captaine of his Country, whither being returned, hee deliuered them from imprisonment, that had banished him.

Metellus Numidicus banished from Rome.

Hannibal banished by his native Country Carthage.

Camillus banished from Rome.

Seruillius Hala, after hee had preserued the Liberties of Rome, from the ambition of Spurius Emilius, Maister of the Knights that wold haue made him King, and whom he woorthily slew, was banished for his recompence, and sent into exile.

Seruilius Hala banished out of Rome.

I neuer knew anie Common-weale, more beholding vnto a man, then Lacedemon was to Lycurgus, for the good Lawes he gaue them, whereby to order their course of life. And albeit, he was a man of Holie life, and commendable manners, and of whom (according vnto Valerius Maximus) the Oracle of Apollo lo Pytheam, made answere; That it was doubtfull, whether hee should bee ranked among Men, or the Goddes: yet notwithstanding, hee was manie times pursued by the Cittizens, at the stones triall, and expulsed from their Cittie. Finallie, hauing one of his eyes pulled foorth, hee was afterward banished out of the countrey.

Lycurgus most vnkindly vsed and banished by the Lacedemonians.

The selfesame courtesie did the Athenians extend to Solon, who had instituted so many good and Vertuous Lawes for them, and of whom, if they would haue continued due vse, their Empire (it might haue beene) had perpetually endured. Neuertheless, because he conquered & recouered for them the Cittie of Salamina, and likewise aduertised them of Pisistratus his attempts, seeking to make him selfe a King, and to Tyranize ouer them: euen in his old decrepit age, they rewarded him with banishment; and he could not preuaile so much with them, as to graunt him any poor place in their countrey, where he might conclude the small remnant of his dayes, but needes they would exile him into the Isle of Cyprus.

Solon banished by the Athenians.

Scipio Nasica, who was knowne to be the Woorthiest man in Rome, and deserued no lesse honour, for administration and gouernement in the Common-wealth, then the other Scipioes (with their armies) in the field: Neuertheless, after hee had freed Rome from the Tiranny and subiection of the Greekes (wel knowing the enuie of some Cittizens, and their hatred conceiued against his Vertues) dissembling an employment in an Embassie, he voluntarily retired himselfe to Pergamum in Asia, where (without seeking anie Reuenge on his Countries ingratitude) he ended the rest of his daies.

Scipio Nasica banished him self from his Countrey.

Publius Lentulus, in like manner, after hee had vertuously defended the Common-wealth, and represted the furious attempts of the Greekes, his best recompence was banishment from Rome. But before he went to his confination in Scicily, he desired of the Gods in all the peoples presence, that hee might neuer returne againe, vnto so ingratefull a Nation.

Publius Lentulus banished from Rome.

Boetius Seuerinus, a very famous and Vertuous man, was banished by Theodoricke, that vsurped in Rome: only vpon a conceited suspition, that the sayde Boetius sought the freedom of his Countrey. For the same cause, the Tyrant Dionysius banished Dion the Syracusane, an excellent Captaine, who by the meanes of his banishment, became afterward so powerfull, that he restored his Countrey vnto her wonted libertie, and banished Dyonistus from his gouernment, & wholly depriued him. In like maner hapned it to Thrasibulus the Athenian Captaine, who being banished from Athens by the power of thirtie Tyrants, which held it in subiection, he mustred together other banished men; and with the helpe of Lysander, a Captaine of Lacedemon, returned to Athens, and deliuerd it from their slauish seruitude. Publius Rutilius, Consul of Rome, being banished by them that tooke part with Silla, albeit he was afterward repealed from exile, yet would hee not yeeld thereto, but saide: I had rather do shame to my Countrey, that causelesse banished mee, then to liue among them that consented to my exile. Tarquin the proud, though by no ingratitude, but rather for his wickednes, was banished out of Rome, and lost his kingdome, for the rape which his Sonne had committed on chaste Lucresse, a verie worthie Romain Lady. Milo, the Romaine Patrician, by reason of the death of Clodius, albeit he was descended of Cicero, was relegated to Marseilles.

Dion banished by Dionisius.

Thrasibulus banished by 30. Tyrants.

Publius Rutilius banished from Rome.

Tarquinius Superbus banished Rome.

Milo the Patritian banished Rome.

I read, that Clisthenes was the first that deuised the Law of Ostracisme or banishment in Athens, and was himself the first man, that by the same law was banished. Also Eusitachius Pamphilius, a Prelate of Antioche, was banished, because he contradicted the Arrian Heretickes, in the time of Constantine the great. Paulus Diaconus, a great Historiographer, and of especiall Authoritie, saith; that Pope Bennet the fift was banished out of Rome by the Emperor Anthenius: for this Anthenius hauing vanquished the Emperor Berengarius, and Albert his Sonne, sent them also into perpetuall exile.

Plutarch in his Epistles.

Eustachius Pamphilus banished.

Pope Bennet banished.

Berengarius & his son Albert sent into perpetuall exile.

Thus you see, that manie woorthy persons haue beene banished, and yet exile was accounted in Rome so great a punishment, as no one could there bee banished, till first hee had consulted thereon with all the people. For in trueth, the loue tha a man beareth vnto his nation is so great, as hee cannot bee excluded thence, but to his extreame greefe and affliction. For, the consolation of banished men, Plutarch wrote a singuler Boetius Seuerinus banished by Theodoricke.

Treatise, and Erasmus a very learned Epistle. Seneca also, in his Book of Comfort, directed to Paulinus, writeth woorthily thereon.

Plutarch. Erasmus. Seneca in lib. de Consolat.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of two seuerall men, who being apprehended for Homicides, were neuertheless made Kings, and by those meanes which they supposed, would be the losse of their liues.

THe meanes whereby God ordereth and woorketh all things, are so secret to the immagination of men, as when they suspect the losse of some perticuler matter by one way, euen then they sooneſt finde and recouer it. So that, in whatsoeuer high estate a man is, let him make no certaine assurance thereof, nor yet distrust or fall into despair, if his aduersity be neuer so mighty, as may appeare plainely by two notable examples.

The weaknesse of mans imaginations.

At what time Ladislaus raigned King in Bohemia and Hungaria, hee being the Sonne to King Aubert, young, and newly come to the Gouernment of the kingdom, he was constrained (in that regard) to rule by the opinion of some of his chiefest Barons, amongst whome, there happened contention and discords, especially, in the Sons to John Huniades Vayuod (Tutor to the King, who died a little before, and had held the most power or sway in the Realme) on the one side, and Henrie Count of Celia, neere Kinsman to the King, on the other. This enmity was so great, that on a day when the Count of Celia was in a Church, in one of the Citties of Hungary, hee was there slaine by the hands of those Sons, to the Lord John Huniades Vayuode, which is a name of great dignitie in that Kingdom. For the instant, the King made no shew of discontentment, because he knew him selfe not strong enough to chastice this presumption: but afterwardes, being returned to the Cittie of Buda, hee caused the Sonnes of Vayuode to bee apprehended; and the eldest of them being named Ladislaus, had his head smitten off. As for the other called Matthias, because he was verie young in yeares, hee spared to execute Iustice on him: Neuertheless, hee was committed vnto prison, vnder good and sure guard, in the Realm of Bohemia.

Ladislaus King of Hungaria and Bohemia.

Ladislaus, son to Vaiuode, beheaded.

The Count of Celia slaine in a Church.

The youth being thus detained prisoner, without any hope of life, or to see anie end of his imprisonment, it hapned, that in the same Cittie, where hee was prisoner, named Prage in Bohemia, the King Ladislaus dyed; by meanes whereof, the people of Bohemia, elected a King called George Pogibrachio. The Hungarians (on the other side) beeing aduertised of their Kings death, and much mooued with pittie to young Matthias, especially because of his Fathers former great Authoritie in the Kingdome, they proclaymed Matthias King of Hungary, althogh he was in the power of George, the newe King of Bohemia. When George had intelligence of their election, hee foorthwith deliuered him; and vsing many royall kindnesses towards him, gaue him also his daughter in Marriage. Thus the poore despairing young Lorde, became in an instant a most potent King; & questionlesse, if he had not falne into this aduersitie, he had neuer attained vnto such greatnesse of State. Because some other then he, might haue beene elected; or his Brother Ladislaus (beeing the Elder, and not put to death) had preceeded him; or else, the Count of Celia (hauing escaped his murther) had hindered him, being so neere in Kindered to the King; onely respect and pittie of his imprisonment, was the sole cause of his aduancement.

The death of King Ladislaus.

Matthias being in prison, was proclaimed King of Hungary.

Where Fortune fauoureth, no contrary meanes preuenteth.

Thus hourely expecting death, hee came to a Crown, and by the same meanes as such as haue it, do sooneſt loose it: proouing afterward, one of the worthiest Kinges in his time, obtaining manie famous victories, and performing admyrable actions in Armes, especially against the Turkes.

The like fortuned to Iaques de Lusignam, Vnckle to Peter, King of Cyprus: For, during the Feasting and solemnitie made for the Kings Corronation, a controuersie happened betweene the Geneways and the Venetians there present, concerning their preferrance, because each

The second History of Iaques de Lusignam.

The Venetians and Genewaies at contention each of them contended about the chiefeſt place. And the matter was ſo obſtinately debated on either ſide, that Iaques de Luſignam (who fauoured the Venetians) cauſed ſome of the Geneweyes to bee ſlaine. Whereof the reſt being aduertiſed that were at Gennes, they were ſo offended; that to reuenge this wrong, they raiſed a great Army, vnder the charge of a Captaine, named Pedro Fregoſo, an excellent Warrior on the Sea. Hee ordered the matter in ſuch ſort, that beeing come to the Iſland, he tooke the City by force of Armes, wherein was Iaques de Luſignam, who was alſo ſurprized & led to Gennes, where (by appointment of the Senat) he was ſhut vp in a ſtrong Tower, with full purpoſe, that there hee ſhoulde finiſh his daies. In this ſtate, he there continued for the ſpace of nine years, not hoping of liberty, or any fauour elſe. But in the end, Fortune turning hir wheele, it chanced that K. Peter died without anie heire: by meanes whereof, they of the Iſland (ſorrowing for the long detention of this Iaques in priſon, & regarding that he was neere Kinſman to their deceaſed Lord) elected him for their King, althogh he was priſoner. Without which means of impriſonment, it may be, that hee had neuer come to ſuch dignity, although he had got it by being at liberty, ſuch are the wils and inclinations of men. After this election made by the Cypriots, they ſent their Ambaſſadors to Gennes, to the end, that with al the beſt cõditions that might be, they ſhould compaſſe the libertie of their King. Compoſitions being propounded, and his ranſom paid, with great pompe and feaſting hee was freed from captiuity; & being magnificently broght to his ſhips, they ſet ſail for Cyprus, where he was welcommed as their king, crowned, obeyed, and raigned diuers yeares.

Iaques de Luſignam ſhut vp in priſon.

Iaques de Luſignam elected King being then a priſoner at Gennes.

Iaques cõuaied from Gennes to Cyprus.

CHAP. XXX.

A Paradox in defence of Hurts & Wounds, maintaining that the wounded man is in more happy eſtate, then hee which is whole and ſound.

ICannot well conceiue any reaſon, that ſhould incite vs to ſuch tender and delicate care of our bodies, ſeeing wee pretend to haue courage more hard then Iron, and leſſe ſenſible then ſtones. Nor do I ſee any iuſt cauſe, why we ſhould be ſo fearefull of wounds and ſtabs, ſeeing they can but pierce the Corſlet or falſe Coat of Defence, and no way hurt or offend the ſoule, which is the moſt Noble part of all, and can no way be iniuried or wounded, but by our ſelues only in wicked cogitations, which are the blowes (indeede) that brings the greateſt greefe, and moſt of all tormenteth a quiet ſetled ſpirit.

The ſoule is the moſt Noble part in man.

I haue many times ſmiled to my ſelfe, in noting ſuch men, as haue wondered and complained verie greeuouſly, when any of their friends and Kindered, were mortally woundedin diuers parts of their bodie: Neuer conſidering, that amongſt all thoſe wounds, but one only was fatall and deadly, for one bodie cannot indure many mortall wounds. So that if there be but one wound, that maketh the way open to death: it followeth of neceſsitie, that the other muſt be of leſſe force, ordinarie harme; or (at the vttermoſt) void of any danger.

One mortall wound, is enough to expire life.

Iulius Cæſar, had three and twentie woundes; notwithſtanding, hee had but one onely, that tooke his life from him. I could gladly wiſh, that as manie men, as haue their members weakened or diſabled, by hurts and Wounds, their pride of minde might thereby bee abated, and their ſwelling glorie made more coole and humble. The Princely Prophet (in the Song of the bleſſed Virgin, and elſe-where of himſelfe) ſingeth woonderfull ſweetely: Thou Lorde, haſt Humiliated the Proude, euen as wee ſee him humbled, that hath beene well beaten or wounded.

Iulius Cæſar had three & twenty woundes.

Luke 1,52.

For my part, whenſoeuer I ſee anie one, that hath his Noſe cut off, his head broken, or his body otherwiſe wounded, I neuer conſider the wounde, but eſpecially regard the matter and occaſion thereof. For, as wee behold the faces of Valiant Soldiers and Captains commended, when in wars (for their Countries cauſe) they are cut, ſlaſht, and mangled; which hurts are to them, as ſo many rich Diamonds or Rubies to adorn them withall. So on the contrary, they that are wounded in any baſe or bad quarrel, or diſſoneſt enterpriſe, thoſe hurts are thẽ, as ſo many filthy ſpots, or ſtaines of dirt vpon their faces.

Wounds the honourable badges of ſoldiers.

Marcus Sergius mained in Warre.

Marcus Sergius, fighting valiantly, and as became a man of worth; loſt one of his handes. And when hee had cauſed another to bee fordged of ſteele for him: hee was rather a more famous Champion then before, no way appearing defectiue by his handes loſſe. This hath beene euermore, and yet may bee obſerued, in men of greateſt dilligence and knowledge, that where Fortune granteth licence to hurt & wound; there Vertue her ſelfe is moſt pained and tormented. For we ſee it ordinarily happen to men, as it dooth to precious odours and the pureſt ſpices, which the more they are beaten and bruiſed; the ſweeter ſent and ſauour they ſende abroade, thereby expreſſing their more piercing and gracious power. And not to trouble yee with the Wal-nut, and other Trees; that by blowes and ſtrokes do become the more fruitfull, as in like manner our wearing Garments, by bruſhing and beating are the better preſerued. Euen ſo, when we ſee any man maimed, cut, or wounded, it giueth ample teſtimonie of his hearts greatneſſe, as alſo of his vndoubted proweſſe and Valiancy.

Vertue expreſſeth it ſelf beſt by opreſſion.

Let vs confeſſe then, that it is not euill to bee hurt or mangled, in cauſes of Vertue & true honor: but let vs be heedfull of ſuch cuttes and wounds, as come thorow our owne follies, or thoſe badde ſtroakes, which proceed of wicked occaſions; for they are much more daungerous to the ſoule, then thoſe exteriour hurts that happen vnto the body, by courage of heart, and valour of the minde. Becauſe the inward wounds which enſue or are cauſed by our owne defectes, are truely ſuch, as the Emplaiſters and Medicines of the beſt Phyſitians and Chirurgions in the world, being applied to them, can neuer helpe, or ſoundly recure.

To bee hurt through our owne wickedneſſe, is the greateſt harm of all other.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of the Crocodile, with a refutation of ſundry Fables, which are found written, concerning the ſame Beaſt.

I Know very well, that many men among vs, haue ſeene the ſtuffed skins of Crocodiles, & of great hugeneſſe, though not liuing. Of which Beaſt, I find ſome ſtore of Fables to be written, which people (very peeuiſhly) haue beleeued: wherefore, to take away thoſe errors, I purpoſe in this chapter to confute them, according as I haue beene enſtructed by many woorthy perſons that haue made ſome long ſtay in thoſe parts, wher the Beaſt it ſelfe abideth, who all (with one conſent) haue confirmed what I finde faithfully Written of the Crocodile.

Many Fables credited of the Crocodile.

This Beaſt is tearmed Amphibium, that implieth to liue partly in the Water, and partly on land. It is commonly credited, that Nilus onley, the Riuer of Egypt, is the perticuler breeding place of this great and dreadfull creature. But how far this is from all truth, hath well beene obſerued, ſince the Spaniards effected their long Nauigations. For the Riuer Ganges breedeth ſtore of them; & many of them haue beene found in diuers partes of India, eſpecially in thoſe Iſlands, which are about the Cittie of Honorath, & in great Ethyopia, in the Lake of Zembera, and in the riuer of Darath, in the dition of great Negus or Necos: in which Lake and Riuer, the Crocodiles are much more cruel then thoſe of Egypt; for if they can ouer-reach ſuch as com to bath themſelus there, they hale them forthw th into the bottom of the water, and there deuoure them. As hapned (not long ſince) to a Gentleman of Portugal, who had two of his ſeruants deuoured, as they were bathing themſelues in that Lake.

Amphibium what it ſignifieth.

Crocodiles bred elſwhere then in Nilus.

Crocodiles more cruell then thoſe in Egypt.

Leirus Writeth, in his Hiſtorie of America, that hee hath ſeene ſome little Crocodiles, onely of the length of two or three foote, and about the bigneſſe of a mans Thighe, which are no way cruell cruell or hurtfull; but so soon as the Brasilians haue taken them in the Riuer of Genebra, they giue them to their children to play withall, and they will do them no harme, albeit they haue Teeth, and can bite.

Of another kind of Crocodiles.

Lerius. in Hist. de Americ.

There are also of another kinde in the same Countrey, which keepe themselues in the Rockes, and will rush forth vppon Passengers, as well men as Beastes, and deuoure them: but if they stande vppon their owne defence, many times they flie away from them. He that hath written the generall Historie of the Indians, saith; That he hath seene some, neere or about Panama, containing an hundred foote in length.

The Crocodile is like to the Lizard.

The Crocodile doth euerie way resemble (as well in his exteriour, as inward parts) the Lizards liuing amongest vs. Many are found, to containe the length of sixe great strides of a man, and larger then three foote vpon the backe; beside others of lesser quantity. It is an horrible and fearefull sight, to beholde this monstrous Creature; for the passage of his throate is so wide, that the head of a man may easily enter it. Hee hath Teeth, great, sharpe, and cleare, both aboue and beneath in his Iawes; and hee is onely saide (amongst all other Beastes, as yet euer hearde of) to moouе the vpper-chap or Iaw.

The fight of a Crocodile very dreadfull.

An errour in Aristotle.

Aristotle sayth, that he hath no tongue: but I my selfe haue seene both great and little Crocodiles, dead, and dried, in all which I found seuerally a tongue, but very short, flat, and large. There are no scales vpon his skinne, but it is like to the barke of a Tree, rising as embossed in many places; and it is so hard, that the point of a Pike, or Iron head of an Arrowe, cannot enter it; nay, it is saide, to be Harquebush proofe. He is armed with verie sharpe and crooked Nails, his fore feete beeing very short; and yet runneth with great swiftnesse, when hee flyeth from such as stande not in feare of him.

The Crocodiles skin of Harquebush proofe.

The Crocodile is fearful.

It is not true, which some Authors haue Written, that this Beast keepeth himselfe in the day on the Land, & in the night in the water: For, it is quite contrary, and customarily he commeth forth of the Water, so soone as the Moone beginneth to shine, as is continuallie noted by them that dwell in those partes, as in Egypt, which is the neareſt place of their being to vs.

Of the Crocodiles keeping in the water.

Plinie, and Munster, the Germaine Cosmographer, following him, doo record another Ieſt, to wit: That there is an Island in Nilus, where men do mount on these Beasts, and ride them in like maner as on Horsse-backe. For, when the Beast openeth his mouth to bite, the man clappes a Clubbe of Woodde in it thwart-wise, and holdeth fast by eyther end of the saide Club, and so doth guide this furious Beast, whether himselfe pleaseth, euen as they ride a Horse for seruice in Spaine, with a Bridle: by which means, he is compelled to cast vppe such bodies as hee hath deuoured, to giue them better buriall: woulde any man wish for a more notable fable?

The error of Plinie & Munster.

I cannot bee otherwise perswaded, but that if an hundered men stoode in a ranke, and were well armed in the Riuer of Nile vp to the belly, or in anie other Riuer elsе-where, and did beholde but two such Crocodiles comming towards them, as I haue seene deade and dried; they woulde verie gladly betake themselues to flight, so exceeding hiddeous and dreadfull, are they to be seene in the Water.

The Authors opinion of the Crocodile.

It is certaine, that there is an Island, not farre off from Meroe, called (at this day) Cleomeny in Ethyopia, whereby Nilus passeth; and the people of this Isle, doo oppose themselues against the Crocodiles, with such wonderous boldnesse and courage, as they dare not (by anie meanes) tarrie their comming: but senting them by the smell (for this Beast hath that sense as subtle as a Dog) they flye speedily thereon, and will no longer abide.

People of whom Crocodiles stand in feare.

Aristotle sayeth, that this Beast may be made tame, like vnto anie other beast of prey, for the benefite of eating his flesh: but I take this to bee meant of such as are young. As it happened in a part of Egypt, where Sacrifices were offered neere vnto Nile, & whereinto the Priests vsed to cast manie Bones, and other peeces of Flesh (which serued for no vse at all in their Sacrifices) and the Crocodiles woulde come to feede on them, not fearing anie men, and so became tame.

Crocodiles made tame.

Strabo sayeth, that in the Cittie of Arsinoe, which is the Cittie of Crocodiles, on Nile: there were some tame, and hallowed; to whome the Pilgrimes (which came in deuotion thither) would bring flesh, Bread, and Wine. One Priest, must open the Crocodiles mouth, and another put the foode into it; which being done, they afterward threw them into a Lake, which Nile had made neere to the Temple. The Egyptians (by perswasion of their Priests) beleeued these beastes to be Goddes, and diuers times suffered their Children to bee deuoured of them; not a little reioycing, that they did serue for food to their Gods.

The Egyptians verie superstitious, taking Crocodiles to be Gods.

A braue inuention of a Soldier, wher by to get mone of the Egypuans.

Vpon a time, Demetrius the Macedonian, returning from pursuite of the Persians, his Armie being much disabled and destitute of meanes and money, passing thorough Egypt, after he had a while refreshed his men; he bethought himselfe, that seeing he had no money, hee would procure some from the Egyptians by a sleight. For, he well knowing, howe superstitious they had continued till then, in honouring those monstrous Crocodiles; he began to reproue them for it, assuring them, that they did great wrong to Iupiter and his Court, in honouring such horrid things. Wherfore, he had made a Vow to Iupiter, to reuenge this high iniury doone vnto him; and commanded his Souldiors to war vpon those Crocodile Gods.

Heereuppon, the fond and fooliſh Egyptians, made a generall and humble requeſt to him, not to offer any wrong to their Goddes; and they would giue him Garments and Money, wherewith to prouide his whole Armie. Whereto, he condiſcended, & limited them a time for paiment of the Money. In the mean while his Army was well refreſhed; and the promiſe being performed, he departed from them on his iourney. That they may be made tame, being young taken, is very credible; conſidring, that Serpents and Lizards are daily tamed, as may bee ſeene in many places.

Proofe for taming Crocodiles.

The Crocodile is ſubtile and craftie in compaſsing his prey; for he ruſheth on a man at vnawares, if he walk about Nilus, or any other place where hee ſwimmeth or haunteth. Some haue ouerthrowne Boats with their tailes (wherin they haue incredible ſtrength) and ſo catching at men thus ouer turned in the Water, do there deuoure them. This they doo in the day time, & at night they com forth of the water, frequenting ſtill thoſe paſſages, wher they know any beaſts to feed, be they wilde or domeſticke; or men trauailing thorow the Countrey, ſeazing on their feet with his teeth, and not with his clawes, becauſe his ſtrength in them will ſcarſely hold any thing. Thus hath Nature prouided for the life of this Beaſt, permitting him to moue his vpper Iawe, and not the neather, as no beaſt els doth the like: not any Fiſh or Beaſt can eſcape him, if either his pawes or teeth doe take hold on him.

The craft and ſubtilty of the Crocodile for his prey.

The Crocodile mooueth his vpper iaw as no Beaſt els doth.

There is not any Beaſt that I haue read of, which becommeth ſo great, of ſo ſmal a beginning, as the Crocodile: and al his actions are performed by the number of ſixtie, for he hath ſixtie teeth, and ſixtie turning ioynts. At one time in the year, he continueth threeſcore dayes without feeding, and liueth no longer then ſixtie yeares. The Female Crocodile layeth threeſcore Egges, in threeſcore dayes; and hatcheth them in other threeſcore dayes; by which time, they are hatched either on the banks of Nile, or any other Riuers where they reſort, and her Egges are not greater then a Gooſe Egge. The Egyptians do affirme to this day, that a little before Selim (firſt of that name) beſieged the great Cittie of Cayre, and tooke Egypt; for the ſpace of eight daies together, a great number of theſe Crocodiles were ſeene, in all parts on the Bankes of Nile, and ſo thickely diſperſed abroad in the fields, that whatſoeuer preyes they lighted on, they rent and tore with their long ſharp teeth, as a preſage of the miſchiefe which befell to Egypt.

The number of ſixtie remarkeable in the Crocodile

The Egyptians preſage of the Crocodile

Ælianus, and ſome other Authors do write, that the Crocodile filleth his Belly with the water of Nile; & hauing kept it ſo for ſome time, he caſteth it vp again on ſome broad High way, and then goeth to hide himſelfe not far off, breathing foorth a lamentable voice or noiſe, as if it were the murthering of ſome man. But if any one (mooued with pittie and compaſsion) come to ſee and lend ſuccour, paſsing ouer that lubricke and ſlippery place where he vomitted the water, he falleth downe; and the ſubtle beaſt iſſuing forth of his ambuſhment, eaſily deuoureth him thus falne vpon the ground. How far this is eſtranged from any truth, is quickly diſcerned, becauſe the Crocodile

Elianus, and other Authors concerning the Crocodils dile hath no voyce at all. As also they write, that a man, beeing but toucht with a Feather of Ibis, a Bird belonging perticularly to Egypt; he remaineth immoueable, which euen is as false as the other. Thus hauing refuted these Fables, spread abroad of this monstrous Beast: I will end this Chapter, least the length thereof should proue offensiue to the Reader; to write another, concerning mens endeuour, to rid the World of Crocodiles; as also to discourse of another Creature, vtter enemy to the Crocodile, and of his properties.

Aelianus and those Authors refuted.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of some meanes obserued by Men, both to take and kill Crocodiles. And of Ichneumon, or the Rat of India, called Pharaohs Rat, deadly enemy to the Crocodile; And of his properties.

GOD, our Almighty Creator and Preseruer, by his great and wonted prouidence fore-seeing, that this monstrous Beast laboured to vnfurnish the Riuers of Fishes, and the Land of Men and Cattle: gaue him an Enemy, to the end, that his multitude shall not so super-abound (beside the industry of men) but that great store of them might be destroied. For the Ægiptians goe in the day time, (well armed and defenced) along the bancks of Nile, and seeke for the Egges of the Female; which they breake in peeces. They take also many of the young ones; especially Females, which then are not aboue the length of two foote, or sometimes lesse; and flaying off their skins, doe eate them, because they are very delicate meate. As for the greater Crocodiles, which are of more terrour; they can take them also without much labour, after any invndation, or when the Arabes and Ægiptians perceiue the Water of Nile to decrease, as after an ouer-flow, and remaineth troubled, by reason of immundicities, and washing the Land, couered with vncleanesse. They then cast forth a long Cord, at the end whereof is fastned a hooke of Iron, large and strong, weighing about three poundes weight, and baited with a peece of Cammels flesh, or of any other Beast. When the Monster beholdeth the prey, immediatly he leapeth at it, and swalloweth it, and the Morsell (with the Hook) sticking fast in his throat: it would moue much delight, to see what mountings he makes aboue Water. When the Beast is then taken, these barbarous people (by little and little) doe draw him to the Riuers side, and fastning the Cord about a Palme, or some other Tree; they hang him vp in the Ayre, as fearing least hee should yet deuour them. Then with a Wooden Leauer they giue him many blowes on the belly, because it is the most soft and tender place about the Beast. Which being done, they flay off his skinne, and make sale of his flesh: for it is excellent meat, and I my selfe haue eaten of it salted. As for the skinne, great sale of them is made to the Christian Maronites, Greekes, and Iewes, that dwell in Ægipt: And beeing wrought or curried, they re-sell them to the Christian-Latines, that come thither for them, and bring them among vs.

An enemy giuen by God to the Crocodile.

Crocodiles very good meat to eate.

The Egyptians cunning to take great Crocodiles.

Sale made of the flesh and skins of Crocodiles.

As for the Beast before named, which God hath sent as an enemy to the Crocodile, and is no longer then a Cat, and as low, tearmed by our Elders Ichneumon: now a-daies, that name is forgotten in Ægypt, and it is called Pharaohs Rat, feeding on Serpents and Rats, killing all Dogges and Cats that it can attaine vnto. The Ægyptians (by nourishing) haue made some of them tame, and it is one of the strongest and boldest beasts that is to be found, and sufficiently prouided of vnderstanding. When this Beast is in the fields, he ceaseth not to sente, runne, and seeke about, where he can find the Crocodiles Egges, to eate them. After his long quest, and finding them, hee eateth his fill of them, and breaketh all the rest in small pieces, that not any Crocodile may be hatched of them.

The description of Pharaohs Rat and how he seeketh for the Crocodiles Egges.

Sometimes hee lyes in waite, and watcheth so long, til he can espy a Crocodile lying along in the Sunne, with his belly vpward: for he obserueth his behauiour, as an vsuall custome, onely while while he sleepeth on the bankes of Nile, with his mouth wide open; to the end, that the Bird Trochilus (which is a very little Bird, and almost like to that which we call a Wren) may cleanse his teeth from the flesh sticking in them, or the knotted blood lying about thē. Which the Trochilus pecketh forth with his bill, hauing no other sustenance while hee liueth, and in this manner the Crocodile often sleepeth. This Ichneumon perceiuing, he steppeth vp on his belly, and byting and piercing it in three or 4. places; he enters in at those wounds, and so killeth him. This Beast hath such subtiltie in his doing it, and hideth himselfe so cunningly; that (albeit the Bird Trochilus hath a continuall watchfull eye, to giue warning to the Crocodile, least he should be hurt in his sleep, and therefore pecketh at the lids of his eyes to wake him:) yet notwithstanding this great care and loue, he is thus slaine before he can awake, and many of them are found dead in this manner vpon the shoares.

How Pharaohs rat surprizeth the Crocodile

Ichneumon killeth the Crocodile cunningly.

The kind loue of the Bird Trochilus to the crocodile.

Herodotus writeth, that this Rat of Pharaoh, enters in at the throat into the Crocodiles body, at such time as hee sleepeth, as hath formerly beene saide; where byting his entrailes, and tearing the skinne of his belly, hee commeth foorth thereat. But these are meere dreames, for I haue conferred with credible persons, that haue remained a long while in Ægypt; and they condemne this to be vtterly false. Yet it is supposed by some, that because this little beast byteth the other by the belly, and will not let go his hold, vntill hee be dead: that he enters in at the mouth, and issueth forth at the place of his byting, as being the tenderest part of all his body; neuertheless, the better iudgements doe hold this for a Fable.

The false imagination of Herodotus.

Pliny, Appian, and Pausanias write, that the Dolphine hath certaine little wings or Finnes on his backe, as keene cutting as any Razor; where-with hee cutteth the Crocodiles belly in swimming, being soft and tender, and so killeth him. But these Allegations are fabulous likewise; for the Winges or Finnes on the Dolphines backe, are no way offensiue, because I can assure ye, that I haue both seene and felt them. Beside, there are no Dolphines, or euer could any bee seene, where the Crocodile haunteth. And although this Beast be so cruell and horrible, not onely towards other earthly and watery Creatures, but also to man: yet notwithstanding, in diuers and sundry parts of his body, are found many good remedies for especiall diseases. For beside that his flesh is verie nutritiue, and engendreth good blood: they that ordinarily vse it, shall neuer be tormented with the Gout, or Sciatica in the Hippes; and if they haue them before they vse it, yet it forthwith helpeth them. His Gaule put into the eyes, without all doubt, taketh away any Webbe or Cataract growing in them. His Grease or Fat is an especiall and singuler remedy, against all Ioynt-Agues, or other paines in the ioynts. The teeth of his right Iaw, bound about the Arme, dooth greatly prouoke the Act of Venerie; which the Ægyptians (to this day) make vse of, because they are much addicted thereto, and therefore do sell them at a deare rate. When any member of the body, is (for some defect) to be cut off; if it be annointed with the Ashes of his skinne in vineger, it so deadeth the sense, that the Pacient shall not feele any paine. His Blood also greatly sharpneth the sight, and therefore the people of that Country, vnderstanding when any Crocodile is taken; doe speedily hast thither (I mean such as are bad sighted) to haue of it when he is newly kild, which they buy at a certaine appointed price, and bathing their eyes there with, doe finde marueilous ease. The Hart of the Crodile, wrapped in blacke Wooll pluckt from a blacke Sheepe, that was the first of his Dammes eaning, cureth all Quartane Feauers. Iuell, a most famous Iew-Phisition, hath left written al these recited properties of the Crocodile; his dwelling was at Alexandria in Egypt, and the World beareth record of him, that he was a Man very deepely experienced in Phisicke, and performed many singuler cures.

Many parts of the crocodile very soueraigne for diuers diseases.

For the Gout and Sciatica.

For sore eies.

For Ioynt-Agues.

For Venery.

For dissection of some member.

For the eye-sight.

For the Feuer Quartane.

A meere fixion of the Dolphines killing the crocodile.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of strange accidents, which happened to a Prisoner, and by what meanes he was set at liberty.

MAtters of admiration shold not be ouer-lightly reported, nor haue I set downe any, which hath not beene certified by some faithfull Authour: as this now whereof I am to speake, recorded by Alexander of Alexandria, a man well skilled in the Sciences (as I haue formerly approued) who writeth this History for a certainety. He saith, that a in well knowne place of Italy (which he spareth to name, a Gouernour ruled (whose name also he silenceth) that was a cruell Tyrant, and of fierce Nature. It fortuned, that one of his people, had (by mischance) slaine a Grey-hound, which he highly esteemed, for which vnwilling offence, the Tyrant was so enraged against him; as he committed him to a strong and vnsauoury Prison, lockt vp vnder many keies, and in very sure and safe custody. Some few daies after, he that had charge from the Gouernour, to bring him his appointed allowance of sustenance, as daily he vsed to do; found all the doors fast and firme, as before he had left thē: but looking in the place where the Prisoner vsed to sit, hee found him not there, yet all the Chaines and Bolts where-with he was charged, were whole, sound, and not broken. This act being reputed a Miracle, was reported to the Gouernour of the Cittie, who commanded al possible dilligence, with priuy searches from house to house, and yet no tydings could bee heard of him. And the case was accounted so much the more strange, because his Irons were neyther filed nor broken: but remained intire in the Prison, euen as if the Prisoner had still worne them, the Prison and doores also not a iot impaired.

Alexander of Alexandria Authour of this discourse

A Prisoner strangely freed out of Prison.

The Prisoner found againe in the prison.

Three daies after, the doores remaining fast closed, euen as when the Prisoner was there, and the Keepers little thinking thereon: they heard one cry in the same place, where the Prisoner was wont to be kept, and running in all hast thither, to see who it was that cryed, they found it to bee the Prisoner, who called for foode, and was as fast in his Irons as he had beene before; his face appearing very dreadfull, discoloured and wrinkled, his eyes sunke into his head, staring and wandring, and wholly resembling rather a dead Man, then one aliue. The Iaylers being not a little amazed heereat, demaunded where he had been; but he would make them no answere, except he might immediatly be brought before the Gouernour: for he had much matter to say to him, and which concerned him very importantly. When the Gouernour was acquainted there-with, hee caused him to bee brought before him, in the presence of many others, before whom he would deliuer his charge. And recounting many wonderfull things, told thē, that being in the obscure Prison, he fell into such despaire, that he called to the Deuill to helpe him, onely to deliuer him thence out of his misery. The Deuill came to him, in an euill fauoured and dreadfull shape, with whom hee made a complot, to be deliuered out of Prison: and no sooner had hee condiscended thereto, but he found himselfe presently to be in the Ayre, not knowing how, or by what meanes hee came thither. Suddenly he descended thence, thorough certaine horrible, tempestuous, obscure and tenebrous places, where he saw millions of millions of people, that suffred grieuous torments, both by fire, and otherwise, beeing tormented by an infinite number of Deuils. There did he see all sorts of people, both Kings, Popes, Dukes, Prelats, and many Men which hee perfectly knew. Hee gaue the Tyrant also particularly to vnderstand, that in those frightfull Low-Countries, he saw a great Friend and companion of his, who demaunded tidings of him, concerning his life and manners, and whether he continued as cruell yet, as he was wont to bee. To whom the Prisoner said, he made answere, that the Gouernour had not left his old behauiour, but rather fell from bad to worse. Whereon this friend friend requested the Prisoner, that when he should see the Gouernour next: hee would admonish him, to amend his life, not oppressing and vexing his subiects any more, with tributes and taxations, because (quoth this friend) I know full well that his place is already prepared in Hell, where he must be very grieuously tormented, except he do quickly conuert to amendment. And because he may the better credit my words, tell him from mee, that by vertue of this watch-word, which oftentime (in war) passed between him and me (and which Watch-word hee deliuered to the Prisoner) I wish him to beleeue thee, and not to procrastinate his amendment.

The speeches of the Prisoner to the gouernour.

The fearefull visions which the Prisoner beheld.

The prisoners words concerning the Gouernor.

A priuate watch-word sent to the Gouernor.

All these thinges beeing heard, the Gouernour fell into a suddaine terrour and astonishment: for he was well assured, that none but God, his Friend, and himselfe onely, did know that Watch-word. Then demaunded he of the Prisoner, in what forme and habite hee found the Gentleman in that place? The Prisoner made answer, that he was in the same Garments, which he vsed to weare in this World, of Crimosine Sattin, and albeit his habite appeared to be such; yet was it laced and guarded with a terrible burning fire, and as I thought (quoth he) to touch it with my hand, to try whether it were fire or no: it burned my hand, as heere ye may behold. He spake of many other very fearfull thinges; to the great amazement and terrour of the Gouernour; who gaue the Prisoner present libertie, and sent him home to his house, where his Wife hardly knew him, or his Kinred eyther, by reason he looked so pale and meager. He liued some short while after, much troubled in his sences, weak, bare and poore, spending the remainder of his daies, in care for his Soules saluation, and true contrition for his sinnes. But what good this admonition wrought on the Gouernor; Alexander declareth not: but onely affirmeth the Historie to be true.

The Gentlemans apparell.

The Prisoner set at liberty by the Gouernour.

(.)

CHAP. XXXIIII.

That the Blood of a Bull, is death to such as drinke thereof; And who it was, that first tamed the Bull.

SEeing that the Bull is such a Domestick Creature, as his Flesh is fed on, and the Beeues engendred by him, doe sustaine and nourish more then any other meates: me-thinkes it is quite contrary to nature, that his blood, separated from the flesh, and drunke when it is hot, should haue the power to procure a mans death. To approoue this true, Dioscorides and Pliny doe both say; that the fresh blood of a Bull is venomous, and killeth him that drinketh it. Plutarch writing of Mydas (euen hee of whom so many Historie and Fables doe make mention) saith; that beeing sicke of some fearefull imaginations, and waxing daily worse and worse, without finding any amendment: he determined to drink the blood of a chased Bull, wherof he dyed. It is written, that Themistocles the Athenian, a worthy Captaine, who defended Greece frō the inuasions of Xerxes; being banished from his Countrey, went to the Court of King Artaxerxes, to whom (in anger and indignation conceiued against his Countrey) hee made promise, to enstruct him in the meanes of conquering all Greece. But when he was summoned by the King to keep his word: he chose rather to die, and in feigning a Sacrifice to the Goddesse Dyana; hee dranke the blood of a Bull, wherof he dyed instantlie, as is credibly affirmed by Plutarch.

Dioscor. in lib. 6 Plin. in lib. 28. Plutar in lib. de Superstit.

Plutar. in vit. de Themist.

The naturall reason which can be giuen, why the hot Blood of a Bull causeth the death of him that drinkes it; is deliuered by Aristotle, Pliny, and Dioscorides, who say: That death ensueth thereby, because the blood of a Bull doth curdle, coagulate, and waxe hard immediatly; yea, much more sooner then the blood of any other Beast. So that attaining to some quantitie in the stomacke, it there congealeth, and procureth cureth swoundings and suffocations, stopping the passages aspiratiue and sensitiue, by reason whereof sudden death ensueth. Pliny further saith, that Colewortes sodden in the blood of a Bull; doe preuent all opilations or obstructions. Thus we may perceiue, that the blood of a Bull, is venomous of it selfe: but beeing in composition with some other thing, it is very medicinable.

Arist. in lib. de Animal. Plin. in lib. 11. Dioscor. in lib. 6

Plin. in lib. 22.

Man, to whom God hath subiected all thinges, deriueth great benefit and seruice from the Bull, and Cattle of his kinde: which is the cause, that Collumella preferreth him before al other beasts. Beside, in former times it was great offence to kill a Bull; and Pliny reporteth, that a man was banished, because hee had kild one. The first Man that tooke in hand to tame a Bull, and make him doe seruice in the yoake; according to Diodorus, was named Denis, or Dionisius, the Sonne of Iupiter and Proserpina: but according to Pliny, in his seuenth book, hee was named Briges, and a Natiue of Athens. Others doe maintaine, that it was Triptolemus, of whom it appeareth that Virgile spake, saying: The Infant Maister and inuenter of the curbed flesh. Seruius saith, that this to be vnderstood of Triptolemus, or of Osirus. I am of opinion, that Virgile couered the name of the inuenter of a labour so good and profitable: because (to speake vprightly) it could not be the inuention of one man onely; but contrariwise, the spirit of humaine necessity found it out, so that some men inuented one part thereof, and others the rest.

Columella in his Agriculture

Plin. in lib. 22.

The first man that tamed the Bull.

Diodor. Sic. in lib. 4, &c.

Plin in lib. 7.

Vir. in Georgi.

The first Inuenter of husbandry.

In like manner, Trogus Pompeius saith, that Auidis, King of Spaine, was the first that tamed Bulles, and brought them to labour: but whosoeuer was the inuenter and actor, it was done very wel & profitably, for the life of Man. This Beast feedeth on the Grasse, contrary to all other, for hee continually draweth his food backward as he feedeth, and the other forward. Aristotle speaketh of certaine Bulles in Phrigia, whose Hornes doe not containe any strength of bone, neither grow but in the skinne onely, and are as easily moued by them, as they doe their eares; Ælianus maintaineth as much. The first that ranne with Buls in Rome, and kild them; was Iulius Cæsar, whereof Pliny giueth testimony. This Beast hath another naturall qualitie: for he knoweth and Prognosticateth when it will raine, by smelling and bellowing vp in the Ayre, and hyding himselfe more couertly then is accustomed.

Auidis King of Spaine.

Arist. in Lib. 3. de Animal.

Plin. in Lib. 9.

The Bull a wizzard for weather.

CHAP. XXXV.

Who was the first that established Religion in Rome, and ordained chiefe Byshoppes, Priests, and Vestall Virgines. In what manner they were put to death, when they were taken in Adulterie. Also, of their Vestiments, Vessels, and other Instruments, made for vse of the Sacrifices.

IN a former Chapter of old Rome, part of this Argument hath beene alreadie handled, according to the description of M. Francesco Sansouino; what now further is to be said in this case, proceedeth from Anthony du Verdier, the Lord of Vauprivaz, not disallowing or finding fault with any thing before alledged: but rather as a supplement of some things wanting, and found more at large recorded in other Authours. For all Histories are filled with the reuerence, which the ancient Romaines gaue to their prophane Gods, to whom they erected very sumptuous Temples, with institution of chiefe Byshops, and diuers Sacrifices. Numa Pompilius, second King of the Romaines, was the first that established Religion in Rome; with adoration of the Gods, and ordained many and sundrie Ceremonies for the honour of them. Himselfe would needs be the first high Byshop, which dignity was afterward referred to foure other persons; then to eyght, and at last to fifteene, which number was called the Colledge of Byshops. Ouer whom, as in place of greatest eminence, was appointed one of more notable race and authoritie then the rest, who was styled the great and chiefe Byshop, to whom all the other, and the King himselfe in the sacrifices,

The reason for this chapters addition.

Read Titus Liuius in his first Booke, and Plutarch in the life of Numa Pompilius.

A chiefe Byshop appointed ouer the rest in Rome, and what his Office was.

fices, the Augures, Flamines, and Vestall Virgines, gaue obedience. He had super-intendencie ouer the Sacrifices and Ceremonies, and his Office was, to make new sollemne Prayers; to declare the daies of Feastes, and to what God ech day was dedicated: to keep registred in writing, the Annals or Histories of all notable thinges, which happened yearely; to iudge of matters concerning Religion; to punish the Vestall Virgines for any notorious delict; to repaire the Bridge, cald Sublicius, when it was broken, which Bridge was made of Wood, without any Iron or other Mettall, and accounted sacred; and this last charge gaue way to the name of Pontifex, as composed of these two Latine words, Pons & Facio.

Forty yeares after the building of Rome, Numa Pompilius erected a Temple to the Godd. sse Vesta, forming it round, & men were forbidden entrance thereinto: onely, choise was made of a number of Virgines, for seruice of the Goddesse Vesta. This word Vesta came from the Greekes, and was taken for fire, as Ouid saith in his sixt Booke ad Fast. and because the fire was called Virgin, these Virgines were appointed to the seruice of Vesta. And in regard also, that Fire engendreth nothing of it selse: but no Image or Statue of her was placed in the Temple; because our Ancients tooke Vesta to be nothing else, but a Spirit and Diuine Fire, which could not be seene, but onely was to be conceiued in the vnderstanding. In this Temple was kept a perpetuall Fire, as they did the like at Athens, in the * Prytaneum. And if thorow want of care, or negligence in any of the Virgines, the fire happened to be extinct; the cheefe Bishop caused the Virgine to be whipped with Rods: as did P. Licinius Crassus, being chiefe Byshop, according as Valerius Maximus writeth. And the fire being quenched, it was accounted prodigious, causing feare and terrour in the whole Senate and people of Rome: so that before they durst attempt any matter of consequence, they must needes expiate and appease their Goddesse, and to re-kindle the fire, it was done in this manner. The Vestall Nunne or Sister, tooke a Vessel of Copper, hauing three corners, and clearely shining, which she did set directly against the Sun beames, vntill the reuerberation of his mightie heat, should kindle the dry matter which was in the Vessell: and this beeing done, then she must carry the sacred fire, to the verie inner-most place of the Temple, and in this manner they vsed to kindle the Fire againe (beeing quenched) each yeare on the first day of March, in which Moneth they alwaies began the yeare among the Romanes.

Some are of opinion, that these sacred matters of Vesta, was transported from Troy into the Land of the Latines, and from thence to Rome by Romulus. For which reason, some Authors docal Vesta Iliaca: but yet Numa Pompilius builded the Temple, in her honor, as I haue already saide. It was appointed, that these Virgines must be the Daughters of Free-men, not Slaues, Seruants, or of vile condition, perfect in all members of their bodies, and without any defect, light braind, or giddy headed. They were receiued into this Religion, from the age of sixe yeares, to ten, and aboue (as Labeo Antistius and Aulus Gellius writeth) and after that they were become Vestalles; they must continue thirty yeares in virginity. In the ten latter yeares, they instructed young Sister-Nouices in the Sacrifices and Ceremonies. Neuertheless, after they had remained thirty years in the Temple: it was lawfull for them to depart thence, and marrie. But because it was perceiued, that much misfortune ensued to such as married: the most part of them remained in the Religion, to the ending of their daies. They were maintained by the publique Treasurie, and were chosen by the chiefe Byshop, onelie for their modesty, vertue, and exemption from any imperfection of body: by which chiefe Bishoppe they were admitted into the Religion, although it were without consent of their Fathers, if they themselues onelie consented: except they were the daughters of a high Byshop, of an Augure, of a Flamine, Dialis, or Quindecimuir; or a sounder on the Flutes to the Sacrifices; or one of the seauen Epulones, who were exempted, if they made refusall. As also no Maid could be compelled, whose Father had not three children, or more, or

10 20 30 40 50

This Temple is at this day to be seene in Rome, neere vnto that of Ianus heard by Tiber.

Ouid in lib. 6. ad Fast. Dion. Halicar. in Lib. 2. Diodor. in Antiquit.

*The councel house at Athens.

Valerius Maximus. Strabo in Geograph.

How the Virgines re-kindled the Vestall fire when it was quenched.

The opinion of some Authors concerning Troy.

Labeo Antistius. Aulus Gellius. lib. 1. cap. 1

When the Vestals might marry.

Aulus Gellius in lib. 1. cap. 12 or ſhe whoſe Siſter had formerlie been a Veſtall. Theſe Veſtals could not ſucceed or inherit any goods, of him that dyed inteſtate, or had not made his Teſtament. In like maner, if they themſelues deceaſed inteſtate, no man might plead to be their heire, but their goods went to publike vſe.

Amata the firſt Veſtal virgin.

The firſt Virgine that was admitted into this Myſtery, was named Amata; which gaue occaſion, that all the reſt ſucceeding after her in that profeſſion, were ſo called. For Aulus Gellius ſaith, when the chiefe Byſhoppe receiued the Veſtall Virgine from her Fathers hand: he would call her Amata, becauſe the firſt Veſtall Nunne had that name. She that was chiefe and principall among them, was tearmed Great Miſtreſſe, and theſe Virgines were in great honour and reputation among the Romaines.

Aulus Gellius in lib. 1. cap. 12

The wordes which the Biſhop vſed, at the entertainement of any Veſtall, are written in the firſt Booke of Fabius Pictor. To approoue this, Albinus, a Plebeian (as Titus Liuius recordeth) meeting ſome of theſe Virgines, which had walked foorth of Rome on foote: deſcended both himſelfe, his Wife, and Children from his Coach, to mount the Veſtall Virgines therein, becauſe they kept the perpetuall Fire in the Temple, the Palladium, and other holie thinges. The Palladium, was the Image of Minerua, which Æneas ſaued at the ſacke of Troy, carrying it to Ilion, the chiefeſt Fortreſſe in Troy: from whence hee brought it, with the great Goddes Penates, into Italie, and after the deſtruction of Alba the long, King Hoſtillius placed it in the Temple of Veſta.

Titus Liuius, in lib. 10.

Of the Palladium Read Dionyſius, Halicarnaſſeus, Plutarch, and Ouid.

When any of theſe Veſtalles behaued themſelues vnchaſtlie, or were taken in inceſtuous Whoredome, as were Porphiria, Minutia, Sextilia, Æmilia, with their other Companions, and many more: they were put to death in this manner. Firſt ſhe was degraded, by taking off her Robes, and veile on hir head, and then laid on a Beere, whereto ſhe was faſt bound, with her face couered, and ſo carried (with wonderfull ſilence) through the midſt of the Cittie, (which all the whole day was full of mourning) to the Port or Gate, called

The order obſerued by the Romanes, in puniſhing the Veſtalles, when they committed whoredome.

* Salaria, neere to which Gate was a place, called, The wicked Fielde, where (expreſly) a Sepulcher was made, vaulted in manner of a Caue vnder ground, hauing a little doore, and two little Windowes belonging to it: in the one of them ſtood a burning Lampe, and in the other, Water, Milke, and Hony. Being come to this place, the chiefe Biſhop ſaid ſome Prayers, with his hands heaued vp to Heauen, and afterward, they went in with the Beere at the little doore; while the people (then preſent) turned their faces a contrary way, not willing to behold ſo wofull a ſpectacle, whereof euery one had much compaſſion. So leauing the offender there entombed aliue, they returned with the empty Beere, and a great ſtone beeing rouled againſt the Graue doore, the people couered it ouer with earth, ſpending the reſt of the day in griefe and mourning.

* From the Sabines to Rome.

Seruius ſup. lib. 2. de Aeneis.

Veſtal virgins buried aliue for whoredome.

The Temple of Veſta (by chance) afterward fell on fire, and L. Cecilius Metellus being chiefe Biſhoppe, twice Conſull, Dictatour, and Maiſter of the Horſe, entred into it, and brought forth the Palladium, after it was halfe burned, with the loſſe of his owne eyes. Numa Pompilius created alſo three Prieſts, called Flamines: one in the honour of Iupiter; the ſecond, of Mars; & the third, of Romulus Quirinus, wearing verie ſignal Robes, made much like to the Coapes, which Prieſts vſe to wear in Churches; and round white Cappes vpon their heads, wherein ſtucke a branch of Oliſe, with a flock of wooll on the top thereof, and the Cappe muſt neceſſarilie be made of the Wooll of a Sheep, which was offered vnto Iupiter; and called Alba-Galera. Hee inſtituted alſo twelue other Sacerdotes or Prieſtes, called Salij, in honour of Mars the Conquerour, Propugnatour, Reuenger, and pacifier of all ſtrifes. They were clothed with certaine ſleeueleſſe Iackets, or painted Robes, and wore on their Breaſts, Targets of Copper, enriched with Gold, Siluer, and precious ſtones. Religion ſo encreaſed among the Romaines afterward, and adoration of their Gods, that they exceeded thirty thouſand in the number of them.

Feneſtel. cap. 3.

The Flamines.

Prieſts called Salij. Prieſts of Mars.

Pompilius did further augment the num-

Pater-Patratus Fecialis. Epulones. Augures.

ber of Priests; to wit, the Pater-Patratus; the Fecialis; the Epulones, or Banqueters, and the Augures; who had such authoritie, as the Senate could not bee assembled without their permission. And they were clothed with diuers vestiments, except when they performed the sacrifices: for then they all wore a like habite, which was a * Gowne or Albe of Linnen, large and long, which they girded to them with a Girdle, and this manner of Garment was called Cinctus Gabinus.

* The Latines named it Alba Vestis.

Moreouer, they had many Instruments and Vessels made for vse in the Sacrifices, to wit; The Præfericulum, which was a Vessell of Brasse or Copper, without any handle, and broad as a Bason. The Patina, or Patera, was another Vessell, wherin the victimary emptied the blood of the Beast. The Achama was another little Vessell, in fashion of a Cup, and therein they tasted the wine of the Sacrifices. The Infula, was a veile of Linnen, which the Priestes and Sacrificers did weare on their heads. The Acerrea, or Acerra, was a little Chest or Coffer, wherein the Incense was kept. That which had the name of Enclabris, was the Table where the sacred things remained: whereby the Vessels seruing for Sacrifice, were called Enclabria. Thereon they laide the Sacrifice wide open, curiously to peruse his inward parts (to wit; the Hart, Lungs, and Liuer) with a Knife of Steele somewhat long, hauing a round Haft, made of Iuory, and obseruing the inward partes very diligently, to deriue from thence some diuination, as the Gretians also obserued, according to the affirmation of Pausanias. The Secespita, was the fornamed knife, with a rosid haft of Iuory, and a Pommell garnished with Gold and Siluer, and nayled with Nailes of Copper, and there-with the Sacrificer did cut the beasts throat, the Knife beeing so named, à secando. Struppi, were certaine bundles of Hearbes, tearmed Verbenes; as Laurell, Myrrhe, & Oliffe, accounted (by them) happy in all Sacrifices: which Hearbes they would wreath in Garlands, placing them on their Gods heads, and putting them in their eares. Aspergillum, was a braunch of Hisop, which they dipped in water, that stood in a vessell of Marble, named Labrum, placed at the entrance of their Temples; as the holy Water-pots now adaies vsed, & where-with they sprinkled all the people present. Suffibulum, or Subsibulum, was a white Veile, foure square and long, which the Vestall Vergines did weare on their heads, when they sacrificed. The ancient Romaines had many other Ceremonies, which I omit for breuities sake.

Read Festus Pompeius. Præfericulum.

Patina, or Patera. Achama.

Infula.

Acerrea.

Enclabris.

Enclabria.

Pausanias. Secespita.

Struppi Verbenes.

Aspergillum.

Labrum.

Suffibulum, or Subsibulum.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of the Auncient manner of Marriages, as well among the Romains, as diuers other Nations. What course the Romaines obserued in the repudiation of their wiues; And who was the first that diuorced his Wife.

THe very same honest excuse, which we pleaded in the beginning of our precedent chapter, must serue as our best buckler for this ensuing; because many points heerein, haue been before declared, as they were set down by Loys Guyon, Lord of Nauche. And surely, I cannot hold it any offence to the Reader, to put him twice or thrice in minde of one and the same Argument; when worthy Authours doe enlarge the same, for his more ample satisfaction. List then what Pedro Mexia writes of ancient Marriages, and accept my pains, that (willingly) would not displease any man.

The cause why this chapter is inserted.

The ancient Romaines obserued a custome, to decke the Woman when she married her Husband, in this manner. First, they gaue her a Key in her hand, when she entred the House of her spouse: to signifie (saith Sextus Pompeius) the facility of child-bearing. Or, which beareth a better vnderstanding, to let her know heereby; that the keeping and care of all Houshold matters, contained vnder that Key (as the house, administration and dispensation of all things thereto belonging) were familiarly to her trust referred. Ouer the mans head, they held a Launce, quite pierced through the body with a Fencers Sword:

At a Maides marrying her Husband.

Sextus Pompeius.

Sword: as signifying thereby, a readie punishment for violation of Marriage. Blondus saith, that she was girded with a Girdle, wouen of Lambes Wooll, which her Husband taketh from her on the Marriage Bed. Vpon the Veile on her head (which they called Flammeum, and she did weare in signe of good lucke, and that she should neuer be diuorced) was placed a garland of Verueine and other Hearbes intermingled, and this they crowned her withall, sitting on a Lamb or Sheeps skin: for no other cause (as I conceiue) but to set before her eyes, that she should alwayes haue Wooll neere her, to spinne her owne Garments. Festus Pompeius writeth, that when the Bride should goe to bee married, three Children (whose Fathers and Mothers were liuing) did beare her company. One carried a lighted Torch before her, made of the Hearb called Alba-Spina, vulgarlie tearmed our Ladies Thistle (for they were married in the night time, as Plutarch saith in his Problemes:) and the other two Children went with her, one on the one side, and the other on the other. The Torch was carried lighted before her, in honor of Ceres, for as Ceres (who is held to be Mother of the Earth, and the Creator of all Fruites) nourisheth all mankind: euen so in like manner, the new marryed Bride, becomming Mother of the Familie; must haue care for nourishing of her Children. The like manner is yet obserued in many places, especially in England, that two Children (like Paranymphes) doe conduct the Bride to Church, and receiue (with her) holy Prayers and blessings among the Congregation. From thence, two Men do conduct her home againe, and the third youth (in stead of a flaming Torch) caryeth a Bride Cuppe of Gold or Siluer.

Moreouer, in the time of Marriage, the Romaines vsed oftentimes to name Thalassius, as the defender of Virginity. Some hold it to be the Nuptiall Verse or Song, or else the God that gouerneth in marriage, called by the Greekes ὑμέναιον. But many speake diuersly, of the reason why they make such acclamations in their Nuptials. Titus Liuius and Plutarch, in the life of Romulus, saith, that among them which made stealth of the Virgins from the Sabines; some were found of slender quality, and yet they would be sure to seaze on such as surpasse the rest in wonder of beauty. And meeting some principall men of the Cittie by chance, they would haue taken the Virgines from them forcibly; and they had preuailed therein, had they not cryed out aloude (as they led them) to Thalasia, or Thalassius, who was a young man, much beloued and esteemed by euerie one. And when the other men heard, that it was for him whom they cryed; they were verie glad and ioyfull, commending them for expressing such affection towardes him: so that as they accompanied them on the way, they would often-times turne backe, onely for the loue of Thalassius, with loud repetitiõs of his name. And thereon grew the Custome, that the Romaines sung at Weddings, the name of Thalassius, euen as the Greekes sung Hymeneus, as accounting it a happinesse to meet with a Wife.

Notwithstanding, there are others, of whom Varro is one, who alleageth, that this name was induced at Marriages to no other end: but to aduertise the new married couple, how they should thinke on labour and trauaile, especially the Woman to spinne. For they tearmed the little Pannier or Basket of Osiers, which held their Wool, Talassio, and the Latines called it by another name, as Calathus and Quasillus. Plutarch, in his Problemes, maketh this Vocable to descend from the Greekes, who tearme Wooll τάλασσον. Moreouer, the new espoused Woman hath three peeces of Money, which they call * Asses, one whereof, she holdeth in her hand, and as if shee bought a man, shee giueth it to her Husband. Wherein may be noted the miserable condition of the Feminine Sexe, tyed to this hard Law, to bring great Riches with her, in getting a Husband. Wee giue good Wages to Varlets and Seruants, beside our large expences on their bellies: And Women, how faire soeuer they be, must bring to their husbands (whom wee may tearme their Maisters) a great Dowrie, which sometime exceedeth an hundred fold more, then the expences for their dyet and Blond. in lib. 8. de Triumph. Rom.

Verueine tearmed holie Hearbe, or Iunoes teares.

Alba Spina, Our Ladies Thistle. Plut. in Proble. Plin. in lib. 10. Cap. 18. Where he speaketh of those torches Thalassius the nuptiall song.

Fol. 84 A. Ferd Tit. Liuius in 1 lib. lib. 2rb. cont Plutar. in vit. Romul.

Thalassius vsed among the Romaines, as Hymeneus with the Greekes.

Marcus Varro.

Plutar in Prob.

Fol. 86 A. Ferd

Budæus saith, that As was a piece of Mony of Copper, cõtaining the weight of a pound, & the value of oure dimers or pence among vs, or little more. It was taken also for another thing. See his learned Booke de Asses.

maintenance, can amount vnto al their life time. Vpon which occasion, Euripides speaketh in his Medea, to this effect. Of all things produced by the Earth, that hath a vegetant and sensible Soule; there is nothing which surmounteth a woman in misery. She must haue great goods, wherewith to buy her a Husband, that must be the Master of her body.

Euripides in Medea.

If the Maiden be poore, though of neuer so good and vertuous behauiour, small account is made of her, except to purchase her honour at a cheap rate: for shee may tarry a long time before she be maryed, vnlesse it be with one as poore as her selfe. Because Auarice reigneth so commaundingly; that rich Men couet to haue Wiues richer then themselues. Which Saint Iohn Chrysostome seemeth to touch, saying. He that purposeth to marrie a Wife, doth hee enquire of her good manners, or education of the Maide he seeketh after? Truelie no, but rather soundly to informe himselfe, what plentie of Gold and Siluer shee hath, and the bottome of her Inheritances, and valuation of her mooueables. He questioneth very curiously after these thinges, euen as if hee would make a bargaine or exchange.

Poore vertue is poorely prized in these daies.

S. Ioan. Chrisost. in Homil. 74. sup. Math.

The new married Wife carryeth another peece of the fore-named Mony in hir stocking (Festus Pompeius saith, in her shoe) and then layes it on the Chimny-harth, where the Lares and familiar Gods doe resort. The third, she putteth in a Purse hanging by her side, opening and shutting it at euery streets corner. This was obserued as an ancient Law among the Romaines, and Boetius Seuerinus, in his Commentarie on the Topickes of Cicero, declareth another sollemnity of ciuill Law, vsed by them also, and whereby both the Man and Woman did interchangeably buy and purchase the others affection, which was tearmed Coemptio, and performed in this manner. The Man and Woman did interogate together, hee demanding of her; If she would bee Mother of his Family? Whereto shee answered, Yes, and then further demanded of him: Will you be Father of the Family? He replied; He would. This done, they ioyned their right handes together, and kissed each the other. * And then the new troth-plighted Husband, gaue a Ring of Gold to his new elected wife, in signe of earnest, and as a testimony of mutuall dilection, or else, that by this gadge, their harts might be conioyned. This Ring, Tertullian in his Booke of womens ornaments, tearmeth Pronubus: And it was put by her Husband on her fourth finger, meaning the next to her little finger, on her left hand. Because, saith Isidore, in regard of the Diuine Offices therein contained, there is in that finger a veine or nerue of blood, extraordinarily tender, which goeth and extendeth directly to the hart. The selfe-same reason is giuen by Aulus Gellius, following the opinion of Appian, and Atteius Capito: wherefore both the ancient Greeks and Romaines, in wearing the Ring on that finger of the left hand, did account it to be Phisicall. Pliny also testifieth, that (in his time) they had a custome, to send a Ring of Iron to the intended Bride, without any stone therein enchased. The Assirians took their daughters (which were marriageable) with thē to the Markets, where men bought them, to enioy them in marriage. The Babylonians did the like. And the people of Thrace (as Herodotus writeth in his Terpsichore) did by their wiues (as a great price) of their Parents.

Of the other two peeces of Money.

Boetius Seuerinus in Comment sup. Topic. Cicer.

* Read Tertullian, in his Booke of veiling virgines. And in his Apologies, Chap. 6.

Pronubus annulus.

Isidor in lib. 2. cap. 15.

Aulus Gellius. Appian. Atteius Capito.

Plin. in lib. 3. Cap. 2.

Elianus in li. 4 Stobeus Ser. 42 Herodot. in Terpsico.

The Greekes in elder times, did buy their wiues together; and the same did the Indians. Iphidamas, the Son of Antenor (according as Homer writeth in the second Book of his Iliads) gaue an hundred Oxen to his Father in Law, vpon condition, that he would giue him his Daughter in marriage. The ancient Allemaignes, saith Petrus Crinitus, brought dowries with them to their wiues; but their wiues not any to them. We haue Women now adaies, that cause themselues to be well bought, for before their affianced friend can enioy her to his mind, or the first nights nuptials be nere hand; there is more spent in iewels, toyes, habits, and feastes, then halfe a good dowry amounteth vnto. So that, if restitution should take place, by death of the husband; the sum of the dowrie would be augmented aboue the moity, yea, to a third part (as we tearme it) in right of the wiues suruiuing; for so it hath been couenanted in marriage contracts: Thus we see a woman to be wel bought. The people of * Taxila in India, could Strabo in li. 15. Arist. in Polit. Lib. 2. cap. 6.

Homer. in Lib. 2. de Iliad.

Pet. Crinit. in Lib. 12. cap. 3.

* A great City in India, betweene the Riuer Indus and Hydaspes.

could neuer enioy any such happinesse as these men, to receiue Money with such Wiues as they tooke in marriage: but contrariwise, they were glad, and feigne to furnish them. If pouerty be the hindrance of any maid, and no man will accept or giue her entertainement: then, in the floure of her youth, shee is brought into an open Market (as Horses to a common Faire) with sound of Trumpets and Clarions, and the people beeing assembled about the Maide, her backe partes are discouered vp to high as her Shoulders, and afterward, the like is done before. And if shee be found to be comely, well featured in all her members, and fit to content a Man; immediatlie shee shall haue a Husband. The like we haue formerly declared in the Custome of Carthage.

Strabo in li. 15 de Geograph.

Plato in lib. 6. de Legib.

For auoiding ot all ignorance on eyther side in marriage.

Plato, in the sixt Booke of his lawes, would haue none to bee deceiued in marriage: but that all ignorance being auoided, each Man might know, on whom he bestoweth his Daughter, and of what honest race eyther side is descended. For which cause, hee thought it conuenient, that sports and assemblies of young Boyes and Girles should bee permitted, hauing their bodies naked so farre, as modest shame might suffer: to the end, that by conuenable reason of that age, they should see each other, and bee seene in imperfection, or comlinesse of stature. For my part, I doe not allow of this opinion, neyther would I councell young Maides or Weomen, to suffer themselues be nakedly seene of Men. For, as K. Gyges, the Son of Dasylus, speaketh in Herodot. ἄμα δὲ χιτῶνι ἐκὼν ἐμοίως συνέδυνε τῆς καὶ τῆς αἰδοῦς γυνὴ, That is to say; The Woman that puts off her Smock, doth in like manner put off all shame and modesty. Which saying S. Hierome approueth, against Iouinian, and likewise Clemeus Alexandrinus, in the second Book of Pedagogie; and Saint Cyprian consenteth with them, in his Booke of Virgines Habites, saying. The honour and shame of the bodie, are both together in the Garments couerture. And in another place of the same Booke, he findes himselfe much offended with women, that putting off their Garments, would goe naked into the Bathes and

Herodot. in lib. Fol.38. A. Verd

S Hierom. in li. 1. cont Iouinian

Clem. Alexand. in Pedag. Lib. 2 Cap. 9.

S. Ciprian in lib de Hab Virg.

S. oues. Blondus writeth in his first chapter; That the feare of shame, may wel proue sufficient to cut off a Contract, although there be no feare of death, or torment: As if a man should despoile a woman, threatning to cast her forth starke naked.

Baldus sup. Leg. interpositas C. de transact.

But let vs leaue this, and pursue our purpose, concerning Customes in marriages of diuers Nations: and then returne againe to our Romaine Spouse, whom we haue left (I feare) too long. The Namasones, a people of Lybia, had a strange Custome, to cause the Bride (the first night of her Nuptials) to lye with all the Guestes, and thence forward, to keepe perpetuall chastity. The Anthropophages, Medes, and some of the Æthiopians, resort to their Mothers and Sisters when they are marryed. The Arabes make a Wife common to all the Kinred. The Numidians, Moores, Ægyptians, Hebrues, Persians, Garamants, Parthyans, and almost all the Barbarians, haue each Man as many Wiues, as hee is able to maintaine; some ten, and others more. The Athenians made their Wiues and Children common, and (like brute beasts) wallowed in all kinds of luxuries.

Hero. in Lib. 4.

Strabo in Lib. 16 de Geograph

Herod in lib. 6.

In Scotland it was sometime obserued as a Custome, that the Lord of the Soyle should haue the Brides Maiden head, before her Husband: which vnworthy dealing in any Christian Man, was abolished by Malcolme the third, King of Scotland, a very famous Prince, and deceased in the yeare 1090. And he ordained, that the new marryed couple, for redemption of their pudicitie, should pay to the Lords of the places, a peny of Gold, which (I heare) is yet to this day obserued. I should forbeare to say, it is no long time since, that diuers Lords; yea, some of Ecclesiasticall order, held aright by auncient Custome, to lay one Legge naked in the Bed, on the first night of the Brides marriage; but some say, that the Leg was armed. And there was one man, who would needes exceede the limits of his duty, & abuse his priuiledge through his vnbrideled lubricity, so that (with the price of his life) the custome was lost: But returne wee now to our first intention.

Strabo in lib. 15 de Geograph A custome obserued in Scotland.

A Custome among some Ecclesiasticall persons.

Before the new married Bride entred into her Husbands house, shee annoin-ted the doore thereof with a kinde of Lard: Pliny saith, the Grease of a wolfe; but Seruius saith, it was a certaine Oyle; to signifie thereby, that she chased away all annoyances. Donatus saith, that the name of Vxor, came first Ab vngendis postibus. And Polydore Virgill saith: Vnde ab vngendo Vxor dicta, quasi Vuxor. Afterward, the new Bride was presented at the doore, with Water and Fire, and she must touch both of them; according as the Lawyer Scenola maketh mention.

Plin in lib. 28. cap. 9.
Seruius in lib. 4 de Aeneid.
Donatus sup. Scen. 2. Com. Terent. vocat. Hecyra Polyd. Virgil.
Isidor Etymolog. Lib 9 cap. vlt.
Scenola lib penult. ff de donat. int. vir.

Sextus Pompeius giueth a reason, wherefore this Ceremonie was thus performed. The new married Wife, (saith he) was washed with Water, to shew, that she came pure and chast to her Husband. Or else, that she participated with him in Fire and Water, two principall Elements, without which, the Creation of Man could not consist. I should inferre heereby, that the reason of this fire and water so presented to the Bride, implied thus much: Fire was to mooue the carnall appetite of her Husband, and water to quench it. I will set downe the words of Varro, in his fourth Booke of the Lattine tongue, where he giueth another very good reason, as followeth. Igitur causa ascendi, duplex, aqua & ignis: Ideo ea in nuptijs in limine adhibebantur, quod coniungit. Hinc & mos ignis, quod ibi semen: aqua fœmina, quod fœtus ab eius humore & eorum coniunctione suwit Venus. Assuredly, when moysture and heat are tempered together, all thinges doe receiue original by the. For although fire be repugnant to water; yet the humide and moyst vapour createth all things, and their discordant agreement is proper to all generation: for one of them is as the Masculine Element, and the other Feminine; the one the actiue, the other the passiue. Hereupon, in Antiquity, when nuptiall alliances were instituted; they were approued by oaths sollemnely made on fire and water, because all creatures do receiue body and soule, by heat and moisture in their generation, and liue by them. For euerie beast is formed of a soule and body: the matter of the body consisting in moysture, and that of the soule in heat. As appeareth by the Egges of Fowles, which by reason of grosse humours, (whereof they are full) cannot be reduced into a body; and the body can haue no soule, if heat do not work his operation.

Sext. Pompeius

Varro in lib. de lingu. Lat.

Of the Elements Fire and Water.

Oaths made vpon fire and water.

Moreouer, the Bride did not enter on her feete into her Husbands house; but was carried in: as declaring, that shee went not willinglie, but by constraint, to the place where she was to loose her virginity. The Romaines also would not marry in the Month of May, reputing it to bee vnfortunate for marriage, whereon there arose an auncient Prouerb; Mense Maio nubunt malæ: Bad people marry in the Month of May. Whereon Ouid, in the fift of his Fastus, saith; Mense malas Maio nubere vulgus ait. There are some, that now in these daies do superstitiously make scruple, to marry in that Month, and only (as they say) to be free from iealousie, whereon I see no reason grounded. But happily it may be, that they haue heard by their predecessours, that the most part of Men and Women then obserued (by such as were married in the moneth of May) to agree badly together, and came (in the end) to diuorce or repudiation, which was in vse among the Romaines.

The Bride carried into her husbands house.

Fraſm. Chiliz. 1. Centur. 4.

The moneth of May vnfortunate for Marriage.

The Romaines had three seuerall kinds of separation in mariage. The first they called Repudiation; which was done by the Man, against the will of the Woman. And the first Man that thus repudiated his wife, was Spurius Caruilius, in the yeare after the building of Rome, fiue hundred twenty three, because she was barren, and bare him no Children. Caius Sulpitius repudiated his wife, because she went out of his house, with her haire about her eares, and no veile on her head. Quintus Antisthius did the like to his wife; because she had beene seene to conferre secretly, with a woman a Libertine. P. Sempronius took offence; because his Wife was seene at publique spectacles, without his knowledge. And C. Cæsar repudiated Pompeia, onely thorow fume suspition he had of Clodius, who was found in the habite of a woman among Ladies, at the Celebration of the sollemnitie for Bona Dea.

Three kindes of separation among the Romaines.
Dion. Halicar in lib. 2.
Plutar. in vit. de Numa, cit. in An. 230.
The first that repudiated their Wiues.

The second manner, was called Diuorce, and this was done with the consent of them both and to either of the it was permitted to require it. But among the Hebrues, it was not lawful for a man man to leaue his wife. Moyſes, who was the firſt Author of Diuorce, appointed it ſo, for the reaſon deliuered by S. Hierom. Moyſes (ſaith he) ſeeing many of the Iewes mooued to Auarice: ſome for Domeſticke diſquietneſſe, and others for Whoredom tormented their wiues, yea, oftentimes did put them to death, with intent to take other newe wiues; either richer, fairer, or younger then they. To remedy which euill, power was giuen them, to be diuorced from their firſt Wiues; with condition, that the Husband ſhoulde giue his wife a Bill of Diuorce, to ſtand for hir warrant and ſecurity. To which Bill (ſaith Ioſephus) the husband was then to write theſe wordes following: I PROMISE NEVER TO TAKE THEE MORE. And this was thus doone, becauſe the Woman might marrie with another and hee haue like power to ſeeke another Wife, for otherwiſe Diuorce might not bee graunted.

The second kind of separation called Diuorce.

Deut. 24, 1.

S Hierom vpon the matter of Diuorce.

Ioſeph. in lib de Antiq. 4 chap. 8

Thus you ſee, that by the permiſsion of Moyſes, and not his expreſſe commandement, Diuorce began at firſt amongſt the Iewes. Ieſus Chriſt giueth Teſtimony both of the one and other, in the nineteenth Chapter of Saint Matthewe, ſpeaking thus to the Phariſes: What God hath conioyned, let no man ſeperat; adding a little after, Moyſes, becauſe of the hardnes of your heart, ſuffered to put away your wiues, but from the beginning it was not ſo. He ſaith, for their hardneſſe of heart, becauſe they were cruell to their wiues, whom not to loue, was moſt hard & inhumaine. Neuertheleſſe, Ieſus Chriſt did not reiect Diuorce, ſo it were doone only for the cauſe of Whoredome and Adultery.

Math. 19, 5, 8.

The third manner, was tearmed Direption; for which, there was allowed ſeperation in Marriage; and this was done according to the Princes will: whereof I purpoſe to ſpeake more amply elſwhere, for I doubt I haue ſtoode to long on this matter of marriages.

The thirde kinde, called Direption.

CHAP. XXXVII.

How manie Armies the Romain Emperours kept, and in what places.

IT cannot varrie much from our purpoſe, to ſpeake in this Chapter, of the Romain Armies, and the places of their abiding: as alſo of their name and number: to the end, that al the World may know the powerful ſtrength of the Romaine Empire, while thee feaſted in hir Royall Triumphs, which was from the time of Auguſtus, till Conſtantine tranſported the empire into the Eaſt. Whoſoeuer ſhall duely conſider Romes ſtrength, and how many Prouinces were ſubiected to her, will account it no wonder, that the Romains had two and twentie compleate Armies, and great ſtore of people belonging to each one of them. For it requireth (ſaith Vlpian) a great number of armed men, if we intend to giue it the name of an Armie, becauſe one or two Companies, make not an Army, but a great many conioyned together.

The time of Romes Triumphs.

The neme of Exercitus, cam of exercising a mans ſelfe. Quia exercēdo ſe meliorē faciūt Varro and Vegetius lib. 1. ca. 28. Ab exercitio Exercitus nomen accepit.

The firſt that was ſaide to be a double Armie, remained in the lower Myſia. That which was tearmed the Auguſtane Armie, abode in Scotia: The Galatian, in Phoenitia, now called Caramania. The Cyrenaicone, in Arabia; and another Auguſtane Armie in Numidia. The Flauian and Scithian in Soria, otherwiſe cald Numantia, in Spaine. The Macedonian in Valachia. The conquering and victorious armie, in England. The Claudians, in Seruia and Boſsina. The Iron or rough Armie, being called the tenth, in Iudea. Another tenth, in Allemaigne or Germanie. Another Claudian, in Tranſyluanie. Another double Armie in Dacia: and the Twines in Pannonia. The dreadfull and Thundering Armie, in Egypt. The Apollonian in Cappadocia. The Valerian and ſecond vanquiſhing Armie, in Bretaine. There was alſo another armie alwayes at Rome, for guard of the Emperour. And theſe were the two and twentie Armies, which the Romaines kept continually, for the Defence of their Prouinces: to the end, that they they might be ready at all seasons for the appeasing of tumults & seditions whensoeuer they happened.

The places of the Romains ſeuerall Armies.

The number of men, Elephants, and Chariots, in the Romaine Armies

The Romaines had also in the forenamed Armies (acording as Appian writeth) two hundered thousand foot-men, and fortie thousand Horse-men, three hundred Elephants made apt for warre, and two thousand ready-furnished Chariots, beside three hundred thousand Armors for store prouision. And their armie by Sea, consisted of two thousande Shippes, and fifteene hundered Gallies, from two to fiue Oares on a side. And beside these, they had eight hūdred great ships, called Thalamegos, only for pomp, and to carrie the Emperors Golden and rich furnitures, in their prowes & pompes. They had likely sundrie military ensignes; as the Wolfe, the Minotaur, the little Horse, the wilde Boare, with many other beside: But the Eagle was the proper and principall Ensigne of the Romaines.

Their Armie by Sea.

Their Ensignes or Standards.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Whether the Romaines did generally speake Latine, or no; Or whither they hadde two seueral Languages.

TO the end, that we may not stand in doubt of the thing, which (in my iudgement) is plaine and euident enough, we will deliuer the testimonie of Cicero, who in the thirde Booke of his Orator, saith; The Romaines had a certaine, proper, & singuler Language in their Citty. Which he prooueth by the example of Lelia his Mother in law, who spake in such maner, as they that heard hir, imagined that they vnderstoode Plautus, or Neuius speaking, her phrase seemed so like vnto theirs. But, because no man should thinke, that Lelia had learned another Language, to wit, Latine; and yet knew a contrary, to wit, her Mother tongue, which she had (from her Cradle) naturally learned in the house, he saith a little after; There was no man maruelled, that an Oratour spake Latine. For, if he did otherwise, they wold haue mockt him. And in the first Booke of his Tusculanes. The frequent assembly (saith he) in the Theater where were Women and Children, were moued, hearing so rich a phrase. Whereby it appeareth, that one only Language, & namely Latine, had beene, and was then common to all the Romaines, considering that Children and Women knewe the Latine tongue.

Cic. in lib. 3. de Orat.

Lelia Ciceroes Mother in Law.

Cicero vbi sup.

Cicero in lib. 2 ad Tuscul.

Neuertheless, he was expert in learning, that knew how to chuse his words, and waigh them by direct Iudgement of hearing, which no man could do, without Learning. For, all the Romaines speake Latine, but all knew it not by letters and Learning, as is manifest by Testimony of the saide Cicero, introducing Titus Pomponius, who (in his Brutus) hee maketh to speake thus: Thou seest the Latine tongue corrected, whereof such as haue beene commended, neuer had knowledge, by reason or science, but as it were by Custome. And a little after he addeth, I being a young Childe, haue seen Titus Flaminius, who was Consul with Q. Metellus to bee thought to speake Latine well: and yet notwithstanding he knew not the letters. Any man then may be freed from doubt heerein, considering that the Prince of Eloquence speaketh it.

Concerning Iudgement & Learning.

Cicero in Tit. Pomp ad Brut.

And there was no other diffrence, but that which is likewise amongest vs at this day, to wit; that the Inhabitants of Rome spake more eloquently, then those that dwelt abroad. And in regard, that the Language is nowe otherwise in Rome, then in times past (speaking Italian, insted of Latine, and yet not so good vulgar as at Florence) it was occasioned by barbarous people and Nations, as the Gothes and Vandales, and others; who gayning heeretofore ouermuch dominion in Italy, did likewise corrupt the language whiche then was in vse. So that by little and little, and by course of time, Antiquitie (by the frequentation of straungers, and corruption of manners) hath bin quite peruerted and changed, and noueltie induced. But most true it is, that it is easy to discerne their Originall of the Latine. The like peruertion and alteration, few Nations in the World, but haue as well felt, retaining very little, or none at all, of their prime Tongue and Language, which

The reason for the difference and alteration of the language.

Other countries Languages altered.

which they then enioyed: and therefore, Romes change deserueth the lesse meruaile.

CHAP. XXXIX.

How necessarie Water is for the life of man: Of the excellency of this Element: and the meanes how to know good & wholsome Waters.

Water, the chiefe thing for support of life.

IT plainly appeareth that there is not anie thing more necessary for the life of mã, then Water. For sometimes, when bread wanteth, a man may nourish himselfe with fleth, and other Viands. If fire faile him, hee findeth so many other thinges to feede on raw, as he may wel liue diuers years without fire. But let there be no water to be had, and then neither man, or anie creature elfe, is able to liue. There is no herb, or any kinde of plant which can produce seed or fruite, without water: for al thinges haue neede of it, and must receyue moisture. This is so true, that Thales Milesius, and likewise Hesiodus conceyued; that water was the beginning of all thinges, and the most ancient of all the Elements, as also the most potent. For, as Plinie and Isidore (in like manner) do say; Water both moisteneth and ruinateth great Mountaines, gouerneth the earth, quencheth fire, and conuerting it self into vapors, passeth thorough the ayres regions, whence afterwards it descendeth, to engender and product all things in the earth.

Plinius lib. 2. cap. 4. Isidor. de Etym. lib. 3.

The regeneration of man by Water.

Likewise, God made such especiall esteeme of Water, that hauing resolued to regenerate man by Baptisme, hee ordained it to be done by the means of this Element. And when he diuided the waters in the beginning of the worlde, hee held it in such acount, that the text saith, He placed the Waters aboue the Firmament of Heauen, without comprehending them that circuited the Earth. The verie greatest torment which the Romans inflicted on condemned persons, was interdiction from water and fire, preferring Water before Fire, as worthy of the highest degree and eminencie.

Genesis. 7.

The Romans deemed water to condemned people.

Seeing then, that water is so needful for the life of man, we ought (with heedfull care) to seeke out the best: to which purpose, I will set downe some especiall properties thereof, alledged as wel by Vitruuius; as Aristotle, Plinie, and Dioscorides, with diuers other, that write of the election of waters.

Vitruuius in li. 8. Architect. Aristot. in Problē.

The first instruction is, that if a man trauaile into straunge Countreyes, and would knowe, if the Waters there bee good and wholesome for him, and to carie with him elsewhere according to his necessitie, let him obserue and note the rounde Neighbouring places, vnto the Welles, Springs, or Riuers; as also what the life and disposition is, of the people there inhabiting. Whether they be helthfull strong, and well coloured in their faces, without any defects in their eies and legges; for such men do testifie the goodnesse of the water, and also the contrary if it be bad. But if the water bee newlie or lately found, whereby this experiment must needes faile, then there are other proofes to be made.

Seuerall experiments to be made of Water

Let him take a Brazen Bason, verie cleanly scoured, and sprinkle some drops of the water (whereof he would make triall) therein: if after the water droppes be dried, no blemith appeare in the Bason by those droppes, it is a manifest signe of the waters goodnesse and puritie. This is also another good proofe; to boil som of the water in the same Bason, and then suffer it quietly to stand and coole; then when it is emptied foorth, if there appear no slime or sand in the bottome, it may be called excellent good; and of both the waters, that which hath the least slime is the better. In those Vesselles or other things, where any Graine is sodden, to make Brothes or Pottages, as Oatemeale, Pease, or any other Pulse, the best VVater is that which seetheth them sooneft.

Water good: es approued by boyling.

To deliuer a sound and certain iudgment in waters, there must be good consideration vsed, concerning the places whence they haue their sourse; whether the ground be sandie, neate, and cleare, or whither it be muddy, trobled, & foule: likewise, if Rushes, or other bad and pestifferous Herbes, doo grow thereabout.

For sound and infallible iudgment in Waters.

But

But the beſt and ſureſt way, and to auoid drinking of an vncertain water, or where any doubt is made, is to ſeeth it with a ſoft fire, and then let it coole.

Plin. in Lib. 4. Cap. 2. Plin. ſaith, that the Emperor Nero cauſed Water to be ſo boyled and then cooled it in Snow, glorifying himſelf for finding out ſuch an inuention. Now, the reaſon why boiled water is moſt holſom, is, becauſe the water which we drinke is not ſimple in his own Nature, but is mingled with the Earth and Aire. And by the fire, the windy part is exhaled, and reſulteth into ſmoake. The earthy part alſo, by Nature of the fire (which is to refine and ſeperate diuerſity of natures) deſcendeth to the inferiour place, and there abideth; by meanes whereof, ſodden water is the leſſe enflating or ſwelling, becauſe the windy part (which it hadde in the beginning) is wholly enaporated. It is alſo more light and ſubtle, by being purified from his earthy part, and therefore, the more eaſie to bee kept and preſerued: ſo that it cooleth & moiſteneth competently, without any obſtructing or alteration. Whereby is perfectly knowne, that the water of Welles is not ſo good as other water, becauſe it pertaketh moſt of the earth, and is no way purified, by the ſuns warme viſitation, which makes it the apter for corruption. Notwithſtanding, the more water we draw forth of the Well, the leſſe hurtfull it is, becauſe the continuall motion hindereth the ordinary corruption, which commeth to encloſed waters, and that haue no courſe. And then Nature ſendeth new and freſh water in ſuch meaſure, as preſent draught is made of that ſo lately ſent. For this cauſe, the waters of ſtanding Lakes and Ponds, is the worſt of al other: for through want of courſe & current, it corrupteth it ſelf, engendering euill things, and oftentimes infecting the ayre, cauſing diuers diſeaſes thereabout.

The reaſon for drinking boyled water.

Soddenwater is not windie or ſwelling.

Well-water, not ſo wholeſome as other water.

Lakes and Pondes haue the worſt water.

The South-waters worſe then them of the North.

It is further to be conſidered, that waters that haue their courſe towardes the South, are not ſo good as they that run towards the North; becauſe in the Southerne quarter, the Ayre is much mingled with Vapors and Humidities which hurt the waters, and greatly endamage them. But in the Northern parts, the aire is more ſubtle, and leſſe moiſt, whereby it ſwelles not the Waters, neither troubles them ſo much. In regard whereof, the water which is cleareſt, lighteſt, ſubtileſt, and moſt purified, is the beſt; becauſe (as we haue already ſaid) it is leſſe intermedled with other Elements; and beſide, being neere to the fire, it rather heateth it then the other.

An experimentall proof of two waters

It is alſo a ſinguler proofe of two waters, to obſerue which of them wil be the ſooneſt warmed by one & the ſame fire, & in like ſpace of time: for they are both arguments of the moſt ſubtle and penetrating ſubſtance. And becauſe the mixture of the earth among the water, dooth argue his waightines, it is good to make election of the lighteſt Water, which may bee experimented in this manner. Take two pieces of Linnen cloath, which are of equall poiſe, and ſteepe the one in the one water, and the other in the other, till they bee thorowly ſoaked; then take them forth, and hang them in the Ayre, where the Sun (by no means) may come to them; and when they are drie, weigh them againe, and the piece which waigheth heauieſt, wil declare which is the heavieſt water. Some vſe to waigh theſe waters, in veſſelles verie cleane and neat, & that are of an equall waight.

A triall of the lightneſſe or waight of water.

Ariſtotle and Pliny doo ſay, that the greateſt cauſe which diuerſifieth the qualitie of waters, proceedeth from the ſubſtance of the earth, from ſtones, trees, and Mitherals, and Mettals; thorow which, Riuers and ſtreames make their paſſage. In regard whereof, ſome do becom hot, others cold; ſom ſweet, and others ſalt: for it is a moſt certaine rule, that the water which hath neither ſauour nor odor, is alwayes knowne to be the beſt VVater. All ſuch as haue written on this Argument, doo maintaine; that that VVater which paſſeth thorow Mines of Gold, is the beſt water. And to approoue this, the moſt notable and excellent Riuers in the world, are ſuch as engender and conſerue Gold in their thin and fine ſands. But becauſe we are elſewhere to diſcourſe perticulerly of the properties of ſome riuers and other waters, I meane now to wade into no further examples.

Ariſt. in Lib. 3. de Animal. Plin. in Lib. 12.

Waters paſſing through Mines of gold

Seeing then, that we haue ſpoken of the waters of Riuers, VVelles, and Fountaines; reaſon requireth, that we ſhould ſay ſomewhat concerning Raine-water, which is praiſed by ſome, and blamed by others. Vitruuius, Columella, and ſome Phyſitions, doo highly commend Raine-water water, when it falleth pure and clear. For (say they) it is light and not mixtured, because it commeth from the vapor, which by his great subtilty, is mounted into the Ayres Region; and therefore, it is to bee credited, that heauie and waighty water remaineth in the earth. And albeit some say, that the water descending from heauen, corrupteth immediately, as wee behold in Fishponds, that engender a thousand filthes: yet it is not therefore to bee saide, that this ensueth by defect in the water; but rather, because it is stayed in such a place, where Muddes, Infections, and other Vncleanlinesses are met together. And partly, by some filthinesse which it bringeth with it selfe, washing the ground as it passeth along, when as it raigneth in great abundance. Therefore, the cause of his sudden corruption proceedeth from hence, that it is subtle and delicate; and by meanes of the Sunnes heate, and humiditie of the water, being commixed with many Ordures. Neuertheless, if this water being subtle, purged and cleared, were gathered as it falleth from the couerture of verie clean houses, or else as it falleth from Heauen, passing thorow the ayre, without touching anie thing, and so conueyed into as clean vesselles, it would be better then the other, and coulde preserue it selfe for longer time.

Of Rain-water.

Vitruuius in li. de Architect. Columella in Agricul.

The reason of raine-waters corruption.

Raine-water purelie taken and kept, lasteth lõg time

There are some other Authors, who hold a contrarie opinion, and namelie, Pliny. He saith, It is so vnwholsom that no man should drinke of it, because the vapors from whence it commeth, do proceed of many things, and by diuers wayes; whereby, it receiueth store of different qualities, as wel such as are euil, as them that be good. And in deliuering other reasons, he answereth to them which we haue aledged, & saith: That the proofe is not sufficient to say it is good, in shewing it to be the more light, by being drawne from the Region of the Aire: for such euaporations are exhaled aloft, by a secret violence of the Sun. And that also, by the same reason, it is a vapour likewise, wherby hard Hail-stones are formed in the Ayre: which water is pestifferous; and so is Snow water. Hee saith moreouer, That Raine water (beside his other defects) infecteth it selfe by the heate and vapour of the earth, euen then when it raineth: & to encrease his impuritie, it sufficeth to see, how quickly it putrifieth and corrupteth; where-of true experiment is made on the Sea, wher such water cannot be conserued: and therefore Wels and Cesternes are reproued. Vpon all these opinions, euerie man deliuereth his owne, according as appeareth best to his owne iudgement. But as for mee, I affect Rain-water lesse then the other, although it be more necessarie. And Pliny who blames it, yet saith; That Fishes doo fatten in Pondes, Lakes, and Riuers; and when it raineth, they are then best, because they haue need of the water of heauen. Theophrastus saith, That Garden Herbes, and all other beside, beeing watered by neuer so much aboundance of water, do not so plentifully encrease, as by Raine-water. In the like manner, Plinie speaketh of Reedes, that neede the water of heauen for their encrease. And Aristotle also, speaking on the abounding and encrease of Fishes.

Plin in lib. 32. cap. 3.

Answeres made by Pliny to the former reasons.

Against the impuritie of Raine-water.

Theophrastus.

CHAP. XL.

By what meanes a good quantitie of sweete and fresh Water, may be had out of the Sea. Why cold Water maketh a greater noise in his fall, then hot Water. And whither a Ship be of heauier weight on Salt water, then on fresh water.

Aristotle and Plinie do both aduise vs, for to make sundrie vesselles of waxe, hollow within; binding them so strongly, as possiblie may be, and free from any cracke, hole, or vent. So putting them into Nettes, or some such like matter, well fastened with long Cords, let them down into the sea, and keepe them there the space of a whol day. This being done, to draw them vp againe; and when yee open each of the Vessels, ye shall find a good quantitie of fresh water, in each one of them, as sweet as anie in the riuer. The reason why salt water thus becommeth fresh & sweet entering thorow these vesselles of wax, is rendered by Aristotle, for hee saith; That wax being sweet and delicate, the Water penetrateth it, and the subtle part of the Sea water passing through it, sweetneth it self, leauing the earthie part which it hadde, in the superficies of the Wax.

Arist. In Lib. de Animal. Pl. Lib. 32 cap. 4

Arist. bis supra

In

vessels of wax make salt water fresh and sweet.

In verie truth, if this be true (I say if it be true, because I my self neuer yet made experiment of this secret) it may do great seruice, in diuers necessities, which doo ordinarily happen. Notwithstanding, methinkes, that if salt water will become sweet, by entering into vessels of waxe, it should likewise become sweete, by softe trilling or gliding into wax, wherof such Vesselles may bee made, like vnto those which we haue of stone, to take away the saltnesse of the water. For, by the same reason, these things doe tend to one and the selfesame effect, although there may appeare some difference, by entering into empty vessels, and comming forth of full vessels, because there is an apparance of much greater force and violence, in comming forth of a full Vessell; neuertheless, the curious quetionist may trie both the one and other.

An experiment of hot water & cold.

Yet, in kinde affection to such, as are delighted in like singuler experiences, I will disclose another thing wel worth the knowledge. Take two Bottelles, which are of equall opening and measure, and fill them with water, the one boyling, & the other cold: afterwards, emptie them both together, and the colde water will issue forth sooner then the hot, and make the more lowde and greater noise in his fall, then the hot water, which fals more deafely, and with lesse strength. The reason is, because hote water is lighter then the cold, for that by the heate of the fire, it is more euapored. Likewise, at the beginning of the cold waters issuing foorth of the vessell, the hindmost part striueth to be formost, so that waightinesse is the cause, that cold water issueth forth sooner then hot, & maketh the greater noise in his fall, then the other can do.

Hot water lighter then cold.

A ship beareth a waightier burden on the Sea, then on anie fresh Riuer.

This is the reason deliuered by Aristotle, who likewise telleth vs another thing, which wee beholde daily, to wit; that a Ship beareth much heauier charging on the Sea, then on fresh Water, because the water of the Sea is more grosse and thicke, and beareth on her bosome anie thing whatsoeuer, in much greater weight, then any fresh Water is able to do, which is more subtle. To approue the truth heereof, experience maketh daily demonstration. For, if a man cast an Egge into a fresh Water Riuer, imediately it sinketh vnto the bottome: but, throwe it into Salte Water, or the Sea, and it floateth aloft thereof, and cannot sinke.

CHAP. XLI.

The Reason why all Creatures haue as many feete on the one side, as on the other: And on which side they first beginne to go, and for what cause.

All creatures haue their feet by pairs.

WHosoeuer hath duely considered, the order of Gate or going in al kind of creatures; hath also obserued, that their feete are numbered by paires, as well in those of two feet, as of foure, and more. It is likewise to be further noted, that they are in such manner diuided to them, as the one halfe is on the one side, and the rest on the other. The reason whereof, seemeth to proceed from some secret in Nature, and whereof I purpose to discourse, according to the opinion of the most sprightly, & best iudging Philosophers. Among all which graue men, Aristotle handleth the manner of their common going, and maketh a disputation therof in his Problems. But for our better vnderstãding, we must presuppose, that the motion of all creatures, is composed of rest and trauaile: for to moue one part, requireth to haue the other firme and in quiet, and afterwards it mooueth also; so that our motion in gate or going, appeareth to bee the one footes rest, while other marcheth: which is a rule most certaine and necessarie, except in leaping, which is formed by the whole body, without requiring the managing of the feet, ech after other. Why then it followeth necessarily, that when one part or side of the feet do repose and rest themselues, the other mooueth; and afterward rest againe, while the other do aduance their march; and by this course the feete haue their motion alternatiuely.

Arist. in Probl.

The order of motion in all creatures.

Of Leaping.

One foote is not sufficient in any creature, neither a third foote.

To performe then this motion, there is necessarily required more then one foote; and beside, that they must be alike in number, that is to say, either two, or foure, or more, because in hauing three feete, the gate or going had not well bin ordered, ordered, or equall; for when two hadde mooued themselues, the third (of necessitie) must haue carried the whole burthen. And for the very same reason, all creatures, howe many feete soeuer they haue, either two, foure, or more; are numbered by paires; and they haue the one halfe on the one side of the body, & the other on the other side; to the ende, that the more orderly all the two partes may moue themselues in equal number, and in the manner of their trauaile. As we may obserue in Bees, Flies, & Beetles, which haue sixe feete: and likewise in other Vermine, some that haue forty, and others an hundred, yet are equally deuided by halues on either side. And albeit, that in these creatures hauing so many feete, inequality would appear insupportable: yet by auoyding of such confusion, Nature thus appointed them, for the more perfection.

Bees, Flies, & Beetles haue sixe feet.

Arist. in Probl.

It is also a matter most notable and memorable, which learned Aristotle hath determined in those Books before alledged. Hee saith, That Men, and all other kinde of Beasts or Creatures, doo euermore begin their motion on the right side, whereof wee haue verie euident experience in all things that we do. He that prepareth himselfe to runne a race, dooth alwayes set his left foot formost, to the end, that he may beginne to runne with the right foote, and so to proceed on in his course. If a man do beare any weightie thing, ordinarily he carrieth it on the left arme, or on the left side; because the right part of the bodie may be at libertie, to go on the more lightly. Whereby we discern, that when a man would moue himselfe to do any thing, except it be for some expresse cause, or by reason of a known inconuenience and hinderaunce, the first part of the bodie directed forward, is the lefte, but the right hath the rule and prehemi-nence.

Motion in mē and Beastes, beginneth on the right side.

Likewise, we may behold, when a man would go about anie thing, hee turneth alwayes to the left side, to haue his right arme at full scope and libertie. If he be Dauncing, he turneth with his right arm toward the left. And in mounting on Horse-back, or on any other thing, wherein vse is required of the hands helpe: the right part is still the readiest, both in any mannuall work or motion. in mounting aloft, although a man do put his left foot into the stirrop, and hold by the left hand on the Saddles Pommell, to cast himself into the Saddle. So then wee perceyue, that these kinds of motion are in the left hand; but the right hand is the only chiefe guide and conducter.

The End of the Fift Booke.

The Sixt Booke.

CHAP. I.

¶ Of the Kingdome of Fez: Of the Lawes, Customes, and Manners therein obserued, with a true Description of the Common wealth.

BEcause the kingdome of Fez is great, as being the chiefest in all Barbarie, and the Cittie verie notable in hir lawes and orders: I am the more willing to make a perticuler Description therof, not thinking that it can be vnthankefully taken: because it is the true food of man, to hear and know the most famous thinges which are in the world.

A description of Fez.

1. FEZ, is a verie great Citty, engirt with high and goodly wals, and is (as it were) wholy Mountainy and Hilly, so that the middest onely of the Cittie is plain, but the fourth part therof (as I haue saide) is all hillie. By two wayes the Water enters into the Cittie, because the Riuer deuideth it selfe into two partes: the one passeth besides new Fez, which is on the South part, and the other runneth vnto the West. As the Water makes his entrance into the Cittie, it parteth it selfe into manie Channelles, which runne (for the most part) to the Cittizens Houses, and Courtiers Dwellings belonging to the King, and to diuers other Houses; as also, to all the temples, euery Oratory hauing his part of the Water, as the Innes, Hospitalles, and Colledges haue the like.

Of the Waters entrance into the City.

Houses of office in the open Citty.

Neere to the Temples or Churches, are certain Houses of necessary vse, made after a foure-square manner, with little Chambers built rounde about in them, each hauing his seuerall doore for entrance: And in euerie one of them, is a Well-spring; which water issuing from the walles, falleth into certaine Channels of Marble, making an indifferent noyse with the fal; and running thence thorow those needfull houses, conuayeth all the filthinesse of the Cittie into the Riuer. In the middest of these Houses is a lowe VVell spring, about some three yardes in depth, foure in bredth, and twelue in length; about which, are diuers Channelles, wherein the water runneth, and passeth along vnder the houses; the whol number of these houses are an hundered and fiftie.

The manner of building their houses in the Cittie.

The houses of dwelling in the Citie, are of Bricke and Stone, verie formallie builded, and the most part of them verie goodlie, beeing beautifyed with Stone-woorke of variable Colours. The doores in like manner, are paued with Bricke, and the Porches with Anticke Tyles of diuers Colours, like vnto the Dishes of China.

The toppes of the houses are painted with curious VVorkmanship, and costly Colours, as with Golde and Azure; the roofes being made flat like Tables, and plaine, for more commodious couering the whole house, with faire extended painted cloaths, and to sleepe in during the Summer season. Almost al the houses do consist of two Stories of height, & some of three, with sundrie Tarrasses curiously framed, which do greatly adorne them, and serue as passages from Chamber to chamber vnder the roofe, because the midst of the house is wide open, and the Lodgings are deuided, some on the one side, and some on the other. The Doors of the Chambers are made large and high, and men of what quality soeuer, haue their Chambers entrance formed of costly Woodde, verie curiouslie Carued.

The height of their houses.

The Porches and Portals of their houses.

Each Chamber hath his Presse or Cupbord, verie fair and cunningly painted, of conuenient length to the Chambers largenesse, which serue as VVardrobes for their best and costliest things. All the Portals of these houses, are made vppon Collumbes of pauing stone, and beautified (well-neere half) with painted earth, like to that of China. Some also are mounted on Pillers of Marble, made with Arches, raised from one Collumbe to another, all couered with artificiall Checkie Stone-woorke: and the Transomes that are aloft on the Pillers, and do support (as it were) the seuerall Stories, are of VVood, Carued with ingenious labour, and colours of most curious painting.

Houses for preseruation of Water.

There are also great store of Houses, made purposely for the pure preseruation of water, much like vnto our Conduites, made foure square, containing six or seauen yards in bredth, tenne in length, and about twelue in depth, all couered and bricked verie artificially. In the length of some of them, diuers pretty low fountaines are made, appearing verie fayre to sight, and composed of the foresaid China stuffe: in the midst whereof, are large Vessels of Marble, such as wee see in our Fountaines of Europe. As these Fountaines do fill themselues, the ouer-flowe of water is conuaied to the houses of preseruing water, couertly: and when those houses are full, it is likewise thence-carried by other priuate Water-courses, that neighbor to those preseruing houses, and haue their fall by little made wayes; and passing vnder the Houses of necessarie vse, runne with quicke streame into the Riuer.

Well springs & Fountaines

For conueyance of water thorough the Citty.

On their houses, they haue Turrets or Towers, wherein are diuers apte and well adorned Chambers: in which Turrets, the women do most bestowe themselues, when they are wearied with their Houshold affaires, for out of those Turrets, they may suruey the whole City. Of Temples and Moschaes, there are about seauen hundred, and these are their places of Prayer. Fiftie of those Temples are very great, very well built, and beautified with Pillers of Marble, and other seemly Ornaments. Each of them hath a goodly fountaine, made of pure Marble, and other faire stones, not seene in Italy; and all the Collumbes haue curious Tribunes of Checky woorke vppon them, or Tables very ingeniously ingraued. The tops of the Temples are like to them in Europe, and couered accordingly, and the pauements in the Temples, are all couered with Mats, artificially made, and so cunningly ioyned together, as not a iot of the Floore can bee seen. The wals are likewise couered with such Mats, but of no more heighth then the stature of a man. In each of these temples there is a Turret, wherinto such men go, as haue the charge to cry & proclaim the houre appointed for ordinary praier. There is no more but one Priest belonging to each Temple, to whome appertaineth the Office of Prayer, and care of entrance into the Temple, to wit; Dilligently to keepe the accounts, to dispense to the Ministers of the said Temple, such as do light the Lampes by night, and the Porters of the doors; also, those Officers that haue the charge to cry (in the night time) on the Tower or Turret, and declare the houres of Prayer: because they that cry in the day time, haue not any wages, but is freed from all tenths and payments whatsoeuer.

Turrets of pleasure in the houses.

Temples and Moschaes.

Fountains belonging to the Temples.

The Pauements & wals of the Temples.

Turrets in the Temples.

The Priest of the Temple.

The Crier in the Tower or Turret.

In the Citty, there is a principal Temple, which is called the Temple of Caruen, and it is a very great Temple, containing in circuit a mile and a halfe, and it hath one and thirtie gates each one verie high: the couerture is an hundered & fifty Tuscane yardes in length, and little lesse in bredth then fourescore. The Towet wherin the Crier standeth, is likewise very hie; and the couering or seeling in length, is sustained vpon 38. Arches, and in in bredth vpon twenty. Round about it, to wit, Eastward, Westward, & Northward, are certaine Porches, each beeing thirty cubits wide, and fortie in length. Vnder these Porches, are diuers Storehouses, wherein are kept the Oyle, Lampes, and Mats, with al other things of necessarie vse for the Temple: wherein are nine hundred Lamps nightly lighted, because euery Arch hath his Lampe, especially those Arches in order, which passe through the bodie of the Temple; and they only haue an hundred & fifty lamps; in which rank also are diuers other great Luminaries, all made of brasse. There are places for a thousand and fiue hundered Lamps, all which were made of Bels, wonne from diuers Cities of the Christians, by the Kings of Fez.

The great Temple of Caruen, & the Tower therof

Store-houses for the Oyle, Lampes, and Mats.

In the Temple, and as fixed to the walles, are Pulpits of all qualities, wherin many Learned Masters do read to the people, matters concerning their Faith, and of the spirituall Lawes. They begin a little after the breake of day, and finish at the first houre in the day. In the Summer time they read not, but after the four and twenty houre, and their Readinges do continue for an houre and an halfe in the night. And they read not only the faculties and Morrall Sciences, but those spirituall also, according to the Lawe of Mahomet. The Readings in Summer, are perfourmed by none but by certaine priuate men, and none may reade, but such men as are expert in the Lawes, and euerie one hath good and ample Wages for his Lectures, beside their Bookes and Lights freely brought them. The Priest of this Temple, hath no other charge but to say Prayers: yet hee may take care of the mony and prouision which is offered in the Temple for young Children, and be Steward of such guiftes, as are left at the Gates entrances for the poor; as mony and Corne, which at euerie Feast is imparted vnto all the poore of the Cittie; to some more, and to some lesse, according to the quallitie of their Family.

The Pulpits and Readings in the temple

The Summer Readings.

The Priestes charge of the Temple.

He that taketh the Office on him, as Collector or Receiuer for the entraunce Money of the Temple, hath a seperate office, and for his owne prouision, hath a Ducate each day allowed him, and sixe men to attend him, that gather the Rent Money of the Houses, Shoppes, and other profite, and each of these is allowed fiue in the hundred. He hath also about som twentie Factors, whose charge is to goe abroad, to make prouision for daily Labourers, such as Delue in the grounds, looke to the Vines, and woorke in Gardens, and such like offices, whose wages may amount vnto three Ducates, each man (monthly) of those twenty. About a mile out of the Cittie, are some twenty Furnaces, where Lime is made, and as many more, for Bricke and other necessary furniture, for the buildings and possessions of the Temple, as also of the Temple it selfe, whose allowance is two hundred Ducats daily, but more is spent (by the halfe) in the fore-named occasions. Beside, those Temples and Moschaes that haue no reuennewes, are furnished from this Temple in manie things. And if any ouer-plus of benefits doo remaine, they are spent to common vtilitie of the Cittie, because many poore Commoners haue little other benefit. And most true it is, that lately in our daies, the king caused great summes of money, to bee lent to the Priest of the Temple for these vses, which as yet were neuer repayed backe againe.

The collector or Receiuer of Temple-mony

Twentie Factors and their wages.

Furnaces and Killes out of the Cittie.

The great Temples daily allowance.

In this Cittie, are two Colledges of Scholliers, verie fairely builded, with manie Ornaments of embossed workes, and Carued Transomes, couered with fine Slates, and supported with goodlye Marble Pillers. In each of these Colledges, are manie Chambers, amounting to an hundered and more, all builte by diuers Kinges of the House of Marino.

One of them is (in trueth) verie admyrable, both for Greatnesse and beautie, which was caused to bee builded by the King Abu Henon, hauing a verie rare and goodly Fountaine in it of Marble, the Bowle beeing able to containe two Tunnes of Water; and when it ouerfloweth, it passeth like a little Riuer in a faire Channell, the bottome whereof, is Paued with Marble, and diuers other Checky coloured stones.

In this Colledge, are three faire Galleries, with Beddes in them, verie costly couered, and round encompassed with pillers, fashioned into eight Cantons of diuers Colours, and so made fast vnto the Walles. And on the heade of euerie Collumbe, are Arches bowing Colledges in the Cittie of Schollers.

One Colledg builded by K. Abu-Henon.

from one to another, adorned with Pinacles of strange moduling, embellished with Balles of Gold and Azure. The walles about the Colledge are no higher, then a man (standing close by) may reach with his hand, and thoroughout made al of Checquerd stone. And round about on the Walles, are Verses written, containing the yeare when the Colledge was built, and praises of the place and Founder, who was the King Abu Henon: the Letters being grossely engraued, and in Blacke Carracters on a White Field, for the better sight and reading farre off. The Colledge Gates are of Brasse, verie artificially and ingeniously Wrought, and each Chamber doore, of costly carued wood.

The height of the Colledge wals.

The Colledg Gates.

In the great Hall, where Orations are made, is a Pulpit, hauing nine steps or staires vp to it, made of Iuory and Ebonie, almost myraculous to beholde. When the Colledge was finished, the King would see the Booke of his charges; and hauing not ouer-viewed the left part of the Booke, which arose to forty thousand Ducates, without any further inquisition, he tooke the Booke, tore it in pieces, and threw it into a little Riuer running by the Colledge; alledging two verses of a verie worthy Author among the Arabians, to this effect.

The Kinges viewe of the Colledg building.

Things deer & faire, can neuer be too deer,
And if they please, no man can pay too deer.

But there was a Treasurer, Named Hibnulagi, who seeking to find out a certaine account, although hee came much short thereof, yet he could alledg the expences of four hundred & 4. score thousand Ducates. All the other Colledges of Fez, haue some correspondence with this; and in euerie Colledge, there are Readers in diuers Sciences; some, that read in the Morninges, and the other in the night, all hauing sufficient and verie excellent allowance left by the founders and builders.

Part of the building charges.

The allowances of readers

In auncient times, euery Scholler in this Colledge, was affoorded his expences and Garments, for the space of seuen yeares But now in these dayes, nothing is graunted but Chamber-roome, because in the warre of Sabid, many possessions and Gardens were spoyled, the benefit whereof went to these charges. So that now there remaine but some small fragments, where-with the Readers are maintained: some hauing two hundred, others an hundered Ducates, and some lesse. And this perhappes, may be the occasion of the decay of Vertue in Fez; and not only of Fez, but of all the Cities in Affrica.

Former alowance for scholers.

None doo dwell in these Colledges, except certaine Schollers that are strangers, who haue their liuing of the Cittizens Almes, and from som parts of Fez. And if any haue their lodging in the Citie, they may not exceede the number of two. When any of the Lecturers will reade, a Scholler doth first deliuer the Text, and then the Lecturer comments thereon, inducing some expositions of his owne; and declaring all difficulties happening in the Argument. And somtimes, in presence of the Lecturer, the Schollers will fall to dispute amongest themselues, according to the subiect of the Reading or Lesson.

Strange scholers dwell in the Coledges

The order of Reading.

2. In Fez, there are many Hospitals, which in forme and beautie, are not inferior to the forenamed Colledges. And it was obserued (as a Custome) in former times, that straungers should haue three dayes entertainment in those Hospitals. There are many other without the gates, no lesse commendable then those within, and these Hospitalles were very rich: but in the time of Sabids warre, the King hauing neede of great summes of mony, was connselled to sel their reuennues and allowances. The common people yeelding no consent thereto, an Atturney (belonging to the King) gaue them to vnderstand, that those Hospitals were builded vpon meere Almes, which had formerlie beene giuen by the predecessours to the present King, who now stood in daunger of loosing his Kingdome: and therefore, it was better to sell those possessions, to chase away the common enemie, then to stand vpon such immediate perill, considering, the warre should be no sooner finished but now reuennewes might bee purchased. Heereupon, they were sold, and the King dyed, before any new purchasing followed; so that the Hospitalles remained poore, and in a maner, without any sustentation: yet now there is a Lodging allowed for some forraigne or trauailing Doctor, or to a Gentleman, but very

Of Hospital, and Stoues or Bathes.

Sabids warre, tocke away all the Hospitals reuenues

The olde reuenues, solde, but no newe purchased.

very poorely in the Citty, to releeue foote trauailers, and sickly Strangers, and there is but one of them neither, yet without either Phisition or Phisick; onely lodging and expences is affoorded, till a poore weake man dye, or be recouered.

Respect of mad and frantique people.

In this Hospitall are certaine Chambers, appointed for Lunaticke or distracted persons, that hurle stones in the streetes, and are otherwise dangerous; where they are kept lockt vp, and fast chained, and the doores of these chambers, which front the Galleries or Tarasses, are barred with Iron, both beneath and aloft, and the Windowes with Woodden barres, strongly knit with Iron. He that hath the charge of their dyet, when he perceiueth any one of them to behaue himselfe disorderlie; he beats them with a Bastonado, which hee commonly carryeth ready for the purpose. Oftentimes it happeneth, that trauailers walking by those Chambers, the distracted persons will cal to them, and vse many lamentations, that they are cured of their infirmities; and therefore should be discharged from imprisonment, protesting, that they endure infinite iniuries at the Officers handes. Some, being ouer credulous, will look in at the Windowes, and for their labour, are rewarded with an handfull of noysome filth in their faces. For, although these distracted persons haue their conuenient Houses of Office; yet notwithstanding, they will empty their bellies in the midst of the floore, and watch opportunitie for these beastlie prankes: except the Officers (by their diligence) cleanse away the filth, or fore-warne strangers of such an iniury. To conclude, these Hospitals haue all such familiar Attendants, as are to discharge all fitting Offices: as Clearkes, Factours, Protectours, Cookes, Butlers, and others for apt seruice to the infirme.

Chastisement for mad people.

The brutish behauiour of lunatick people.

Attending officers in the Hospitals.

Of the Stoues or Bathes.

There are also an hundred Stoues or Bathes, beautifully builded and adorned; some whereof are small, others greater: but all made after one forme and manner; to wit, euery one hath foure places or roomes, of the largenesse of great dining Haules. Without, are certaine Galleries somewhat high, and ascent is made vnto them by diuers degrees or staires: where men vse to disrobe themselues, and leaue their garments in safety. In the midst are certain large Wels made, after the manner of their preserued waters, but much greater.

Now, when a man would go to one of these Bathes, when hee hath entred at the first gate, he passeth into a spacious place, which is coole, and there is a coole Well-spring to temper the Water, when it waxeth excessiuely hot. From thence (by another Gate) he goeth on to the second place, where the Water is hotter, and there are diuers Officers, that attend to wash and make cleane all Commers. From thence he passeth to the third, which is very hot, where he sweateth for a while, and here he endureth heat indeed, for the water is walled round with heate: but it hath conuayance forth into certain Buckets of wood, and to each man they must giue two Glasses of water, or more, to such as shall demaund them, for which courtesie, hee giueth to the attending party, a small peece of Coyne, called a * Baioe, or but two at the most; and to the Parrone or Maister of the Bath, he payeth no more then two * Quatrines. The water is made thus hot with the Dung of Beasts, which the Maister of the Bath keepeth Boyes of purpose for to gather, who passing through the Citty, doe load themselues with Dung out of the Stables; and then carrying it forth of the Cittie, they doe make there of a topping Dung-hill, and so it remaineth there two or three moneths drying. Afterward, to heat the Bathhoutes and the water, it is burnt in stead of wood, or other fuell.

The entrance into the Baths

The coole water, and seuerall degrees of the Bathes.

* Valuing two Italian pence.

* The fourth part of an English peny.

Weomen also haue their seperate Stoues or Bathes, and many are kept for Weomen and Men together: but men doe determine their time, which vsually is from the third houre, vntill the foureteenth, either more or lesse, according to the quality of the day, and the rest of the day, as perticularly appointed for Women. At the time of their entrance into the Bath, as a manifestation thereof, a Cord is thwarted at the doores passage, and then no man presumeth to enter. But if it happen, that any man then would speake with his Wife: he cannot, but some Seruant of Baths appointed for women.

The order of womens entring into the Bath.

of the house must carry her his errand. Many times, the Men and Weomen of the Citty do banquet together in those Baths, & vsing diuers pleiures, in diuers kinds, singing very often with excellent voyces. The youth also of eyther kind, doe enter into them starke naked, without any shame or offence to either. But men of some condition and degree, doe enter with wiping Cloaths wrapped about them, and sit not in any common places: but haue the aduantage of certaine distinct little roomes, which euermore are made handsome, and fitting for men of reputation. When the Seruants and Attendants doe wash any body, they cause him to lye along, and then rub and chafe euery part of him, with Oyntment restoratiue, and sometime with such Instruments, as do take away all filthinesse. But when they wash a Lord, or one of great account; they cause him to lie downe on a cloth of Felt (such as Hats are made of) laying his head also vpon Pillowes of Felt, and so deale with him gently and tenderly.

Youth vse the Bathes.

For men of good reputation.

For a Lord.

To euery one of these Bathes or Stoues, are many Barbers belonging, who pay alike payment to the Maister, for vse of their Instruments there, and washing according to their profession. The most part of these Bathes, do hold their best estate of the Temples and Colledges, and doe pay them great rents: some an hundred, others an hundred and fiftie Ducates yearely, some more, some lesse, according to the greatnesse of the place. Nor will I conceale a familiar Feast, made once a yeare by the Seruants and Youth attending in these Bathes, which is performed in this manner. These young men doe inuite all their Friendes, and goe with Drums, Fifes and Trumpets, forth of the Cittie. Afterward, they take a great Onion, called an Onion of the Sea, and put it into a Bason of Copper, which when they haue couered with a faire linnen Towell: they march backe to the Cittie, sounding all the way to the Gate of the Bathe. Then they put the Onion into a Basket, and fastning it to the door of the house, say: This shall be a signe of benefit to the Bathe, because this yeare it shall bee frequented by many. But me-thinkes, this rather resembleth a sacrifice vsed by the ancient Affricanes, at such time as they were Gentiles, and continued in vse euen to our times; as likewise wee finde many notes of their Feastes, imitated by Christians, and as yet obserued, though scarcely well knowne, vpon what occasion those Feasts were vsed. But in euery Citty certaine Feasts were obserued, and left in vse to the Christians, when they gouerned Affrica.

Barbers belonging to the Bathes.

The rents of the Bathes.

A Feast made by the youth of the Bathes, euery yeare.

A Sacrifice vsed by the Affricane Gentiles.

3. In the said Citty, there are about two hundred Innes or Hostaries, verie hansomelie built and contriued. But some doe exceede the other in greatnesse: as those that are nere to the great Temple, and mounted three Srories in height, containing one hundred and twentie Lodgings, and some more. In euery one are fare Welles of Water, and Houses of Office, with their conuaying Channels, which quickly rid away all filth whatsoeuer. Like vnto these, are (in Italie) the Colledge of the Spanyards in Bologna, and the Pallace of the Cardinall of S. George in Rome, euerie Chamber doore entring vppon the Tarras. But albeit these Innes are faire and great, yet they doe afford but verie bad lodging: for there is neither Bed, Bed-stead, nor Sheetes, but euery guest hath a course Couerlet, or Irish Rugge allowed him, & a hansome Mat to sleep vpon. And if he will eate, hee must goe buy his Victuals himselfe, and deliuer them to the Cooke to bee dresst. Poore Widdowes of the Cittie, that haue neither House, kinred, or Friends; are also allowed accesse to these Innes, where roomes are appointed for them, some seuerall, others two in a Chamber.

Releese for poore widdowes.

The Hosts of these Innes are of a certaine generation, which they call Elchena, and go in womanish garments, adorning their persons after the fashion of Weomen: For they shaue close their Beards, and striue to imitate women in their speech. What doe I say, in speech? Yea, they will sow and spin. Each one of these base-minded men, doth keepe his Concubine, and vseth the very same familiaritie with her, as the Husband doth with his Wife: Other loose Weomen also haue resort thither, that make sale of their honesty, as

Of Innes or Hostaries in the Citty.

What lodging the Innes doe yeild.

The Innekeepers of the Citty, and their base qualities.

Bad guests to be allowed in Innes.

as the whores of Europe vse to do. These Inne-keepers haue authority, to buy and sell Wines, without any dispensation from Court Officers. And in these Hosteries, men of the most foule and vilest life haue continuall resort; as to make themselues drunke, and to satisfie their lust with women of hire: because there they may exercise all brutalitie of life, secure from the apprehension of Officers, and other such like deformities, which better beseemeth silence then vtterance. These so well-deseruing Inne-keepers, haue a Consull, and pay certaine tribute to the Castillian and Gouernour of the Citty: standing bound beside, when any Army is required for the King or Princes; to prouide a great retinue of their Seruants, to prepare foode for the Souldiours, because few other are able for that imploiment.

The Inne-keepers pay tribute to the Gouernour.

Assuredly, if the strict Law had not enforced me, whereto a true Historian standeth bound, to reueale the truth in such general descriptions: I could more willingly haue buryed these foule faults in silence, because they are the grossest blemishes in any Cittie, wherein (beside) are many vertues. And setting apart these vices, the Kingdome of Fez containeth men of greater goodnes, then are in all the parts of Affrica. And therefore with those dishonest Hosts, (as is credibly auouched) few other haue any conuersation; but onely ribald persons, of base blood & life: for neither Scholler, Merchant, or any honest Artezane, will so much as speake to them, and they are interdicted beside, from entring into the Temples, or the Market place of Merchants, the Bathes, or any of their Houses. Neuertheless, such as keep the Hosteries by the great Temple, are fauoured in lodging Merchants of rare qualitie, but the common people do nothing but scorne and mocke them: And because they do seruice (as I haue already said) to the Prince in the Fielde, they are suffered to continue in that wretched kind of life.

Men of much vertue in the Kingdome of Fez.

Inne-keepers forbidden entrance into the Temples, &c.

4 Within this Citty, there are about some four hundred Milles, for the grinding of Corne, and they may easily amount to a thousand; considering, that the said Mils are made in the manner of a great Haule, and in Collomes, and in some of them are foure, fiue, or sixe seuerall Milles. There is a large streete in the Cittie, wherein are nothing else but Mill stones, and thither do resort certaine Traffiquers, tearmed Meale-men: who doe hold many of the Milles at rentage, and buying Graine for them, cause it there to be ground. Afterward, they make sale of the Meale in the Shoppes, which they also pay rent for, deriuing very good benefit thereby: because all the Trades-men, that haue no apt means to furnish themselues with Corne, doe buy the Meale in these Shoppes, and make it Bread in their owne Houses. But men of any degree, doe buy their Corne at the best aduantage, and then cause it to bee ground in certaine Milles, which are allowed by the Cittizens, paying the Miller two Baioes for the Bushelles grinding. The most part of these Milles doe belong to the Temples and Colledges, so that but few appertaine to Cittizens: and they pay great rent, two Duckers for euery Mill.

Of Milles in the Citty.

A Streete of Millstones.

A Trade onely of selling Meale.

5. The Artes and Trades in this Citty, are separated one from another, and those of greatest worth and respect, are in the circuit, and neere neighbouring to the greatest Temple: As Notaries or Scriueners, and of them there are about fourscore Shoppes, one part of them beeing ioyned to the Wall of the Temple, and the other right against it, two Notaries sitting in each Shop. A little further off, toward the West-side, are about thirty Shops of Booke-sellers or Stacioners: and toward the South-side, are they that sell Shooes, whereof there are aboue an hundred and fiftie Shoppes. These onelie doe buy both Shooes, Buskins, and Stockings ready made, in very great store, and so make sale of them againe: And not farre from them, are the Shoe-makers, that make Shooes for all degrees of persons, and of them are about fifty Shoppes. On the East-side of the Temple, the Sellers of Brasse and Copper haue their place, and right against the great gate, toward the West-side, stand they which sell Fruit, making (among them) other fifty Shoppes. Next to them are the Waxe-sellers, that shew

Of Artificers, Trades, shops and Market places.

Scriueners.

Booke sellers

Shoo-sellers and Stocking-sellers.

Shoe-makers.

Brasiers.

Fruiterers.

Wax-sellers.

Mercers. shew rare worke-deuises in Wax. And by them are the Mercers; but of both these there are not many Shops. Then Flowre-sellers follow the Sellers of Flowers, who likewise sell Citrones and Limons: but such as doe behold the rare diuersity of Floures, would imagine to see mid-April, when the Fields are in their richest Liuery, or when the Gardens make their best shew of beautie. Of these Shoppes there are about twenty: for such as vse to drinke Wine, will alwayes haue Hearbes and Floures with them.

Milke-sellers. Neere vnto them, are certaine sellers of Milke, whose Shops are well furnished with all China Vessels. They vse to buy their Milke of diuers Kine-keepers, who make this kind of Merchandise of their Kine, and euery morning these Kine-keepers doe send their Milke in certain wodden vessels, bound about with Iron, very narrow at the mouth, but large in the bottome, and so sell it them of these Shoppes. Such as is milked at night, is bought by these Shopkeepers, and Butter made thereof: and that which is sower, commonly called Butter-Milke, they sell in like manner to the people; so that betweene sweet and sower Milke, fiue and twenty Tubs of Milke is daily made sale of. Next Sellers of Bombast. to these, are the Sellers of Cotton and Bombast, making (betweene them) thirtie Shops. On the North-side, are

Hemp-sellers the Traders in Hemp, that sell Halters, Horsse-Collers, Packe-thred, and all kind of Cords. By them, are the Makers

Sadlers. of Saddle-girts, riding Pantofles, and Head-stalles for Horses, some of Leather, and some of Silke. A little further off, are the Scabberd or Sheath-

Scabberd-makers. makers, for Swordes, Daggers, and Kniues, who likewise make Leather Breast-plates for Horses.

Salte-sellers. Next to them stand the Sellers of Salt and Whiting, which they buy in grosse, and sell by retaile. Then they

Pot-sellers. that sell all kind of Stone-vessels, which are faire, and of perfect collours, some that be of one, and others of two colours; of all these there are about an hundred Shoppes. Then such as sell

Lorrayners. Bittes and Bridles for Horses, Saddles, and Stirrups, of which there are about fourescore Shoppes. Then there is a Porters. place for Porters, which are to the number of three hundred, who haue a chiefe or Commaunder among them, and he appointeth those men weekely, that are to labour and carry burthens, and they must duely attend on al occurrences, which happen in that weeke. When the weeke is ended, he deuideth the Money duely and equally among them that haue laboured for it. And the Porters loue like Brethren, for when any one of them dyeth, and leaueth a young Child behinde him: they not onely (in common) do pay the widowes charges, vntill she marry againe; but also haue a louing and diligent care of the Childe, till it be of age to vndertake some Trade. When any of this ranke marrieth, or the birth of a Child is knowne among them: a Banquet is made for the whole Company, and at this meeting, no one escapeth without one present or other. And no man may enter into their profession, till he haue made a sociable meeting to the whole Company: Or else, if hee presume to enter in labour among them, hee must haue but the halfe moity of his owne earnings. And they are priuiledged by the Lord of the Citty, from paying any penalties or taxations whatsoeuer, or the baking of their owne Bread at the Ouen. If any of them commit a fault deseruing death, it is not publikely punished. And when they follow their labour, they goe cloathed in garments all of one colour; but when the day concerneth not their labour, they are habited to their own liking: and to conclude, they are all accounted honest men, & of good life, sildome deseruing any reprehension.

A louing amitie among men of meane qualitie.

Orders obserued among the Porters.

Not farre from the place where these Porters do giue attendance, is the Market place for the cheefe of the Consuls, and Iudges of all things sold for foode. In the midst of this Market-place is a Serraglio of Canes, made foure square, wherein are solde Carrets, and other kinde of Garden Roots, by certain men thereto appointed, because none else but they may buy them of the Gardiners, as being thereto especially deputed, and they pay an order of custome therefore to the Receiuer. And dailie shall ye see there sold fiue hundred Horse-load of these Roots, and many times farre greater quantities, sold at verie very cheape rare, ſometimes thirty, at (at leaſt) twenty pound weight for a Baioc, and Beanes and Peaſe (at due ſeaſons of the yeare) are ſold very reaſonably. Round about are certaine Shops, where they ſel* Vermicilli, and other like things, as fleſh made into round balles, and fryed in Oyle, euery ball beeing about the bigneſſe of a Figge: which are ſold at ſixe Quatrines the pound, and they are made of leane Beeſe. Beſide this Market-place, ſomwhat more Northerlie is the Hearb-market, where they ſell Cabbages, Turnops, Colewortes, and other Hearbes, which they eate together with meate, and there are forty Shoppes of theſe Traders. Next is the Smoaky Market, where they fry certaine kinds of Bread in Oyle, like to the boiled Hony-Bread ſold in Rome. Theſe men haue ſundry Inſtruments in their Shoppes, and Boyes ſinging al the day; for great quantity of this Bread is daily ſold; becauſe it is vſed in faſts, eſpecially on Feaſt daies, and when they intend any ſolemne-faſting.

The Market-place for Il Capo de Consoli.

Theſe men vſe not to roaſt their meat on Spits or Broaches, but they haue two Ouens or furnaces, made one ouer the other, and they put fire into the neathermoſt, and when that aboue is well heated: they put in the meate at a conuayance made aloft, becauſe no fire ſhall offend their hands. By this means, the meat is exceedingly well Cookt, keepes a delicate colour, and hath a rare reliſh: becauſe neither Smoke, nor ſmell of the fire can come at it, but is thus temperately dreſſed all the night time. In the morning, of this meat, and the Bread before named, there is dailie ſold to the value of two hundred Duckets, for there are fifteene of the Shops, and they haue no other exerciſe. They ſell alſo, fryed Fleſh, and fryed Fiſh, and other kinds of Bread, made into Paſte, like Cakes; but yet ſomewhat thicker, being kneaded with Butter, and ſo with Butter and Honny they vſe to eate it. They ſeeth likewiſe the feete of Beaſts, like to our Neates feete or Trotters; & theſe are commonly ſold to poor men, that labour in the grounds, who make their morning breake-faſt of them, and afterward goe to their worke. Next vnto theſe, ſtand the Sellers of Oyle, Butter, ſalt and freſh, Hony, Cheeſe, old and new, Oliues, Capers, Lemons, Skirrets, and Pottatoes, their Shoppes being furniſhed with China Diſhes, making a farre greater ſhew then ſubſtance. They ſell their Pots and Veſſels of Butter and Oyle, in the ſame manner as we ſell goods at an Out-cry, to them that will giue moſt, and they that cry theſe things, are certain Porters thereto purpoſely appointed, who meaſure forth the Oyle, when any great quantity thereof is ſold together. The pots and Veſſels do containe (ſeuerally) an hundred pound weight, and there the Kine-keepers doe ſtand bound, to ſee that this meaſure be duely performed, and as they are ſtill emptied, to bee filled againe, and ſold in the Cittie.

Neere vnto this place, is the Shambles or Butcherie, and there are about fortie ſhoppes of them, faire and large, as any of the other profeſsions, where they cut orth meate, and ſell it by waight of the Ballaunce. They vſe not to kill anie beaſt in the Shambles, but in apt appointed ſlaughter houſes by the Riuer ſide, where they flay off the hides, and then cauſe them to be brought by Porters into the Market, from the ſlaughter houſe, but firſt they are preſented before the Capo de Conſoli; who hauing ſeene and examined the goodneſſe thereof, he deliuereth the ſeller a Ticket in Writing, at what price he ſhall ſell the fleſh: and this Ticket is faſtened by the Butcher to the meate, that euerie one may publickly ſee and read it. Beſide the Butcherie, is another Market place, where wollen cloath (made in the Countrey) is ſold, and containe about an hundred ſhoppes. If any man bring Cloath to be ſolde, hee muſt deliuer it to a Crier, who carries it on his ſhoulders; and ſo goeth on from ſhop to ſhoppe, crying the price thereof, and of theſe Criers, ther are threeſcore in number. The cry beginneth after mid-day; continuing till darke night, and the Cryer is payed two Baiocs in the Ducate; but the Merchants trading in theſe affayres, haue verie great dealings. Next theſe, ſtand the Polliſhers and Cleanſers of Armors and Weapons, as Swordes, Daggers, Partezans, and ſuch like; whereof theſe are ſome that both cleanſe and ſell them. Then are the Fiſhermen or Fiſhmongers, who Fiſh in the Cities Riuers, both within and without; ſelling manie good

* A ſmall cut Paſtimeate, vſed in Italie to make pottage withal.

The Hearbe-market.

The Smoake-market.

Their maner of roaſting meat.

Fried Fleſh, & fried Fiſh.

Oyle, Butter, Salt and other comodities, ſolde as by Out-cry.

The Butchery or Shambles.

The Woollen Cloth Market, and Cryers of Cloth.

Armourers.

Fiſhermen, or Fiſh-mongers good and great Fishes at very easy price, at three Quatrines the pound. They vse to take great store of one kinde of Fish, which in Rome is called * Laccia, & they begin to Fish for them at the entrance of October, and so hold on to Aprill.

* The Chub, or Cheuin.

Next, are the Makers of Cages, Pens, or Coopes, for Powltrey and Fowles, which commonly they make of Canes, and consist of about fortie shoppes. For euery Cittizen doth keepe a great manie to fatten; and (to auoyd noysomnes) they suffer them not to goe at libertie in their houses, but onely keepe them immured in these Cages.

Basket and Cadgemakers

A little further are the Sope-sellers, who sell verie licquid Sope, hauing all their Shoppes together, because they stand seperated by the street. This Sope is not made in the Cittie; but in the neighboring Hillie Countrey, and among the Mountainers, whence the Muleters doo bring it, and sell it to the owners of these Shoppes. Then are the Sellers of Flower and Meale, but there are not many shops of them in this Market, because they are elsewhere placed in the Milles-streete.

Sope-sellers.

Meale-sellers

Next, the sellers of all kind of graine, both for seede, and other-wise; with great store of attending Porters, that carry it thence to mens houses on Horses and Mules, according as it is measured out by the appointed measure, in three sackes vpon a Beasts backe, lying one aloft on the other, & men are especially commaunded to haue care of the measuring and measures. Next is the Market-place, where Linnen and woollen yarne is sold, and the same dressed in such manner as it ought to be. This Market consisteth of a goodly House, with foure seuerall Shops or abidings about it. In one of which sit the weauing Merchants, with certaine inferior Ministers or Officers, which weigh the yarne. In two other sit Women, that haue spunne, and come to sell the saide Yarne, and there is no small number of them. Their Market beginneth at noone, and lasteth till euening, making sale in great plenty. Diuers vse to go see this Market place, because it is found planted with Mulberry-trees, which giue a comely shade to the Market women sitting vnder them; and they assemble there together in such crowdes, that hardly is any passage by them, and falling (many times) from scolding to fighting, are much shame to themselues, and such as behold them.

Corne-sellers

Linnen and Woollen Yarne.

Weauing Merchants.

Mulbery Trees.

Now returning to the West part, towards the Temple from the Gate, as we goe to Mecuasce, beyond the smoke market in the direct way: are they that make Buckets of Leather, vsed for casuall fires, and drawing Water out of Welles, of which Trade there are some foureteene Shoppes. There are also the makers of Hutches and receipts for Meale and Corn, being about thirtie Shops in number. Next whom are Coblers and menders of old Shoes, purposely prepared for poore & meane people; of which there are aboue an hundred and fifty Shoppes.

Bucket-makers.

Coblers.

Then are the Target and Shield-makers of Leather, according to the Affricane manner, and as wee see in some places of Europe. By them are the Landerers, which are diuers men of base condition, keeping there sundry Shops, with Tubs and Water ready in them. Such as keepe no Maide-Seruants in their Houses, bring their Linnen to be washed by these men Landerers, which they also perform very diligently, hanging them afterward on lines to be dried, as they doe in Italy, appearing so pure and neatly washed, as no Women could expresse more cleanely labour. Many other Markers and Trades there are beside, which beeing of meane and silly importance; I forbeare to speake of them, and will now proceede to the Merchants Market, or place of resort.

Target-makers.

Launderers that are men.

6 This Market place is after the manner of a little Cittie, with a Wall built about it, containing in circuit twelue Gates or entrances: And each one of these Gates is ouer-thwarted with a Chaine, so that no Horses, or other Beasts can enter in thereat. The Market-place is deuided into fifteene streetes or passages. Two of them belongeth to Shoe-makers, that make Shooes for Gentlemen, of which cost and comlinesse, none other may weare them, neyther Artificer, Souldier, nor Courtier. Other two doe appertaine to Silke-men, or Merchants of Silke: One part whereof doe sell faire Tassels and Furnitures for Horses, and haue about bout fifty Shoppes: The other do ſell dyed and coloured Silkes, to worke in Linnen, or any other thinges elſe, and haue (very neere) as many ſhoppes. By theſe, ſtand ſome that make Belts and Girdles for women of wooll; but they are vnſightly. Others alſo, that make the like of Silke, but of no better or handſomer faſhion: becauſe they make them in plaites or treſſes, as great as a mans two fingers, ſome of them beeing thought ſtrong enough to hold a Boat tied. Next to theſe are two other ſtreets, where ſtand the Merchants of Wollen Cloth, ſuch as come out of Europe, and all theſe Merchants are tearmed Granatini. There alſo ſtand they that ſell all kinde of Sattins, Veluets, and other Silkes, Hats, and Bonnets, and raw Silkes. A little further off, ſtand they that make al kind of Bedding Pillowes, Mattraſſes, and ſuch like neceſſary furniture. And by them is the place for Toules and Cuſtomes. For theſe cloths are likewiſe ſold by way of out-cry, and ſuch as take charge of them, doe bring them firſt to bee ſealed in the Toule-Houſe, and afterward walke crying them among the Merchants; there being alſo about ſixty Cryers, each man hauing paid him a Baioc for a cloth. Thē there is two other ſtreetes, wherein are the Taylors and Makers of Garments. By whom ſtand they that make diuers Bonnets of Cloath, to couer the head withal. And then are two other ſtreets, where the Linnen weauing Merchants haue their due place, ſelling Shirtes, Smocks, and all other wearing Linnen for men and women. Theſe are the richeſt Merchants in the Citty; becauſe they make quicker returne in their Negotiations, then al the reſt together do. There is another ſtreet, where they ſell all kind of Cloath-Garments, that are brought out of Europe, and euerie eueningan out-cry is made of theſe Garments, ſuch as are brought to the Cittizens to ſell, ſome old, ſome new, and for all vſes. Laſt of all, is a place, where all old Linnen is ſold, as Shirts, Sheets, Hand-towels, Wipers, and ſuch like: And hard by are little Shoppes, where they cry Carpets, and Coueringes for Beds.

The Market place of Merchants and Merchandise.

Shoe-makers for Gentlemen.

Silke-men.

Girdle-makers for women.

Granatini Merchants of wollen-cloath.

Mercers.

Vpholſters.

The Toule or Cuſtome-houſe.

Taylors.

Bonnet-makers.

Linnen-Merchants.

Broakers and Sellers of old Garments.

7 All theſe ſtreets are called together Caiſaria, an ancient word, and deriued of Cæſar, as meaning Cæſar, who was the greateſt Lord of thoſe times in all Europe.

Concerning the name of the ſtreetes, cald Caſaria, ſo named of Cæſar.

For all the Cities from the Riuer of Mauritania, were gouerned by the Romaines, and afterward by the Gothes: and in euery one of them was ſuch a Market-place, that bare the ſame name. The occaſion heereof, is thus rendred by the Hiſtorians of Affrica, who ſay, that the Miniſters and Officers of the Romaines and Gothes, were euery where intermingled in the Cities Store-houſes, and Ware-houſes, where the tribute accounts and collections wer kept together, which many times happened to be ſpoyled by the people. Hereupon an Emperour was aduiſed, to make a place like vnto a little Cittie, where all the Merchants of beſt reputation might aſſemble together, to make ſale of their Wares; And likewiſe the Officers of the Treaſury, to ſtore vp ſuch tributes and taxations, as ſhould bee gathered. Wel aſſuring himſelfe, that if the Cittizens would preſerue and defend their owne goods, it was conuenient for them to doe the like to thoſe of the Empire. For they could neuer conſent to any ſpoile, but it returned alſo to their owne dammage. As many times hath beene obſerued in Italy, when Souldiours (in particular fauour to ſome faction) haue entred into a citty, & ſpoyling the contrary part: when the enemies faculties haue not proued ſufficient, they ranſacked alſo the houſes of their friends.

The reaſon of this generall Markets building.

Spoile in any Citty maketh no reſpect.

8 Neere vnto this little faſhioned Cittie, on the North-ſide thereof, are the Apothecaries, who haue a ſtraite goodly ſtreete, wherein is about an hundred and fifty Shops. This ſtreete is ſhut in at eyther end with two faire Gates, no leſſe ſtrong then large: and theſe Apothecaries doe keepe diuers Watch-men at their owne charge, that walke about in the night time, with Lanthornes, Dogges, and Weapons, to preuent all inconueniences that might enſue.

Of Apothecaries, & other Artes.

Here are ſold all matters of Spicery, or belonging to Phiſicke: but they doe not make any Sirups, Conſerues, or

All matters of Spicery.

Electuaries, becauſe the Phiſitions do ſee theſe offices performed in their own Houſes, and afterward ſend them to their owne Shoppes, keeping Seruants for the purpoſe, who doe ſee the receipts diſtributed, according to the Phiſitions direction. And the moſt part of theſe Shoppes are ſo conioyned together, with them belonging to the Apothecaries: that the Common people know not the Phiſitions from the other. Theſe Apothecaries haue their Shops high, large, and fairely adorned, with beautifull roofes and rich furniſhments. In all the World is not a ſtreete of Apothecaries like vnto this. True it is, that in Tauris, a Citty of Perſia, there is a goodly Marketplace of the ſame Arts-men: but the Shoppes haue darke entrances, yet curiouſly builded, and the Porches mounted on Pillets of Marble. But theſe of Fez are much more commended, for their benefit of aire and light; thoſe of Tauris being too obſcure. A little remote from this ſtreet, are many other Trades, whereof, becauſe I haue elſe-where ſufficiently ſpoken; I may be fauoured to paſſe them ouer.

Phiſitions & Apothecaries haue ſhops together.

The Apothecaries of Tauris.

9 The Citty toward the Eaſt, is ciuile, ſtored with goodly Pallaces, Temples, and Colledges: but (indeede) it is not ſo copious and abounding in Artes and Trades, as the other part is; becauſe there are neither Merchants, Taylors, nor Hoſiers, but of courſe and homely Cloth. There is a little Market-place of Apothecaries, wherein are no more then thirty Shops. Toward the Cittie Wall, are the Furnace men, Makers of Bricke, painted Tyles and Diſhes. And hard by them, is a great Market-place, where they ſell all kinde of Veſſels for vſe, but no Glaſſes; as Pots, Diſhes, Pans, Treyes, &c. Then is the Market of the Garners, where they keepe all their Corne: And another ſtands right againſt the great Temple, hauing all the floore paued with painted Tyles, with diuers Shoppes of Arts about it. There are alſo, fiue hundred and twenty Houſes of Cloth-Weauers, which houſes are made like vnto great Pallaces, conſiſting of many roomes, with many fair Haules, in each of which are great ſtore of Weauers: and the owners of theſe Houſes do not handle any working Inſtrument, but onely the Worke-Maiſters, who pay both the wages and rent of euery houſe. And this is the greateſt of all the Artes in the Citty; for it conſiſts of aboue twenty thouſand Men, and as many more are daily exerciſed in the Milles. There are likewiſe an hundred and fifty houſes of Whiteſters of Yarne, all which Houſes are builded (for the moſt part) by the Riuers ſide, and well furniſhed with pannes and Cauldrons, for boyling the Yarne, and other neceſſarie occaſions. In the Citty are ſundry great Houſes, wherein they ſaw and cleaue Wood into diuers formes: which labour is performed by certaine Chriſtian Bond-ſlaues, and of the Money they earne, their Patrones find them their maintenance. They are admitted no time of reſt, but onely the halfe of Friday, from noone to the euening; and ſome eyght other dayes at ſeuerall ſeaſons in the yeare, at which times are the Feaſtes of the Moores. There are publique Brothels or Stewes, where Strumpets are attendant at poore price: wherein they are fauored eyther by the * Bargello, or Gouernor of the Citty. There are alſo diuers men, who (without offence to the Court) do exerciſe the office of Bawds or Pandares, keeping Wine and Women in their houſes, making benefit by their lewdneſſe, and ſuch as reſort thither, doe it ſecurelie. There are ſixe hundred heads or Springs of Water, naturall Welles, hemd in with walles, and lockt with cloſe Doores; becauſe ſome are deuided into many parts, and runne along vnder-ground, paſſing by Channels to Houſes, Temples, Colledges, and Innes. This Water is in much more eſtimation, then that of the Riuer: becauſe it ſometime faileth, eſpecially in Summer.

Weauers the greateſt trade in the Cittie.

Chriſtian Bondſlaues that cleaue and ſaw wood

* A Captaine of Sergeants.

Sixe hundred well-ſprings in the Cittie.

The ſecond part of the Citty.

What Trades are in this part of the Citty.

Hereto is added, that when they wold make cleane the Kennels, the courſe of the Riuer runneth without the Cittie, which makes euerie one the more gladly to vſe this other ſweete Water. And though Gentlemen (in Summer time) haue of this Riuer Water in their Houſes; yet will they haue ſtore of the Springes Water, as being more freſh and ſweete, but in Winter they doe otherwiſe. Theſe Springes are (for the moſt moſt part) on the Weſt and South ſides of the Cittie, becauſe the part anſwering North-ward, is all Mountainie, being called Teuertino, and there are very great and deepe places, wherein they keepe much Corne for many yeares, ſome capable to containe two hundred quarters. And the Inhabitants in thoſe places, who are common vulgar men, doe liue on the profit they make by the rentage of them; which is a quarter vpon euery hundred, at the beginning of the yeare.

Spring water better then the Riuer.

Stores for Corne.

Gardens on the Cities ſouth-ſide.

On the South-ſide, which is halfe inhabitable, are many Gardens, ſtored with good and delicate Fruites; as Lemmons, Citrones, Mellons, and very fragrant Flowres; among which are the Geſſemine, Damaske-Roſe, and Wall-floure, brought thyther out of Europe, and much eſteemed of by the Moores. In which Gardens alſo, are diuers beautifull Lodgings, Fountains, and proſpects, round engirt with Geſſemines, Roſes, and other ſweete floures. In the Spring-time, whoſoeuer walketh neere thoſe Gardens, ſhall ſmell a rare, delicate, and moſt pleaſing odour; & they are no leſſe anſwerable, in contenting the eye with their beauty and ſplendour. So that, to ſpeake vprightly, no one of theſe Gardens but it doth appeare like an earthly Paradiſe; and this is the reaſon, that Gentlemen (poſſeſſors of them) doe dwell in them, from the beginning of Aprill, vntill the ending of September. On the weſt ſide, is the Rock-Fort, or Caſtle, which was builded in the time of the K. of Lontuna, and (in greatneſſe) may equall an indifferent Citty. This was the ſeat (in elder times) of the Gouernors and Lordes of Fez, that is to ſay; before it was a roiall Citty: And afterward, when new Fez was builded by the Kings of the Houſe of Marino, this Caſtle was left as a dwelling for the Gouernor only. In this Caſtle is a goodly temple, built in the time when it was much inhabited, and thoſe faire Pallaces which then were there, are now quite ruinated, and Gardens made where they ſtood. Onely one remaineth, wherein the Gouernor dwelleth, and certaine other Houſes for his Family. There are alſo many other places, where the Gouernor vſeth to giue audience to offenders, and affoord them

Gardens compared to earthly Paradiſes.

The Caſtell Rocke, built by the King of Lontuna.

The Gouernors Pallace in the Rocke-Caſtle.

Iuſtice. There is likewiſe a Priſon made in the likeneſſe of a dungeon, yet ſuſtained with many pillers; which priſon is ſo large, as it may well hold three thouſand perſons: for there is no ſeparation, or ſecret deuiſion of one from another; becauſe they vſe not to keepe any man cloſe Priſoner in Fez.

The Gouernors Priſon.

10. In the Citty there are none but meane Officers and Magiſtrates, who haue the charge of adminiſtrating Iuſtice. The Gouernor is ſupreame, both in cauſes ciuile and criminall. There is a Iudge, who is appointed for Cannonical cauſes, that is; the Lawes contained in the Bookes of Mahomet. Another Iudge alſo, who is Lieutenant to the other, and he attendeth cauſes of Matrimony and repudiation; to examine witneſſes, and vniuerſally to render Iuſtice. Next is the Aduocate, with whom they vſe to conſult on the lawes, and to whō they make their appeale from the Iudges; either when they deceiue them, or giue ſentence by authority of ſome leſſe excellent Doctor. The Gouernour enioyeth a great deale of Money, by condemnations made at diuers times: And the whole weight of Iuſtice, giuen to a guilty offender; is to be depriued of the Gouernors preſence, and beaten with an 100. or 200. ſtripes. The Hang-man taketh the fruſtrated perſon, & putting a Chaine about his necke, leadeth him thorow the Citty, ſtarke naked, onely the partes of ſhame reſerued, which is couered with a breech purpoſely made. The Bargello goeth along with them, & the Hang-man publiſheth all the way, the fact wherein hee hath offended: which beeing done, he putteth on his Garments againe, and then is returned backe to Priſon, but ſometimes, many are led in this manner together.

Of Magiſtrates, and their manner of gouernment in adminiſtration of Iuſtice, and cuſtommarie habites.

Of puniſhing ſome criminall perſons.

The Gouernour hath of euery guiltie priſoner, a ducate & a quarter, or fourth part, and of euery one committed to priſon, he hath a taxation, which is ſeuerally paid vnto him, by Merchants & Artificers, deputed onely to that office. But among all other benefits, he hath a Mount which yeildeth him ſeuen thouſand ducates of yearely rent. True it is, that he ſtandeth bound to find the King three hundred Men and Horſes, in the time of Warres, and (ſo long as they endure) to be their Pay-maiſter. The

The Gouernours fees of Priſoners.

Iudges in Cannonicall causes.

Iudges for Cannonicall matters, haue neither wages or reward; becauſe it is forbidden in the Law of Mahomet, that any payment whatſoeuer ſhould bee made to a Iudge, for ſuch an Office. Therefore they liue vpon other wages; as on their readings, or by being a Prieſt in ſome Temple. In like manner, the Aduocates and Procuratours, are but ſimple and vulgar perſons. The Iudges haue a certaine place, wherein Debters are impriſoned, and others for light occaſions, or of ſmall moment. In the City are foure Bargelloes, and no more, who make their ſearches from the foure and twentith houre, vntill the ſecond houre of night: And they haue no wages neither, but a certaine tribute of them which they apprehend, by their retention, and for certaine ſmal puniſhments inflicted on them. But each of them may keep a Tauerne or Inne, and be a Bawd for Boyes or Strumpets. The Gouernour of the Cittie keepeth neyther Iudge or Notary to attend him; but deliuereth the ſentence from his owne mouth. There is but one man alſo, that hath chiefe charge in the Cuſtome or Toule-hoſe, who payeth thirty ducates daily to the Kings Chamber, and keepeth Guardians and Notaries at euery Gate, where all thinges (of ſmall price) pay their due at the Gate. But others of greater value, are (by the Guardians) conducted from the Gate to the Cuſtome-houſe, and Guardians & Notaries together, according to the quantity, haue certaine Stipends allowed them. Sometimes the Guardians do go forth of the Gates, to meete the Muleters, becauſe they ſhould not hide or conceale any thing: but if they finde any matter imbezeled, they pay double tribute for the offence, The ordinary payment, is two Ducates in the hundred: And of ſtone-fruit (wherof great plenty is daily brought thither) they pay the fourth part of the price; But for Wood, Corne, Cattle, and Poultry, they pay not any thing. Onely gueldeb beaſts are not payed for, but in the Butchery, two Baioes for euery ſuch Beaſt, and one to the Gouernour, who is the Capo di Conſoli. For he keepeth a Court, with twelue Sergeants there attending. And he rideth oftentimes about the citty, to approoue the weight of Bread, Fleſh, and other thinges that are ſold: And if he find not the eeuen weight, he cauſeth thē to be broken in many fragments, and giueth the Seller ſo many blowes in the necke with the Baſtone, that he leaueth him (in a manner) dead, and the more of ſuch thinges as he findeth too light, the more doth he breake, and publiſh their ſhame beſide thorow the Citty. This Office is granted by the King to ſuch Gentlemen as make ſuite for it: but in former times, it was onlie beſtowed on learned men, and of eſpeciall good fame; though now (by the Lordes meanes) priuate and ignorant perſons do ſooneſt enioy it.

Aduocates & Atturneyes.

Bargelloes Captaines of watch and ſearches.

The Gouernour giueth ſentence himſelfe.

Of the Cuſtome or Toule-houſe, and Officers thereto belonging.

Concerning tribute payments.

The Capo di Conſoli his Court, and his riding thorow the City.

The beſt ſort of Inhabitants in the Citty, and their Habites.

The Dwellers in the Cittie, to wit; the Noble and worthyer ſort, are truly ciuill, and cloathe themſelues in winter time, with garments of forraigne wollen Cloth. The manner of habite, is a long ſide Caſſock or Coat, worne ouer the Shirt, with halfe Sleeues, and verie ſtraite: ouer which hee weares a long Gowne, ſeamed or made faſt before, & a hood hanging behind. On his head he hath a plaine bonnet, like them worn in Italy in the night time, but without eares: whereon is twice folded about the head certaine fine knotted Cloath, and vnderneath his beard. He weares no hoſen, or halfe hoſen, but only breeches of cloth: winter time excepted, or when he rideth, and then he weareth Buskins. The popular ſort weare long skirted coates with hoods, without any ſuch gownes ouer them as is formerlie named: and thoſe kind of bonnets (ſimply) on their heads, of ſmall price or eſtimation. Doctours and Gentlemen of ſome yeares, doe weare certaine Garments with wide ſleeues, much like to the Gentlemen of Venice, who hold much more honorable office. In briefe, ſuch as are of meane and baſe condition, clothe themſelues in Garments of white Wollen Cloth, made in their owne Countrey, and Hoods alſo after the ſame manner.

The common ſort of people

The meaneſt ſort of all.

The habites of Women of all conditions

The Women goe very comely clothed, but in hot weather, they weare a long large linnen Garment onely, guirded about the midſt with ſome Girdle, rather rude and courſe, then otherwiſe. In Winter time, they weare certaine Gownes with large ſleeues, ſeamed down before as the mens are: but when they they walke abroad, they weare close breeches, which reach so largely, as they couer their whole legs. They also weare a veile or Cloth on their heades, which couers their whole body, after the manner of Soria: Their faces likewise is couered with a fine Cloath, so that nothing can be discerned but their eies. In their eares they haue earings of Gold, and very costly Iewels: but such as are not of the like condition, weare none but of Siluer, and without any Iewels. About their wrists, they weare Manilions or Bracelets of pure Gold, and on each arme, which Bracelets doe commonly weigh an hundred ducates. The ignoble and meaner women, haue their Bracelets of Siluer, and such also they weare about their Legs.

Veiles for womens faces

11. The Custome of dyet and feeding among the vulgar sort; is to eate fresh Flesh twice euery Weeke. But Gentlemen feede thereon euery daie, according to their appetite, and haue three meales a day. The first in the morning; is but as a light breake-fast, because it is of Bread or Fruite, and a kind of Broth or Pottage, made with Flower and Wheate, rather very thin, then otherwise. But in Winter, in stead of their Broth, they seeth therein powdred Flesh and Hearbs. At noone or mid-day, they feede on light meates also, as Bread, light-salted Flesh and Hearbes, Oliues, and Cheese: but in Summer time, this second meale is best. At night, their third meale is lightest of all, to wit; Bread & Mellons, or Egges, or Milke. In Winter, their best feeding is on boyld meats, with that kind of Pulse, which in Spaine is called Cuske, or Cuscusu, made in Paste like Coriander Seeds, and stewed in a bored vessel, like to a Strainer, to receiue fume from another boyling vessel, and being afterward well mingled with Butter, is serued in with the broth. They vse not to eate any roasted meate, and this is the feeding of the common people, as also of Artificers, and other poore Cittizens. But men of account, as aged Gentlemen, Merchants, & Courtiers; they liue in better sort, and fare more delicately.

Of their manner of Dyet and feeding.

Three meals a day, & how obserued.

The vulgar people, and meaneſt Cittizens.

The dyet of Europe & Fez compared together.

But in comparison of the dyet vsed in Europe among Gentlemen of respect, the Affricanes is truely miserable and vile: not in regard of the small quantity of foode, but the rude and disorderlie manner of their feeding. Which is on the ground, vpon a very low Table, without Table-Cloth, Napkin, or Linnen of any kinde, or vsing any thing, but the hand onelie: And when they eate the Cuske or Cuscusu, all the Guests are serued in one dish, and graip it with their fingers, without helpe of any spoone. And each man taketh which part of the meat himselfe pleaseth, tearing it from the rest without cutting, because they vse no kniues; and tearing it with their teeth, they hold the rest in their hands, eating and deuouring it very greedily. And no man drinketh, vntil he be well satisfied with eating; then each man drinketh a Mazzer of water, containing the quantity of a quart, and this is the common vse. It may be, that some Doctor liueth more moderatly: but to conclude, the meaneſt Gentleman of Italy, liueth more sumptuously then the greatest Lord of Affrica.

Their rude & grosse manner of feeding.

12 As concerning Matrimony, this is the manner obserued among them. Whē any man is willing to take a wife, so soone as the Brides Father (if shee haue any) hath made promise to him of his daughter: they inuite and assemble their friends together at the Church or Temple, taking two Notaries with them, who draw the Bargaine and conditions of the Dowry, the Husband and Wife beeing there present. The indifferenter sort of Cittizens, doe vse to giue them thirty Ducates in readie Mony, a Negro Seruant-Maid, of fifteen ducates price, a certaine piece of cloth, made of Silke and Linnen in diuers colours, Chekerwise, and other fine Cloathes of Silke, for her to weare on her head.

What manner of custome they obserue in their marriages.

The reasonabler sort of Cittizens gift.

It is their custome also, to present her with a paire of Shoes, fairely wrought, and two paire of Choppinoes, painted with Gold and Siluer, and diuers other small gifts; as Combs, Fans, Perfumes, &c. After that the writings are drawn, and that both the one side and other are contented; the Husband taketh all his company there present, to dine with him; and the Father to the Bride, doth the like to all his bidden guests.

What the Brides father may giue to his daughter beside custome.

If the said Father will adorne his Daughter with any Garments, he may doe it in respect of his owne Gentility: because, beside the Money giuen to the Husband, he standeth not bound to any other charges; although hee may iustly be taxed with shame, if he be not more bountifull. Now adaies, beside the thirtie Ducates giuen in help of the Dowry; the Father (or hee that vndertaketh the matter in like case) spendeth two or three hundred ducates in furnishing the Bride, as well in garments, as furniture for houshold, but giueth neither House, Vine-yard, nor possession.

The manner of furnishing the Bride.

The custome is, to make her 3. gownes of fine cloth, and three of Silke, eyther of Taffata, Sattin, or Damaske; many Smockes; many Sheets for bedding, listed with Silke on either side; Pillowes and Boulsters. She hath giuen her also eight Beds, foure to be laid vp in store, in conuenient Presses made for the purpose; two for present vse on the Bedsted, the Tikes whereof are grosse and strong, and two other made of leather, which are held as Ornaments to the Chamber. Three faire Couerlets, such as we tearme Quilts, but made of wollen-cloth, and lined with linnen: one of which is first laid vpon the bed, and then another of Silke ouer it, whereof also she hath three in number, with others made conuenient for Summer; beside hangings for the Wals, fairely fringed and buttond with Silke; And this is as an addition to the Dowry, but many times much more, whereby many Gentlemen haue sustained great impouerishing.

Furniture for the house.

The manner of bringing the Bride home to her husbands house.

When the husband bringeth home his new wife to his house, she is first placed in a Tabernacle of wood, made with eight gazings or windowes, all couered with cloth of Gold and Silke, and carried by eight Porters on their heads; being accompanied with her Father, Friends, Husband, Flutes, Trompets, and Drums, beside a great number of lighted Torches, and the Friends to the Husband march before with their Torches, and the Father with his Friendes following, passing on to the great market place, by the great Tempie. When they are come into the Market place, the Husband there saluteth the Father and Kinred of his new wife; but shee, without any further attending, goeth home to the house, ther expecting him in her Chamber. The Father, Brother, and Vnckle, goe with her so farre as the Chamber doore, and there present her to her Husbands Mother. So soone as she is entred into the Chamber, the husband sets his foot vpon his wiues foot, which being done, they are left there shut vp together: while they of the house prepare a banket, & one woman remaineth at the Chamber doore, vntil the Bridegroome hath had the honour of the Brides virginity, and the woman then going to her, receiueth a Cloath from her somewhat tinctured with blood, wherewith she goeth among all then present at the banquet, shewing it openly in her hand, expressing with a loud voyce, that the Bride was found to be a virgine. Herevpon, the Husbands Kinred giues her food to eate, and afterward, beeing accompanied with other weomen, she goes to the House of her husbands mother, where she is likewise honoured, and set downe to meat. But if it so happen, that the Husband findes not his wife to be a virgin; he returnes her backe to her Father and mother, and no one wil eat a iot of the banquet, but depart discontented, as a manifest signe of her shame.

The ceremony in the Bride-Chamber.

The Brides shame, being found no virgine.

They vse three seuerall Feasts or meetings; The first, is the same night when the Bride is brought home; the second, is the next night after, and then none but women are inuited. The third, is the seauenth night following, whereat the Brides Father, Mother, and Kinred, are al present. On that day, the father vseth to send no meane presents to the Husbands house, beside Comfits, and other banqueting stuffe, and it is seauen daies before the Husband goeth forth of his doores; in all which time of his not being seene abroad, a certaine quantity of Fishes is bought each day, and duelie brought him home to his house. Afterward, either the Mother, or some other woman (in her stead) doth cast those Fishes vpon the Brides feete; which they hold to be an exceeding good augurie, and beside it hath bin a custome of very ancient vse among them. Beside these fore-named Feasts, there are two other also in the Fathers House. The one is, the day before he sends his Daughter

The Brides three Banquets.

An augury & obserued Custome.

The Feasts in the fathers house.

ter to her husband, & then inuiting the other ſriendes, the whole night is ſpent in Feaſting and Dauncing. On the day following, the women come thither, that vſe to decke and adorne the Bride, there they trim her haire, rub her cheekes, and paint them red, as alſo her hands & feete blacke, with a certaine tincture that continueth but a while, and this day the ſecond Feaſt is performd. Then is the Bride placed vpon a caried Scaffold, to be publickly ſeen as ſhe paſſeth along; in which time, meate is prepared and deliuered to all them that adorned the Bride. And when the wife is come to the houſe, all her Husbands deareſt Friends, doo ſend thither certaine Diſhes of Bread fryed in Oyle, with others made of Honey, and diuers pieces of roaſted fleſh; and the Husband (hauing inuited manie of his Friends) deuideth theſe ſeuerall preſents among them.

Of decking the Bride.

The Bride carried to bee publickely ſeene.

In their Dancing, which continueth all the Night time, they haue both Muſitians and Singers, who conforming their voyces to the Inſtruments, do make their Muſicke verie pleaſing. No more daunceth then one alone; and when hee hath finiſhed his dance, he taketh a piece of money out of his mouth, and throwes it on the Table before the Singers. And if any friend will do honour to him that danceth, he performeth it on his knees; and then ſticking diuers pieces of money on his face, the Muſitians preſently take it off. Women alſo haue their Dauncing, but ſeperately aſide from the men, hauing likewiſe variety of Dauncers, Singers, and Muſitions, which order is eſpecially obſerued, when the bride commeth a Virgin vnto her Husband: but when ſhee commeth to a ſecond time of marriage, the ſolemnity conſiſteth of the leſſer reputation; and then they giue courſe Beefe in their feaſting, Mutton of the Ewe, and boyled Hennes. But when they mingle diuers kindes of pottage with their meate, they vſe to ſet twelue great diſh-ful before the gueſts, in a great round platter made of Wood, the Feaſt conſiſting of ten or twelue perſons; and this is obſerued among Gentlemen and Merchants. The meaner ſort of people, vſe a kinde of pottage, made with round molded Bread in it, like to the Laſangna, vſed in Italy in their Menestra; & therein is cut great ſlices of coorſe fleſh, al mingled together in a large woodden Platter, which they eate with their handes, vſing no Spoones, and ten perſons may feed at one of thoſe Diſhes.

The Order obſerued in their dancing among men,

The womans maner of dancing.

The dyet of Gentlemen & Merchants

They vſe alſo another kind of feaſting, at the circumciſing of their Male-Children, which is ſeauen dayes after the Childes Birth; whereto the Father calleth the Barber, and other inuited frends, on whom he beſtoweth a ſupper. Which being ended, euery one of the Gueſtes, giueth a guift to the Barber or Circumciſer: ſome a Ducate, ſome two, ſome halfe a Ducate, ſome more or leſſe, according to their ſeuerall ability. Theſe perticuler guifts of money, are laid each after other, vpon the Barbers childs face (if he haue any, or ſome other for him:) which Childe pronounceth euery giuers name, quantity of gift, and thanketh him for it, and then the Barber circumciſeth the child; which being done, they dance and feaſt in the fore-named manner. But if it bee a Daughter, leſſe ioy is declared.

Circumciſing their Children, and a feaſt therfore prepared.

13. There remaineth alſo in Fez, certaine Trackes or Imitations, of ſome Feaſts concerning the Chriſtians, wherein they vſed diuers words vnknown vnto themſelues. On Chriſtmas day at night, (commonly called Chriſts birth day) they vſe to eate a kind of Pottage, made of ſeuen ſundrie diuerſitie of Herbs, as Coleworts, Turnops, Carrets, and ſuch like; being dreſt and prepared with al kinds of round Pulſe, as Beanes, Peaſe, & wheat, which is eaten that night, inſted of a delicate confection.

The cuſtomary Order of their Feaſts, and maner of mourning for the dead.

The firſt day of the yeare, Children, masked with Vizards on their faces, vſe to go to Gentlemens Houſes, there to get variety of Fruits, ſinging diuers ſongs made fit for the purpoſe. Vpon the day, called S. Johns day, in euerie ſtreet, they make verie great fires of ſtraw. And as a Childe beginnes to haue his teeth grow, his Parents make a Feaſt for other Children, and they tearme this Feaſt Dentilla, which is a proper Latine word. They haue many other Cuſtomes and maners in receiuing their Auguries, which I haue ſeene obſerued in Rome, & in ſome other Cities of Italy.

The firſt day of the yeare.

On S Iohns day.

The feaſt called Dentilla.

A Ceremony alſo there is verie frequent amongſt women, when as eyther their Husbandes, Fathers, Mothers, or

A Cuſtome amongſt the women at the death of their Husbands, &c

Bre-

Brethren chance to dye, they then meet together, and despoyling them of their vsuall wearing Garments, do put on verie coorse sackcloath. They take the soile and filth from their pots and pans, and therewith do rub and be-smeare their faces. Then causing some base and rude men to come to them, cloathed in Womanish Garments, beating on square Drummes; to the sound thereof, they sing extemporall Lamentations, and mournefull Verses, made in the praise of Death.

Funerall Songs and Complaints.

At the end of euery Verse, the Women crie with loude voyces, beating their Faces and Breasts so violently, that blood yssueth forth in great abundance: they rent and teare their haire likewise, mourning and crying bitterly all the way they passe along, and this behauiour lasteth seuen dayes together. Afterward, hauing respited the space of forty daies, this time is no sooner finished, but they renewe againe their former complaininges, and so hold on, for the space of three dayes more.

This Custome is obserued amongst the Vulgar and common people: but they of better quality, do mourne more moderately, and without any such violent beating. Their friends vse to come and comfort them, and all their neerest Kindred, doo send them diuers kindes of foode to eate: because in the dead bodies house, so long as it remaineth there, they vse not to dresse any meate, nor doe the Women accompanie the dead bodie, although it be their Father or Brother.

No foode dresst in the dead mans house, while his body is there.

14. There are men in the Cittie, that take delight in keeping of Pigeons, whereof they haue store of such as are verie faire, and of diuers colours. They keepe them in certaine large Cages, on the top of their Houses, shaped after the manner of the Apothecaries shoppes: opening twice, euerie morning, and towardes the Euening, because they conceiue much pleasure in seeing them flye; and such as flye oftenest, and speedyest, are most esteemed.

Of Dooues or Pigeons, and their manner of keeping them.

And because many times it hapneth, that one mans Pigeons do mingle themselues among anothers; they quarrel and fall out, yea, and go together by the eares about them: yet to preuent this distemper, they keepe men on purpose, who stand on the top of the Cages, with nets fastened to the end of long Canes; and when their Maisters Pigeons would flye among the Neighbours, they take them in that Net. In the rowe where the Colliers stand, are seauen or eight Shoppes, where nothing else but only Pigeons are solde.

15. Amongst the more ciuill and Gentler sort of men, no other kinde of play or sport is vsed, but the Chesse onely, according to the ancient obseruation. They haue diuers other manner of Pastimes, but they are rude, and vsed by the vulgar people only. At certaine times of the yeare the young men gather togither, and they of one streete, doo fight against them of another, with Staues and Cudgels.

Their manner of Sportes & Pastimes.

The sporte of youth, proouing (many times) from iest to earnest

Sometime it chanceth, that eyther side do grow into such heat; as from iest they fall into earnest, yea, and kil one another, especially at the solemne Feastes, when the Assembly of these youthfull people is made out of the Citty. When they can no longer fight with Cudgels, they fall to hurling stones at each other, & will not giue ouer so long as day-light lasteth. Whereupon, when the Bargello is not able to part them; he seazeth on some of them, and commits them to prison, afterward punishing them thorough the Cittie.

In the night time also, some Wilde bloodes will yssue forth of the City, carrying Weapons with them, and run into the Gardens and Fields. But if they meete with as hot resisters (as many times they do) they fight verie fiercely and cruelly together, bearing alwaies deadly hatred to each other: but manie times, they meete with founde and seueare chastisement.

Dangerous sporte in the night time.

16. There are also many Poets, who compose Vulgar Verses of diuerse matters, but especially of loue; some describing their owne Loue, which they beare to Women, and other to Maids, many times setting downe the affected parties name, without vsing anie shame or respect. These Poets euerie yeare, on the Feast day of Mahomets Natiuitie, do write sundry Songs in praise thereof; and meeting together earely in the morning, in the Market place of the Capo di Consoli,

Poets in their vulgar tongue

The feast day of Mahomets birth.

Conſoli, they aſcend vp into his ſeat, wher euer y one (each after other) doth duelie rehearſe his ſong in preſence of the people. And he that is iudged to haue done beſt, and moſt elegantly declared his owne meaning, that man for the whole yeare enſuing, is called and accounted as Prince of al the other Poets.

A Prince of Poets.

But in the time of the famous Kinges of the houſe of Marinos, the King that then liued, vſed to inuite all the Learned men to his Pallace, yea, all the Iudicious wits in the Cittie, where making a banquet for all the worthieſt Poets, he would haue them to recite their Verſes ſeuerally (made in commendation of Mahomets Birth) in his owne royall preſence; but it was vppon an open Scaffold, and in the companie of many deepe vnderſtanding men, according to whoſe iudgement, the moſt commended perſon had giuen him by the King, an hundred Ducats, a horſe, a Woman-ſlaue, and all the Garments which the King at that time did weare. To all the reſt he gaue fiftie Ducates for each man, that no one might depart from him vnrewarded. But it is nowe about an hundred and thirtie yeares, ſince (with the declination of the Kingdome) this cuſtome ceaſed.

The bounty of a Heathen King to Poets

17. For Children to be enſtructed in Learning, there are about two hundered Schooles, each bearing the forme of a goodly great Hall, with ſeats or degrees round about, for Children to ſit on. The Maſter teacheth them to read and write, not in any Bookes, but in certaine great Tables. And the Leſſons read each day vnto them, are ſundry clauſes of the Alchoran, which beeing fully reade ouer in two or three yeares, and then beginning at the Originall againe, a child learneth verie readily, and containeth euery thing well in memory, proceeding ſo ſtil on for the ſpace of ſeauen yeates.

Schooles of learning for the inſtruction of Children.

No inſtruction in Bookes.

The Maiſter alſo teacheth them ſome fewe Rules of Orthographie, but both that kinde of erudition, and the Grammer, is ordinarily read in the Colledges, as likewiſe the other Sciences. Theſe Maiſters haue ſmall ſtipendarie Wages, but as Children do learne to certaine limited places in the Alchoran, their Fathers ſtand obliged to gratifie their Mayſters with ſome gift. And when the child hath learned the whole Alchoran, then his Father maketh a ſolemne Feaſt to all Schollers of that Schoole, whereat his Sonne is adorned with Garments like a Lords ſonne; and riding vpon a goodlie great Horſe, and of no meane Value, (which Horſe, as alſo the Garments, the Caſtillane of the Cittie Royall, ſtandeth bound to prouide him) al the other ſcholers, mounted likewiſe on horſebacke, do accompanie him home vnto his Fathers houſe; and as they enter in thereat, they ſing many Songs in the praiſe of GOD, and of the Prophet Mahomet. And then is the Feaſt made to the Schollers, and al his Fathers Friends; each of the vvhich Friends, do giue ſome guift to the Mayſter: and then, the Sonne putteth on his owne Cloaths againe, becauſe the other do appertaine to the Maiſter. And this is their yearly obſerued cuſtome.

The Schollers giue part of the poſt learner.

They vſed alſo, to make a Feaſte for theſe Schollers, on the birth day of Mahomet, and then the Father muſt ſend a Torch to the Schoole, whereby euerie Childe bringeth his owne Torch: ſome whereof, do waigh thirty pound waight, ſome more, and ſome leſſe, according to the perſons quality. Thoſe Torches are verie faire, well made, adorned and beautified round about, with diuers Frutages made of Wax, and theſe Torches doo burne from the breake of day, til the Sun be riſen; all which time, the Maſter bringeth in diuers Singers, that ſing the praiſes of Mahomet; and ſo ſoone as the Sun is riſen, the Feaſt is furniſhed. Theſe are the greateſt profits of the Mayſters, becauſe ſometime they ſell their Waxe for an hundered Ducates, and ſometime for more, according to the number of their Schollers. No man payeth anie Dutie for his Childes ſchooling, becauſe the Schooles were founded on Almes, which were left vnto them by diuers perſons. The Schollers, not only of theſe Schooles, but likewiſe of the Colledges, haue two dayes vacancie euerie weeke, and then they neither read, nor ſtudie.

The Schollers Feaſt on Mahomets birth day.

The Maiſters greateſt benefit by their wax Torches.

The Schoole-Maſter wages

18. There are a great number of Wizardes or Sooth-ſayers, which deuide themſelues into three kindes, or (as we may rather ſay) qualities. The firſt, are certaine men that Diuine and foretell things by the Art of Geomancy, making diuerſity of figures; and are paid for euerie one of them, according as the vſe of

Of Sooth-ſayers and Diuiners, or Foretellers of things to come.

Diuiners by the Art of Geomancie.

of them (for imployment) is needfully required. The second, are some others, who putting water into a Glasse Basen, and they letting fall a drop of Oyle into the saide water, which will appear bright and transparant, like a Glasse: they then tell the By-standers, that therein they do beholde Deuils, troope vpon troope, seeming like to an Armie of manie stoute Warriours, offering to plant down their Tents or Pauillions, euen as they march along the way; some on the water, and some on the Land. Then as the Wizzard pretendeth this confusion to be appeased, he demandeth of them that com for information, such matters as they seeke to be resolued in: whereof he then questioneth those Deuils in the Water, and they make him aunswere, by signes, noddes, becke of the hand, or winke of the eye. Beholde, what grosseneſse is in them, that will credite these fallations. Sometimes, hee will put the Basen into the hands of a Childe, of eight or nine yeares old, and aske of him if he doe not see such & such a Deuill, whereunto the simple Child answereth, that he doth see such shapes as he tels him.

Diuiners by a Bason of water.

Strange answeres of Deuils in a Bason of water.

This do many Fooles verie constantly beleeue, and spend much mony on such shameleſse deceiuers. The third sort, are women, who perswade the common people, that they holde amitie with Deuils of diuers kindes: and therefore, they tearm some to be red Deuils; others they say are white Deuils, and others they affirme to be blacke Deuils. When they would fortel vpon any ones request, they perfume themselues with certaine sweet Odours, and then they perswade the partie, that the Deuill which shee then calleth, doth instantly enter into hir person. Heereupon, suddenly she changeth her voice, faigning that it is the spirite which speaketh by her tongue. Then the Man or Woman that is come to bee resolved in somewhat by her, demaundeth what she pleaseth of the spirit, with great Reuerence and Humility: and receyuing answere, leaueth a good guift for that deuill, and so departeth, euen as wise as when she came thither.

Women Wizzards pretending great familiarity with Deuils.

But such men, as haue ioyned VViſedome with honesty, and wel experiented such matters, doo tearme this VVoman Soothsayer Sahacat, which aunswereth to the like Interpretatiõ, as Fricatrices doth in the Latine tõong. For indeed they haue a wicked Custome, in taking Carnall knowledge one of another; and therefore, cannot be expressed by an honester vocable.

Sahacat the Name of the woman Wizzard.

Moreouer, when among such VVomen as come to them, for information in things that they desire, they perceiue any one to be faire and beautiful, they becom enamored of her, euen as a young man of his affected Mistris. And then, in form of the Deuil, no other recompence is required of her, but amorous coniunction in familiar entertainment. The simple woman, beleeuing that she shal haue the pleasures of a Spirit, sometimes is drawn to consent; and many haue beene therewith so delighted, that they grewe desirous for to ioyne in society with them. Whereupon, counterfetting sickeneſse, one of these Wizards must needs be sent for, and (many times) the fooliſh Husband is made the Messenger.

Fleshly fruits of Diuination

She presently discouereth her desire to the Wizard, who afterward reuealeth it to her Husband; telling him, that a Deuill is entered into her bodie, and that if he be desirous of her helth, it is very conuenient, that he giue her Liberty to make one in the number of that Societie; and secretly to practise the Art among them. The Gull-Husbande beleeuing, giueth his consent; and (to expresse his greater folly) maketh a sumptuous Feast for the whole Order: wh ch being ended, they all fall to Dauncing, certaine Negroes playing on their Instruments, and so shee is referred to her fortune amongst them. But some Husbandes will driue the Deuill out of their Wiues, with the solemn sounde and blowes of a good Bastinado. And others, dissembling themselues to be possessed, do deceyue the Deceyuer, euen by such meanes as his wife was beguiled.

Of Women that desire to ioyne in society with these Wizards.

Fit Physicke for Fooliſh Women.

19 There is likewise another sort of Wizards, who are called Muhazzimin, that is, Enchanters. These are reputed to be verie powerfull, in deliuering mad-men, or such as are possessed with euill spirits: not for any other reason, but that sometimes their endeuor forteth to effect; but if it succeede not, they tearme the Deuill to be an Infidell, or else, that he is some Celestiall spirit.

Of Enchaunters or Coniurers. Muhazzimin.

The maner of his Coniuring, is thus; he

The maner of his Coniuration, & dealing with a party possessed.

he writeth certaine Carracters, and formeth Circles on a Chimney Hearth, or other like place; afterward, hee painteth some signes on the hand or foreheade of the partie possessed; and then sweeteneth himselfe with diuers perfumes. Thus the enchantment being made, he demandeth of the Spirit how he enterd into that bodie? By what part? What hee is? And how hee is named? At length, hee commaundeth him to depart. Some there are of another sort, that worke by a rule called Zairagia, that is, * Cabala. But they fetch not their operations from the Scripture, becaufe this Science of theirs is held to be naturall. And indeed, many of them know howe to giue infallible answeres, to matters that are demanded of them. But such a rule is very difficult, becaufe he that will preuaile therin, must needs bee no leffe a perfect Astrologer, then an Abbachift or Arithmatician. Sometimes, he maketh a Figure, which asketh so long time in making, as from Morning till night, in the Summer season; and it is in this forme.

* A hidden science of heauenly and Diuine misteries, professed by the Rabbies.

The order of making a Figure after their manner of Cabala.

He maketh many Circles one within another, & in the first he shapeth a crosse, at the Confines whereof, hee setteth downe the foure quarters, East, VVest, North, and South. VVithin the sayde Crosse, that is; where all his parts meet together, he formeth the two Poles; and without the first Circkle, hee frameth the foure Elements. Afterwardes, diuiding the said Circkle into foure parts, he deuideth the following Circkle into as manie more; and then euery part he deuideth into seauen parts, noting downe in euery one of them, certaine great Arabian Carracters, which are twenty eight, or twentie nine Carracters for each of the Elements. In another Circkle, hee shapeth the seauen Planets: In another, the xii. Signes: In another, the twelue Moneths of the yeare, according to the Latines: In another, the eight and twenty Tabernacles (or as we tearme them, Houses) of the Moon: In another, the three hundered, threescore and fiue daies of the year; and without all these, the foure principal windes. He taketh then one letter only, of the thing to bee demaunded; and then, multiplieth it with all the matters numbered, vntill he commeth to know what number the Carracter beareth. Afterward, he deuideth it in a certain manner, and then putteth it into some parts, according as the Carracter is; & in what Element it standeth, insomuch, that after the multiplication, diuision, and dimension, he perceiueth, that the Carracter agreeth with that number whereto it is aduanced Then respecteth he that found Carracter, according as hee did the first; and so traducing it on from degree to degree, it passeth the eight and twentie seuerall places, or Carracters. Thereof then hee composeth a sentence, and of that sentence a short Oration, which is the answere to the question demaunded, and that Oration euermore agreeth with one measured Verse, beeing the first of those Arabian Verses, which are called Ethauil, consisting of eight and twelue Sillables, answerable to the Arabian Metricall Art.

Arabian verses, tearmed Ethauil, wherin consisteth their chiefe Cabala.

In the said Verse then, is comprehended the fore-named Carracters, becaufe of them it is compounded, and from thence ariseth a true and vndoubted answer: for first, is discerned the matter demanded, and afterward the answer to the cause demanded. The like course as this neuer erreth: and in this Cabala of theirs, consisteth an admirable Art: for, neuer was seene a matter (held to bee naturall) that appeareth more super-naturall and Diuine, then this their Cabala.

One of these Figures was sometimes made, in the Colledge of King Abululan in the Cittie of Fez, and the open place where it was made, was paued with fine smooth white Marble, euery quadrant of the place, containing fiftie yardes in length, and two third parts of the place, was employed with such things as belonged to the framing of the saide Figure: three seuerall persons also were verie seriously busied in making it, each man hauing the charge of a proportioned part; and yet they could scarsely conclude it in a whole day. Another was likewise made in Thunis, by a verie excellent Mayster, whose father had commented on the said rule in two Volumes; and such as be acquainted with this rule, are held to be verie singuler men.

An apparant proofe of this kinde of Figures, by seueral Masters performed.

The twelue Months after the Latines.

20 There are also many Learned men, who are styled by the name of wise men, and morrall Phylosophers, who obserue some other Lawes then were commanded by Mahomet. Som of them are are accounted Catholicke, and others not; but the vulgar people repute them to be Saints, although they admit many things for lawful, which were prohibited by the Lawes of Mahomet. As by way of example: The Law forbiddeth, that no song whatsoeuer of Loue, shalbe sung by the rules of Musicke; and yet these men say, that they may do it.

Rules and directions in the Lawes of Mahomet.

There are Orders in this Lawe, and many Rules, euerie one of which, hath his chiefe defence, and Doctors also, to defend those Rules, exercising manie Workes, concerning spirituall life. This Sect began fourescore yeares after Mahomet; and the first and most famous Author thereof, was named Elhesembnu Abilhasen, in the Cittie of Bufra, who began to giue certain Rules to Schollers, but wrote downe none.

The first Author of this Sect.

An hundred years after being passed, there was another most woorthy man in like manner, called Elharit Ibna Eled, of the Cittie of Bagaded, who wrote a learned worke Vniuersally to all his disciples. But afterward, both by the Lawyers and Byshoppes, his opinion was depraued, & all such condemned as obserued those Rules.

Another Author of the same Sect.

About foure-score yeares after, this Sect beganne to spring vppe againe, and had another verie famous man, as defender thereof, who was followed by manie Disciples, and preached the same Doctrine publickely. So that all the Lawiers (assisted by the Byshoppes) condemned both him and all his followers vnto death, concluding, that each man of them should loose his head. Which when the chiefe Leader of this sect herd, immediately he wrote a Letter vnto the Byshops, entreating them to afford him so much fauour, as that hee might Dispute with the Lawyers: and if they could conuince him, hee would willinglie dye: but if he could giue demonstration, that his Doctrine was better then theirs, it was no honest case, that so many poore Innocents (by false Calumnie) shoulde perish.

A third Author of this Sect.

A request made for disputation with Mahomets Lawyers.

This request seemed to the Bishops to be lawfull and iust, and they graunted his request, so that the Learned man cam to Dispute with them; and preuailed with such successe, that hee vanquished all the Lawyers, and the chiefe Byshop (in teares) conuerted to bee one of the same Sect: and (while he liued) continually fauoured it, causing many Monasteries and Colledges to be builded, for the followers of that man. This Sect continued for another hundered yeares, vntill out of the greater Asia, came Malicsath the Emperor, whose stirpe and originall was of the Turkes. He persecuted this Sect, some of them flying to Cairo, some into Arabia, and they continued twenty yeares in this expulsion, which was till the raigne of Caselsah, Nephewe to Maliosach; whose chiefe Counsellour (that was a man of great spirite, named Nidam Elmule) being of this sect, did set it on foote againe, planting and combining it in such firme manner, that by the labours of a very learned man, called Elgazzuli (who composed a worthy work, deuided into seauen seuerall Bookes) the Lawyers and followers of this sect, were reconciled together. Whereupon, the Lawyers had the Title of Doctors, and Conseruers of the Prophets Lawes; and the other were nominated vnderstanders and Reformers of those Lawes. This Vnion continued, till the ouerthrowe of Bagaded by the Tartars, which was in the yeare, 656. of Ihegira. And as yet hath hapned no diuision, because all Affrica and Asia are full of those Disciples.

The expulsion and persecution of this Sect.

The re-enstalment of this Sect, and agreement with the Lawyers.

In those dayes, none might enter into this Sect, except learned men in euerie faculty; and (aboue al) deepe vnderstanders of the Scriptures; for the better defence of them, and confutation of the contrarie side. But now, within these hundred yeares, euery ignorant fellowe will enter thereinto affirming, that there is no neede of learning: because, after knowledge of the truth, the blessed Spirite is sufficient for them of cleane heart: This and other like weake reasons doo they alledge in their owne behalfe. So that leauing the commaundements as superfluous, yet necessarie to the rule in parte, these men intend no other Offices, but euen what the Lawyers do appoint, addicting themselues vnto all the pleasures, which are helde law full by the rule; and therfore, they make many Feastings, sing wanton amorous songs, & vse long dances. At certaine times, some of these men, tearing off their Garments, according to the proposed matter of the song, or answereable to the idle fantasie then hapning in their brain, wil say: that euen then

Who were admitted into this Sect in elder times.

Alteration of these latter dayes.

Feasts, wanton songs, and Dances.

then he is heated with the fire of Diuine loue. But I rather suppose him to bee warmed, with the superfluous plentie of meats, because euery one of these vnmanerly men, will deuoure so much meate, as is thought too much superfluitie for three men. Or which I rather thinke to bee more true, this heate proceedeth of intemperate desire, and lasciuious beastly loue to yong beardlesse Boyes. For, it is no rare matter, when a Gentleman inuiteth one of these chiefe Maisters to his wedding, bringing all his Schollers with him, they at the beginning of the Feast, do say Prayers, and sing diuine songs. But when all is finished, the elders putting off their gowns to dance, if any of them happen to fall, hee is quickly holpen on his feet by one of the yong Lads, who therefore is sequited with many lasciuious kisses. Heerupon grew a Prouerb, That the Hermits banket, is in euerie mans mouth in Fez. Signifying thereby, that the feast is no sooner ended, but euerie boy must serue as his Maisters bride; for, they may not take any Wiues, and therefore, they are termed Hermits.

The custome at a Gentlemans marriage.

A Prouerbe in Fez.

21 Among this Sect, are certain rules held to be hereticall, both by the one and other sort of Doctors, because they not only differ from eithers Lawes, but also from their faith. For some there be, that haue a firme opinion, that a man by his owne good workes, by fasting, and by abstinence, may purchase to himself an Angelical nature: because say they, they purify his heart and vnderstanding in such maner, as he cannot sin though he would, but it behoueth first, that he passe thorow fifty degrees of discipline. And albeit he should sinne, before he haue passed those fifty degrees, yet God will not ascribe it to him as sin. And these men (at the first) do keepe very strange, & seldom seene the like Fasts; but afterwardes, they fall to all pleasures in the World. They haue also a strict rule or order, made by an eloquent and Learned man, in foure Volumes, his name was Esseuerardi de Sebrauara, a City in Corasan. There was another Author named Ibnulfarid, who compiled al his doctrine in verie elegant verses: but those verses are ful of Allegories, seeming to intreate on nothing else but loue. Wherfore, one called Elfargani, Commented on the saide worke, and drew thence the rules and degrees which were to bee obserued.

Concerning Rules, Sects, and superstitious credulity in manie men.

A strange opinion of mans begetting an Angelicall Nature.

Esseuerardi de Sebrauara.

Ibnulfarid.

Elfargani.

This Poet was of such elegancie, as others (his followers of the same Sect) vsed to sing none but his Verses at their Feasts, so that for some 300. yeares since, not oong was held more polished and delicat, then that receiued from him.

An elegant Poet.

These men are of the minde, that the Spheares, the Firmament, the Elements, the Planets, and all the Starres, are one God, and that no Law or Faith can bee in error, because they imm agine all men to honor in their souls, that which deserueth to be adored. They beliene also, that the knowledge of God is contained in a man, named Elerob, elected and pertaking with God; and, as concerning knowledge, a meere God. There are likewise, forty other men besides these, who are termed Elauted, that is, Bougsis or branches, because they are of a lesser degree, and of more inferiour knowledge. But when the Elerob dieth, another is created out of these fortie men, and he commeth out of the number of seauenty other.

The strange opinion of some men.

Elerob, knowing as a God.

Elections out of diuers degrees.

There are likewise 755. other men, whose title I doo not verie well remember: but when one of these seauentie dyeth, another is added from these to fulfill their number. Their Law bindeth them, to walke vnknowne in the world, disguised like fooles, or publicke noted sinners, or of the vilest men that can be. Wherefore, vnder these or the like shaddowes, many wicked minded men wander thorough Affrica, starke naked, making publicke apparance of their owne shame, & are of such vnbrideled disposition, that euen without any respect at all, like vnto brute Beasts, in the midst of an open market place, they will deale carnallie with women; and yet notwithstanding, the Vulgar sort do repute them to be Saints. Of these base people, there are store in Thunis, but many more in Egypt, and especially in Cairo.

A counterfeit cloake for much wickednesse.

Horrible brutishnesse.

It happened on a time in Cairo, in the Market place, called Bain Elkasrain, one of these afore-named men, tooke a verie faire young Woman; that was newly come foorth of a Stoue or Bathe, and bringing her into the middest of the Market place, hee there hadde carnall knowledge of her. So soone as hee hadde lefte the Woman, all the Beholders came running to touch her Garments, as a matter of Deuotion, becauſe ſhe had beene touched by an holy man. And they ſaide among themſelues, that the holy man did but faigne the action of ſinne, and did not commit the deede. When the matter was made knowne to her husband, hee accounted it as a verie gracious fortune befalne him; and praying God for it, made a ſolemne Feaſt & Banquet, giuing Almes alſo for, ſo happie a bleſsing. The Iudges and learned men in the Lawes, ſought all means how to punnith the runnagate: but they were in danger to be ſlaine by the people, becauſe (as I haue formerly ſaide) ſuch villaines are held in eſpeciall veneration amongſt the common people, and they will beſtowe great guifts and preſents on them.

A true History of their vilenesse, vpon an open Market place in Cairo.

Of the Cabaliſtes, & ſome other Sects.

22 Certaine other rules, are obſerued among ſome, that tearme themſelus to be Cabaliſtes, who haue a ſtrange order of Faſting; not eating the Fleſh of anie creature: but haue certaine meates, and appointed Habites, ordained for euerie houre both of the day and Night. They haue alſo perticuler Praiers, according to the dayes and Moneths, deliuering thoſe Prayers, by the way of number; and wearing on their bodies certain Quadrets, painted with Carracters, and engrauen numbers. They vſe to ſay, that good ſpirits do appeare vnto them, and ſpeake with them, giuing them notiſe of all thinges vniuerſally done in the world. Of this ſort, there was an excellent Doctor, named El Boni, who compoſed their Rules & Prayers, as alſo their Quadrets.

Their maner of diet.

Their habite & Prayers.

Their apparitions.

El Boni, a famous Doctor

His moſt famous Workes are about eight in number, one whereof is named Ellumba Ennoramita, that is; The Demonſtration of Light, and therein is appointed their Prayers and Faſtes. Another is termed Semſul Meharif, that is, The Sun of Knowledge, wherein is contained the maner of making the Quadrets, and it declareth the benefit enſuing by them. A third, is entituled Sirru Laſme; Elchnſue, that is, The Vertue contained in the ninety nine names of God, &c.

Ellumba Ennoramita.

Semſul Meharif.

Sirru'Laſmes Elchnſue.

There is an Order in this Sect, which is called the Order of Sunach, that is; of certaine Eremites, who liue in Woodes and ſolitarie places, and feed on nothing but Hearbes, Rootes, and wilde fruites; no man beeing any way able to vnderſtand their liues, becauſe they flye and ſhunne all dwellings of men. But I ſhall wander too farre from my intended purpoſe, if I ſhould perticuletly followe the relation of all the Mahometane ſundrie Sects.

The order of Sunach, being Hermites in Woods.

Therefore, whoſoeuer is deſirous of further intelligence in this caſe, let him read the Workes of one who is named Elacſani, who defuſedly diſcourſeth on the diuerſitie of Sects, proceeding from the Religion of Mahomet, which are ſeuenty two eſpeciall ſects, and euerie one holdeth his owne to be good and true, as hoping thereby for ſaluation. But the truth is, in this preſent age, there are no more of theſe Sects to be found, but two. One is that of Leſhari, which extendeth it ſelfe thorow all Affrica, Egypt, Soria, Arabia, and all Turkey. The other of Imamia, which runneth through all Perſia, and ſome Cities of Coraſan. This held the Sophi King of Perſia, and by the like Sects was almoſt all Aſia deſtroyed, becauſe they held (before) that of Leſhari; yet the ſaide King fought by ſtrength of Armes oftentimes, to contayne himſelfe in his owne Religion: but moſt certaine it is, that one Sect onely, is embraced within all the Mahometane Dominions.

Elacſani, who declareth all the Mahometan Sects.

The two ſeuerall Sectes at this day remaining.

23 In Fez alſo, there are certaine men, who are called Elcaneſin, that attend only to finde out Treaſures, which they beleeue to haue beene buried in the Foundations of auncient ruines. This iddeot kinde of people, will go foorth of the Cittie, entering into many Caues & Grottes, ſeeking there to finde the forenamed Treaſures. For, they hold a verie ſtrong and true opinion, that when the Romaines were enforced from the Emperie of Affrica, and fled to the Spaniſh * Bætica, they were enforced to burie vnder grounde, many verie rich and precious things, which they could by no meanes beare away with them, but left them there enchanted; and therefore, other Enchanters muſt be had to find out thoſe treaſures. Nor is there any want of ſuch men, as will ſweare, that in ſuch Caues they haue ſeene Golde and other Iewels of Siluer: but they could not get them thence, becauſe they had not their enchantments readie, and their fitting perfumes.

Of Inueſtigators or ſearchers for hidden treaſures

* Now called Granado.

perfumes. Whereuppon, the people being led by this vain credulity, do make search in the grounde, ouer-throwing thereby (oftentimes) many goodly buildings and Tombes, wandering (at some times) ten or twelue dayes iourney from Fez, because the Riches was drawne by enchantment so farre off. Nay more, they haue Bookes, wherein mention is made of certaine hils, and other obscure places, wherein manie wonderfull Treasures lye hidden, and are there kept by especiall Oracles.

Greedines of gaine beguileth many ignorant people, and some beside, that thinke themselues wise.

24. Nor is there any want of Alchimists, but they abound in verie great number, that bestow their studie in this fooliſh vanity. And what are they? None but lowtish filthie Fellowes, that soil and pollute the world (more then any other) with sulphurous, noysome, and offensiue smelles. In the night time, manie of them, doo ordinarily meete together in the great Temple, and there dispute on their false imaginations. For they haue many Bookes of that Art, composed by eloquent men: the first & cheefest whereof is intitled Geber, who liued an hundered yeares after Mahomet, and was reputed to bee a Greeke Renegado, whose workes, and all his receipts are Written in Allegories. They haue another Author, who hath written another great labour, called Attogrebi, that was Secretary to the Soldane of Bagaded. Likewise another Volume, composed in Songes, reuealing all the Articles of that Art, and the Maister was named Mugaribi, said to be of Granado. And it was Commented on by a Mamaluke of Damasco, who was a verie learned man in the Arte; but his Comment is more difficult to be vnderstood, then the Text it selfe. These Alchimists are of two kinds, the one laboureth in search of the Elixer, which is the materiall substance, that toucheth euerie Mettall and Vaine: and the other seeketh after the multiplication of the quantities of Mettalles, by meanes of commixing one with another. But both their proper ends, is oftnest found to be falsifying monies, as may be noted in the most parts of Fez, without handling.

Of Alchimists and what maner of men they are.

Geber a Greek Alchimist.

Attogrebi another Author.

Mugaribi, of Granado.

Two sortes of Alchimists.

25 In this great Citie, there is also as great store of that vnprofitable rascality, which in Italy are known by the name of cozening Beggers and Mountebanks. These men go vp and downe the Market place, singing Romants, fabulous Songs, and such like follies, playing on Timbrils Viols, Harps, and other Instruments, selling to the ignorant multitude, certaine Mottoes, and briefe words, which (they say) are much auaileable against diuers euils. With these are ioyned another sort of vile men, who are all of a familie and Kindred, and they walke thorow the Cittie, making Apes and Monkies to dance; and they haue liue Snakes and Adders Writhed about their naked neckes and armes. They can also make some figures of Geomancy, & pretend to fortell what shall happen to women. They lead goodly Stallions along with them, and for a certain price, will cause their Mares to be couered, that are thereto disposed, with promise of successefull speeding.

Of cozening beggerly Montebanks, and dissembling Conuerters.

Cozeners with liuing Snakes and Adders about their neckes.

Heer could I pursu other perticularities, of like base minded men in the Citty, but it shall suffice to say; that (for the most part) they are displeasing and badly affected to straungers, albeit there is no great number of strangers, because the Citie is aboue an hundred miles distant from the Sea; and from the Sea thither, the waies are sharpe, and vneasie for trauailing strangers. I could say also, that the Seigniores are very proud, insomuch as fewe haue dealing with them. The like are the Doctors and Iudges, who (for reputations sake) will conuerse but with very few. Neuertheless, my conclusion is, that the Cittie is faire, commodious, and well ordered. Only in winter time, the streets are very dirty, so that men can hardlie passe along, but with certaine hie Choppinoes which they weare; yet much auoidance is made by the Channelles; for (by them) many streets are wassed clean. But where there are no channels, the filthe is gathered vp, and conueyed thence vpon Beasts backes, and thrown into the riuer.

The Authors excuse from further progression in this kinde.

26 Without the City, on the west side, there is a Town or Burrough, which maketh about fiue hundred fires: but all the houses are verie rude, and inhabited by vile people, such as are the Drawers of Cammelles, the Carriers of Water, and Wood-cleauers for the Kinges prouision. Yet is this Towne furnished with many shoppes, and all kindes of Artificers. There dwel likewise the cozening Townes and Burroughes out of the City, & of what housholdes they consist.

Beggers, the players on Instrumentes of small esteeme; and great store of Strumpets, but they are brutish, base, and sluttish. In the chiefe street of this towne, are many Ditches or Trenches, made by working Tooles and Instrumentes, because they are hewed out of a hard rock, where the Corne (for the great Lordes) was wont to be kept, when none els dwelt there, but the Keepers of Corne. But after the warres began, and the Corne was violently carried thence, the Granaries were made in the new Cittie of Fez; and these which were without, vtterly abandoned. These Trenches are of wonderfull greatnes; for, the verie least of them will containe a thousande quarters of Corn, and there are an hundred and fifty of those Trenches, which now are layde wide open, and many people (vnawares) haue falne into them: wherefore, certain little wals haue since beene made about them.

The chiefe street of the Towne, containing Garners for corn.

When secret executions are done, how they bestowe the dead bodies.

The Castellane of Fez, when it happeneth, that he performeth any secret execution, the offenders bodies are throwne into these Trenches, for there is a priuie doore out of the Rocke, made answereable and fitting for these places. In this Towne, all cozenages at Dice are lawfully permitted; and heere euerie man selleth Wine, keepeth a Tauerne, and publicke vse of Whoores: whereby it is iustly saide, that this Towne is the receite for all the filth in the Citty. After the twentith houre is past, not one man is to be found in any of the shops, for then euerie one falleth to dauncing, sporting, drabbing, and drinking.

A Towne of Leapers only were relieued & maintained

There is another Burrough belonging to the Cittie, wherein diseased Leapers only are dwelling, containing about 200 houses. These sickly people, haue their Priour or chiefe Gouernor, who gathereth the reuennues of many possessions, giuen only for Gods sake, by Gentlemen and others; and they are attended on in such good maner, as they find no want of any needful thing. This Priour hath the charge to see the City free from any such infected person: and if so be, that he find any one so diseased, to take himselfe presently out of the Citty, and bring him to this place appointed for the purpose. If any one happen to die there without heires, the one half of his estate is deliuered to the community of the Town; and the other belongeth to him that can shew best right for it. But if the leprous partie haue Children, his goodes are his Childrens.

The Office of the Priour, concerning his charge.

It is further to be noted, that in the number of these diseased Leapers, such also are included, as haue any white scabs or scurfe on their bodies, and other incureable infirmities. A little further from this Towne, there is another, wherein dwell none but Muleters, Potters, Bricklayers, & Carpenters, and this Towne maketh aboue 150. fires. Again, further yet westward is another great Towne, which can make about 400. fires: but they are very simple houses, and inhabited by poore wretched people, that either cannot, or will not abide in any better place. Neere to this Towne, is a great champain field, which extendeth it selfe from this Town to the Riuer, about two miles in length, and three in full bredth Westward. In this field, is a Market held euerie Thursday, and great store of people resort thether with all kinde of Cattell. The Shoppe-Keepers also, dooth carrie thither their commodities, and make sale of them there in open Tents. They haue a custome, that some few Gentlemen being gathered togither, they cause a Butcher to kill a Sheepe; and diuiding the body among themselues, they giue him nothing but the head and feete for his labour, for his skin they sell to the Wooll Merchant. Litle tol is paid for the goods sold in this Market; and yet I must tel ye, that neither in Affrica, Asia, nor in Italy, are so many people seen at a market, as at this, and such store of prouision, which surely is an vnvalewable matter.

A Towne of Muleters, Potters, &c.

A great town of 400 households.

A Custom on the Market day.

Without the Cittie, are verie steepe Clifts or Rockes, which do engirt a large Trench of two Miles long: and on these Cliftes, they hew out the stones, wherewith they make their Lime and Chalke, whereby manie Gentlemen growe Rich, but none that are of any Nobilitie. Againe, on the West part without the Cittie, are some hundered Cottages, erected on the Riuers side; which are kept by such as vse to White cloaths, and then spread them abroad in a faire field, neere to these Cottages, where they haue euery thing fit and apt for the purpose, euen as wee see vsed in any other Nation elsewhere.

Rockes and Clifts without the Cittie.

Whitsters of cloath.

27 There

Of Common Graues and buriall without the Citie.

27 There are diuers Fields about the Cittie, wherein they burie their dead bodies; and these fields were giuen (for Gods sake) by sundry Gentlemen, onely for common buriall. They lay a Stone made Triangle-wise, but long and faire, vpon each graue. But on men of more woorth and reputation, they place at his head a Table of Marble, and another at his feete, whereon Verses are engrauen of consolation after so harde and bitter a passage.

Somewhat lower, is his name sette downe, his house of descent, & likewise, the day and yeare of his death. Among these Verses, some are apt to cause ioy and comfort in death; but others, do rather encrease griefe and Melancholy, yet patience must be vsed both in the one & other.

Of the kings burial & Sepulchre.

28 Without the Cittie likewise, is a faire Pallace towards the North, vpon an high hill, wherein manie Sepulchres are to bee seene, of diuers Kinges of the house of Marmo, beeing adorned with goodly Ornaments stones of Marble, & Epitaphes verie ingeniously deuised; so that the cost and colours, do (in a maner) fill the Beholders eyes with much admired pleasure.

Of Gardens and Orchards

29 On the North side also, & Eastward and Southward, are many goodlie Gardens and Orchardes, stored with all kind of Fruits, growing on Trees, great and high. By the Gardens entrance, do diuers Armes of Riuers run along: but by the thicke growing of the Trees, the Orchards appeare to be goodly woodes. The month of May doth water them very plentifully, which is the chiefe cause of the fruits abounding, and alsoe of perfect goodnesse, except Peaches, which haue not any pleasing rellish. And is imagined, that in due season of the yeare, 100. horse-loads of these fruits are sold dailie: and all those horse-loads of Fruite, are brought to one certaine place in the City, where they pay a limited taxation, and are there sold by out-cry, in presence of the Fruiterers. In the same market place also, are sold the Negro Bondslaues, and an appointed tax paide for euerie one of them. Moreouer towards the West, is a large plot of ground, containing xv. mile in bredth, and 30. in length, which is all full of Springes and little Brooks, belonging to the great Temple. This place, is rented by the Gardiners; and there they sow Line, Mellons, Pompions, Citrons, Carrets, Nanons, Reddishes, Coleworts Cabbages, and such like Garden fruits in great plenty: so that it is verily supposed, that this place yeeldeth in Summer time, fifteene thousande horse-loades of these fruits, and as many in Winter. But verie true it is that the Ayre there is verie bad, and the most part of the inhabitants haue their faces of a yellow colour, being continually subiect to Feauers, and verie many do die of them.

The Gardens and Orchardes yeilde great plentie of fruits.

The sale of Negro Bondslaues.

Of the Newe Citty of Fez, and the scituation thereof, as also the description of the Riuers current.

30 The New City of Fez, is round enguirte with two verie faire, high, and strong wals, being built on a verie goodly plaine, neere to the Riuer, distant from the olde Citty (on the West part, and somewhat leaning toward the South) the space of a mile. Betweene the two wals, entereth and passeth the Riuer along, to wit, on the North side, where the Milles are; and the other current of the Riuer, is diuided into two streams: one running betweene new Fez and the olde, on the rocke side; and the other glideth on further, by certain Vallies & Gardens neere to old Fez, vntil it getteth entrance thereinto on the South side. The other part of the riuer, enters at the Rocke, and passeth by the Colledge of King Abutximam. This Citie was builded by Iacob, Son to Abduich, first King of the house of Marino, who wonne the Kingdome of Marocco, and displaced the king, as such time as he was in warre with the King of Marocco, the King of Telensio, did very much molleste him, being leagued with the king of Marocco; because the house of Marino should not encrease.

Who was the first Founder of New Fez, and vppon what occasion

So soone as Iacob had ended the war of Marocco, he bethought himselfe to be reuenged on the King of Telensin, and purposed warre against him, as being couetous of his Dominion, yet wel perceiuing, that the strongest Forts of the kingdome, were farre off distant from Telensin it selfe; whereon he concluded, to erect the Cittie in this place, and to translate thither the royall seate of Marocco, which he accordingly performd, naming the Cittie Bianca, but the vulgar people afterward called it new Fez.

New Fez named Bianca by the Founder.

The King caused the City to be diuided

The diuision of the City in to three parts into three parts, euerie one seperat from the other. In one part, he appointed his owne Pallace-Royall, and other Pallaces for his Children and Brethren, commanding each one to haue their Gardens of pleasure; and neere to his owne Pallace, he builded a verie goodly Temple, beautified in meruailous stately manner.

The first part

The 2. part.

In the second part of the Cittie, were erected faire great Stables, for the Horsses belonging to his Royall person, and many sumptuous Pallaces for his Captains, and men of greatest esteeme in his court. From the Gate on the West side, to the gate that looketh Eastward, was appointed and made the market place of the Cittie, containing in length, little lesse then a mile and a halfe, and there are the shops for Merchants, and Handi-crafts men of all sorts.

The Market place of the City.

Neer to the West gate, by the second wall, is a verie goodly lodging, with many other thereto belonging, where the Custos of the Cittie, with his Soldiers & Officers, do make their abiding. And neere thereto, is two other great Muzes or Stables, well able to containe aboue three hundred Horsses, deputed only for seruice and guard of the Pallace.

The Custos of the City.

The third part of the Cittie, was assigned for dwellings to the Guard of the Kings roiall person, who were certaine stout men of the East, armed with long Bowes, because the vse of Crosse-browes, was not (as then) knowne in those parts.

The 3. part.

Now, at this present, are many goodly temples in the fore-named Market place, and very stately Stoues or Baths, made with great cost and charge.

Temples in the Market-place, and stoues.

And neere to the Kings Pallace, is a place where the Money is coined, which is named the Zecca, which is made in forme of a quadrant Market place, with certaine Lodgings round about it, and those are the houses of the Maisters. In the middest thereof, is another faire dwelling, which is the house of the Lord of the Mint, where hee and his Notarie daily sit together; because the saide Mint (as in all other Countreyes) is an Office belonging to the King, and for his benefit.

The Mint for Coyning money.

Neere vnto the Mint, is another Market place, wher are the Goldsmiths shops, with their Consull, and he that keeps the Seale and stampe of the Monyes. In Fez they may not make any Ring, or anie other work of gold or Siluer, til the mettall be first sealed or stamped, on paine of great losse to the seller: but being sealed, an appointed price is paide, and then it may be vsed, as they do their mony.

The place of the Golde-Smiths.

A Seale or stamp apointed for Gold and Siluer.

The greater number of the Goldsmithes, are Iewes, who worke al their labour in new Fez, and then bring it to sell in olde Fez, at a Market place assigned to them; next to the Apothecaries, because in old Fez, no Gold or Siluer may bee hammered; neither may any Mahometan vse the Art of a Goldsmith, because they terme it vsurie, to sell things made of Golde or Siluer, for anie greater valu then the waight only; but the Lords giue Libertie to the Iewes to do it, because they are accounted Vsurers.

Concerning the Iewes in Fez.

There are verie few, that make any worke for the Cittizens onely, neither haue they any other recompence then for the making. And that part of the Cittie, where (in elder times) the Guard of Archers dwelt, is now allotted to the Iewes onely, because the Modern Kings haue not kept such Guards, but such as haue first dwelt in the old Cittie, and at all such times as a King died, they were expulsed by the Moores. And it was a great trouble to the King Abusabib, to translate the Iewes from the old City to the new, imposing a Tribute vpon them: and nowe there they remaine, in a verie long and large Market place, where they haue their Shoppes, Houses, and Synagogues.

The Iewes dwelling place assigned by it self.

And they are increased to such a number, as verie hardly can they bee counted, especially since the Iewes were expelled by the King of Spaine. They are contemned of all men, and none of them may weare any Shooes; but they vse certaine Pantofles, made of Sea-Bulrushes, and on their heads they haue blacke Tolibants; and they that will weare Hats or Caps, must haue a piece of red cloth fastened thereon, to bee publickely noted from other men. Their tribute is to pay the King of Fez foure hundred Ducates euery month.

The great number of the Iewes, & how they are despised generally.

In briefe, this City was within the space of an hundred and forty years, furnished with strong Walles, Pallaces, Temples, Colledges, & al those Ornaments which a City can haue: and I am of the minde, that the cost was greater, bestowed on those ornaments, then on the wals which do engirt it.

The time of the Cities compleating.

VVithout the Citty, are manie great wheels made, to mount the water out of the Wheeles for conuayance of water into the Cittie.

the Riuer, conuaying it vpon the Citty wal, where certain Channel gutters are made, which carry it to the Pallaces, Temples, and Gardens. And these Wheeles haue been made in our time, to wit, within an hundred yeares: because before, the Water came into the Cittie by Channels, that is, by Water-guides, which issued from a Spring or Fount, distant from the Citty the space of ten miles, which Channels were made vpon certaine Arches, very formall and artificiall. And it is said, that those conuayances were inuented by a skilfull man of Geneway, at such time as Merchants were much fauoured by the King. And the Wheeles were made by a Spanyard, which are (indeed) very admirable thinges; especially, because in such a power of Water, they turne no more but foure and twenty times both by day and night. I should adde to this discourse, that not many Noble men dwell in this Cittie, or such as are allied to Lords, or Courtyers, because all the rest are meane people, and imployed in base offices. For men of reputation and quality, thinke scorne of admission to any Court offices: beside, they hold it a disgrace vnto them, to match their Daughters with any that are of the Kings house.

Who deuised the water Channels.

Who inuented the wheeles.

Men that refuse Offices in Court.

The order of the K. of Fez his Court.

31. Among all the Lords of Affrica, it is not found, that any was created King or Prince, by election of the people, or called from any Prouince or City. By the Law of Mahomet, there was not any Temporall Lord, that could tearme himselfe ligitimate, except the chiefe Priests or Bishops. But after that this authority consisted in the Byshops onely; all the heads or commanders of the people, which liued in the deserts, began to approch to inhabited Countries, and (by force of Armes) instituted diuers Lordes against the Law of Mahomet, and likewise against the Bishops prerogatiues. As it happened in the West, that the Turks, Curdes, and Tartares, with others comming from those parts, got dominion of what Lands they could attaine vnto. Also in the East raigned the people of Zeneta, and they likewise of Lontuna; afterward the Praditatores, and after them, the family of Marino ruled there. True it is, that the men of Lontuna, came in ayde and fauour of the westerne people, to deliuer them from the handes of Heretiques: and heerein the Lordes were Friendes to the people, vntill they began to grow to tyranny, as apparantlie hath beene noted. Vpon which occasion, no Lordes are now made by true inheritance, nor by election of the people, or by the greatest, or by some Captaine: but euery Prince, before hee dyeth, leagueth and bindeth the greater and most potent men of his Court, to create (as Prince) after his death, either his Sonne, or Brother of the said Son. Wherein many times an Oath is giuen them, or else (as it hath often hapned) they would elect for their Lord whom themselues pleased. In this manner haue they vsed to create the Kinges of Fez, & so soone as the King is publikely named; he maketh one of his noblest persons his chiefest Counseller, assigning him a third part of his Kingdomes Reuennues. Then doth he elect a Secretary, who serueth for Secretary, Treasurer, and chiefe Steward of his House. Afterward, hee createth the Captaines of his Cauallerie, who are deputed to the Kingdoms custody, and therefore are most times ready with their Horses in the field. Then, for euery Citty is a Gouernour established, who enioyeth the benefits of the Citty vnder Obligation; to keep such a number of Horses at his owne charge, ready for the Kinges commaund; that is, so often as he shall neede to leuy an Armie.

The order of Princes creation at this present in Fez.

After publike nomination of the King, the Creation of new Officers.

The Law of Mahomet against temporall Lordes.

Forcible dominion, both in the East and West.

Next, certain Comissaries are made, and Agents ouer the people that dwell in the Mountaines, and likewise ouer the Arabes that are his Subiects. The Comissaries doe administer Iustice, according to the diuersitie of Lawes appointed for the people. The Agents stand charged, to gather the Reuenues, and keepe diligent account of ordinary payments, as also such as are not ordinary. Then are certaine Barrons appointed, who are learned in their language, Custodes: euery one of them hath a Castle, or else one or two Villages, from whence they derive certaine allowances for liuelode, and to maintaine their quality and condition, in accompanying the King with his Armies.

Arabes Subiects to the King of Fez.

Comissaries and Agents, and their seuerall offices.

Also

Allowance for keeping Light-horſes.

Alſo, they kee pe light Horſes, whoſe charges they beare when they are in Fielde: but in times of peace, Corne, Butter, and powdred fleſh is allowed them all the yeare, but very little Money; and they take charge of the Horſes abroad, no leſſe then in the Cittie, becauſe the King furniſheth them with all things. And all the Seruants of the Stable are Chriſtian Slaues, who doe weare great Iron Chaines at their feet: but when the Army goeth abroad, the ſaid Chriſtians doe ride on Camels of burden

Chriſtian ſlaues, Seruants of the Stable.

The Commiſſary for the Camels.

There is another Commiſſary ouer the Camels, who giueth entertainment to the Shepheards, and other Hards, & diſpenſeth with them for the fieldes, being a Prouider alſo for a number of Camels, only for imployment in the kings buſineſſe, and euery Cameller keepeth two Camels in ordinary, for the Kings carriages onely, and according as commaund is giuen. Then there is a Steward, who hath charge to furniſh, prouide, keepe and lay forth Monies, for prouiding the Kinges dyet, and for the Army, and he keepeth tenne or twelue great Pauillions, wherein he diſpoſeth the Victuals, ſtill changing and rechanging the burdened Camels; to the end, the Army may ſuffer no want, and vnder his controule are the Officers of the Kitchin. Then there is a Maiſter of the Stable, who hath care of all the Horſes, Mules, and Camels, belonging to the King; and he prouideth all thinges neceſſary for them, and for the familie vnder his charge, laying out whatſoeuer is therein thought expedient. He hath alſo vnder him a Commiſſarie for the Corn or Graine, conuaying the Oates, Barlye, and other prouiſion for the Beaſtes, from place to place: and this Commiſſarie hath Chancellours and Clearkes, who doe ſet downe all the Corne which is ſpent, and yeildeth an account thereof to the Maiſter of the Houſhold.

The Steward for the Kings prouiſion.

Officers of the Kitchin.

Maiſter of the Horſe.

The Comiſſary for Corne, and his vnder Officers.

There is likewiſe a Captaine of fiftie Horſe, who (after the manner of Curſors) doe ride to lay impoſitions, on behalfe of the Secretary to the King, and in the Kinges name. And there is another much more honorable Captaine, who is chiefe of the ſecret Guard, and hath authoritie (in the Kings name) ouer the Officers that doe executions, and for confiſcations in caſes of Iuſtice. Hee may apprehend the greateſt perſons, commit them to priſon, and vſe ſeueritie of Iuſtice on them, when hee is commaunded by the King. The King hath alſo neere him a faithfull Chancellour, in whoſe keeping is the Kinges Seale; and he writeth the Letters that paſſe the Kings hand, ſealing them with the ſame Seale.

A Captain of fifty Horſe.

Captaine of the Guard.

The Lord Chancellour.

Of Lackeyes and Footmen there are a great number, who haue a Captaine ouer them, that entertaineth, diſchargeth and deuideth among them their moſt and leaſt Wages, according as he iudgeth of their ſufficiency. And when the King graunteth audience, the ſaide Captaine is alwaies preſent, and exerciſeth the Office (as it were) of a cheefe Chamberlaine. There is alſo a Captaine of the carriages, whoſe Office is, to the conuay Tents and Pauillions fro place to place, wherein the Kings light Horſe-men are lodged: but the Kinges Pauillions are carried on Mules, & thoſe of the Souldiors on Camels. There is a company of Enſigne-bearers, that carry the Streamers and Standards on the waies: but one of them goeth alwayes before the Army, bearing a verie high pointed Standard. And all theſe Enſigne-bearers are guides, knowing the waies and paſſages ouer Riuers, woods, and Deſerts, keeping a great companie of Drummers, that play vpon Drums made of Copper, like vnto great Kettles, broad aboue, and narrow beneath, being couered aboue with Skinnes, and they carrie them on Horſe-backe, with certaine counterpoizes directly againſt the Drummes, becauſe their weight is heauie. Theſe Horſes are of the beſt, and ſwifteſt of pace that can be gotten: for it is held as a very great ſhame, when any drum is loſt. And thoſe drummes ſound ſo ſtrongly, and with ſuch a loud noiſe: that they may bee heard (a long while) a great way off, making the horſes and men to tremble, and they play vpon them with Buls Pizzels.

Captaine of the Lackeyes.

Captaine of the carriages.

Enſigne-bearers, & drums of Copper, carried on horſe-backe.

Great ſhame to looſe a Drum in war.

The Trumpets are not kept at the Kings charge, but they of the Citty are bound to keepe a certaine number of them, at their owne coſt: and they attend vpon the Kings table, as alſo when he goeth to battaile. There is a Maiſter

The trumpets

Maister of the Ceremonies, and his office

ster of the Ceremonies, who when the King calleth his Counsell, or admitteth audience; alwaies standeth at the Beds feet, ordering their places, and causing them to speake each after other, according to their degree and dignity. The Kings Family or Houshold, are (for the most part) Negro-slaues, and of them also are the Chamber-Maides and Women: Neuertheless, he hath his Wife alwaies white. Hee hath also diuers Christian slaues, and they are Spaniards or Portugals; And all the Weomen are vnder the Guard of Eunuches, who are all Negro-slaues.

The Kinges Houshold Negro slaues, and his Wife.

The Kinges dominion and reuenues.

This King (in truth) hath a great dominion, but smal reuenues, which hardly doe amount to the value of three hundred thousand Ducates. And the fift part thereof also commeth not to his hands, because the residue is assigned, as we haue formerly declared: and the one halfe of those Reuenues, is in Graine, Cattle, Oyle, & Butter, comming in by diuers wayes. Some places doe pay for so much Land, as can be Ploughed in a day by a paire of Oxen, a Ducate and a quarter. Others pay for euery Chimney or Fire, as much. Other places there are, where for euery Man (from fifteene yeares vpward) is paide as much, and in other places, both for Men and Women. Nor is there any other oppression of Toule, but in the great Cittie onely.

The manner of payments.

Toule paid in the great City onaly.

Mahomets law against reuenues.

I may not conceale, that (by the law of Mahomet) Temporall Lordes might not hold any Reuenues or Rents, except the tribute appointed to them, which was: that euery person who had an hundred ducates in ready Mony, stood bound to pay the Lord (out of that summe) two ducates and a halfe yearly, so long as such a quantity lasted. And euery one, that gathered of his owne Land tenne quarters of Corne, was bound to deliuer the tenth part: And such rentages were yeilded into the Byshops hands, who, beside the Kings supplie, made storeof the ouer-plus to cõmon benefit, wherewith were relieued the poore sickely persons, Widdowes, and warre maintained against the Enemy. But from the time that the Byshops power failed, the Lords (as hath beene said) began to vse tyranny: and it did not suffice them to vsurpe on those Reuenues, spending them according to their owne appetites; but they annexed vnto them new tributes, so that, throw all Affrica, few Countrey people are found, that can allow themselues so much, as wil be sufficient for their food and rayment onely. And hence ensued it, that no learned man, or of honest conuersation, will haue familiaritie with temporall Lords, nor feede with them at one Table; much lesse accept any gift or present from them, because they account the faculties of those Lords, to be worse then robberie.

Concerning Lands, and releefe of the poore.

Tyranny and vsurpation in the Lords.

Contempt of the temporall Lords.

The K. of Fez, keepeth continually in pay, sixe thousand Horse, fiue hundred Crosse-bowes, and as many Shot, all on horse-backe, and ready in order at euery commaund: but in times of peace, they are kept a mile off from his person; that is, when the King is out of the field, for being in Fez, he careth not for any guard. If it happen, that Warre is to be made with the Arabes his enemies; then those sixe thousand Horse are not sufficient, but he calleth such Arabes as are his Subiects to his ayde, of whom a great number are leuyed at their own charge, and they (indeede) are more practised in warre, then the sixe thousand belonging to the King. The pomp and Ceremonies of this King is verie small, and not many are willingly done vnto him: but at Feastes, or in some publike shewes; of necessity then they must be affoorded, as in this manner. When the King will ride abroad, first of all, the Maister of the Ceremonies maketh it knowne to all the Cursores in the Kinges Name; then they giue intelligence thereof to the Kings Kinred, to the Captaines, Custodes, and to the other Cauallery, who meete all together in the Marker-place, which is before his Pallace, comming thither by al the neerest waies. And as the King issueth foorth of the Pallace, the Cursores doe deuide all the Horse-men in order.

The Kinges continuall preparation for warre.

Of war with the Arabes.

The pompe & ceremonies of the King.

When the K. rideth abroad the order of euery degree in their seuerall places.

First do the Ensignes lead the way; next the Drummes; then the Maister of the Stable, with all his Officers and Familiars; then the Steward with his Attendants; then the Custodes; after them comes the Maister of the Ceremonies; then the Kings Secretarie, the Treasurer, the Iudge, and the Captaine of

The King and his attendants of the Army. In the next place rideth the King, with his chiefe great Counsellour, and with some other Princes: certaine Officers riding directly before the Kings person; one bearing a sword; another a Shield; another carrying the Kings Crosse-bow; with all the Footmen and Lackyes round about them. One of them beareth the Kinges Partizane; another the Couering for the Saddle, and Head-stall for the Horsse. When the King alighteth on foot, the Saddle is couered with the couerture, and the Head-stall put ouer the Bridle, to hold the Horsse by. Another Footeman carrieth the kings Pantofles, which are wrought with great cost and curiosity. After the King rideth the Captaine of the Foot-men; next the Eunuches; and then the Kinges Houshold. Then follow the light Horsemen; and next them the Crosse-bowes and Caliuers.

The footmen and their office when the K. is alighteth

The habite which the King then weareth, is meane and honest, and such as know him not, will scarcely think he is a King: because his Foote-men are more proudly cloathed, in rich cloath, curiouslie embroidered. No King, or Mahometane Lord, weareth any crown or any thing that may resemble it; because the Law of Mahomet doth forbid it. When the King remaineth in the Field, first the great Tabernacle of the King is planted in the midst, which is made like to the Walles of a Castle, with Turrets and Quadrants on each side, containing fifty yardes in length; and on the top of euery side, are little Towers, made of Cloth, with Spires, Piramides, and round balles on each Turret, which seeme to be of Golde. This Tabernacle hath foure Gates, at euery one whereof standeth the Guard of Eunuches, and in the middest thereof there is another Pauillion. The Chamber wherein the King sleepeth, is made in such manner, that it may be very easily taken vppe, and set downe againe as occasion serueth. About this Tabernacle, are the lodgings of the Officers, and such Courtiers as are most fauoured by the King: And round about them againe, are placed the Tents of the Custodes, which are made of Goats skinnes, like to them of the Arabes. Euen as it were in the midst, are the Buttry, Pantry, Seller, and Kitchin, belonging to the King, and they are all verie great Pauillions.

The Kings wearing garments.

The King weareth no Crowne.

The order of the Kings being in the field.

The Kinges resting chamber in the field.

The Custodes Tents.

Not far from them, are Tents wherein the Light-horsemen Souldiors haue their lodging, who doe all feede on the Kinges common dyning boord, but in very base manner. A little further off is the Stable, beeing certaine couered places, wherein the Horses are kept one by another. Without the circuit of these Lodgings, are the Muleters abydings for the Kings carriages, as also diuers Boothes of Butchers, Pedlers, and other retailers. Merchants & Artificers that follow the Fielde, are ranked by the Muleters. So that all the Lodgings about the Kings Pauillions, do appeare like a builded Citty; because the Custodes Tents serue in stead of Wals, which are made and planted one by another, that no man can enter into the saide Lodgings, except it bee by appointed waies. About the Kinges Tabernacle, is the watch kept al night; but the watch men are silly persons, no better then Armour-bearers. The like Guard is about the Stable of Horses; but by the simplicity of these Watch-men, not onely are the Kings Horses many times stolne: but also diuers enemies vnto the King haue entred, with purpose to kill the King. The King (almost all times of the yeare) is in the fielde; as well for safety of the Kingdome; as to preserue in peace and amity the Arabes his Subiects, wher they spend the time in hunting, or playing at the Chesse.

The Light-horsemens Tents.

The Stable.

The Muleters Tents.

Merchants & Artificers.

Watch about the Kings Tabernacle, and about the stable of horses.

The King in field well neere the whole yeare.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers Customes and manners of burying the dead; Of ancient Obsequies, and their Ceremonies. Who was the first Inuenter of them; And how the dead haue beene lamented for.

Numa Pompilius was the first Inuenter of Obsequies for the dead, and instituted a chiefe Byshop, who had the care and charge therof. The ancient ancient Romaines had two kindes of burying their dead. One was, to lay them in the ground, and couer them with earth. And the other was, to burne the body in a pile of Wood, which they tearmed * Rogus: but this manner of behauiour continued not long, and the first of the Senators that was burned, being dead, was Sylla. The order obserued therein, was thus: First marched the Torch-bearers, and after them all the Colledges of Priests. Then followed an Image of Waxe, made in true resemblance of the dead party; before which also went a man, who should counterfeit the deceased in countenance, called * Archimimus. The bodie was carried in a bed, with many Escutchions of Armes fastned thereon, before which went the sounders of Trumpets, if he were a man mature of years: but those of young daies, were carried with the sound of Flutes, and followed with Songs For Macrobius saith, those Auncients verily beleeued, that Soules being deliuered out of their bodily Prisons, returned to the original of Musical sweetnesse, that is to say, to Heauen. Some thinke, that it was so done, because the Soule is held by many, to bee harmonious, which Herophylus first of all credited. When they came to the place where the fire was prepared, the body was laid therin, and there burned, which done being in presence of the Parents, neerest kinred, allyes and friends to the dead party: they gathered vp the Ashes, which being put into Vrnes, or other vessels, was placed in some tomb, with other pots full of Wine & Milke, and fire in others, that burned for many yeares, it was so wonderfully composed. Then one of the neerest Kinred, pronounced a Funerall Oration in his praise, which being ended, the woman, who was hyred to lament and mourne for the dead, beeing called * Præfica, would cry with a loud voyce these last wordes, I, Licet; as if shee would haue said, Ire Licet, as much to say, as He must needes depart. Then the bones and ashes were put into a Sepulcher, before which (as Seruius saith) an Altar was readie furnished. All these Ceremonies being finished, the last Adieu was deliuered with a loud voyce, in this manner, Adieu, Adieu, Adieu; Wee must follow thee, according as the course of Nature shall permit vs.

Numa Pompilius first deuised Obsequies.

* The buryall Fire.

Cornel. Tacitus in lib. 3.

* The chiefe Actor.

The manner of carrying the body.

Macrobius.

Alexander Aphrodiseus (in his Problemes) giueth another reason.

Of burning the dead body.

* A Woman mourner, going before the Corps.

Vide L. Gregor. Girald. et Seruium.

And because heere a question may be made, to wit; how it should be possible, to select and know the Ashes of the body, from among them of the Wood and Faggots, all of them being burned together: I will set downe that which I haue read in the Geography of Raphaell Volaterranus. Hee saith, that the bodyes of great Lords were sowed vp in a Cloath, made of the Stone called * Amiantus, which neuer can be consumed in Fire, but onely that which is enclosed in it; and that Cloath was made in the Isle of Eubœa, now called Negropont, in the Towne Carystos, very neere to Chios. This custome of burning dead bodies, continued among the Romains, til the time of the Anthonine Emperours, when then they began againe to bury them in the earth.

Of knowing the Ashes of the body.

Raphael Volat. in Geog.

* Some say Salamanders haire.

The first Honour which they vsed to performe in the Obsequies of famous persons, was, to commend the partie by an Oration: And the first that made Funerall Oration, in praise of the dead, was Valerius Publicola, on the death of Brutus. The second Honour, was the play of the Gladiatores or Fencers: And Marcus and Decius, the Sonnes of Iunius Brutus, were the first that made shew thereof, in honour of their Father. The third honour, was to make a banquet of magnificent furnishment. The fourth, was a distribution of flesh to all the common people. They had likewise an order, that within some while after the Obsequies, they would strew diuers flowers and sweete odours vpon the Sepulcher: as the Romaine people did on Scipio. And such as could not be buried with the like, and so great pomp (for the expences were insupportable) were buried in the night time, by some which were thereto deputed, who were tearmed Vespillons, that carried the dead body to the graue, cloth din white, and he or shee that were neerest of Kinred, closed vp his eies.

The Honours done in the Obsequies of great men.

The first Honour.

The second Honour.

The third Honour.

The fourth Honour.

Another Custome.

Of buriall in the night time by the Vespillons.

No long time after the sicke person had surrendred vp his Soule, the Chamber was set wide open, and all of the Houshold were permitted to enter, as also the Neighbours, and three of them (with a loud voyce) called him by his name three times. Afterward, his body

Ouid in 6. de Fast.

After the soul was departed.

dy was washed with warme water, and this Office was done by certaine good Weomen, according as Euaius reporteth. The good Woman, that washed and annointed the bodie of Tarquine; the Heire gaue her the House, with some other rewards thereto designed: And ouer the doore of the house, were boughes of Cypres thickely placed. If the party deceased were a worthy man, and of authoritie; the Cittizens were inuited to his Obsequies, by one to whose trust the office was referred, and the Wife of the dead Man, with al the Women of his Kinne, went along with the Corpes in white Garments. Plato writeth, that the Funerall pompe in his Cittie, was in this manner. Such as were in white habites, neither shed any teares, or vsed any lamentations. Two Quires of Singers, the one of fifteene Boyes, and the other of as manie Maidens, continued about the Coffin, while the Priests (ioyning with them) sung all the praises of the dead person; and this lasted the whole day, in commendation of his felicity. On the morrow following, early in the mornig, the younger sort carryed him to his Graue, and chast men, that neuer had beene married, rode before on Horse-backe, and then came next, the band of footemen in their Armour. The young Lads followed, singing Hymnes in their paternall language. The Maides accompanied with aged Women, came after, and then he was ensepulturde, as we vnder-ground lay our dead in a vault.

But among other Nations, the custome of burying their dead was diuers. The Greekes also were burned after death, as Lucian witnesseth. The Noble-men among them, were neuer burned alone, as Homer recordeth in the Song at the Funerals of Patroclus; for with him were burned Oxen, Sheepe, Dogges, Horses, and twelue stout and valiant Sonnes of Noble Troyans. And Achilles would needs haue his haire burned, with the dead body of Patroclus. In Persia they neuer interred the bodies of the dead; except they had formely beene torne and dismembred by Dogs or Fowles.

The Massagetes and Derbices, people of Scythia, did account them to be most miserable, that died by any oppression of sickneſſe. For when their Fathers, Mothers, and Kinred, had passed the age of seauenty yeares; they would cut their throats, and deuiding their bodies in pieces and gobbits, did eate them among their Mutton, Goat, Veale, and other flesh: accounting it much more conuenient, thus to sustaine their owne bodies with their friends, then to suffer them to be deuoured of Wormes. Only the bodies of old women they would not touch, but abstaining from them; when they had first stifled them, then they butyed them. Which custome, most sauage, Tertullian in his Bookes against Marcion, attributeth to the Pontique people, saying: They serued their Tables at Feasts, with the Flesh of the bodies of their slaine Parents, eating them with other Beastes. Such as ended not their liues in this kind, their death was reputed most vnhappy vnto them.

Stobeus writeth, that they of Colchos neuer buried their dead, but hung their bodies vpon Trees, and this kind of Sepulture they teatmed Ayry. The Ægyptians, so soone as any one among them was dead; they would draw his braines forth at his Nosthrils with an Iron Instrument, filling the place againe with sweete perfumes. Then they made incision into his belly, with an Æthyopian Stone, called Laigne, and hauing taken out his bowels; filled the body againe with many sorts of sweete odours, beaten and compounded together. Then, for the space of seuenty daies together, they salted the body with Niter, and annointing it with Gumme, wrapped it in a Sheete. And the neereſt kinred to the partie dead, hauing made an hallow Image or Statue of Wood, according to his resemblance; therein they enclosed the dead body, and then buried it. The Scythians vsed to bury in the Graue with the dead body, such as were deareſt and neareſt to him. The Bactrians and Hyrcanians kept Dogges publiquely, and some priuately in their chiefest Cities; by which Dogges (each man according to his degree and faculty keeping them) they were after death torne and dismembred. For they held this kind of buriall to the best, and they called those Dogges by a vocable in their owne Language, to wit; Sepulchraux. Which cruell and inhumaine behauiour,

Of Tarquines washing.

Plat. in Lib. 12 de Legib.

The order of Funerall pompe in Plato's Citty of Athens.

Of carrying him to the Graue.

The manner of buriall in other nations

Of the Greeks

The Funerall of Patroclus.

Of the Persians.

Of the Massagetes and Derbices, who did eate their dead Fathers and Mothers.

Tertul. in lib. cont. Marcion.

Of the Colchians.

Of the Egyptians, and how they buried their dead.

Of the Scythians.

Of the Bactrians, and Hyrcanians.

Nicanor Lieutenant to great Alexander.

our, when Nicanor (Lieutenant to Alexander the Great, against the Bactrians) sought to reforme; hee lost almost the whole Kingdome. Saint Hierome saith, that the Hyrcanians were not only torne by Dogs after their death; but were also throwne halfe aliue to the Fowles of the ayre. As the Poet Lucretius singeth;

The Poet Lucretius.

Viua vident viuo sepeliri viscera busto.

Which is as much to say; That in a liuing Sepulcher, they saw their entrailes buried aliue. The * Essedones, Scythians of Asia, celebrated the Funerals of their Fathers and Mothers, with Songes of great ioy. & all the kinred being assembled; would teare their members in pieces with their teeth, mingling it in their banquet with the flesh of other beastes, as formerly we haue said of the Massagætes. And they vsed the skull of the head, called Cranos, in stead of a Cup or Mazzer to drinke in, it being round enchased with Gold: And this (saith Pliny) was accounted an especiall great Office of piety. The Thracians buried their dead laughing, and highly reioyced, because (as they said) That they departed were from euill, & arriued at beatitude. The Celtes, neighbors to the ocean (as Stobeus affirmeth) accounted it as a villainous shame to shunne the ruine of a Wal or House when it fell to the ground. And when any invndation of the Sea happened, they would run out armed, and withstand (so long as they could) the waters fury, euen til they were drowned in the deepe; least, by flight away, they should be reputed fearefull of death.

*Sauage people nere to Mæotis, and the Riphæan hils.

Solinus in Polibist. Cap. 25.

Plin. in lib. 9.

Pomp. Mela. in lib. 2. Cap. 1. Herodot. in Melpom. Stobeus de For. Ser. 7

The wise Brachmanes, a people of India, did wonderfully despise death, and (as Strabo reporteth) did greatly exercise themselues in contempt thereof. The history of Calanus the Philosopher, one of the Gymnosophists of India, is very notable, who when he was resolued to dye, threw himselfe voluntarily into a great fire. The like did Zarmanochegas the Indian, in Athens, vpon whose tomb was written these wordes following. ζαρμανοχήγας ἰνδὸς ἀπὸ βάργου κατὰ τὰ πάτρια ἑαυτὸν ἀπαθανατίσας. That is to say; Zarmanochegas, the Indian of Bargos, making himselfe immortall, according to the customes of the Countrey of India; lyeth heere. Numa Pompilius prohibited the Romaines, to vse any sorrow for deceased Infants, or vnder three yeares olde: and for such as had passed that time, he appointed so many moneths mourning, as they were yeares aged. Women vsed to mourne for their Husbands, ten months at the least: and if any one married againe, before the time of mourning were expired, shee was very greatly blamed and reproued. It was also a custome among weomen, when their Husbands were dead; to teare their haire, harme their faces, and beat their handes one against another, which sottishnesse is yet to this day obserued in Rome. For many times, I haue seen Matrones & Ladies of Rome, to teare the faire tresses of their Haire, and throw themselues on the dead bodies of their Husbands.

Strabo in lib. 4.

Vide Arrianus de Gest. Alexā.

Zarmanochegas his Epitaph. Plutarch in vit. Numa Pom.

How long women mourned for their husbands.

An idle custome yet obserued in Rome.

CHAP. III.

Whence the custome grew, of saying to such as sneeze; God saue ye, or Christ help ye. And for what reason, a man maketh the signe of the Crosse on his mouth, when he yawneth or gapeth.

THe yeare of our saluation, 619. in Italy happened a strong and very strange disease, that when men sneezed, they died suddenly. Which gaue admittance and entrance thence-forward, to a good and commendable custome: that when any were seene or heard to sneeze, euery one present, or neere, would say, GOD help ye, Christ blesse ye; and from that time hitherto, the custome hath not vnprofitably continued. Yawning and gaping, was likewise an occasion of as sudden death, without ability of bringing the iawes together againe. For remedy whereof, and to preuaile (so farre as men might) against this hurtfull inconuenience; whē any one yawned, he was aduised to vse the like good words inwardly, as God defend me, or Christ keep me, and (withall) to make the signe of the crosse on his mouth; and it pleased God that this sudden euill ceased. For which cause, it hath not bin thought discommendable, to keep the same fashion still in remembrance, and in all Christian Nations, the vse thereof is maintained. Yea, and so much the rather, because the signe of the Crosse is our first badge of Christianity, and we receiue it in Baptisme; to the end, that when further yeares shall enable vs, wee may not be ashamed to fight vnder that standard, being a reuerent signe and memoriall of our Redeemers passion, who would suffer on the Crosse, for the saluation of all his people. To which purpose, Tertullian saith, in his Booke of the Crowne of Warfare, as followeth. Tertullian lib. de Corona. Milit. Ad omnem progressum, atque promotum; Ad omnem aditum & exitum; Ad vestitum & calceatum; Ad lauacra; Ad mensas; Ad limina; Ad cubilia; Ad sedilia; quacunque nos conuersatio exercet, frontem signaculo terimus. That is. At euery steppe, and mooning; At euery entring, and departing; At apparrelling, and vncloathing; At washing; At the Table; At the doore Threshold; At bedding, sitting still, or what conuersation else soeuer is vsed; this signe on the forehead is not offensiue. Farre be superstition frō any Christian soule. Not that any superstitious opinion is conceiued thereof, or that the bare signe hath any power to defend, without the maine helpe of all, which is Gods gracious assistance: for wel we know, it is not the signe, but he that was thereon so cruelly handled.

A strange disease appearing in Italy, in the yeare 619.

Yawning and gaping caused people suddenly to dye.

The reason of making the signe of the Crosse.

CHAP. IIII.

¶ Concerning the Originall, of vsing these wordes: Ie vous baise les mains; I kisse your hands.

Pomponius Letus writeth, that the vse of kissing handes, did come from the ancient Emperors, who first of all gaue their handes to Noble-men, and then after came the kisse; but to meaner people, they gaue forth the knee to be kissed. And thence, as I am perswaded ensued this manner of speech; I kisse your hand, as declaring that so should the man be saluted, who is worthy of empire and soueraignetie. Else, it may be thought to be deriued from the Carthagenians, who meeting each other, vsed no salutations by wordes; but in signe of friendly amitie, closed with their right handes, and so each of them kissed the others hand. For two reasons, we say, I kisse your hand. I am of the minde, that wee doe not hold this Custome from so long a continuance; but my opinion is, that it rather proceeded from the homage of some Vassailes and Liedge men, that stood obliged to doe such seruice to their Lordes, Iustices, and Guides: for in many places, in stead of this homage, some stand bound to kisse the knee, in case of a new Recognisance. For some proofe hereof, I haue a Court-roule of rents appertaining to me, called De Luriac, made in the yeare 1352. which maketh Affidauit heereof, in euery one of the Tenants aunswers, where it is set downe in the words following. Pro quibus rebus, fundis & possessionibus ipse fecit homagium ligium dicto Domino de Luriaco, vt assuetum est genibus flexit, manus suas iunctas tenendo inter manus ipsius Domini, eiusque pollices osculando. That is: For, and in consideration of all which Landes, Goods, and Possessions; hee maketh himselfe a Liege Man in homage, to the said Lord of Luriac. So that, vsually, vpon his bended knees, and his hands ioyntly vpheld, between the hands of the said Lord, he kisse his Fingers.

The Authors coniecture of the originall of this courtesie.

Proofe by a president of his owne.

CHAP. V.

Of the deuision of the yeare, and diuersitie thereof among the Romaines. Who first found out the Houres, and made Clockes and Dyals. What is meant by the Bissextile; by a Month; by a day naturall; a weeke, fortnight, houre, point, minute, ounce, and Atome.

Most certaine it is (as Iosephus writeth, in the first and fourth Bookes of his Iewish Antiquities) that the Hebrues deuided the yeare into twelue moneths, and so ordained it afterward in Ægypt: for the auncient Ægyptians made the yeare to consist of Ioseph. in lib. de Iudaic. Antiquit. lib. 1. et 4.

The Hebrues deuided the yeare into 12. months.

of two moneths, and afterward of foure. The Arcadians of three; the Carians and Arcananians, of sixe. The Greekes accounted their yeare, to bee three hundred fifty foure daies: And the Romaines, from the time of Romulus, finished their yeare in as many daies as the Greekes did; comprehending it in ten months, and beginning it in March, though it disagreed with the course of the Sunne and Moone, to the circumference whereof Numa Pompilius brought it, by addition of fifty six daies. And yet the yeare being not fully sufficient, Iulius Cæsar made it apt to the course of the Sunne, making it to containe 365. daies, and in taking away the Dies intercalares, said he did it; because that a day might be added to the month of February, which then was the last of the yeare, and that day wanted to make the yeare compleate. Whereupon hee concluded, that from foure to foure yeares, one day should be added to the month of February, which was called Bissextilis Annus, the Leape yeare. And the reason of this name, was, that two daies of equall degree, were tearmed the sixt of the Calends of March, euen as now we find it to be,* and therefore do account two daies for one.

The Romaines conformable with the Greeks.

Iulius Cæsar his ordination of the yeare.

Dies intercalares, the odde day of the leap yeare, which falleth euery fourth yeare.

* L. Quum Bissextus F. decret. significi.

The same Cæsar deuided the yeare into twelue months; the month into foure weeks, and some odde daies: each weeke into seauen daies; the day into foure partes, and to each part hee appointed sixe houres. And to euerie houre, foure points or quarters; to the point or quarter, ten moments or minuts; to a moment, two and twentie ounces; and to an ounce, forty seauen Atomes, that is to say, numbers indiuisible; for ἄτομος in Greeke, is as much to say, as without diuision. The month is part of the Solary yeare: the Weeke, foure partes of the month: the naturall weeke day, part of the weeke; the Quadrant, foure parts of the day; the hour, the sixt part of the quadrant; the point, the fourth part of the houre: the moment or minute, the tenth part of the point; the ounce, the twelfth part of the minute; and the Atome, the fourth part of the ounce.

Iulius Cæsar his deuisions of the yeare, moneths, weeks, daies, houres, &c.

Degrees of the Solary yeare by deuision.

The ancient Romaines hauing dedicated the Moneth of March to their God Mars; began the yeare with that month. Afterward they tooke Ianuary for the first month of the yeare, as Plutarch writeth: because that after the Kinges were expulsed, the first Consuls were created in the Calends of Ianuary. Wherefore, this they did, in memorie of their liberties recouery, and vtter abolition of tyranny. They obserued also the great yeare (called by some the Platonicall yeare) which they saide was to bee ended, when all the Planets should haue made their intire reuolution, and were returned to the same place againe. And concerning this yeare, Authours haue not well accorded. For some say, that it finisheth in 2484. yeares; and others in 5552. Some doe hold, that it cannot be concluded, but in 49000. Romaine yeares; and others say, in 36000. Iosephus hath left written, that the great yeare consisteth of 1000. yeares. Our ancients began the yeare diuerslly. The Greekes (in the first place) making their glory in the destruction of Troy, began their yeare at that time. The Romains counted from the building of Rome. The Mahometanes counted, and yet doe, their time, from the daies of the false Prophet, and impostur Mahomet. And we Christians do deriue our date, from the Natiuitie of our Lord Iesus Christ, the true Son of the euer-liuing God, or else from his Incarnation, which we hold to bee the truest course.

Platoes great and wonderfull yeare, about which the Authours much varry.

The Greciams.

The Romaines.

The Turkes & Mahometans

Christians.

The houres tooke their name of the Sun, which in the Ægiptian language is cald Horus. Hermes Trismegistus hauing obserued in Ægipt, that a certaine Beast (consecrated to * Serapis) pissed twelue times in a day, keeping euermore equal space of time: deuised, to part the day into twelue houres, and this number of houres, was long time obserued, and afterward deuided into 24. The Sun dyal, whereof the shaddow (which is called Gnomon, that is to say, Measure) demonstrateth the houres: was first inuented at Lacedæmon, by Anaximenes the Milesian, and he called it Sciathericon, ἀπὸ τῆς σκιᾶς, that is to say, Of the shaddow. Ctesippus Alexandrinus, inuented the Clepsydra, or water dyall, to discouer the passage of houres, by drops of water falling from a vessell, expressely made for the purpose, like to a Garden watring pot, whereof Cicero maketh mention.

How the houres tooke their name. Vide Macrob. Saturnal. Lib. 1 Cap. 21

* A Godlie forme of an Oxe among the Egyptians.

The inuention of the dayes deuision into houres.

Of the Sun dyall.

Of the beginning of the yeare among the Romains.

Of the water dyall.

Vitruuius in lib. 9 de Architect. Cicero in Lib. 2 de natur. Deor. & 2. Tusc.

The vsuall Dyall.

Afterward, by diuine and ingenious cunning, the Horologe or dyall of mettall or Iron, was found out, euen such as we now make vse of in these daies; with toothed Wheeles and counterpoises, which declared the houres, partly by shew; and partly by the sound of Belles. These did so naturally represent (by the same artefice) the course of all the Planets, Sunne and Moone: as it would seem to ye, that ye discerned the very same heauen. Like vnto that which is at Venice, on the place before Saint Marke, all richly guilded, & made with infinite cost.

Of Clockes.

CHAP. VI.

Vpon what occasion, and wherefore the daies of the week were called Feriæ, Holidaies, or Festiuall daies.

Pope Syluester the first, altered the daies of the weeke from the Gentiles custome.

POpe Syluester, the first of that name, labouring to extirpate the memory of vaine and false Gods: ordaind, that the daies of the weeke, which before did beare name of the Gods of the Gentiles, & Idolaters, should be otherwise altered and tearmed. For wheras our Sabbath day bare the name of the Sun; Munday, of the Moone; Tuesday, of Mars; Wednesday, of Mercury; Thursday, of Ione or Iupiter; Friday, of Venus; and Saturday, of Saturne: they were deuided to the number of Feriæ, or Holy-daies, and called the first, second, third, fourth, fift, and sixt Feria, after the same manner as the Hebrues had distinguished their daies, by the name of Sabbats, or Sabaoths. He called the day of Saturne, Sabaoth, according to the ancient vocable of the Law, which is interpreted Rest, or Repose; and imposed the name of Dies Dominicus, which we call Sunday, on the first Feria, as a day sacred to the Lord, and which before had carried the name of the Sunne. This he did (as is said) at the request of the Emperour Constantine; albeit the Apostles had dedicated this day to God: because vpon the like or same day, our Lord and Redeemer arose from the dead.

Feria prima, Sunday. Feria secunda, Munday, and so of the rest, not intending Holy-dayes only, but any day of the weeke.

The Apostles dedication.

Yet so it is, that this name of Feria, hath not, nor is obserued, but in matters Diuine and Ecclesiasticall; onely the daies of Sunday & Saturday excepted, which are not to be called Feriæ. Likewise, the other fiue (among the Layicks) haue recouered their ancient names: a matter (questionlesse) much to be moaned, and whereat wee may blush with shame, because no more care was had in former times, to giue other Christian names to al those daies, to the end, that all memory of the Gentiles Gods might be lost among vs. These Feriæ (among our ancients) were such daies, as it was not lawfull to trauaile on them, & were so named, à feriendis victimis, Of smiting the beasts in the sacrifices: Or else, à ferendis epulis, Of bringing victuals, which then were principally giuen to be eaten. The Romains sollemnized infinite feasts, causing them to be published by a common Cryer to the people, to the end, that they should not bee transgressed. Moreouer, they would haue no worke to be done on those daies; for hee that gaine-saied, was grieuously punished.

Of the ordinary fiue daies in the weeke.

The Feriæ in elder times were Festiual daies.

Feasts of the Romaines.

CHAP. VII.

How, and by what meanes, Phisitions learned to take blood from diseased persons: And who it was that first wrote concerning Hearbes.

Plin. in Lib. 8. Cap. 26.

PHisition learned to recouer sickly people (by that which is tearmed Phlebotomy, or blood-letting) of the Hippopotamus*, which is called the Horse of the Riuer. It is a Beast of Nylus, who when hee feeleth himselfe filled with ouer-much meate, and to bee immeasurably fat or foggy: he commeth forth vpon the banck, seeking for new cut Canes and Reedes. And when he feeleth any that are verie sharpe indeed, pressing downe his body vpon them, he pierceth a veine, whence blood immediatly issueth, and by this meanes, his body is discharged of the former sickenesse, and he closeth the wound againe with his owne Dung.

A beast liuing in the Riuer Nilus, hauing feete like to an Oxe, his backe & mane like a Horse, with a winding taile, and tusked like a Boare.

There

There is likewise a Bird in the same Ægipt, called * Ibis, somewhat like to the Storke, which Bird doth wash that part with her crooked Bill, where all Fowles doe annoyd their Excrements; and thereby (saith Polydore Virgile) came Phisitions to the knowledge of giuing Glisters. Orpheus was the first, that of all other (bearing memory) wrote carefully concerning Hearbs, and (after him) Museus: albeit, some are of the mind, that they both liued in one and the same time. Dioscorides came after them, and Pompeius Lenus Libertinus; who being enfranchised by Pompey the great, traduced the Bookes of Mithridates out of Greeke into Latine, which concerned the property and nature of of Hearbs.

* A Bird in Egypt that killeth Serpents.

Polid. Virgil. in Lib. 1. cap. 21.

CHAP. VIII.

A true and admirable History, of a Maiden in Poictu, who for the space of three years, and more, liued without receiuing eyther meat or drinke.

Euripides desired, that either we might liue dumb, in perpetuall silence; or else, that dumbe thinges (without any Ambiguitie of wordes) might speake to vs. As for my selfe, I could wish, that eyther wee were like those Indian people called Astomi, whom Pliny describeth to liue without mouthes: or else, contented like them, with the sole benefit of ayre, we might heere spend our time without eating or drinking. For, by this meanes, it might come to passe, that our Spirit, (which with a firme eye, cannot contemplate naturall things, no more then the Owle is able to looke on the bright raies of the Sunne) beeing freed from those Mistes and thicke Vapours, occasioned by the vse of msates; would comprehend with one looke, the Ideas and formes of things nakedly, & according as they are indeede. Chrisippus then should not neede to take Helleborus with such obseruance, for the purging of his vnderstanding; to the end, he might the more subtilly see the strength of his Arguments. Our soule (against her nature) would be no heauy burden at all vnto vs, for she should not serue as salt to our body, to keepe it from corrupting: But rather she would be there like to a Pharos, which (in our Diuine Nauigation) would discouer the way, for our attaining to the Land of Heauen.

The wish of Euripides.

Plin. in lib. 7. Cap. 1.

The disability of the spirit in naturall things.

Heracl.

But in regard, that our life is maintained by the bodies nourishment, and that (by one mutuall assistance) both together do conserue themselues, euen while wee our selues doe study how to support this life, by continuall care for furnishing it with foodes: It ensueth, that thereby we altogether abase, and cast downe that part of the soule to the earth, which otherwise (of it selfe) wold couet nothing more, then to eleuate it selfe to high and heauenly things. Notwithstanding, Plato was perswaded, that Man is prouided of store of repletion, & cloying for the entrails or intestnies: to shew thereby, that God created him a Creature full of reason, without which, as Plantes are continually tyed to their Rootes, for their feeding; so should he alwaies haue meate in his mouth, or else (like the beasts) his mind would be perpetually labouring in seeking after nothing but fresh pasture. You may see it thus verified. While the food doth conuay it selfe by the passages of the belly, the Spirit naturallie sendeth hir strength vegetatiue and nutritiue thorow the body; and by this commixture, life, and the motion of the body is maintained so well, that this more sublime part of Nature would passe on much further, to declare the effects of her power and vertue: if (after food hath sustained the body) the Spirit were not called to the desire of new meats, and compelled to yeelde it selfe to the bellies appetite. For there is nothing (saith Pliny) more painefull to a man, then his belly; for contentment whereof, the most part of Men haue imployed their whole life time.

Life preserued by feeding the body

Plato in his Timeus, concerning mans prouision.

A very apt comparison in this case.

Plin in lib. 26. Cap. 8.

This importuning vessell of the body, is euermore at hand with vs, like to a greedy Creditor, summoning vs many times in the day to his attendance: but he must not be listned alwaies when he calleth, if he haue had his due paid him, no more then the young Scholler, who would not allow his Tutor the charges of his feeding, as if hee liued on winde, hauing bin neuertheleſſe with him, and ſed on his purſſe. But whoſoeuer ſhall, or doth deale ſo, the Emperour adiudged him not receiueable, but let him go ſeeke his dyet elſe-where. Notwithſtanding, it is ſo, that the bellies neceſſity is ſo borne with vs; as the Stoickes themſelues, who excluding all the ſenſe of mã, were conſtrained to feel the bellies gripings and murmuring, and did eate, but how? To the end, they might ſhun eating. Quite contrary to many Gourmands and Gluttons, who eat & drinke, only becauſe they would encreaſe their eating and drinking; hauing no other God but their bellie, whereon they beſtow whatſoeuer ſerues to excite their luxury: for maintenance whereof, the Seas are trauerſed, euen ſo far as the Riuer * Phaſis, ranſacked her entrailes, for contention agreeing with an inſatiable appetite. And this is that part, wherein we come the neereſt to brute beaſts, who (by their proper nature) are led to deſire whatſoeuer their belly demands, and with whom we haue (in common) this neceſſity of eating & drinking. For Nature hath giuen one Inſtrument of life to all Creatures, which is naturall heat, that (euen as our wood in the fire) hath his Seate in the triple ſubſtance of our body; to wit, ſolide, humorall and ſpirituous, which (without intermiſſion) heruinates and conſumeth. So that in a very ſmall while, all would bee quite waſted, if it were not maintained by a freſh ſupply of Meats and drinkes; neyther more or leſſe, then as the flame of a Lampe, which extinguiſheth it ſelfe, ſo ſoone as the Oyle is conſumed, if no more bee put thereinto, for longer laſting. And hereupon, Hippocrates, the Prince of Phiſitions ſaid; That the bodies of young Men haue neede of more nouriſhment, then others: becauſe they haue more heate then they; For otherwiſe (ſaith he) their bodies would conſume themſelues. Contrariwiſe, the bodyes of old men, becauſe they haue but little ſtore of heate; they neede therefore as little nouriſhing.

The appetite of the belly is neuer satisfied.

Hence may we draw a confirmed argument, by that which Hippocrates himſelfe hath ſaid: That old men very eaſily endure Faſting; next to them, ſuch as are in the ſtrength of their age, yet much leſſe then they that are in youth-hood; and Infants leaſt of all other, eſpecially ſuch as are lineliеſt, and readieſt in their bodily functions. For the ſmalneſſe of heat, the tenacitie of the primitiue moyſture, and the denſity or thickneſſe of the body hindereth in old men, that the triple ſubſtance cannot waſt it ſelfe at all. From whence it proceedeth, that they haue not ſuch great need of meate, and deſire or appetite after food (if I may ſo ſay) which is hunger; is in them much languiſhing. As contrariwiſe, in young men it is ſo much the more ardent; as the naturall heate is ſuper-aboundant, the vitall humor more fluxible, and the compoſition of the body more thin, and leſſe heaped together. Which three things, as they cauſe the receiued food to conſume: euen ſo (by little and little) they repaire any defect there ariſing.

To approue the truth heereof; The ſubſtance of euery Creature diſſolues it ſelfe into the ayre, by the pores of the skin which enuirons it, ſaith Galen. It followeth then of neceſſity, that the very neereſt parts of the skinne, ſhould bee firſt deſtitute of nourriture, and that by their owne force and vertue, they ſhould draw nouriſhment from other neighbouring partes, to reſtore that which (through want of ſuſtentation) is impaired: thoſe there, from the veines; theſe heere, from the Liuer; the Liuer, from the inteſtnies and ventricle (by the meſentery veines) calling what is moſt conuenable to their nature. Then the ventricle, ſeeing her ſelfe empty; by a meer naturall vnderſtanding which ſhee hath of her owne want, is incited to deſire meates, where-with ſhe may be ſuſtained.

But if there be ſome bodie, which hath ſmall ſtore of heat, and more of the radical moiſture, wherto the pores and Reſpiracles of the skinne do giue place: there cannot be made any great Euacuation of the triple ſubſtance, and ſo conſequentlie, there is no neede at all of great nouriſhment. Neither is it altogether neceſſary (as Galen teſtifieth) in thoſe places, where (beſide that alreadie ſaide) the Ayre which encompaſſeth vs, is cold, and the body heauy, benummed, and without motion: becauſe the little troughes or openings in

Tit. Deſlim. cap. praeſt. c.

The Stoickes did eate, to auoid eating.

A very great Riuer in Colchis

One Inſtrument of life, giuen to all Creatures naturall heat.

The triple ſubſtance of the body.

Hypocrat. in lib. 1. Aphoriſm. 14

Hippocra. in lib. 1. Aphoriſm. 13.

Old men haue not ſuch need of food, as young mẽ.

Galen. de Simptom. 1. Cauſ. 7.

The particular parts of ſupply.

Concerning ſome particular bodies.

Galen de vena ſect. aduerſ. Eraſ.

Aproued examples in diuers Beastes, which keepe their Dens al Winter.

in the skin, are as mouths, and yet litle or nothing at all passeth out at them. This he giueth to vnderstand, by the example of sauage Beasts, which (in all the time of winter) will not forsake their Dens and Cauernes: in regard whereof, he calleth them φωλεύοντα ζῶν, such as are Beares, Bats, or Dormice, Serpents, Lizards, and diuers other. Al which, hauing at spring time (by warmth and heat) the conuoies of their bodies released & opened: when they finde that the inward warmth is resolued, and they beginne to bee hungry, they come foorth (by their owne proper motion) out of their prisons, and (guided by Nature only) do seeke in al parts, such feeding as is apteſt for them. From whence he gathereth, that assiduate blowing or breathing, which is performed by respiration, causeth this defect, and it also prouoketh the appetite and desire of eating. For Nature hath giuen this property to the empty part, that it shold demand to be re-filled. So that, if the causes ceased, for which the body hath need of nourishment, it would ensue as necessarily, that euen penury it selfe, & meere vnderstanding what hunger is, by little and little would cease also: and that for this reason, the Beasts which are hidden in dennes of the earth, may liue without the vse of food.

The guifte of nature to the empty parte, to require sustentation.

In like manner, by the report of notable men, and well worthy credence, there haue beene found in the Lanthornes and Boxes of Pixes, of Altars and aged Sepulchres, burning Lampes, which the inscriptions (on the saide Tombes & places) haue witnessed, that they were put thereinto, almost infinite yeares before the finding of them. As that wherof Lodouicus Viues speaketh, discouered about the yeare, 1500. which Hermolaus Barbarus saith, was found in the Territories of Pauia, without date of day, or of Consull indeede: but yet notwithstanding, it hath beene there enclosed aboue eight hundered yeares, as P. Appianus gathered by the inscription. Such Lampes then were preserued or maintained, so long a time, with little or no supply, because the very moisture of the places, doth strongly enable them, and they perish but very little. Whether it may bee thought by the humidity (which the Alchimistes tearme Radicall) of Gold, which only among all naturall bodies, is beleeued to suffer no diminution of his substance, or of something else, neere enclining to his Nature, I am not able to censure. But so it plainly appeared, by the Testification engrauen on a Vessell of earth, which Barbarus (before mentioned) hath written downe in these words:

S. August. de Ciuit. Dei lib. 21. Cap 6.

Lodouicus Viues.

Hermolaus Barbarus.

P. Appianus.

A Lamp lasted burning aboue 800 yeares, without any supply.

Plutoni sacrum munus ne attingite fures,
Ignotum est vobis hoc quod in orbe latet
Namq; elemẽta grani clausit digesta labore,
Vase sub hoc modico maximus Olybius.
Adsit fœcundo custos sibi copia cornu,
Ne pretium tanti depereat laticis.

Hermolaus Barbarus his Latine Verses.

And these lines which follow, were written or earued on another vessell of earth, and enclosed within the former in this manner:

ABITE. HINC. PESSVMI. FVRES.
VOS. QVID. VOLITIS. CVM. VOSTRIS. OCVLIS. EMISSITIIS.
ABITE. HINC. VOSTRO. CVM. MERCVRIO. PETASATO. CADVCEATOQVE.
MAXVMVS. MAXVMVM. DONVM. PLVTONI HOC SACRVM. FACIT.

Other Latine lines founde on another earthen vessel

In this Earthen Vessell, was and had beene kept this Lampe, placed betweene two Flagons or Bottels, the one of gold, the other of Siluer, and these were imagined, to haue giuen nutriment vnto the Lampe, that continued burning for so many ages. The same Barbarus, called this Licquor, Heauenly Water, or rather, the Alchimists Diuine water, which he also noteth to haue beene called (by Democritus and Mercurius Trismegistus) sometimes Diuine Water, sometimes the Scythian Drinke; sometimes Spirituall, that is to say, a spirite drawne from the Celestiall Nature, and * Fifte Essence of thinges, whereof Aurum Potabile is composed, and the Phylosophers stone or sand, in search whereof, so many people haue vainly consumed themselues. To this Diuine Licquor of Golde, I knowe not whether I may attribute, or no, the meruaile of a Lampe continually burning, whereof Cedrenus speaketh, which from the time of the Emperour Iustinian, was found in the Cittie of * Edessa, with an Image

How the lampe was placed in the Tombe.

Heauenly Water.

The Alchymists Diuine water.

Scithian Drinke.

*Or Quintessence Aurum Potabile.

Cedrenus in the Abridgement of his Histories.

* A Citty of Syria, beyond Euphrates.

Image of our Sauiour Christ. It had bin inclosed or hidden ouer a certaine Gate, immediately after the passion of Christ: and yet neuertheless, it had also remayned there fiue hundred yeares, without extinguishing.

A Lamp burning 500. yeares.

Moreouer, some of the Oyle which was found in the saide Lampe, being cast into the neerest fire to that place: it burned (intirely) all the warlicke troopes of Chosroes, King of the Persians, who was an enemy to the Christians. But bee it howsoeuer, neither this, or any thing els before alledged, do I account to bee so straunge, as an example now to be apparantly seene; a matter rare, and almost incredible, but that both our eyes and iudgements haue beene witnesses thereof, happening within our owne quarters of Poictu, to wit, the wonderfull Faste or abstinence from foode, of a Mayden of Confolans or Conflans, in France, who for the space of three yeares hath liued, and as yet dooth liue without receiuing anie bodily food or sustenance.

A matter of great meruel

This was written in the yeare, 1602.

This Maiden is about fourteen years of age, and is named Iane Balan, her Father Iohn Balan, a Lockfmith by profession, and her Mother, Laurencia Chambella. Her stature is answerable to her age, she beeing somewhat Countrey-like of behauiour, a Natiue of the Towne of Confolans, vppon the Riuer of Vienna, in the Confines of Limosin, and also of Poietu.

The Maid of Confolans, and her Parents.

In the eleauenth yeare of hir age, beeing seized on by a continuall Feauer, the 16 day of February, 1599. she hath since then, beene assayled with the excesse of many other sicknesses, and (beyond all the rest) with a continnall casting or Vomitting, for the space of twenty daies together. The Feauer hauing somwhat left her, she grew to be speechlesse, & so continued eight and twentie dayes, without the deliuery of any one word. At the end of which time, shee came to her-selfe againe, and spake as she had done before, sauing that her words were full of feare, and void of good sence. Then came a weakenesse vpon her, and a benumming of all her sences & bodily motions, from beneath the head, in such sort, that Oesophagus it selfe (being that part of the stomack, which serues as a conduct for passage of meate and drinke, into that which we terme the little belly) being dissolued, it lost the power attractiue. Since which time, not any one coulde perswade this Maiden (in any manner) to eate: albeit they made triall to haue her but sucke, or to licke delicate meates, fruits, and sweet things, agreeable to one of so yong years. Neuertheless, the vse and motion of her members, came to her againe, about sixe months after, only one hip excepted, on which side, she yet goes with some difficulty. And one onely impotency remayneth to her, that shee cannot swallow or let downe any thing: for both meats and drinkes, she altogether loaths, and mightily abhorreth.

A Feauer seizing on her body.

Speechles 28. dayes.

A benumming of al hir sences.

Oesophagus.

Recouerie of her sences againe.

Loathing of meates and drinkes.

In this time (a thing most straunge) the inferiour part of her belly, by little & little grew leane in such manner, and so dried vp, that downe from her sides, and along from her Nauill, there remayneth nothing of the belly which he hadde before. There is only in this place, or insted thereof (to wit, vnder the auncient belly, where we may say it hath beene) a Cartilage or Gristle, hanging pointed downe (from Thorax*, or Sternum) after the manner of an Eaues or Pent-house, which throwes off from the building, all the water that falles on the top or couerture. Heere hence, and from the points of these Bastard-sides, the skinne (vnderneath) doth suffer great pain and feeling, both of extension and divulsion, as may easily be perceiued, by the moanes which the Maid her selfe maketh. And hence it ensueth, that all the Muscles, Intestines, Bowelles, and other parts of the belly, being withdrawne and annihiled by want of foode, one would iudge, that they had been rackt or rent away; for there remaineth nothing else but Lappings and Filaments; for, all the Fleshie substaunce which filled those partes, is perished and gone.

Her bellie dried vp.

*That part of the Breast, wher the ribs meet & ioyne together.

Shewes of moane made by her selfe.

As concerning the other parts of her bodie, it would bee thought conuenient, that there should be likewise an answerable diminution: and yet she hath a large Breast, her pappes prettie and round, her armes and thighs fleshy, her face also indifferent round, but browniſh. Her Lips (indeede) are drawne inward a little; and yet her words are prompt and ready, her head couered with haire of good length: for her haire and nailes doo keepe their due encrease, in each beseeming parte. There comes no excrement from hir, hir belly

The other parts of her body.

No auoydance of Excrements.

belly yeelds no Ordure, neyther doth any Vrine at all passe from her body, or is the mattrix impeached by her Menstruall Flowers. Her head is not charged with Scurfe or Dandriffe, but sheweth it selfe very sound and well, as well in the exteriour part of the skin, as in the inwarde Organes of sence. For, neither doo her nose or eares yeeld any excrements; but only from her mouth comes a little spettle, and sometimes from her eies issueth a little moisture, or few teares.

The bodie yeil des no sweat.

The whol bodie ouer, yeelds no sweat at all, but we (and such as haue touched her) do find all her skin to bee colde and drie, and not heated or chafed by anie motion (except the arme-pits, and those parts which Neighbor neer to the hart.) Yet shee doth trauaile about the house, go to the Market for Victualles, sweepe the house, spin at her Wheele, Reele off her Quill; and giues her selfe to all seruiceable Offices in a family, and seemes as if she were not defectiue in any part of sence, or motion of her body.

When the bodie receiueth encrease, it hath most neede of nourishment.

By all which thinges, we may gather the rarity and meruailous nouelty of this example. For, the accident hapneth in such an age, when as the bodie receyues encreasing, and those things which doo encrease haue need of good store of nourriture: but especially, in bodies of such Constitution, as this Maidens is, slender, thinne, and colde, where the internall parts are accustomed to bee most hote. Hence comes it, that our Ancients haue saide: Our Bellies in Winter are more hot, then at other times, with causeth a much readier concoction, and an hunger lesse tollerable, especially when it is prouoked by exercises, whereof this Mayden maketh no spare, especially such as her age is capeable off, the ayre and soyle also wherein she liueth, affoordes the people to be verie hungry. All which occasions of appetite and hunger, were taken from her by the accident of her continual Feauer: and in the end, all her naturall functions became asswaged, and seized on by a kind of dead palsie.

Hippocrat. lib. 2. Aphor. 15.

The exercises of the Maide.

Of the little belly or maw. Hermocrates in Hippocrates.

And now to begin with the first and principall, the little belly or maw (which otherwise is the receptacle of foode, and Officer for the first Concoction) beeing lagde and rent by the Ordure of Crude & raw humors, hath languished in such sort, as it had no power either to retaine the meats therein enclosed, or to receiue in any other. Euen so in Hippocrates, Hermocrates being surprized with an extream burning Feauer, did euermore cast the Food he receiued, because this faculty had lost his strength, and that was quenched in him (saith Galē in the same place) whereof the Office was, to feele lacke in health, and to desire what was familiar for him.

Opinion conceiued of an Apple giuen to the Maide.

Many woulde attribute the cause of this Symptome, or passion ensuing sickenesse, to some wicked power in an Apple, which an old Woman had giuen to this young Maiden, two or three months before; because when he had eaten it, she had a distast of her meats, and felte some alteration of her spirits. But in regarde, that (besides this) nothing hath hapned to her, which outwardly hath impeached her health, or her naturall functions, vntill shee became surprised by the aforementioned Feauer: [illegible] reason at al, that yeelds any subiect [illegible] conceiue, how the euill power in the Apple, could remaine so long time hidden, without yelding any effect. Her vomiting ceasing, shee became dumbe, by reason of those Nerues resolution, which we call recurrent (that happened to her soone after, thorow all her bodie) the Flegme colde and raw, being licquified by the heate of the Feauer, which (by this means) wroght a debilitie in the Braine, and caused that she could not be found or well in spirite. Heere-hence it necessarily ensued, that she must needs loose the sense of tast and sucking, and likewise the vse of swallowing meate and drinke; which onely hath procured abolition of the animall appetite, and by little and little, it hath beene followed by a total priuation of the naturall appetite, which Hippocrates noteth by these words, γίνεται δέ ἐκ ἀδιψάτο, if we may giue credit to his most graue Interpreter Galen. And hee casts the cause of this passion, vpon some blame in the Liuer; who being the beginning of the Vegetant and Naturall soule, so soone as she is wounded, shee is constrained, that her auxiliary or succouring faculties (to wit; the Attractrice, the Retentrice, the Assimiliatrice, & the Expulsatrice, in whom lies al the power of norishing) must needs sinke and fall, and so consequently, the appetite which cannot be compleat and perfect, but by attraction. The same Au-

An answer to that obiection.

The Nerues tearmed recurrent.

The reason of loosing her tast and vse of meats.

Galen his coniecture of the passions cause

The helping faculties four in number.

Galen. 1. Epid. s. ct. 3.

Author gathers it to be the ſickeneſſe of the liuer in Hermocrates, by this, that the ſixt day of his ſickneſſe, he was noted to loo'e yellow: and yet notwithſtanding, in all the courſe of his diſeaſe (which was for 27. dayes) this yellowneſſe neuer left him, as it had don in Heraclides, to whom the ſelfeſame paſsion happened, and on the very ſame day, neither by ſweating, neither by the voyding of much choller, nor by the conuoy of his belly, nor by Vrine, nor yet by vomitting. And therefore, it was eaſie to be ſeene, that the naturall faculty (whereof the Liuer is the Fountaine) was ouerthrowne in verie ſtrange manner. Which being ſo, all the ſtrength of appetite doth becom ſo weakened, ſaith Galen, that ſicke folkes deſire rather to die, then to receiue in anie thing at their mouths, or haue it ſo much as but to touch their lips.

Heraclides his ſickneſſe.

The Liuer is the fountaine of the Naturall facultie.

Galen. 5. Deloc. affec. Cap. 1.

In the Maid, of whom we ſpeak at this preſent (who hath not bin dealt with, by any cunning or helpes to Nature) the Liuer hath beene ſo beſiedged with the the burthen of hurtfull humors, that her Naturall heate being broken, and hauing no more force, it hath (by little and little) dried quite vp, with all the neather parts of the Belly, yea & ſo, as there is nothing indeed to be wondered at, when we perceiue the functions of the naturall Oeconomy to be alſo aboliſhed. This then is one of the cauſes of this diſtaſt of meats, and of the Faſt or abſtinence thereon enſuing, that this drying vp of the Liuer, and of all thoſe parts ſeruing to nouriſhment; from whence attraction beeing taken, it hath bin followed, with a priuation of ſucking or ſwallowing, which is the beginning of hunger.

Her naturall heate quite dried vp.

A reaſon for this Faſt and abſtinence from meates.

Galen 1. De loc. affect. 1.

In this opinion, I haue Galen for my warrant, who ſaith; By reaſon of the liuers debility, the bodie can receiue no nouriſhment. And yet notwithſtanding, it may ſubſiſt a long time, to wit; ſo long as the heart remaineth ſound. Neuertheleſſe, Hermocrates died at 27. dayes end, becauſe the corruption of humors had gained the ſubſtance of the hart, which likewiſe the quality of the Feauers heate (by altering) had conſumed, after it had chaſed away the Naturall heate. But this Maide hath beene preſerued, in regarde, that the Feauers fire beeing extinct, the Naturall heate which remayned, beeing but weake, hath beene detained in a bodie faſt locked vp, couered with a wrinkled colde and drie skinne. By making but ſmall decay of this heate in her, ſhee hath not much neede of maintaining it; and this may ſerue for a ſecond and third reaſon, of this defect in appetite.

The reaſon of the Maides preſeruing in this maner.

For all that ſhee exhaleth by the meanes of reſpiration, as breath and Naturall heate, the ſame is ſtill ſupplyed and repaired, firſt of all, by the ayre drawne as well by inſpiration, and receyued at the heart, by the Pipes and Organes of the Lunges and Lights: as by this inſenſible tranſpiration, which (according as I can iudge by her diſpoſition, is almoſt vtterly waſted in her) receiued in the whole bodye, by the Arteries. After this, Nature (thus lagde, and ſcantly vigorous) delights her ſelfe with this crude rhumie Humour, which cannot otherwiſe in this young bodie, but muſt needs (of it ſelfe) much abounde and encreaſe, according to the qualitie of her ſexe and age.

Her exhaling by reſpiration

Natures delighting her ſelfe.

And the ſame more eſpeciallie may be now diſcerned, by ſome little Decadence of her bodie thorough the palſie, which is not (as yet) perfectly cured. Now this Humour (in time) doth ſeeth it ſelfe, and conuerts into ſoode, proper and apteſt for nouriſhing of the bodie. And there is no want of manie other thinges, which haue their maintenance in our bodies, wherewith Nature may ſerue her ſelfe; when (preſſed by Hunger) ſhee pleaſeth to vſe them for ſuſtenaunce: As Fat, Marrowe in the Bones, and Phlegme; all which thinges, the deſpoyled partes of the bodie dooth drawe to their Naturall ſeatings, to furniſh well their owne expences withall, and they receiue them (like a diſperſed Dew) thorow their whole ſubſtances.

The Maide troubled with the Palſie.

Many things in the body to ſupply nature withall.

CHAP.

CHAP. VII.

A further Discourse on Fasting, approuing that manie Creatures do fast in verie strange maner.

PRoceeding on further in this Argument, concerning Fasting, I finde one that saith, Snailes in the Ayre, hauing drought, if no dew fal to them from Heauen, they liue by sucking of themselues. And hence grew it, that Plautus said:

Symmach. lib. 1 Epist. 33.

Plaut in Capti.

Quasi, cum caletur, cochleæ in occulto latẽt, Suo sibi succo viuunt, ros si non cadit.

Arist. in Hist. Aud. 8. Cap. 13

And so the Snailes on the earth, when they will defend themselues against the sharpe cold of Winter, they make a certaine white couering before their shelles entrance, hard like Plaister, and liue so within (sixe months together) vnder the ground, neere to the rootes of Hearbes; sustained only by the internall humour; which redoundeth from themselues. And diuers other kinds of creatures, do the same; such as are accustomed to decline from the rigour of Winter, by withdrawing into Dennes: As Serpents, Frogges, Flies, Wormes, Dormice, Rats of the Mountaines, Turtle Doues, Swallowes, &c.

Creatures that do inwardly sustain themselues.

As concerning Serpents, almost al of them (shunning the colde) doo remaine all Winter hid within the earth, as Aristotle saith. From whom, albeit Plinie hath borrowed that which he saith concerning Serpents, he hath (neuertheless) against reason, taken Aristotles intent contrary to sense, there where hee saieth; That of all Serpents, the Viper only seeketh places vnder ground: and the other, the hollowes of Trees, and of Rockes. Whereas (quite contrarie) Aristotle hath written truely; That the Viper is well nigh alone, that during the Winter, withdrawes himselfe vnder stones or Rockes, and the other vnderground; for then sleepe serues them instead of foode. Nay, and much more, Vipers do endure a whole yeares hunger together, without counting the time of Winters cold, so saith Pliny. Which we haue knowne by experience, wee that haue aboundance of them heere: of whom, we haue kept some (a yeare) enclosed in Bottles of Glasse, without anie Foode at all.

Of Serpents.

Arist. in Hist. Animal. lib. 8. Cap. 15.

Plin. in hist. nat Lib. 8. Cap. 39.

Pliny reproued.

Pli. in hist. Nat Lib. 8. Cap. 39.

As for Frogges, whom Pliny thinkes (after a life of sixe moneths) to resolue themselues into slime and mud, and reuiue again at the Spring times comming Waters, they are soundly deaded with colde, but yet not reduced to nothing, as Pliny holdeth. For, they remaine in the Cauernes on the Coasts, where not only they abstaine from al nourishment: but are likewise halfe dead, and they may be seene in this estate, in your Fennes on the Sea-coasts (which are not subiect to Freezing) at all seasons of the yeate. So likewise in the Ditches, whether they are retired; where you shal not only see their young ones, but also the Frogges of the other yeare.

Pli. in hist. Nat. Lib. 8. Cap. 40. Of Frogges.

Your Flies benummed with the colde of Winter, remaine hidden in Riftes of Planchers, and pieces of Woode; and come not out, but by Fire Artificiall, or by the renewing heate of the Spring or Summer. During this numnesse, they liue not so much by reason of their Bodies smalnesse, or littlenesse (as Aristotle argueth) as by the cold which is in them. For that which is hot, desireth Foode, and digests it verie soone: Contrariwise, that which is cold, doth very easilie let it alone.

Of Flies.

Ari. de part Anim. lib. 4. ca. 5.

Among Flies, they that make Hony, do forbeare to come foorth in the same time, and abide close in their litle Hiues, yet without eating: whereof we may easily make proofe, in that, if one bring food, and set it before them, they wil not so much as touch it. And if it chaunce, that any one gets forth, you shall see the same to haue a transparant bodie, vtterlie emptie of all nourishment. From the heart of Winter, vntill the yeares renewing, they liue in sleepe, without any nouriture, so saith Pliny.

Arist. Lib. 8. Cap. 14. Of Bees.

Pli. in hist. Nat. Lib. 11. Cap. 16.

Aboue all other Creatures, the Grashopper doth fast the longest: for the moisture (which is super-aboundant in their bodies) doth sufficiently furnish them with store of nourishment.

Grashoppers Arist. lib. 4 cap. 5. de part Anim

Wormes, growing to bee olde, their skin

Of Wormes.

skinne doth outwardly waxe very harde, and becauſe (that skinne) then lookes of Gold or yellow colour, the Greeks were wont to call them Chryſalides, and the Latines named them Aurelie. After they haue once taken this forme, they will receiue nothing more into their bodies, neither doe they voide or caſt anie thing forth.

Chryſalides. Aurelie.

Among theſe, the Silke-worm ſheweth a Myracle in Nature about the midſt of Summer, for being then faſt cloſed vp within her huske of Silk, ſhe liues (at the leaſt) for fortie dayes together, not onely without eating; but imployeth beſides, verie much of hir ſubſtance, in making of ſilke. And comming forth of her ſhell or couerture, ſhee becommeth a Butter fly; & yet this liberty maketh her not to ſeeke any nouriſhment.

Of the Silke-Worme.

The Bat or Dormouſe, remaines hidden (all Winter) in a perpetuall ſleepe: and during all this time, ſhee hath no other nouriſhment then ſleepe.

Of the Bat or Dormouſe. Ariſt. lib. 8. c. 7. Plin. lib. 8. c. 57

The Rattes of the Mountains, like vnto Dormice, do ſleep hidden al the winter, and for ſixe moneths together, in full continuance, they are buried in ſuch a profound ſleepe, as being caſt vp out of the grounde by digging, or otherwiſe, they will not awake at all, vntil ſuch time as they be brought into the ſunne, or laid before the fire, and they beginne to feele heat. They carrie Hay, Chaffe, & ſuch like other things into their Cauerns, only to keepe them from colde: but yet all this, hinders them not from ſleeping ſoundly.

Of the Mountain Rattes. Ariſt. lib. 8. cap. 17.

Prouiſion to keepe them from cold.

The Tortoiſe of the earth, lieth al winter within the earth, and ther paſſeth that ſeaſon, like as the other creatures doo. And Rondeletius witneſſes, that not only in Winter, but likewiſe at all times, ſhee can liue longeſt without any foode, yea, albeit ſhee haue her head cleft or cut off, and this is by the power of the cold moiſture within her ſelfe.

Of the earth Tortoiſe.

Rondelet in lib. de Amphib.

The Loriot, a kind of Bird hauing this Nature, that if a man ſee her, when he is ſicke of the Iaundiſe, the man ſhall wex whole, and the Bird die immediately: lyeth all the Winter hidden in the earth, and ſheweth not her ſelfe, till about the Solſtice of Summer.

Of the Loriot Ariſt. in Lib. 9. Cap. 29. Plin. in lib. 10. Cap. 24.

Your Swallowes, as well thoſe of houſes, as they that are wilde, to ſhunne the ſharpeneſſe of Winter, when it draweth neere, do retire themſelues to ſecret places in the Neighbouring Mountaines, where you ſhall finde them Naked, and without any Feathers on them. And you may ſee them (almoſt) in the ſame condition, euen at the Spring time. As for them which are called Swallowes of the Sea-coaſts, they withdraw themſelues to the ſides of Riuers, Lakes, Mariſhes, and of the Seas, where the Rockes doe ſerue them for a retirement: There ſhall you ſee them in multitudes together, as newly aſſembled to chaſe one another. In ſuch ſort, that (as Agricola ſaith) the Fiſhermen many times, take them out of the Waters, ſo faſt tied and ioyned together, that our New Phyloſophers, may ceaſe henceforward, to fordge their new Colonies in Affrick, and other places beyond the Seas.

Of Swallowes of the Seacoaſts

Agricola.

Turtle-Doues, if they beginne to hide themſelues when they are fatte; and although they leaue their Feathers in their holes, yet notwithſtanding, they keepe their fatneſſe.

Of Turtle-Doues. Ariſt. in lib. 8. cap. 16. Hiſt.

Some one peraduenture (beeing a more diligent ſearcher into natural thinges) may diſcouer a great number of other Birds, which might be thought to be ſtrangers, becauſe (in Winter time) they hide themſelues thus; and yet neuertheleſſe are of our country; As Kites, Stock-Doues, Black-birds, Stares, Hoops, Backs Gripes, Owles, and others; which are ſuſtained and fed by the fat within themſelues; in all which time, the courſe and office of the belly ceaſeth. For Galen holdeth; That when hunger is not thoroughlie contented, the fat, Marrow, and Flegme, do giue nouriſhment to the Naturall heate. Whence alſo we may relieue a doubt, ariſing from that which Hippocrates hath written; and maintaineth, that a man can hardly liue out the ſeauenth day, without eating; which day, although he chaunce to ouer-paſſe; yet notwithſtanding, hee will die ſoone after. For, albeit it may be true, and that which hee hath Written might haue been manifeſted in this maid of Confolans, the Inteſtine receyuing no foode at all, did during his time, ſo ſhut vp it ſelfe, that it could not afterward admit the receipt of any, yet notwithſtanding, it is not altogether ſo conſtrayned, that by this reſtriction of the Entrayles, death ſhould follow thereon ſo readilie. For, it is recorded of the Scythians, that if

Other Foules of like nature

Galen. 4. vſu. part. & Com. 1. de rat. victus acut.

Hippocrat. in lib. de carn.

Compariſon with the Faſting Maide.

Long fasting endured by the Scythians.

A Maide of Spire, that fasted 3. yeares

Obseruations concerning the Maide of Spire.

A lerned Phisition in France writingon the Maid of Spire.

Plat. in Lib. de Repub.

Herus Pamphilius.

Plin. lib. 11. Cap. 54.

Diog. Laertius, ex test. Dicæar.

if by any occasion happening them, they are to endure long Fasting, they wil bind vp their bellies strictly with large bands, to the end, that hunger may not charge them so soone, because they haue lefte little or no space at al, for the bellies conuoy. Moreouer, the maid of Spire, of whō ran such great report, that she had beene three yeares without eating: yet, after the superabounding humor in her was consumed, she returned (according as they report that wrote thereof) euen as one from banishment, to hir first right course and vse of feeding, beginning (as it is very likely) with Pottages and liequid thinges, if it bee true which those Authours haue recorded. Or rather, if the mother of the Maid, did not impose this on the honest people (as the rumor ran) therefore, there hath bin some occasion of remaining in doubt, by their owne proper writing. For, it might be noted, that hir Nose voided much filth, her ears wanted no part of their Ordure, and that she deliuered aboundance of teares at her eyes: which sheweth, that the languishing powers haue bin often releeued with some food, albeit not solid, whereby these Excrements (by a secret posier in Nature) were sent into proper Organs.

Nor dooth this make any thing at all, against the Paradox, which M. Ioubert hath in the second Booke of the first Decade, where (among many other examples, of long fasting and abstinence) hee produceth, as an Hypothesis or argument disputed, that Historie of the Mayde of Spire. For, beside a great number of obseruations of the same qualitie, which he placeth before, & that haue bin approued by the auouching of manie graue Authors, we haue also notable confirmations, as well by experience of elder ages, as of our moderne, newer, and later. Plato in his Commonwealth, maketh report of a certaine man, named Herus Pamphilius, who remained ten dayes together among the dead bodies of thē which had bin slaine in a battell. And two daies after that he was broght thence, as hee was laying on the pile of wood to bee burned among other dead bodies, he was found to be aliue. As for Pliny, he is not perswadeable, that thorow lacke of foode, a man should yeild to death at the 7. daies end. Diogenes Laertius declareth by the testimony of Dicearchus, that Pythagoras the chief master of abstinence continued 40. daies togither without drinking: by whose doctrine also, Apollonius Thyaneus lerned (out of long vse & custome) to endure fasting for many daies. Pliny assures vs, that drought or thirst may be surmounted by constant perseuerance, and that the Romā noble Knight, Iulius Viator, hauing had warning (in his yong years) by Physitians not to drink any water at all, by reason of an indisposition in him, leaning to the dropsie, so turned the custom of Nature, that he passed al his age without drinking Apollon. Thyaneus. Plin. lib. 7. cap. 18.

Iulius Viator a famous Roman Knight, drank not in all his age.

Fresh yet in our memory, & all France hath seene the same in the person of the Lord Marquesse of Pisani, who is a man of such merit, as the K. himselfe employes his seruice in matters of great importāce. There are many Books of deuout enstructions, which do recount meruails of diuers frequent and voluntary abstinences, as of P. Alcantara, a Monk in Spaine, and that for 8. daies & more in euery month. But beyond all others, there is a historie verie famous, of a certaine Maid, named Catharine, a Native in the land of Colberg, who hath bin known to liue 7. years togither, without drinking or eating any thing whatsoeuer. She was carefully tended by Henry Smetius, at this time Professor in Heildeberge, & John Iac. Theod. Physitions, till the 24. of Nouember, 1584. by the commandement of John Casimir, Count Palatine. And since then also, four graue Matrons were appointed to keepe hir company. who haue acknowledged with the Physitions, that this fast or abstinence, is most true. Three yeares after, this History was traduced into French, & printed at Frankford, by John Wechel, in the yeare, 1587. with an aduertisement in the end, that the maide then liued still in that maner, without drinking, eating, sleeping, or deliuering any excrements. Beside all those, Ioubert (concerning this argument) hath set downe such pregnant & necessary reasons, as I cannot thinke, that any one needs to make doubt thereof.

The Lord Marquesse of Pisani.

P. Alcantara a Spanish monk

Catherine of Colberg tasted 7. yeares.

Proose made of the truth in this case, by diuers Physitions of great credit.

Neuertheless, being my self afterward to discourse on the same subiect, I happned (being in a Booke-sellers Shoppe) as mine eyes wandered ouer viewe of the Bookes, to light on a little Treatise, bearing this Title in the forehead: Vieux non pesse, vt quis sine cibo & potu plures dies & annos transigat. I tooke the book, which in regarde it was Written by I. Harnet,

The Authors' discourfing on the same Argument.

I. Haruet. Doctor of Phyſicke.

a Doctor of Phyſick, of the ſame condition with vs, and as we are;) I read it verie ſeriouſly from the one end to the other. But comming to the place, where he argues on the negligence of the Authours of ſo manie notable examples, who (hee ſaith) haue beene ſomewhat deceyued, by the inueterate beleefe of this extraordinary faſting, I thought good that hee ſhould be ſatisfied in this point; and paſſed my promiſe thereon, in the name of our Maide of Conſolans. Albeit during ſo many months and yeares, I could not giue my ſelfe to conſider all her actions and motions: Neuertheleſſe, it is verie likely, by that which in all places is ſayde of her, to approue the three yeares Faſte now in queſtion. And yet ſuch as haue ſeene her naked, as we haue done, could coniecture no otherwiſe, if ſhee bee not chaunged ſince the laſt time I ſawe her, which was in the moneth of Iulie laſt, 1602.

In Tagin. 174.

The reaſon of his further purſuit in this point, to ſatiſfie D. Haruet.

Some ſay, that ſhe is a little more full of fleſh, and yet ſhe hath neuer receiued any foode at all, that could poſſiblie bee knowne. Beſide, this truth ought to receiue credite generally, by the faithfull report of ſo many perſons of honor and goodly quality, who (for trials ſake) haue kept her in their Houſes amongeſt their Maids and Children, ſome for three, others for foure months and more. If anie one bee further deſirous, and would willingly ſee her, he hath free liberty, & the Maide her ſelfe will not contradict, what other proofes he or ſhe can make of her. But in my minde, Ioubert would haue receiued no meane contentment, by the ſight of an accident ſo ſtrange: For, if to ſo many pertinent reaſons he could haue had but an eye-experience he ſhould not nowe (perhaps) haue had Haruet for his aduerſary. Who being in the humour to combate both againſt ſence and reaſon, it may bee, it would then bee the harder for him, to vndergoe the demonſtration of Ioubert. For they are vnder-propped with principles ſoundly aſſured, & drawn from the Oracles, euen of the great Dictator of Nature.

Triall made by perſons of Honour and reſpect.

Eye-experience is an vndoubted perſwaſion.

The validite of Iouberts writing.

CHAP. X.

The matter and manner of ſo ſtraunge Faſting, diſputed betweene Ioubert and Haruet, with many excellent and approued examples, tending thereto.

FIrſt of all, Ariſtotle enſtructeth vs, that al kinds of creatures, haue a certaine naturall heate in them, which is combined to the ſoule with ſo ſtrict a Bond, as the one cannot bee without the other, and thoſe Creatures (while they liue) haue this heat, but death approaching, they are cold immediatly. In another place, There is (ſaith he) in the ſeede of all Creatures, the thing that cauſeth fecunditie, and that it is it which wee call heate. Further he ſaith; In the earth, and in the Waters, the Creatures and plantes doe ingender, becauſe in the earth there is a moiſture, and in the moiſture is a ſpirite; and in this great ſubſtance is the animall heat, to the end, that all things ſhould be ſomwhat ful of ſoule. Thus he doth hold that all things are made by heat, and that all functions are performed thereby. Galen alſo is of the ſame opinion, and ſayth; That heate is either the ſubſtance of the faculties, or at leaſt, the moſt chiefe and neceſſarie Inſtrument of them.

Ariſt in lib. de vita & mors, & reſp.

Ariſt in lib. 2. de gen. Anim. Cap. 3.

The animall heate which performeth all things.

Galen in lib. ad Glauc. & in lib 4. de vſu par.

It is no meruaile then, if Haruet think it ſtrange, that Ioubert ſaieth (according to Ariſtotle) That life dependeth vpon heat only. For that it muſt needes be ſo, life is nothing elſe, but an abiding and attendance of the ſoule with heate, according to the ſame Ariſtotles iudgement. And wee cannot in this obſcuritie of thinges, finde any more aſſurance of this preſent life, then by the functions thereof: of all which, heate (as the eſpecial inſtrument, and without other means, is the author, the motiue cauſe and effecter.

What life is. Ariſt. in lib. de reſp.

Nor hath Ioubert (vnaduiſedly) defined life by heate, when Ariſtotle hath dedeſigned death by the extinction of the ſame heate: for Ioubert groundeth on this Axiom, that of two contraries, the con-consequents are contrary. And Galen himselfe (who holdeth death to arriue then, when heate, beeing weakened and broken by frequent action, becoms faint, and that the temper of the Elementarie qualities, which are in vs (beeing out of square) comes to yeelde it selfe vnder the tiranny of one alone) giues thereby reasonably to vnderstand, that the course of life keepes it selfe for so long time, as naturall heate doth aboundantly disperse it selfe aboue the radicall humor, and that the Elementarie qualitie do hold a good simpathie amongst themselues, in their harmonie and kinde accorde, which we call temperature. And therefore, it is blameles to define life by these two causes, Heate and Temperature; becaus it behooueth to take the definition, from and by the cause which is most neere. Now, heate is the most neere Instrument of the soule, and temperature next vnto that of Naturall heate, which disposeth and accommodates it vnto diuerse actions. Then this causeall definition, is well deriued from the chiefe and principall occasion of Life, which heere we haue alledged by the Authoritie of Aristotle.

Ioubert defineth life by heate.

How long the course of life keepeth it selfe.

How to take a definition in his right form

Neuertheleſſe, Harnet goes after another fashion, he defineth the life of man, to bee an action of the reasonable soule, producted into the bodie of man: but this definition is not subtle enough. For first and formost, life is no action of the soule, otherwise it should bee the soule that liueth, and not the bodie. But, as it hath beene saide alreadie, life is an abyding, or an Vnion of the soule with the bodie, according as Aristotle describeth in another of his Bookes, whereof action proceedeth afterward. Heereto I adde, that the actions of life beeing to vnderstand, to smell, to moone, and to norish: if life were an action, why then it should be an action of action, which is most absurd. Or else, if life bee an action of the reasonable soule; insomuch as she is reasonable, the corporeall parts should bee driuen to performe their operations, as receiuing food for nourishment, and to beget hir like only by reason of the intellect, and not by any natural sence. But per aduenture, Harnet hauing drawn his definition from others, hath read, that life is an act of the reasonable soul; which word of act, hee hath conuerted into action.

After what maner Harnet defineth the life of man.

Aristot. 8. Met.

The actions of life.

The bodily parts in their operations.

Now let me tell ye, Act is that which the Greeks call ἐντελέχεια, which is a perfection, energy, & moouing power of it selfe, far enough diffring from that which they terme ἐνέργεια. And so one may (to some purpose) define life: an Act of the soul in the body, that is to say, a power & vertue of the soule by the vnion therof with the body. Whence is easily vnderstood, that taking life generally, it should rather bee imputed to naturall heate, as to the Organ of the soul, then vnto reason. In case notwithstanding, that this heate doe still abide vnited with the radicall Moysture; which although it be (day by day) consumed by this heate: yet nature prouideth a daily subrogation of new, which shee borrows from the noritures we receyue, as hath bin said already heeretofore.

Act insted of action.

Life an act of the soul in the body.

Heat abyding with the radicall moisture.

But Harnet imagineth, that these nourishments doo yet serue to another vse, which is (saith he) to releeue and fortifye the spirits; the which Joubert hath omitted: as if vnder this name of radical moysture, we should comprehend only moysture by it selfe, & not the spirits likewise. And what is hee, who will deny, that the spirits are not restored and strengthened, both by eating and drinking? But to speak truly, many thinges are piled and heaped vp in the body, very vnprofitably, and to small purpose. Moreouer, that which he proposeth against Hippocrates in the 14. Aphorisme of his second Booke, is altogether Paradoxicall, to wit; That hee in whom heate is most languishing, hath the more neede of nourishment: which he proueth by example of a fortie yeares aged man, who (sayeth hee) receyueth more Foode, then an Infant of two or three dayes: in whom notwithstanding, there is greater aduantage of this heate, according to Hippocrates.

The vse of nourishments.

The spirites restored by eating and drinking.

Hippoin Lib. Aphor. 14.

Comparison of an Infant, and a man of fortie yeares.

Beholde (in my iudgement) a verie feeble Argument, if all should be alledged that he failes in; and also, if we should oppose the Organes of both kindes, the one against the other. For, to the ende, that vnder this worde Infant, no cauillation may be couered, I call all them Infants, which are vnder foureteene yeares of Age, in the verie same manner as the Greekes do vnderstand the word νήπιος. They, I say, that according to the proportion of their Mawe or little Bellie, do take more foode then men of middle and perfect age: as well by reason of the power of the facultie, which seeths or boyles the foode (whence proceedeth a speedie riddance thereof) as by their frequent exercises: during which time, good store of their substaunce, glides it selfe thorow the pores of the skinne. Heere also I may bee silent, in those two necessities alledged by Hippocrates, which Infants haue of eating, to witte; for Nourishing, and to giue encreasing to the bodie.

Cauillation auoyded about the word Infant.

The two necessities in Infants in feeding.

Nowe, the strength of the facultie which boiles the meate in our stomacke, dependeth much vpon temperature and moderation, but that is, when it is excited and prouoked on by naturall heate; which, albeit that after one foode bee digested, she introduceth not any other nouriture of her selfe, as Harnet sayeth; yet notwithstanding, in regard that this first foode is digested by heate, there growes immediately, a feeling of penury & want of foode, at the mouth of the Ventricle, which we call hunger. For this cause, Ioubert referreth onely to heate (as the principall Agent) the quantitie of those meates, which are afterward receyued, and gouerned by the appetite of hunger. The facility of supporting hunger (sayth Galen) acknowledgeth it selfe, when anie one hath no appetite to meate; and yet neuertheless, feeleth not thereby some endamagement or defect. Which Harnet brings in thus, that such as are restored from sickenesse, haue a good appetite; and yet notwithstanding, no such meates are giuen them, as their appetites doo desire: but when aduise is giuen for restoring their powers, it behoueth also to haue regard to the infirmitie of Naturall heat, which must not be ouerthrowne, but still supported. This is thus doone, because that the temperature, beeing not (as yet thoroughly recouered, and the naturall Faculties feeling themselues (as yet) diseased: the Organs cannot boile the meates receiued in too great a quantitie. Now Ioubert in his demonstration, is vnderstoode to speake of the healthfull, not of the sicke, or else of them that are neutral. And therefore he concludeth, that olde men haue not neede of meate often, because they do not desire or apetite often, principally considering, that they haue cold bodies: whereto Harnet in no wise wil agree, for he saith; That al the action of mixed bodies, cōmeth from that qualitie, which wins the vpper hand in the Elements assembling. Now, so it is, that in liuing bodies, heate ruleth ouer the other qualities; of which heate, euery action hath his originall, and not of colde. I willingly admit the proposition with Aristotle, as concerning mixt inanimat things, and which acknoledge the simple forms of the elements for their principles. But in animate bodies, which haue a more noble forme, and wherein are contained those other more ignoble (euen as the Triangle within the Quadrangle) it is not a thing so easie. For, they acknowledge, (as principall of their functions) that nature, which I say is properly called the soule, that is; the moouing vertue of the body naturall and organicall, liuing by power.

Of the facultie that boyleth the food in the stomak

Galen in Com. 2. Aphor. 13.

For restorement of the powers, and maintenance of the temperature.

Old mē haue not neede of often feeding

Aristot. in Lib 2. de gen. anim. c. 5

Of bodies that haue soules, and their forme.

As concerning that which Harnet placeth in the assumption of his argument, to wit; that heate (in the liuing bodie) surmounteth the other elementarie qualities, I cannot allow thereof, except hee will haue vnderstood by this heate, that it (being diffused thorow the bodie) gouerneth and moderateth the whol Oeconomy therof; and so long as it is in essence, maintaineth life; but approaching neere quenching, then death of necessity must follow. This also surmounteth and subiecteth to it selfe, not only the cold, moyst, and drie elementary quality, but euen the hot elementarie Nature also, as beeing (in it selfe) truly celestiall. For, if hee meane the predominant heate of the Elementary heate, as it seemeth to ensue by his Sylogisme: then let me set the Salamander before him, which (in his mixtion) is composed of so colde a temperament, as his verie touch doth quench the fire, euen as if it were ice. He liueth neuertheless, yet not by the heat mixed or elementary, which being weak in it self, cannot exceed the power of this cold. It followeth then, that it must needs be by celestiall heate, which likewise maintaineth life in Serpentes, and euery one knowes them to be temperately cold.

Of heate, surmounting the other elemētary qualities and the power thereof.

The predominating heat of the Elementary heat

How the Salamander liueth by celestiall heate.

This then which hath beene said, that cold (in Olde men) maketh them to hate the abounding of Foode; it must bee, that Harnet meanes it in such sorte, as that cold hath no Dominion or superioritie ouer human bodies, neither that actually it can haue. But for the cold of Hippocrates, it is the same which Galen, & all Phy-

The action of mixed bodies

Hip in Com. 1. Aphor. 14. Galen Com. 3. Aphor. 15.

Physitions (by comparison) do call a soft heate: and therefore, their weak and feeble heate, hath need of some small helpe. Euen as the slender flame of a Lampe is maintained, by putting in Oyle by little and little, but it is easily extinguished, in being smothered by a superaboundant effusion.

Natural heat the primitiue Agent.

Hitherto we haue spoken of Naturall heate, as beeing the Primitiue Agent; wherein wee haue defended for M. Ioubert, that according to the aboundaunce or tenuitie thereof, the bodye hath neede of much or little nourishment. Let vs now speake of the Primitiue humor patient, and of his Nature, and how it is subiected to this heat.

Repetition of what hath formerly ben said

With consent of all Physitians, wee haue constituted heate, to bee the first essentiall cause of our life, and haue sayde; that thee cannot product any effect of her Functions, without a proper aliment or foode, which is the radicall moysture and primitiue abounding, mingled with her heate in the seede and Menstruall blood, the principles of our generation. But by the swift flight of yeares, it greatly decayeth and diminisheth it selfe, to our harme, by continuall embracement of her heate: for retardment whereof, as we do warily renew the Oyle in the burning Lampe, euen so do we as diligently giue feeding to this heate; feeding, I say, which serueth to restore this humiditie, & deliuer it from so strict an embracing. So that, if in the bodie there be some superabounding humour, which the partes cannot any way disperse, Galen calles the same περίττωμα ὑγρὸν ἀχρήστον, and the Schooles, An vnprofitable excrement. As that, saith he, which remaineth within the little hollow places of the Bones, like the froathy humidity in the Lunges, the Glewy humour in the ioyntes, the seede in the Testicles, and Pipes whereby it is voided forth, or as spettle vppon the tongue, and Milke in the Breastes: euen so this holdeth a place of Foode, and serueth the fomentation and kindling of naturall heate, as Ioubert hath verie amplie Written in his Paradoxe, and wee our selues haue heeretofore declared. Therefore, so long as this humour remayneth in the body, there is no neede of meat or drinke; and yet it is all this while, nourished, and liueth. Which Harnet verie obstinately denieth, and reiecteth al the reasons of this demonstration. But for our owne credite and respect, without further amusing our selues, to cul out his writings by parcels, where himselfe both maketh and faigneth Obiection, answering also to them, as any newe Apprentize in Physicke might doo the like: wee will confound those reasons, which seem to bee best furnished with apparaunce: albeit, wee cannot endure any errour, how little soeuer it be, in matters of such moment.

Swifte course of yeares decayeth the life of men.

Galen in Lib. 3 Aphor: 31.

The superabounding humour, and in what manner it abideth in the body.

Harnets obstinate denial against apparant truth.

In the beginning of this propositiõn, hee imposeth on Ioubert, who hath Written, that not onely the smallest heat helpeth, to make abstinence or Fasting the more easye, but also in this regarde, that the superfluous humor, and which holdeth the place of Natural heat, might be more aboundant.

Harn in pag: 47

This dooth Harnet interprete in his sence, as if Ioubert hadde sayde, that the sole smallest heate not only helpeth vnto render abstinence the more easie: but also causeth, that the superfluous humour, which holds the place of Naturall heate, should bee the more plentifull. From whence hee deriueth this following proposition, that the least heate causeth the superfluous Humours abounding. Against which proposition, he so distilleth out his owne Spirite, and Tormentes it so tedioutly, euen as if it were on Ioubert himselfe.

Ioubert's words not truly interpreted by Harnet, but wrested to his own purpose.

Next hee makes it a great case and thinkes hee hath attempted an acte beseeming another Hercules, in shewing; that the Excrement doeth sometime supplie the place of Foode, and that Nature serues her selfe with vse thereof, and it can repaire that, which is impaired by the power of heate. In truteth, the Excrements do not fall vnder one and the same consideration. For, there be some which are quite against Nature, and vtterly vnprofitable, & which haue no resemblace at all with vs: and therefore, can neuer conuert themselues to our vse, to bee incorporated with vs. The Greekes call them by an apt name περιττώματα, as the Ordure, Vrine, sweat, &c.

In pagina 52.

The Excrements not all vnder one cõsideration.

There bee others more according to nature, which are profitable to som part of the bodie: and yet are excrements, not in regard of the whol body, but for some part thereof only. Like as the Chylus, or white iuyce, proceeding of the meat digested in the stomacke, whereof blood is engendred, after that the Ventricle is satisfied, it is sent to the Intestines, as an excrement and vnprofitable charge. When it is drawne by the Liuer, then that which was an excrement of the ventricle, is made an aliment vnto the liuer. There while blood is made of the Chylus, the Spleene and the bladder of the Gall or Choller, do attract gall both from the one and other, being their familiar nourishment, and yet the excrements of the Liuer. Hauing receiued their conuenable portion, they send away the rest as an excrement, which can doe no more Seruice, nor yeeld contentment to anie one part. The Spleene sends that which shee holds superfluous, by a little Vessel at the bottome of the Ventricle; and somtimes by the Hemorrodes, and from thence to the Intestines. The Vessell of the Gall or Choller, sends it by the Parancholidocum, to Duodenum, or Intestinum primū, and other parts. By which demonstration, Galen induceth, that all these two parts of blood (to wit, the thick and earthy, which the Spleene draweth, and the most subtle of all, drawne by the bladder of the Gall or choller, which hauing past the examen of heat, conuerts it selfe into choller) are according to nature, and do serue her to some vse, because their proper vessels were ordained for them, and to be receiued thereinto.

Excrements that are agreeable to nature, and profitable to some parts of the body.

But as concerning the sundrie kinds of choller, and all the sorts of Serosities (being the warterishnesse, or thinner partes of the masse of bloode, like to Whay in Milke, which floats vpon it, after it hath bin let out of a Vaine) because they are things vnprofitable, and out of Nature, there is not any vessell allowed to them. Only to Flegme or Rhume, nature hayled in allowing it a perticuler receptacle, although it be beneficial: but rather hath lodged it in the vaines with the bloode, there to bee boyled, and made capeable for nourishing the bodie. Haruet obiecteth, that this Rume or Flegme, holdes no part of an excrement, but is Naturall and Elementarie, to wit; a fourth humor of blood: I answere, that by conference of other humors, which are of the nature of Excrements, it appeareth manifestly, that by that place of Galen, excrementall Flegme, is meerely vnderstoode. For thus hee compareth all the excrements. As (saith he) among the diuers kindes of Gall, one is profitable and Naturall in the Creature, the other vnprofitable and out of Nature: Euen so, in Flegme, that which is sweete, is healthfull and Naturall in the liuing creature; but that which is salt, is out of Nature.

Moreouer, to approoue this, in euery concoction, there is some excrement seperated from the blood, which then shal bee the excrement of the Elementarie Flegme. For example, the Melancholy iuyce hath his excrement; the billious or Chollericke hath also his, and yet it is not that which is lodged in the stomack, and in the Intestines: for it hath not (as yet) attained so farre as the Liuer, which is the Shop or Work-house of this concoction.

In briefe, Flegme is not held to haue any perticuler Instrument, because, that if somtimes thorow want of eating, there shall be a defect of bloode, the same turning it selfe on the blood side, shall serue as nutriment to those parts. For naturall Flegme it nourisheth and maintaineth continually, not by power and want of Food only, but the parts colde and moist actually.

It is then an excrement, but profitable, which Galen in the place before alledged, saith; That abyding in the bodie it may be changed. And he doth not any way contradict the same, in the first of his Prognostickes, where hee calleth it (not as he doth heere) Nourishment halfe boyled, but an Excrement of the nourishment halfe boyled, whereof the bodie being filled, men may (so saieth Hippocrates) not only bide from eating once a day, but also much more easily, endure an extraordinary hunger.

Haruet obiecteth two things. The first in the Dropsie, named * Anasarcha (which the Latines call Intercus) all the parts of the body being swoln with flegm or Rheume; and yet notwithstanding, the patient must haue food giuen him at all times, whereof if there be any want, he seemeth readie euery houre, to giue vp the Ghost. I answere, that all Flegme is not proper to nourish the body, but only that which is sweete. Now, that of the Dropsy is salt, by reason whereof, it putrifieth and sendeth noisom sauors to the Galens comparisons.

Proofe of concoctions, by euident example.

Flegme hath anie perticuler instrumet.

Of Naturall Flegme.

Galen. vbi sup.

Galen. in 1. de Prog.

Hippocrat. 2. de acutis.

*A Dropsye vniuersallie spred ouer the body, betweene the skin, and the flesh.

The answere to Haruets obiection.

Of the Chylus or white iuice conuerted into blood.

The Spleene, and her superfluous euacuation.

Gal. 2. de fact. nat.

The two partes of bloode.

Of the diuers kinds of choller, and the Serosities.

Haruet obiection of rhume or Flegme.

The answere. Galen. De fact. nat. 2.

the parts which it toucheth. And Galen calleth it earthy, or deadly, because, beeing commixed with some other humours: he not only changeth his true and naturall colour (as Galen saith in the same place) but also his temperature. So that, both by Hippocrates and Galen, it is more often designed by the word Water, then of the Phlegme or Rhume. Vpon which occasion, Serenus calleth it Aquosus languor. And Horace tearmeth it, Aquosus albo corpore languor.

Gal in 1. de Prog. Hippoc. in Aphor. 8. 14. & sect. 2. Galen Aphor. 48. 2 coac. Serenus. Aur. in Od. Lib. 2. pag. 65.

This solution may also satisfie the obiection which he makes soone after, concerning the excrements of sick persons, which (saith he) if they haue power to nourish during the disease, wherefore then (they being consumed) doth not the sickenesse it selfe cease also? And if the sickenesse cease, why then are all the parts in the body depressed? Alas (good man) those excrements are wholly contrary to Nature, and the body desires nothing more, then to be deliuered of them, as Galen speaketh of the Sereons watterish humour. That is more strong, which hee alleadgeth a little before; that Joubert doth not conclude well, saying; that if the ventricle (being filled with the Phlematicke humour) hath no appetite: in like maner, all the partes of the body (being filled) can haue no desire or hunger. For the appetite of the ventricle (now in question) is animall appetite, which being not in the other partes, this Phlegme cannot communicate it selfe vnto them in the same kind.

Concerning men in time of sickenesse.

Gal. 2. De nat. fac.

The appetite of the ventricle.

I answere, that there are two sortes of appetites in the ventricle, the animall, and the naturall. The Animall appetite is a certaine molestation and anguish of the ventricle, proceeding from the sucking, or compression of the food; whereby (being made angry or offended) it desireth meate. But the naturall appetite, is a power, bred and borne in all parts of the body, which continually desireth what it wanteth, and is thereto agreeable. The one is appeased by vapour of the meats receiued, and by (how little soeuer) it be of substance; the other, by the only application of foode. The Animall appetite is perticuler to the sole-ventricle: the naturall is common, as well to the ventricle, as to all the other parts, whereby (being carried to the Superiour Orifice of the same Ventricle; he exciteth the Animall appetite, which serues vs as a Spurre for the taking of our meats. So long then, as the raw and Phlegmatick humour remaineth at the ventricle, and that there (by naturall strength thereof) it is boyled and brought into good estate: the tunicles (which make the body of the ventricle, in taking their competent portion; yea, and the very best thereof) doe conuert the same to their owne profit. So, the naturall appetite being contented, the animall appetite is not offended, neither complaines at entrance of the ventricle. If all the body were full of one and the same humour, all the parts (whereto this appetite is common, and communicateth the strength of this emotion) would borow thereof, and draw thence what should be seruiceable for them.

Two appetites, animall and naturall.

The appeasing of both the appetites.

The superiour Orifice of the ventricle.

The Coat-armours of the ventricle.

The body is not filled with one humour.

These are the Arguments, wherewith the learned Joubert hath fortified his opinion: Arguments, which (in my iudgement) vntill this instant houre, there could be no man found, that did know (deseruedly) how to stand against them. Whereto there are adioyned many examples, both of Plants and other Creatures: that not onely preserue themselues many daies, but many yeares also, without any nourishment outwardly taken. As in Plants; the Onion and the Garlike, &c. In Graine, Wheate, Rie, Barley, Oates, Millet, and others. In and among Beasts, Serpents, Lizards, Dormise, Beares; Crocodiles, and Camelions. The authority of which examples, Harnet laboureth to eneruate, by opposition of dissimilitude, and great disproportion, which is betweene the life of brute beasts (yea much more of Plants) and that of man: because his principall is referred to the reasonable soule, and theirs to the soule irrationall. Beside, that heat (the instrument of both) is much more noble in man, then in the vnreasonable Soule; and yet is more in the vnreasonable soule, then in the Plant. Whereto I answere, that the similitude of these examples doe very well agree together in that kind of life, whereof we speake in this place; which is, The faculty of feeding, and nourishing the body, and which is equally

The strength of Joubertus Arguments.

Examples of Plants, Grain and beasts.

Dissimilitude of life in men and brute beasts.

The similitude of are defended.

Ariſt. in Lib. de Gen. 2. Cap. 5.

In Pagina. 78.

The humour abounding in crudity.

Abounding of Phlegme to to cauſe the Apoplexie.

equally diſtributed, as well in beaſtes as in Plants, ſaith Ariſtotle. Moreouer, that they agree in kind of the cauſe, to wit, the raw and Phlegmaticke humour; where-with their bodies are as well filled, as thoſe of men. But who can, (ſaith Haruet) ſupport ſuch a great aboundance of Phlegme in Diaphragma, without a palpitation of the heart, ſickneſſe of the ſtomacke, and paine of the collicke and raines? And who can retaine them in the head, without an Apoplexie? I anſwere, that this humour, doth there ſeeth it ſelfe in the body, and yet not corrupt it ſelfe. For, beeing according to nature, it cannot create any accidents or diſeaſes againſt nature. Perhaps he will obiect, that the very abounding of Phlegme, cauſeth an Apoplexie.

Gal. in com. 3. Aphor. 20.

But (I ſay) that it is an Excrement properly of the braine, which hath not beene wont to goe lodge it ſelfe at the ventricles thereof, neither doth, except it be driuen by the ſpirit, or the vapour. He may ſay, that in theſe Natures, the Spirits are more languiſhing, and haue not power ſufficient, to make an impetuoſity ſo violent. Whereto I reply, that albeit (otherwiſe) exerciſe of the body is healthfull, according to Galen: yet notwithſtanding, if ye will exerciſe a Man full of Phlegme, or ſubiect to one and the other choller, or elſe full of blood; ye ſhall forward him (by ſuch exerciſe) either to an Epilepſie, or Apoplexie.

Concerning life.

Ariſt. in Lib. de gen. 2. Cap. 9.

A vegetatiue ſoule in man.

Ariſt. vbi ſupra.

Now, whereas he ſaith, that our life is differing from that of Plants and beaſts, and that her principle (which is the ſoul) is much more noble thē theirs: what is he that will deny it? Seeing Ariſtotle himſelfe beleiued, that ſhe onely was diuine, and came from ſomewhere elſe abroad, to lodge within our body. But becauſe he encloſeth within his obiection, the vegetatiue Soule of Plants, and the ſenſitiue of beaſts: it behoueth to let him know, that our body hath a vegetatiue Soule, and nouriſheth it ſelfe as a Plant; ſenſeth or ſenteth as as brute beaſt, and hath diſcourſe of reaſon, of which it maketh vſe like to a man. Marke but his beginning, ſaith the ſame Ariſtotle; he liueth as the Plant, and hath onely then the vegetatiue Soule. Afterward (in time) hee gaines the ſenſitiue; and at length, comes to the intellectuall and reaſonable, which bringeth all perfections with it. For he is not wholly (at one time) both animall and man, neyther an Animall and an Horſe (though this kind of reaſoning is ſcant ſeemely, in the mouth of a Chriſtian Philoſopher.) He muſt bee firſt of all an Hearbe, as a Beete or Lettiſe; afterward a Dogge, Horſe, or the like thing; and laſt of all he comes to be Cæſar or Cato.

Of mans being both animall and man

Hippocrat. de priſca. Med.

But Haruet holdes on yet, and proueth by Hippocrates, that our fore-fathers would neuer haue ſought out a proper manner of feeding for man; if one ſelfe-ſame eating and drinking had beene ſufficient, for the nouriſhment both of men and beaſts. Neuertheleſſe, he omitteth that which Hippocrates addeth; that in the firſt age, men vſed one and the ſame kind of food, as other Creatures did, becauſe the inuention of ſowing and planting was (as yet) vnknowne to them. Then they fed on ſuch Fruites, as nature (in her owne kindneſſe) produced, without any tillage. Howbeit, the omnipotent Creator of man, had a will from the beginning, that he ſhould not liue onely by the fruits of the earth; but alſo that he ſhould vſe the vnreaſonable Creatures for his nouriſhment. What would he haue Hippocr. more to ſay? That which our ancients did, declared a wil, to prouide for the infirmity of our naturall heat, which being vnable (ſometimes) to digeſt meats of ſuch crudity; is much better ſupplyed and maintained, by thoſe that are prepared and corrected by art and experience, in doing whereof, the health of man is the leſſe ſubiect to perrill. Otherwiſe, a man (if he had been vſed thereto) might feed on Hemlocke (dangerleſſe) with the Stare; and on Helleborus with the Quaile; or vſe poyſons (as Mithridates did) and not be poiſoned: for man being invred to ſuch a cuſtome, they would be to him as naturall viands.

Mens food in the firſt age, before tillage was knowne.

The care of our elders in the firſt age, for naturall heat.

What meats a man might eate in ſome kinds.

Gal. in lib. 3. de ſimpl. fact. Theophraſt. in lib. 9. Hiſt. plant. Cap. 18. Ariſt. de reg. prin.

In like manner, an old Woman of Athens (recorded by Galen) vſed familiarly to eate Hemlocke; as Thraſias did Helleborus, by report of Theophraſtus: A maide being ſent by the King of the Indiaes to Alexander, did (for long time) feede in the ſight of all beholders, on

Napellus,

Napellus, commonly called Woolfesbane, without any preiudice vnto her health.

Our Mother the earths care for our maintenance.

But without all these, hath not our good Mother the Earth, yeilded (out of her bosome) many other things necessary to maintaine life? Yes truelie hath she, and euen in such estate as shee receiued vs, when wee arriued in the Inne of this World; in the very same manner shee doth both entertaine and sustaine vs: shewing her selfe euermore benigne, sweete, indulgent, and readie to doe (whatsoeuer she can deuise) to serue our vse. When she is tilled and husbanded, what diuersity of foodes doth shee produce, apt and proper for our nourishing? How plentiously is she furnished without Tillage? What Odours? What Sauours? What Iuyces? What Colours? And yet (all this while) we will needes exercise our cruelty vpon brute beasts. We will keepe those Creatures imprisoned, on whom Nature hath freely bestowed, the large and spacious Pallace of Heauen Why are not we more curious, to make banquets in simplicity, and without Butchery (after the manner of Pythagoras) rather then warre in the Ayre; aduenture life on the Seas and Riuers, and rauage ouer the Earth, as wee doe? Our Elders report, the age which we tearm the Golden Age, was happy in this; that it sullied not her mouth with the blood of Creatures.

The earths plenty without tillage.

The freedom bestowed on Creatures by nature.

Ouid. 1. Metam

Domitian his demaund of Appolonius Thyaneus.

The Philosophers answer.

The Philosopher Appolonius Thyaneus, being demaunded by the Emperour Domitian, why he kept not the common manner of feeding, which consisted in the vse of Flesh; but rather fed on Roots and Fruites, such as the earth yeilded? Returned this answer. All that the Earth bringeth forth to vs, is wholsome and healthfull. I neede not then goe seeke after the Fowles of the Riuer Phasis, or the Francolines in Ionia. Alasse, with me (as with Countrey Horace) much better agreeeth the Oliue, gathered from the Trees fat Braunches, or Sorrell, growing in the field, or Mallowes, wholesome for wearied bodies.

In Pagin. 67. 68. 69.

Haruet pursueth, to confute the alleadged examples, saying; That that which is reported of Serpents, Dormise, &c. is meerelie fabulous. For, as concerning Serpents, that abide all the Winter in their Dennes: they nourish themselues with Earth. Bears and Dormise, they make their prouision of food in Autumne, whereon they liue like vnto the Ant. The Camelion feedes himselfe with Flyes. The Crocodile cannot liue long out of the Water, according to Aristotle, &c. Whereto I answere. That the Serpent should nourish himselfe with earth onely, the reason of the same Philosopher doth repugne. For, he saith; A mixed body cannot be nourished, with one sole and simple Element; whereto also, the successe in thinges is conformable. For we haue many times obserued, that as among Fishes, the great ones eate vp the smaller Fry: the selfe same is in practise among Vipers, Adders, Snakes, and such like. But that Serpents can liue very long without foode, Aristotle shewes the same, by experience of such as haue beene kept by Apothecaries, whereof we haue spoken heeretofore. And as concerning that which was said to the Serpent, in the third of Genesis; Thou shalt eate earth all the daies of thy life; this nothing at all concerneth our earthly Serpents, but onely the ancient Enemy to mankind, whose slauish Seruants doe eate earth, that is to say; they can relish nothing but earthly things, according as our learned Diuines haue expounded it.

Of Serpents. Of Beares & Dormise.

The Camelio The Crocodile.

Aristl. in lib. 1. de gener. Anim

A comparison of Fishes with Vipers, &c.

Arist. Anim. lib 8. cap. 4.

Gen. 3. 14.

D. Aug. in Gen.

Aristotle writes, that the Dormouse (in Winter) is not onely hid in the Caues of the earth, but also in the hollowes of Trees, and that (during this season) he fattens by sleeping. Haruet thinkes, that he eates the prouision he hath hidden, and labours himselfe against Aristotle, saying: That sleep euacuates the body, when as the ventricle is emptied, by reason of heat, which euermore consumeth moysture. But behold heere the Aphorisme of Hippocrates, which is flatly against him. They (saith Hippocrates) which in the night time doe become altered in body, and thirsty; it is best for them to sleepe, although they bee neuer so dry. For sleepe (aboue all thinges else,) doth keepe the body moyst, very pleasingly: yet not that body which is wholelie empty and dry, but that which is filled with foode, or with crude moysture. For the naturall faculty (all this while) bestoweth her vttermost power, in concoction of the meats and Aristl. in lib. 8. Hist. Cap. 17.

Hippo. in lib. 5. Aphor. 27.

How necessary sleepe is for the body.

and raw humours. Who will make any doubt then, that a ſloathfull Creature, and full of cruditie, may not fatten himſelfe by ſleeping? Pliny ſaith; It is beſt making concoction in the time of ſleepe, for gathering corpulence, that is to ſay, for fatning of the body. And Martiall, willing to waken thoſe Students, which ſleepe away (as one ſaith) the fat of the morning, hath addreſſed theſe two verſes to them.

Plin. in Lib. 11. Cap. penult.

Dormitis nimium, glires, vitulíq; marini,
Nil mirum ſi vos craſſa Minerua premit.

Martiall.

We ſee many beaſts, which (at Spring-time) comming forth of their dens; are fatter then other, becauſe they haue found the time fauourable to thē. And Galen ſaith, Women are more fat then men; by reaſon that they are more cold, and greater ſitters in the houſe, then vſually men are. Ariſtotle prooueth by two reaſons, that Bears do not eat any thing, during the time of their winter retirement: the one, becauſe they come not forth at all; the other, in regard their bellies are reſtrict, and their inteſtines empty. But Haruet wrangleth againſt the firſt; becauſe (ſaith he) they haue wherewith to feed on. But a beaſt of ſuch greatneſſe, what ſtore (I pray ye) needes there, of Roots, apples, or ſuch like, for all thoſe daies, and all thoſe months? As for the ſecond reaſon, Ariſtotle iuſtifyeth the ſame by eye-experience. For one ſaith, that their inteſtines (thorow lack of eating) do cloſe vp in ſuch ſort, that they almoſt touch or cling together. And therefore, when they come abroad againe, they feed on a certaine hearb, called * Aron, onely to get looſe their entrailes. The firſt ſeauen daies that they lie hidden in their Caues, they are ſo ſoundly ouercome with ſleepe, that although one ſmite vpon them, yet they awake not; ſo ſaith Pliny & Olaus. They ſay both, that they fatten wondrouſlie by this heauy ſleep; and principally, by licking their right foot. Which is to be vnderſtood in this manner, that after they haue paſt 14. daies in ſleepe; they ariſe and ſit on their buttocks, & liue by licking their foremoſt feete, vntill ſuch time as the Spring comes againe, and then they iſſue forth. As concerning the Male Beares, they are very fat: but not the Females, becauſe (at this time) they nouriſh their whelps. Nor are they any ſuch maſſe or lumpe, of white and deformed fleſh, which by little and litle (in licking) they bring to a forme, as ignorantly hath bin credited of antiquity: but a young little Beare, well formed, ſuch as great Scaliger witneſſeth, to haue been found (not long ſince) in the belly of a She-Bear, which one rent in pieces.

Gal. in lib. 2. de Temp.

Ariſt. in Hiſt. Anim. Cap. 17. Lib. 8.

Of the Bears feeding in Winter.

* Wake-wort to vnlooſe the Beares entrailes.

Plin. in hiſt. nat. lib. 8. Cap. 26. Olaus in Hiſt. Septentr. lib. 18

The Male Beares very fat, but not the females.

Scalig. Exerc. 615.

The ſame Scaliger, firſt (before Haruet) declareth, that the Lord John des Landes, when he was in Syria, bought a Camelion. And it was noted, that by prompt mouing of his tongue (which he can caſt and recaſt (in an Infant) out of his mouth) hee tooke a Fly that was on his breaſt. This was newes to them, who ſuppoſed it onely (among all othets Creatures) to liue without foode or drinking: and onely to nouriſh himſelfe by the Ayre, euermore faſting, without enduring any languiſhment, as Tertullian ſaith. Neuertheleſſe, it is not altogether from the purpoſe, to imagine, that he ſhould liue by the aire: becauſe he hath beene obſerued to paſſe a whole yeare together, without eating any thing, as the ſame Scaliger teſtifieth. Alſo, that after he hath yawnd or gapt, and taken ayre: hee hath ſhut his lawes, & then his belly became blowne full (like a bladder) with this ayry ſubſtance. There be ſome, that ſay, that turning himſelfe to the Sun; he ſeemes to ſwallow downe his beames, and ſo purſues them (yawning) all about. Tertullian hath auouched as much, when (ſpeaking of the Camelion) he ſaith, He nouriſheth himſelfe by yauning and yawning, he chawes, and blows vp himſelfe like a foot ball, the wind is all his food.

Exercit. 196. 4.

That the Camelion can catch Flies.

Tertul. De pal.

Scalig. vbi ſup.

Tertul. in Lib. de Mant.

The Crocodile, by the teſtimony of Ariſtotle, and (after him) Pliny, paſſeth alwaies ſixe moneths of Winter in his Caue, without eating. Ælianus ſaith, that he remaineth threeſcore daies only ſo hidden, during which time he eateth nothing. Symmachus, one of a Conſuls quality among the Romaines, cauſed Crocodiles to be broght into the Theater before the people, after hee had made them to faſt fifty daies. Long time afterward, he kept two, without giuing them any foode: reſeruing them, to haue them ſeene at the arriuall of certaine friends of his. Albeit (ſaith hee) they Ariſt. In Hiſt. An. lib. 2. ca. 13. Plin. in Hiſt. Nat. lib. 8. Cap. 25.

Symmach.in lib 8 Epist.44.

they made shew, not to liue long time without eating. As for that which Haruet alleadgeth from Aristotle, that the Crocodile, beeing out of the Water, cannot liue any long time: It receiueth interpretation by the very same place, where he writes. Albeit the Crocodile delights her selfe in the Water, and that in such sort, as she cannot liue, being enclosed out of watry places: Neuertheless, shee dyes, if she receiue not Ayre, as she is wont to doe, and nourishing her young ones out of the Water. For as much then, as she is a Creature partly watery, and partly earthy; he holds, that she is to be ranked among those Creatures, called * Amphibij, which are not of a staied Nature, whom he calleth ἐπαμφοτερίζοντα. Other wise hee should contrary himselfe hauing written before: That she spendes the day on the Land, and the night in the Water: both the one and other shee affecteth, by reason of the warme moisture she loueth. Which he would haue to be vnderstood, of the time when shee doth not hide her selfe, because cold is so contrary to her: as when it is faire seasonable weather, she must needes be on the Land in the day time, and in the water all the night.

Arist.in Hist. An.m.lib.8.cap 2.

* That liue as well on Land, as in the water L.b.2. cap.10.

I might here auouch the Indian Birds without feere, which the Sacrificers to Mahomet, did sometime make the King of the Molucques to beleeue, that it dropt downe out of Paradise: because she is not found but in vnknowne places, separated from resort of the world; in regard whereof, they of that Countrey call it, the Bird of Paradise. She liues continually in the Ayre, and neuer at any time toucheth the earth, till after she be dead: whereon then she lyeth, and preserueth her selfe (long time) without corrupting. This Bird dooth not nourish her selfe on Mushromes, & other insect thinges, as Sparrowes and Swallowes doe. For she liueth in the middle Region of the Ayre, where are no Creatures (knowne to men) whereon she may feede: but vppon the Ayre onely, or on the vapour arising from the Isles of Molucques, which doe send foorth (on all sides) a very sweete and Aromaticall sauour. Cardanus holdeth, that shee cannot liue of the ayre alone, and perfectly, because it is very subtile in those Countries. But he that gaue her the Ayre for food, hath power likewise so to thicken the aire: as to render it selfe apt enough for her nourishment.

Of the Bird of Paradise.

How the Bird of Paradise nourisheth her selfe in the Ayre.

Cardan in lib.9 cap.20.

And no lesse admirable is the Bird, which Plutarch calleth Phintaces, verie common in Persia; which hath nothing emptie in her body, but is all full of fat within (as are the * Benericks in Languedoc.) And yet notwithstanding, this Authour saith, that she liues not but of the Ayre, and of the dew therein. Aristotle the Prince of truth, writes, that in the Furnaces in Cypres, where the Melters and Casters of Copper are, they haue a little Creature, of the bigneſse of a great Fly, which they call Pyrausta, that hath Winges and foure feet. So long as there is fire in the Furnace, this worme or Fly liueth: but let it be neuer so little off from it, it dyes presently. And yet notwithstanding, this Creature is most cold, hauing no other maintenance, then the heat of the Fire onely.

Plutarch.in vit. Artoxer.

* The little Blacke-Bird, called a Gnat snapper.

Arist.in hist. Anim lib.5 ca.19 Plin.in lib. 11. cap 36.

But why should I dwell on these examples, whereof Haruet (in euery place) holds, that (by them) wee can draw no consequent to men. Peraduenture then, some examples (deduced from men themselues) may make him to acknowledge a truth. And therefore I will produce one, which is out of all scruple, and whereof Princes (worthy of beliefe) made recitall to King Henry the third, being in Poland. He had there many great Lords of France, Councellers, beside Phisitions, &c. And among others, Monsieur Pibuxius, our Deane; skilfull not onely in the Phisicke, but likewise in whatsoeuer concerned knowledge of the naturall Historie. He was then Phisition to my Lord the Duke of Neuers, and called to Counsell with the Kings owne Phisitions. From him was it, that we verbally heard this Historie, which also is written by Alexander Guaguinus of Verona, Captaine of the Foot-men in the Cittadell of Vitebcka, on the Limits of Moscouia, and in his description of the said Country.

Examples concerning men.

Manifested to Henry the the third, K. of France.

Alexand. Guagnig. Veronens.

He saith, that there are certaine people in Lucomoria (which is a Region, in the vtmost Confines of the Sarmates, towards the North) which dye (or rather remaine entranced, like Frogges and Swallowes) euery yeare, the twen-

People in Lucomoria, neere the Sarmates, that dye, or are entranced tie

ty seauen day of the month of Nouember, by reason of the extreame cold in that part of the Country. Afterward, at the Spring-times returne, the twenty foure day of Aprill, they come to life againe.

People called Gruſtintzians & Sperponomptzians.

These people make their Commercers with their Neighbours, who are the Gruſtintzians and Sperponomptzians, after this manner. When they feele the time of their entrancing to draw nere; they then locke vp their Merchandises in certaine places, and the Gruſtintzians and Sperponomptzians doe there take them, and leaue other (in their stead) of answerable value. The time beeing come of their reuiuing, they take the Merchandises left in exchange, if they perceiue they may make profit of them: if not, they demaund backe their owne againe, whereby ariseth (oftentimes) quarrels and warres betweene them. By this sleepy trance, the naturall heat in these bodies (which otherwise are accustomed to this Ayre, and boyled againe, (as Albertus Crantzius saith) is no whit extinct: because all the pores, places, passages, and conuoies (beeing lockt vp and stopt) it gathers it selfe about the entrailes, and by this Antiperiſtaſis, or repulsion of euery part; shee encreaseth her selfe, and makes her power the more vigorous for the Spring time ensuing.

The reason of this sleepy trance in this people.

Aboue all other parts of the body, the daunger lyeth principally in the braine; which hath great store of large openings, and (among others) the nostrils: were it not, that when they beginne to waxe-stiffe with cold; a tart rhume or moisture distilleth from the Nosthrils, which (by report of the said Lord Piduxius) euen as it flowes, congealeth it selfe, no lesse then the spettle doth, and so it waxeth hard, before they fall to the ground, according as Sigiſmond de Herbeſtein describeth in the Historie of Moscouia. By meanes whereof, the Nostrils and other parts beeing so lockt vp; the mallice of the ayre cannot so easily pierce vp into the braine. And if any one of them, to shunne this cold vnfriendlinesse of the Ayre, doe thinke (by couering himselfe with skins and other things) to forestal the Isicles hanging at the Nosthrils and mouth, &c. immediatly the Ayre (being exceſſiuely cold) steppes vp into the braine, and there extinguisheth the naturall heate. So that these Lucomorians, in stead of a temporall entrauncing, doe then fall into one perpetuall and endlesse. But the time being come, that the Sunne gaineth rule ouer the world, and brings againe the sweetnesse of the Spring season: the Icie moysture (at the parts fore-named) melting it selfe; heate (by little and little) insinuateth into the bones; feeling and vigour creepeth againe into all the members, and then hath the body the same Oeconomy, which it had before.

The greatest danger in the braine.

Their eyes, ears, nostrils, and mouthes, are softly frozen vp, before they fall into this trance. Sigiſ. Herb. in Hiſt. Moſcou.

Daunger in seeking to preuent this cold.

The manner of the peoples recouery.

Haruet concludeth this whole discourse, with the fasting of Moyses, Helias, and our blessed Sauiour, which (saith he) would be held as no Miracles; if (according to Nature) so long an abstinence might be endured. Ioubert hath answered, that in sicke persons, and such as are subiect to much sicknesse; long Fasting or abstinence is naturall: but supernaturall in such bodies, as are otherwise perfectlie well, and of good temperature.

Haruets conclusion of his discourse.

And Haruets obiecting the place of Auicenne, cited by Ioubert: That the same might also happen to healthfull Men. For our selues, wee will embrace Iouberts opinion in such sort, as we holde the accident heere happening among vs, occasioned by a sickenesse against Nature, and yet (in time) may be recouered. But as for men of such rare sanctitie, we are not so deuillish; as to thinke, that their Fasting should ensue by any sickenesse: but onely by the especiall will of God, and that naturall appetite is returnable againe, at such time as is limited by his prouidence.

Auicenne his opinion of healthful me.

Last of all, where he exhorteth euery one, to imitate a certaine Gentleman, who (by care and dilligence) discouered the impoſture of an Hermit in Sauoy, that (by feigned Fastings) had long time deceiued the peoples opinion: For our selues, not knowing how to goe against authoritie, of so many rare and cleare sighted Phisitions, nor how to steale into our eyes, the credence of what they haue seene: wee loue rather to referre the causes of such extraordinary workes in nature, euen to the most curious Enquisitour, then (like to the companions of Vliſſes) charmed charmed with the Fruit of the * Alysier, or Lot-tree; to serue or know no other Gods, then Edusa and Potina.

Haruets finall exhortation.

An Hermit impoſture in Sauoy.

* A Tree in Affrick, cald the Lot-tree.

CHAP. XI.

Of the authority giuen to the Germaines, to make election of the Emperour: What and who the Electors are. Also, of the manner which the ancient Romaines obserued, in consecrating their Emperors, and ranking them in number with the Gods after their death.

The Electors of the Emperor, were created by Pope Gregory the fift

POpe Gregory the fift, a Natiue of the Countrey of Saxony in Germany, & Kinsman to the Emp. Otho, to the end, that the Empire might remain in their hands, who wer of his nation, made a law (but with consent of the said Otho) as concerning the election of the Emperor: which afterward was obserued, euen to our time, and so is (as yet) maintained. Whereby it was lawfull, and permitted to the Germaines onely; to elect the Prince, that should be called Cæsar, and King of the Romaines. Also, to be stiled the Emperour Augustus; when the Byshop of Rome had approued and confirmed the election. The said Pope likewise giue authourity, to be elected by three Ecclesiasticall, and foure Lay persons, to wit: To the Arch-Byshops of Magonce, Treuers, and Colongne: And to the Marquesse of Brandenbourg; to the Count-Palatine of Rhine; to the Duke of Saxony; and to the King of Bohemia; and to their Successours in all those dignities. And the saide King of Bohemia, was added as the seauenth Electour, to take away all differences, which might happen in the election, and to iudge aboue them all.

This Law was made in the yeare 1002.

The seauen Princes Electors by their seuerall names.

Now I hold it very conuenient, being in a matter of this Argument; that I should also say somwhat in this place, concerning the maner obserued by the ancient Romaines, of inserting their Emperors in number with the Gods, after they were dead. They buried the deceased body with sumptuous Funerall pomp, making an Effigy or Image of Waxe, so neere resembling the dead Corps as possibly might bee, wan and pale, like to a sicke person. This Image was laide in an high and stately Bed of Iuory, at the entrance of the Imperiall Pallace. About this Bed (for the more part of the day) were seated in this order: first, all those of the Senate on the left side, cloathed in mourning; then on the right side, the Noble Matrones, all in white Robes, but wearing neither Chaines nor Iewels. This order was continued seauen daies together, and euery day the Phisitions came to the bed side, saying (after they had seen the Image) that he daily waxed worse and worse. The seauen daies being ended, and he reputed to be dead, the youngest Noble-men (chosen among the orders of Knights and Senators) carried the Bed vpon their shoulders; first, to the old Market place; then to Campo Martio without the Citty, where a Tabernacle was prepared, after the fashion of a Tower, on that side where the fielde was most spacious. This Tabernacle was filled within, with old dry Logges and Faggots, and a great quantity of sweet sauours: without, it was adorned with rich Cloath of Gold, faire Images of Iuory, and sundry sortes of beautifull Pictures. The Bed, and the Image in it, was shut vp within this goodly Tabernacle, and when the accustomed Ceremonies (in such cases) were finished: he who was the neerest to succeede in the Empire, hauing a lighted Torch in his hand, first began to giue fire to it, and consequently all the other, fiering it on all sides: so that, in short time it was wholy burned. Then from some high place, suddenly was an Eagle let loose, by which Bird the people verily beleeued, that their Princes Soule was carried to Heauen: And by these means, the Emperours were honoured among the other Goddes. Whosoeuer is desirous, to be further acquainted, with all the ceremonies touching this case: let him read Herodian, at the beginning of the fourth Booke of his Histories.

How the ancient Romains defied their Emperours after death.

The Imperial Bed, and the attendants about it.

The carying of the Imperiall bed.

The burning of the Imperiall Bed and Image, & the Eagles flight.

CHAP. XII.

Who first found out the Art of Nauigation; deuising Ships, Gallies, Oares, Sayles, Ankers, Rudders: And who first of al fought vpon the Sea.

Diod. in lib. 6.

NEptune inuented the Art of Nauigation, if wee may credit Diodorus, speaking thus. Neptune (as the Candians say) hauing found out the Art of sayling; leuied an Army, whereof he made Saturne chiefe Commaunder. Which hath bin the occasion, that such as succeeded him, did verily beleeue, that Neptune had full power on the Seas. The men of Misia, and the Troyans, found Skiffes, made of many pieces of wood fastned together, like to a Raft or Float-boat of Timber; whereon they began to Nauigate, passing on the Hellespont to encounter the Thracians. Some others doe giue assurance, that such vessels were first seene in the Brittain Ocean, which were made of Leather. The Sydonians builded some such of Oziers and Reeds, and with thē went not onely a Fishing; but made no doubt of sayling in them on the chiefest Seas. In a long space of time after, the Inhabitants of the Isle of Coronta, aduentured to build Gondolots of wood onely, without any Oziers or Leather skins. Pliny saith, that the Nasselles or Skiffes were first put in vse vpon the red Sea, and that King Erytheus first sayled with them among the Islands. Thus, from the beginning, men frequented the Seas. But afterward, hauing left these small Boats, wherein (at first) they had practised nauigation: they began to builde ships as great as houses, therein to trauerse all the Seas. Iason was the first that made vse of a long Ship; and the inuention thereof is (by Diodorus) attributed to Sesostris, King of Ægypt. The Erythræans deuised the Galliot, called the light-Galliot, with two Oares. The Gally (according to the opinion of Eusebius) had original, by the Samothracians, or (as Clemens will haue it) of Atlas: but Pliny saith, that Danaus brought it out of Ægipt into Greece. The Trireme, or Gallie with three Oares on a banck, was inuented by Aminocles the Corinthian. The Quadrireme, or for 4. Oares at a banke, was the Carthagenians inuention, as it is affirmed by Aristotle. That of fiue Oares for a banke, called by the Grecians πεντήρης: was first of al made by Nesichron of Salamina, and such kinde of Gallies did the Romaines build in Italie, in the time of their first wars in Affrica. The Gally of six orders, or of six Oares for a bank (which the Latines knew not how to expresse in one word, and Titus Liuius was constrained, to call it by the Greeke name Hexeres) was deuised by Zenagoras of Syracusa. The said Titus Liuius, maketh mention also, of Gallies of 7. and of eight oares for a banke; which he tearmed Hepteres, and Octeres. Nesegiton was the deuiser of them of tenne Oares for a banke. The Enneres, of eleauen Oares, were much vsed be Ptolomeus Philadelphus, who had a great number of Gallies: as some of 13. Oares, some of 14. others of 20. yea, and of thirty orders, according as Atheneus writeth. Alexander the Great, deuised the Gally of 12. orders, to wit, of twelue oares for a bank. Ptolomeus Soter inuented the Gally of fifteene Oares. Ptolomeus Philopater, that of forty Oares; and it was two hundred and fourscore cubits in length, and in height to the top, about eight and forty cubits.

Hippias the Tyrean, was the Inuenter of ships of burden, or Merchants boats, which vulgarly in Flemish, are called Hulques; and by Appian and Thucidides, they are tearmed Holcades: of which kind were the Wine-Boates, the verie greatest whereof, we tearme Bottomes or Lighters, carying sometimes fifteen hundred Tuns, and the least, which are called Lusandes, doe carry but three hundred. Vlpian calleth them Vintners Shippes. Of the same kind are the wodden Boats, for carrying of Sand, Hay, & Coales. Such Ships of burden as these, are those for the transportation of Soldiours, which Thucidides, (in his eyght Book) plainely calleth στρατιώτιδες, of carying Souldiours, that the Grecians named τοὺς στρατιώτας, which name our vulgar hath retained to this day, in taking away onely one letter: for he cals Stradiot a man at Armes, armed for lightnesse. The Hippagines or Hippagoges, were certaine Skiffes founded by the Mysians and Troyans.

Skifies of leather on the Brittish Ocean.

Gondolot is a Venetian wherry.

Plin. in lib. 7. Cap. 3.

Leauing smal Boats, they builded tall Ships.

Diod. in lib. 6.

The Light Galliot.

The Gally. Plin. in lib. 7. Cap. 56.

Plin. vbi sup.

Arist. in lib. 6.

Polib. in Lib. 2. Tit. Liuius in Lib. 7. Dec. 4.

Tit. Liu. in Lib. 7. Dec. 5.

Atheneus in lib 5. Cap. 4.

Plin. in Lib. 9.

Plutar. in vit. Demetr.

Appian de Bel. Ciuil Lib. 4. Thuci. in Lib. 6.

Vlpian in Lib. Vulgar. F. de furt.

Thuci. in Lib. 8.

Tit. Liu. Dec. 3. Lib. 4.

certaine Ships among the Greekes, for cariage of Horſes, as well on Riuers, as on the Seas, being imployed for the ſeruice of warre: which were inuented by them of Salamina, and in our language are cald Paſſe-horſes. There is another ſort of Ships, which the Latines named Actuarias naues, and Cæſar calleth them Victoria nauigia. Theſe comprehend all kinds of light Foyſts, as Brigandines and others: which onely were inuented for pleaſure, and with the ſwifteſt legerity, to cut through the Seas. Theſe Foyſtes were not ordained for any war-ſeruice, but to be as Seruitors to other Veſſels: and for this reaſon, they were named by the Greeks ὑπηρέται, as Seruants.

Cæſar in Com.

Foyſts and Brigandines.

There are many kindes of Actuary Ships, among which, are the Explorators and Speculators, which we tearme ſpies or ſcouts, being very ſwift of ſaile, and are vſually ſent to diſcouer the enemies forces. Two of theſe ſpeculatory Galliots, which were ſent forth by thē of Marſeilles: brought tidings back, that the Punicke Army was at the mouth of the Riuers entrance. The Lembus is likewiſe in number of the Actuary Veſſels, and was inuented by the Cyrenenſes. So is the Cymba or Barke, which the Phœnicians firſt made vſe of. The Celox, ſo called for her ſwiftneſſe, was firſt deuiſed by the Rhodians. The Cypriots doe attribute vnto themſelues, the inuention of the Cercuron, which is ranked in number of the Actuary veſſels: albeit Nonius Marcellus ſaith, that it ſhould be a very great Ship. The Illirians firſt founded the Squiffe, called in Latine Scapha, ἀπὸ τοῦ σκάπτειν, ab excauando; becauſe firſt of all, they began to hew them out of very great trees. The Germains which dwell about Danubius, inuented little Boats, made of hollow trees: which the neighboring Riuers made vſe of, in ſted of Ferry-Boats. The people of Cepa, inuented Oares and Skuls; and Icarus deuiſed Saiſes, though Diodorus doth ſay, that Æolus firſt found them out. Dedalus deuiſed the Maſt and Croſſeyards, with their fit furniture belonging to them. Piſeus inuented the Stem or Beak-head of the ſhip: And the Tyrrenians the Anker, which Eupalmus firſt made with two fangs or teeth. Anacharſis found out the grapling hooks or Irons for ſhips; And Typhis the Rudder, or Inſtrument to gouerne Shippes or Gallies. What elſe the Reader would further bee enformed in, concerning theſe matters, he may more amply ſee ſet downe in the Book, which Lazarus de Baif hath written of Nauall affaires. Minos was the firſt that made war on the Sea, as Pliny hath confirmed.

The Germains neere Danubio.

* A Citty of Beotia, neere Cephiſus.

Diodor. in lib. 6.

Plin. in lib. 7. cap. 57.

Plin. in lib 7. cap. 44.

CHAP. XIII.

Whence the cuſtome came, of giuing New-yeares gifts. The originall of Maſques and Mommeries: As alſo of our Shroue-tide.

THe cuſtome of giuing new-yeares Gift, to wit, the Guift whereof a preſent is made at the beginning of the yeare; came firſt from the ancient Romaines. For the Knights vſed euerie yeare, on the firſt day of Ianuary, to offer new-yeares guifts in the Capitole, to Cæſar Auguſtus, although he were then abſent: which maner of behauior, hath ſince thoſe daies deſcended to vs, albeit in ſundry kinds of vſes. For in Italy, the greateſt perſons doe giue to the meaneſt: And in England, Subiects giue to their Princes, and Princes to the King, who returneth thē ſome Gift in recompence. We imitate thoſe Ancients, in the repreſentation of ſpectacles, plaies, huntings, Iouſts, running of Horſes, & likewiſe in the reciting of Comedies, euen in the ſame manner as they did during their ſollemnities of the Quinquatria, certaine daies dedicated to Minerua. Alſo of the Megaleſian Playes, done in honoor of the great Mother of the Gods: going Masked, wearing falſe vizages through the Citty. So haue wee learned a cuſtome, to make Maskes or Maſquerados, not for a day or two, as they did in their Sacrifices; but euen for two months together before Lent: which giuing the greater licence to ſin, hath beene the occaſion of many miſchiefes each day committed, yet paſſing without any puniſhment. As if it were lawful (by theſe meanes) to be vicious, or elſe, as if men imagined that they did not ſin, becauſe their faces could not be ſeene: And as God ſaw nothing at all, who is wholly iuſt, in recompencing both vices and vertues, aſſigning paines to the wicked, and praiſes to the good.

New-yeares guifts came from the old Romaines.

Of Italy and England.

Other imitations of our Elders.

Quinquatria.

Megaleſian Playes.

Of Maskes & Maſquerados.

Maskes haue bin the cauſe of many miſchiefes.

* Ops and Terra, Rhea, Berecynthia, and Pessinuntia.

Of Mommeries.

Mimicke scoffers and Plaiers.

How the name of Mommer first rose.

Suetonius in lib. 4.

A witnesse reproued for being a Player.

The meaning of Socrates.

Knowledge of mens dispositions veiled vnder maskes

The great hurt and villainy committed vnder this colour, in pretending loue to women, &c

* I haue read, that the Corybants, Priests belonging to the Goddesse Cybele, first inuented Masques and Mommeries, & sullied their faces with blacke: from whence grew the name of smearing, which is tearmed in Italian Mascarati, a Masqued face. Varro writeth, that one of Æneas cõpanions, which he brought with him into Italy, brought likewise Mommeries first into vse, which the Peazants and Country Boores only exercised, dancing in the Sacrifices of Bacchus, wearing false vizards, made of the barcks of trees. Then the Mimicks, that is to say, Scoffers and Iesters in Playes and Enterludes, vsed such Masques and counterfeited vizards: to the end, they might the more boldly reprehend and mocke at men, and make countenances both apish and ridiculous. For the Maske could not blush, euen as yet the Italian Commedians doe obserue in their Zanies. And this name of Mommer, came of the Latine word Momus; that is, a Mocker; a very conuenable name for such masked men, who come to no mans house but to mocke, although themselues doe better deserue to bee mocked. According as Suetonius exprobrated to Nero, who by often masking himselfe, sullied the pure glory of royal Maiesty. And the very truth is, Maskes, Mommeries, & such floutings, do iustly carry infamy with them. For I haue haue heard a witnes reproched in iudgment, for hauing plaid in publike vpon a Stage, the part or person of a masked Bawd. And as concerning Maskes and Mommeries, they are nothing else, but to shew a man otherwise then he is indeed: quite contrary to the intention of Socrates, who said. Nature foiled greatly, by not making windowes in our breastes, or Lattices at the least; to the end, that by those meanes, the courage, thought, and disposition of vs all, might be discerned. But nowadaies, men study how to hide vnder these false vizards, the small iudgement which can bee gathered, either of the goodnesse or badnesse of men, by plaine appearance of their reall face; & which (in truth of nature) they know not how to dissemble so deeply, as by the aduantageable helpe and cunning of these counterfeited Masks. I speak not of the robberies and assassinates, which vnder the shaddow of these vizzards are committed. I speak not of the obscenity procured by these Masks; occasioning many times, that good women shall be solicited, and pursued in quest of their honor; yea, and in the end debauched. Some hold opinion, that ther is no better meanes of making loue to a woman, then by beeing thus masked: for then they hold thẽselues vnder safe defence, to giue Rings, Iewels, Letters, &c. to Ladies, which cannot bee free from an immodest signification. If a man would but well consider, the power and preuailance in Gyges ring, which made men to walke inuisible, and wherein was suspition of nothing else but liberty. But if to the girdles of Ladies such rings were fastned, as whilome was to the Ceston or girdle of Venus; Husbands would (by no meanes) suffer their wiues to receiue of Maskers such Girdles, which manie times are too liberally giuen them, and wherewith they are ouer-readie in girding themselues, because they thereby oblige and tie themselues to the giuers.

Example of the Ring of Gyges.

Venus her Ceston or girdle.

Here I may not forget to tell ye, that such disguisings and changings of habits, are highly reprooued by the holie Scriptures. For God menaceth malediction, against all such as vse them, speaking thus by his Prophet Sophony: I will visit all such as are clothed with strange apparell. And in Deuteronomy he maketh this prohibition. The woman shal not wear that which pertaineth to a man, neither shal a man put on womans raiment: For all that doe so, are an abhomination vnto the Lord thy God. But we doe very badly obserue the commaundements of God. And herein, England stands exempted only, for euer hauing there vsed any such maskings, or euer will admit them. And the English-men haue a law, which forbiddeth any man so to maske himselfe, vpon the paine of life.

Disguising of apparell reproued by the Scriptures.

Sophon. cap. 1. 8

Deut. 22. 5.

England only exempted from such Masquings.

Now, because Lent followeth so suddenly after Shrouetide; we Christians are then very curious, in eating dainty meates, beeing ouer-much addicted to care for the belly, eating immeasurably without any necessity: euen as if wee would supply abstinence before hand, with that which ought to follow, after we haue gluttonously deuoured flesh, like brute beasts. For Shrouetide is held but for a kind of little ceremony, yet to too great abuse, by hauing all thinges then

Of Shrouetide and Lent among vs Christians.

The extream exceſſe of Shroueride, more then at any other time.

then in extreamity of exceſſe, feeding and conſuming, as if they then made a celebration for the burſting of their own guts; according as one hath very well ſaid. This is ſo much the worſe, in that it is done among Chriſtians, and that they ſhould make ſuch ſlender eſteeme of Lent: without any feare of God; in meere contempt of the Magiſtrate, and tranſgreſſing the ordinances of the Church, at ſuch time as good and religious lawes are appointed, for a fit and conuenient ſeaſon of Faſting.

CHAP. XIIII.

When, and what time it was, that Hereſies had their Originall and beginning: And who was the firſt Heretick & Schiſmatick.

Vnity & concord broken by diuerſity in opinion.

NO Citty, no people, no Commonweale, did euer continue in ſuch vnion and concord: but the Cittizens (about ſome occaſion) haue been deuided into diuerſity of opinions; a matter ſo euident and notorious, to ſuch as are skilfull in Hiſtories, as there needeth no further ſpeech thereof. From hence (then) did Sects deriue their ſourſe and originall, which made deuiſion both in Citties, and in Religion, and was tearmed by the Greeks, Hereſies of choiſe: becauſe euery one made election of his maner of life, and which was beſt to his own liking, as among the variable ſects of the Philoſophers. The people of the Iewes in like maner, albeit they held one and the ſame Law: yet were they deuided into diuers ſects, as much to ſay; as Hereſies, to wit; the Phariſies, Eſſeans, Sadduces, Samaritaines, Nazarians, and Herodians. But be it howſoeuer, we haue the Apoſtles of God Authours of our Religion, who made no election or choiſe of any, to be receiued or embraced after their fantaſie: but faithfullie taught all people and Nations, the Doctrine of Ieſus Chriſt, truely God and Man. It is not then lawfull for vs, to introduce or elect any nouell things: but to follow thoſe, which haue bin ordained by the holy Apoſtles, & confirmed by councels of learned Biſhops and Fathers. Wherefore, and in this reſpect, the vocable Hereſie, is eſteemed among vs impious. And therefore our Diuines or Theologians, do tearme that Chriſtian an Hereticke, that ſhall deuiſe or follow any Sect, contrary to the foundation of Chriſtian Religion. Of which accurſed impiety, to wit, of all Hereſie, Symon the * Samaritaine, called the Sorcerer; was chiefe Authour, with his immodeſt Wife Selena, his companion in all wickedneſſe, and whom he had taken out of the common Stewes.

Hereſies of choiſe.

Sects among the Iewes.

The Apoſtles of God.

Election of nouelties vtterly prohibited.

Definition of an Hereticke.

* He was of a village in Samaria, called Triton, according to Tertullian lib. 1. de Hereſ.

This Symon Magus, cauſing himſelfe to be baptized in Samaria, by Philip, one of the ſeauen Deacons; was the firſt of all that endeuored himſelfe, to corrupt the Chriſtian faith. And of him, al ſuppoſts and counterfeits, were tearmed Symoniacques, who would ſell the grace of the holy Ghoſt, and preached, that our nature proceeded not from God; but of (I know not what) power from aboue, and ſupernaturall vertue. In this maner, Symon (from the beginning) ſowed a deadly poyſon, only to kill the roots of encreaſing Religion. Againſt which hurt, the Apoſtles could make no better reſiſtance, then by rooting vp & diſanulling it altogether: becauſe, that continually there would bee falſe Prophets, of whom we ſhould be well adviſed, and ſtand vpon our guard; Being ſuch as come vnto vs in the habit of ſheepe, but inwardly are rauenous wolues. This Simon well perceiuing, that the Apoſtles gaue the bleſſed Spirit to ſuch as they touched, who were ſound of hart, and had a good zeale to be conuerted: eſſaied to obtain that of S. Peter by the price of Mony, which was not to be purchaſed but by faith and piety. But the Apoſtle ſaid vnto him. Thy Mony periſh with thee, becauſe thou thinkeſt, that the guift of God may be obtained with Mony. Thou haſt not any part in this faith: for thine heart is not right before God. Simon being thus expulſed from S. Peter, hee remained (alwaies after) his ſworne enemy. Comming frō Samaria to Rome, in the raigne of the Emp. Claudius: he began there to exerciſe his works of Magicke, becomming thereby very famous, and much renowned. Within a while after, in the time of the Emp. Nero, he made himſelf better knowne and reuerenced: ſo that he was reputed as a God in the Citty of Rome, and a Statue was erected in his honour, beeing placed ouer Tyber, between two Bridges, bearing this inſcrip-

Symon Magus was chriſtned in Samaria by Philip, one of the ſeauen Deacons.

Chriſts admonition of falſe Prophets. Math. 7. 15.

Symons dealing with S. Peter.

Acts 8. 20. 21.

Symon Magus his going frō Samaria tō Rome.

Read Iuſtine Martir in his Apologies.

tion aloft: TO SYMON THE HOLY GOD. In the end, he grew to ſo great and audacious folly, that hee dared to contend with S. Peter, in working of Miracles. And as he imployed his Art, to raiſe a dead Childe to life, which was neere of kinne to Nero: he made it to ſtirre a little, but the bodie budged not a iot from the place, being ſtiffe, and ſtretched out long. But S. Peter, after he had called on the name of Chriſt: raiſed the dead child to life. For which Miracle, Symon (moued with no mean fury) made an offer, that he would flye in preſence of all the people, from Mons Capitolinus, to Mons Auentinus: prouided, that S. Peter would follow him, and that this piece of worke ſhould declare, which of them two was beſt beloued of God. Thus Symon (by his diabolicall Art) did put forth himſelfe to fly, and Saint Peter exalting his hands to Heauen, deſired of God, that he would not permit ſo famous a people to be abuſed, and deceiued by ſuch Magicall charmes. His prayer being ended, the Magitiō hauing fled halfe way between the two Mountaines: fell downe to the ground, and brake one of his Legs, and through the pain thereof, he died ſoone after in Affrica, whither hee was caried by his owne followers, after he had receiued ſo great a ſhame. He held horrible propoſitions, which are particularly declared in Ireneus, Epiphanius, Philaſter, and Theodoret; and therefore, to auoyd prolixity, I ſpare but onely to ſpeake of them heere. But very true it is, that Ireneus, in the Preface before his third Booke of Hereſies, ſaith. That Symon was the Father of all Heretickes. And in another place he writeth: That all Hereſies came of him.

Many ſorts of Sects iſſued from this Monſter, to wit; the Doſitheans; the Cleobanians; the Georthenians; the Masbothenians; the Adrianiſts; the Eutychiſts; and the Caniſts: all which ſeuerall ſects (hauing forged ſome peruerſe mutations of this one wicked deuiſer) could haue no long continuance, but ſoon fel into vtter obliuion. There was alſo in the Iſle of Paphos, a falſe Prophet, a Iew Magitian, and a Diſciple to Symon Magus, named Elymas Bar-Iehu, who deceiued many perſons by his illuſions and enchantments, and reſiſted againſt the Doctrine of the Goſpell; when he perceiued that the Proconſull Sergius, leaned ſomewhat to the Doctrine which Paul preached. Who being a man led by the ſpirit of God, expreſſing grauity in his countenance, and fixing his eyes ſtedfaſtly on Elymas, thus reproued him ſaying. O man, ful of al fraud and miſchiefe, child of the Deuill, and enemy of all righteouſneſſe: wilt thou not ceaſe to peruert the ſtrait waies of the Lord? Now therefore behold, the hand of the Lord is vpon thee, and thou ſhalt be blind, and not ſee the Sun for a ſeaſon. And immediatly there fell on him a miſt and darkneſſe, and he went about, ſeeking ſome to lead him by the hand. Act.13.10.11.

Menander, diſciple to Symon Magus, excelling his Maiſter in deuilliſh Arts.

After Symon Magus, ſucceeded a certaine Samaritain, named Menander, who in the time of Titus ruling the Empire, abuſed many people with falſe doctrins: going beyond his Maiſter in malice and deuilliſh Arts, making very admirable enchantments. He made his vant, that the Angels were vanquiſhed by his Magick. He tearmed himſelfe to be the Sauiour, that deſcended from Heauen for mens ſaluation; and no man could conquer Deuils, without beeing armed by him in Magick art, and made immortall by his Baptiſme, which he deliuered after a contrary maner. Euſebius writeth, that the maine end of his Hereſie, tended to obſcure the merits of the Son of God Chriſt Ieſus, and the doctrine concerning the peoples ſaluation, and the Reſurrection. Euſeb in lib.3. Cap.26.

Nicholas the Proſolite of Antioche, of whom came the Nicholaitaines. Acts 6.5.

It is ſaid, that the Hereſie of the Nicholaitaines, had his beginning from Nicholas the Proſelite of Antioche, one of the ſeuen Deacons, which were inſtituted with S. Stephen by the Apoſtles: vnder the Empire of Domitian, and Pontificacy of Anacletus, about the yeare of our Lord, 83. This man beeing iealous of his Wife, was reproued by the Apoſtles, before whom he brought her, and there forſooke her, to him that would haue her. And hence it came, that ſuch as (inconſiderately) followed his Act, and embraced his Hereſie: did repute it lawfull, to haue their wiues common, and to paillardiſe impudently. And yet, according as Euſebius declareth, Nicholas neuer thought to do any ſuch deed, neither euer had conuerſation with any other Woman, but her to whom hee was eſpouſed. But as honeſt a man as he Euſeb. in lib.3. Cap.29.

was,

Symon contended with S. Peter in working Miracles

Symon Magus flyeth in the Ayre.

S. Peter prayeth to God.

Symon falleth, and died ſoon after in Affrica.

Ireu. in Præfat. lib.1. de Hereſ. & in cap.20.

Sects that enſued Symon Magus by ſeuerall forgeries.

Elymas the Sorcerer in the Iſle of of Paphos.

was, and full of pietie, being very obedient to the Apoſtles: he brought his wife in publicke before the Apoſtles, to reiect the crime impoſed on him, and to purge himſelfe, becauſe it was ſaid, that he was iealous of hir. It was alſo to demonſtrate, that carnall delectation was more to bee contemned, then followed. This Hereſy then proceeded of a falſe immitation. Theſe Nicholaitans were in Aſia, and S. Iohn maketh mention of them in his Apocalipſe, where ſpeaking of the Church of Pergamus, hee ſaith: Thou haſt them that hold the Doctrine of the Nicholaitans. ſaint Ignatius, in his Epiſtle to the Trallyans, ſpeaketh thus: Flye from thoſe moſt foule Nicholaitaines, louers of voluptuouſneſſe, wicked Calumniators. Read Rupertus alſo vpon the Apocalipſe, what mention there he maketh of them.

Clemens in lib.3

Nicephorus in lib.3. Cap. 15.

Apoc.2, 15.

S. Ignat: in Epi. ad Tral.

Rupert. ſup Apoca lib:4 cap:9

Cerinthus, another Hereticke, well invred to wicked manners, affirmed, that it behoued to obſerue Circumciſion, contrary to the precept of Saint Paule to the Galathians, where he ſaith; If you bee circumciſed, Chriſt ſhall profite you nothing. And in the matter of Baptiſme alſo, wher it is ſaid, God is not pleaſed that wee ſhoulde fall into this damnable Hereſie, which falſly affirmeth, that wee muſt obſerue the Lawe with the Goſpel; and Circumciſion with Baptiſme; and that (neceſſarily) we muſt keepe the Law of Moiſes. This Cerinthus ſayde, that the God of the Iewes was not God, but an Angell: And that Chriſt was the naturall ſonne of Ioſeph, and of Mary; & man only, hauing in him nothing more then other men, onely he ſurpaſſed them in Wiſedome and Vertue.

Cerinthus the Hereticke, of whom came the Cerinthians

Galath. 5, 2.

Extranag. Bap. Cap. Maiores:

Tertul. in lib:2 cont. Heref.

The Hereſies of Cerinthus in his doctrin.

Hee taught moreouer, that the Kingdome of Chriſt ſhould be earthlie, after the reſurrection, wherein the Saints ſhold liue at Ieruſalem, with iouiſſance of all delights, aboundance of meats, women, and all temporall commodities: in which eſtate (he ſaide) they ſhould continue the ſpace of a thouſand yeares. And for this cauſe, the Diſciples and followers of this Cerinthus (who were in their full power in the raigne of the Emperor Adrian, and Pope Xixtus, firſt of that name, & about the yeare of our Lord, 130.) were called Chiliaſtes, that is to ſay, Millenarias. Saint Marke in the twelfth Chapter of his goſpell, reproued the foreſaide Sect, ſaying; In the Kingdome of Heauen, neyther Men marry, nor wiues are married, but are like vnto Angels.

The Diſciples of Cerinthus, at what time they floriſhed

Thouſand-yeares-men.

Marke 12, 25

It ſhould appeare, that the Mother to the Sons of Zebedeus, was attainted with this Hereſy of Cerinthus, to wit; that the Kingdome of Ieſus Chriſt was earthlie: when ſhe deſired, that her two Sonnes might ſit, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, in his kingdom. Hiſtorians haue left no memory, of what Countrey or Nation he was. I thinke notwithſtanding, that he was a Iewe and in the number of them, who (as it is ſaid in the Acts of the Apoſtles) deſcending from Iudea, taught the Brethren, ſaying; Except ye be circumciſed after the maner of Moyſes, ye cannot be ſaued; about whoſe diſſention, the firſt Counſell was Celebrated by the Apoſtles.

The Mother of Zebedeus children ſuppoſed to be a Cerinthian.

Cerinthus imagined to be a Iew.

Acts 15, 2.

It appeareth, that this Cerinthus liued in the time of Saint Iohn the Euangeliſt, by that which is teſtified by S. Ireneus, when ſpeaking of S. Polycarpus, he ſayth; That S. Iohn, comming once to the Bathes, found there the Heretick Cerinthus in company of his followers, diſputing verie vehemently, and like a bolde Blaſphemer, impudently denied Ieſus Chriſt to be God. Saint Iohn ariſing, admoniſhed ſuch friends of his as were there, to depart out of that place with him, for God would no longer ſuffer ſuch impudent blaſphemies. And ſo ſoone as they were gone out of the doors ſuddenly the houſe fell to the ground, and ſlew Cerinthus with his adherents: which was a manifeſt example of the Diuine vengeaunce againſt them, who being full of impietie, blaſphemed the name of God, and his Holie Doctrine, which the iuſt wrath of God woulde not permit to paſſe vnpuniſhed.

S. Iren. in lib. 3 Cont. Her. cap. 3

Cerinthus an horrible blaſphemer.

The death of Cerinthus, and ſome of his followers.

The Ebionites began about the eight yeare of Ieſus Chriſt, vnder the Empire of Titus, & Prelacie of Anacletus. A certaine man, named Ebion, was Authour of that Hereſie, which proceeded of a commixture with the Iewiſh Religion. Nicephorus ſaith, that they were called Beggers, according to the word Ebion, which by interpretation is a Begger, beecauſe they were poore, beggerly, and deſtitute of true faith. They maintained, that Ieſus Chriſt was not before his Mother. To confound and deſtroy ſuch an erroneous opinion, Saint Iohn who wrot his goſpell laſt of all, being deſired by the Prieſts of Aſia, and willing to declare the Diuine Nature

The Ebionites came of Ebion the Heretick.

Niceph. in lib. 3. Cap. 13.

The Hereſie of the Ebionits

Nature of Christ, began to speake aloud thereof, in this manner; In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and God was the word. They wold receiue no more of the New Testament, but the Gospell according to Saint Mathew, and reiected the Epistles of Saint Paul, whom they tearmed an Apostat, because he reuolted from the Law of Moyses. These members of Sathan preached also, that men ought to keepe the Lawes and manners of the Iewes. This Sect began acording to the testimony of Epiphanius, in the Village of Cocaba, and spread it selfe thorough the Region of the Bisanites, after that Ierusalem was destroyed.

Afterward, about the year of our Salnation, one hundered and nine, in the time of Thelesphorus, Byshop of Rome, and first of that name, Martion, a Stoycall Phylosopher, a Natiue of Pontus, & Sonne to the Bishop of the said country, sowed his Heresie, and followed the Errors and Blasphemies of Cerdon and Valentine, who liued in the time of Martion. And some say, that they were all three together in the Cittie of Rome: Albeit some others do hold, that they came thither one after other. But Eusebius sayeth, that all of them came thither vnder Higinus, in the yeare of our Lord, one hundered forty three.

Martion held the same opinion, as the Gnosticques did, and made profession of Cerdons Heresie, from whose hand hee receiued it: but hee added something thereto, out of his owne craftie Braine. Cerdon and Martion were so bolde in folly, as to say: That there were two beginnings, and two Gods; one good, and the other bad: the good God did perfourme good thinges, and the bad God, wicked thinges.

Moreouer (as Ireneus sayeth) Cerdon maintained, that one of those Gods was iust, and the other euill. And, that that God, which was fore-told by the Lawe and the Prophets, was not the Father of Iesus Christ: and that the God which made and created Heauen was knowne, but the Father of Iesus Christ was vnknowne. And the cause which mooued Cerdon to say, that one of the Gods was good and iust, was: That the iust GOD had commaunded in the Law, that an eie should be taken from him, who did put out another mans eye, and a tooth taken for losse of anothers tooth. But the God which he called good, had commanded in the Gospell, that a man shoulde turne his right Cheek, to him that had smitten his left: And to him that had taken away his Coate, he should giue him his cloak also.

Besides, the iust God had appointed men to loue their Friends, and hate their enemies: but the good God had enioyned them to loue their enemies. Martion agreed heerein with Cerdon. But Epiphanius addeth, that Martion had set downe three beginninges, to wit; the first inuisible, the second visible, or the worker; the thirde, a meanes betweene the inuisible and visible, which was the Deuill. Theodoret the Byshop affirmeth, that Martion had forged foure increate substances, and taught his Disciples (saith Iustin Martir) to deny God the Creator, and that they must belieue in another God much greater then the Creator.

It is further auouched, that he forged two Christes: One that was reuealed in the time of Tyberius, for saluation of the Gentiles: the other, he whom the Creatour had destinied, and should one day come to re-establish the state of the Iews. This Hereticke, affirmed Christ to bee borne, and had endured only by opinion and imagination, and onely in the shape of a seruant, but not in verie deede. And his reason was (as himselfe saide) that Nature would neuer suffer, that a Virgine should bring forth a Childe. For which blasphemies, and other detestable propositions, held by this wicked Martion, Ireneus called him, The Mouth of the Deuill. The Martionites his followers, dared to maintaine, that the Serpent was better, and more excellent then the Creator, because the Creator did forbidde to participate of the Tree of knowing good and Euill, and the Serpent freelie did permit it.

As concerning the Heresye of Valentine, a Platoniste, and the imitater of Basilides, Carpocrates and Prodicus, hereticks; it had beginning in the sixte yeare of the Empire of Antoninus Pius, and in the yeare of our Lord, an hundred forty sixe. This wicked man saide, that there were many Gods, because the Prophets hadde tearmed God by diuers names, to witte; Eloy, Sabbahot, Adonay, and others. He laboured to prooue, that God the Creator

His reason for the good God

Epiphan. lib. 4. Three beginninges maintaind by Martion.

Foure increaned substances.

Tertul. in lib. 4. cont. Martion.

His blasphemous opinion concerning Christ.

Iren. in lib. 3. cap. 14.

Valentine the Hereticke.

Heresy of many Goddes.

Iohn 1, 1.

Tertul. in lib. de Preser. de heres.

Ireneus in lib. 1 Cap. 26.

Of Martion the Heretick.

Cerdon and Valentine, Hereticks.

Eus. in l. 4. c. 30.

The Gnosticks.

The Heresie of Cerdon and Martion.

Ireneus in lib. 1 Cap. 26.

The reason of Cerdons opinion of the iust God.

tor of the world, was another God, then he that was the Father of Christ. And becauſe it is ſaid in the Goſpell: No man hath knowne the Father, but the Sonne; by this place, he ſaide, it was very likely, that the God knowne of the Prophets, and declared by them; was not the Father of Ieſus Chriſt. He ſaid moreouer, that the Sonne of God brought his fleſh downe from heauen with him, and receiued nothing of the Virgin Mary: but paſſed thorow her, as water dooth in a Brooke or Chanell. And therefore he vſed to ſay in this manner: Ieſus, borne by the Virgin, but not of the Virgin. He was of opinion, with one Marke, a Sorcerer and an Heretique, that mens ſoules onely were ſaued, and not their bodies. And his reaſon was, becauſe Saint Paule ſaid, That fleſh and bloud could not inherite the Kingdome of heauen. Before ſuch time as Valentine came to Rome, he had declared his peruerſe Doctrine, and left ſome ſeedes thereof in ſundry partes of Egypt, to wit: in Atrepatia, Proſopatia, Arſenoria, and Thebais, which are the inferior partes of the maritime Region, and vnder the gouernment of the Alexandrianopolites. He and his ſectaries vſed all thinges in common, and at free liberty, hauing their wiues common, and addicted themſelues inordinately, to all kinds of villainies, Whordomes. Addulteries, and Inceſts. His ſucceſſours were Ptolomeus, Secundus, Heracleon, Baſſus, Colarbaſus; and many ſects (of very ſtrange Names) yſſued out of this Schoole of Valentine: As the Barbeliotes or Borborians, Naaſinians, Stratonitaines, Phemionitains, Sethianiains, otherwiſe called, Ophites, Caimnians, who commended Caine and Iudas, Antitactes, and Perates.

In the time of Pope Pius, firſt of that name, the hereſie of the Cataphrygians beganne and encreaſed, in the ſeauenth yeare of the Emperour Commodus, and after the incarnation of our Lord, one hundred, eighty fiue yeares. The hereſie of Apolinarius, was the occaſion and entrance thereof. And theſe Cataphrygians enſued the heretike Montanus, who became Frantique and diſtracted in his ſences, by hauing ſeene ſome viſion; and admitted mad women into his company, namely; Priſcilla, and Maximilla, that ſtiled themſelues by the Title of Prophoteſſes, the more eaſily to allure men into their errours. Theſe were called Montaniſts, who held a ſtrong opinion, that the Holy-Ghoſt was not giuen to the Apoſtles, but only to them.

At the verie ſame a man named Tatian, a Syrian by Nation, and very learned, who had read Rhetoricke at Rome, with great honor and grauitie, puffed vp by a fooliſh perſwaſion of eloquence and ambition, ſeperated himſelfe from the Church, and became the chiefe of the Encratites hereſie. A name but badly agreeing with their actions; and which is as much to ſay, as men of abſtinence. They would drinke no Wine, and abſtained from eating fleſh, and all other things that had a ſoule. Neuertheles, they would giue Licenſe to all filthie ſinnes; and ſhaddowing themſelues vnder this modeſt and honeſt name, condemned Marriage, ſaying; that it was an inuention of the Deuill, and that a woman was the Workemanſhippe of the Deuill, or Sathan.

By a verie ridiculous reaſon, theſe Encrates ſaide they, were followers of Ieſus Chriſt, becauſe hee was neuer married. There were other Hereticks that deſcended of this Tatian, and hee was the author likewiſe of their Sect, who were named Hydoparaſtes, becauſe they preſented water in ſtead of Wine, in celebrating the Supper. And ſome others were of this band, in the quarters of the higher Eaſterne Countreyes, who were named Seuerians; of a certaine man called Seuerus, that helde all the opinions of Tatian and of the Encarites.

They beleeued no part of the Olde-Teſtament, nor the reſurrection of all Fleſh, neyther would they drinke anie Wine, becauſe they were fooliſhly perſwaded, that the Deuill and the earth had brought foorth the Vine. They helde Opinion, that man was compoſed of two parts: One by God, and the other by the Deuil (to wit;) that part from the Nauill vpward, was the work of God; and that part thence downward, the worke of Sathan.

Florinus and Blaſtus, two other Hereticks, continued on the Hereſy of Valentine, about the time of the Prelacy of Eleutherius the firſt. Ireneus Wrote againſt them both, to wit; againſt Blaſtus, in an Epiſtle bearing Title of Schiſme: and againſt Florinus, in another Epiſtle of Math. 12,17.

His Hereſie concerning Chriſt, & the bleſſed virgin

Marke a Magitian and an Hereticke.

The ſpreading of his hereſies.

The ſucceſſors of Valentine, & Sectes iſſuing out of his Schoole.

The Cataphrygian Hereticks.

Apolinarius the Hereticke.

Montanus the Hereticke.

Priſcilla and Maximilla feined Propheteſſes.

Tatian the chiefe of the Encratites. Ireneus in lib. 2 de hereſ. ca 30. Hier. ſup. Amos & Epiphanius in lib 1 con. 30 Hereſ.

Falſe imitaters of Ieſus Chriſt.

Hereticks called Hydroparaſtes.

Seuerians Hereticks.

Nicephorus in lib. 4. cap. 4.

Man compoſed of two parts.

Florinus and Blaſtus, two Hereticks.

Euſeb. in lib. 5. Cap. 15.

of the Monarchy. Wherein hee declared, that the opinion which he helde of God (to be the worker of euill) was falſe. For Florinus and Blaſtus both held, that God was the Author of euill things, contrarie to this ſaying; GOD hath made all things good.

The Helcheſaites, ſo named of a falſe Prophet, called Helcheſaus, divulged their Hereſie, in the time of Pope Fabian the firſt. Theſe men did altogether reprooue the Apoſtle Saint Paul, renewing the errors of Cerinthus, Ebion, and of the Nazarians, ſaying; It was no ſin to denie Ieſus Chriſt in the time of perſecution, becauſe it was a matter of no importance; prouided, that a man had a good and ſound heart, with a willing intention to continue in faith. And for proofe heereof (ſaide they) God hath more regard to the heart, then to the tongue. Origen confounded their errors, as likewiſe he did thoſe of ſome others, who affirmed, that the ſoules of men died ſo ſoon as their bodies: and yet afterward, ſhould newly be raiſed againe with thoſe bodies, in the generall reſurrection.

From ſuch priuate and perticuler opinions in men, which wee call Hereſye, came thoſe publick diſcords, called Sciſmes in the Greeke Language, whereof Nouatus (a Romaine Prieſt) was the Author. This man, ſeeing himſelfe fruſtrated in the attempt of a Byſhoppricke, which hee vnder hand laboured for, and being verie much offended, that he could not attaine to ſuch a dignity (albeit hee faigned another matter which hee hadde then in his heart) raiſed vp a new hereſie, drawing vnto him ſome honeſt meaning Prieſts, to aſsiſt him with their ayde and fauour. But they, hauing well perceiued the ambition, periuries, deceipts, & lies of this affronter, ſeperted themſelus from him, and returned againe to the church, only ſuch excepted, as found themſelues euery way equal to him. He would needs enforce, that all ſuch as followed his ſect, ſhould be called Catharians, that is to ſay, pure and cleane perſons. He condemned ſecond Marriages, and ſaide moreouer, that ſuch men ought no more to be receiued into the Church, as had once falne, or were in Apoſtaſie, althogh they were repentant therefore. And by this place of Scripture, I will diſclaime ſuch as ſhall diſclaime me, hee made his foundation, to proue, that the repentance of ſuch as had falne, was vaine, and of no value. Vpon this occaſion, a Counſell was celebrated at Rome, of ſeauenty Byſhops, and of as many Prieſts, beſide many deacons: by whom, the hereſie of Nouatus, and of Nouatian his Diſciple, was reprooued as falſe: becauſe (according to the example of Ieſus Chriſt, al repentants ought to be pardoned, and then were all of that Sect condemned as Schiſmatickes and Hereticks.

Thus Nouatus, in the yeare two hundered fifty fiue, was Authour of the firſt Schiſm, as Saint Cyprian witneſſeth, writing to Cornelius, where after he had ſpoken many things, he addeth; This is the ſame Nouatus, that kindled the fire of Diſcord and Schiſme. Socrates in the 4. Book of his Eccleſiaſticall hiſtory, Writeth; That Nouatus was executed to death, in the time of the Emperor Valerian. And yet not withſtanding, his hereſie extended verie farre, and laſted a long time, before it could be laid to ſleepe.

In the time when Sixtus held the See of Rome, neere to Ptolomais there aroſe a falſe Doctrine, full of blaſphemies, againſt God the Father, and Ieſus Chriſt, denying him to be the Sonne of God. & begotten before all other Creatures, and taking away alſo the intellect of the bleſſed Spirit. The Sectaries of this doctrine were tearmed Sabellians, of Sabellius, the Scholler to one Noetus: and it had been debated in Affrica, by Praxeus and Hermogenes, before there was any ſpeech of Sabellius. He held, that the Father, the Sonne, and the Holy-Ghoſt, were onelie one ſubſiſtance, and one perſon, hauing three Names. And to approoue this, he tooke his reaſons out of the Olde and New Teſtament, though ill vnderſtoode, and worſe applied, as theſe that enſue. I am God, and there is none other then I: I & my Father are one: Heare Iſrael, the Lorde thy God is only God, I am the God of your fathers: I am the firſt, and wil be heereafter. Thou ſhalt haue no other Gods before mee. They ſhal worſhip in thee, and make prayers in thee: for there is no other but God. I am in my Father, and my Father in me. Saint Baſile writing to the Neoceſarians, reporteth another reaſon and foundation, of this peruerſe opinion in Sabellius, which is this: Becauſe our Lorde Ieſus Chriſt had ſaide; Go, teach all Nations, baptizing them

The Helcheſaits, hereticks

Theſe men were in the yeare, 230. Euſeb. in Hiſt. Eccleſ. l. 6. ca. 28 Nicephorus in lib. 5. cap. 24.

Nouatus a Romaine Prieſt, the author of Schiſme.

Nouatus his ambition and lewdnes perceiued, and therefore forſaken by ſom of his followers.

Catharians, vnſpotted people, and their errors.

A Counſell holden at Rome againſt Nouatus, & his ſcholler Nouatian.

S. Cypr. in Epiſt. ad Cornel.

Socrat. in lib. 4. de Hiſt. Eccleſ. Anno 247.

Sabellius the Hereticke, of whom came the Sabellians.

The Hereſie held by Sabellius.

S. Hillar. in lib. de Trinit.

S. Baſil in Epi. ad Neoceſ.

them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy-ghoſt. Hauing ſaid (quoth he) in the Name, and not in the Names; it is not therefore conuenient, that there ſhould be three perſons. Was not this a goodly Conſequence?

Nepot a Byſh. of Egypt, an Hereticke.

There was likewiſe, one of the Byſhops of Egypt, named Nepos; who fel into the error of the Chiliaſtes, determining certaine thouſands of yeares, for pleaſures and voluptuous delights, and ſaying; that the Saints ſhoulde raigne on earth with Ieſus Chriſt, in all kinds of Delectations. Which he ſuppoſed, to haue well approued by the Apocalipſe of S. Iohn, and dared alſo to write a Booke, which hee entitled of Allegoriſtes. This hereſy was long time much debated in the Citty of Arſenoria in Egypt, and the Sectaries thereof were called Nepotians, according to the name of the Author.

This was in the yeare of Ieſus Chriſt, 264.

Paulus Samoſatenus reuiued the hereſy of Artemon.

At the ſame time, Paulus Samoſatemus, a Byſhop of Antioche, began to renew the hereſie of Artemon, to gratifye Zenobia, Queen of the Palmyrians, whom the Perſians after their victorie, obtained againſt the Romaines, had eſtabliſhed as their Regent in Syria. He was of the ſame opinion with the Iewes, who reiected not the hereſie of Arteman.

Paulus Samoſatenus conuinced, and his Hereſy condemned.

The Byſhoppes were aſſembled many times in Antioche, to refute the errors of this Paulus. And in the laſt Counſell congregated againſt him, being in the yeare, 273. He was publickly conuinced, & his hereſie condemned: he was named Samoſatenus, in regard of Samoſata, a City in Meſopotamia of Syria, ſcituate on the Riuer of Euphrates, whereof he was a Natiue.

The Hereſye of Manes the Perſian, of whom came the Manideans.

In the fourth yeare of the Emperour Aureleanus, the error of the Manicheans did ſpread it ſelfe in the world. Of which hereſie, one Manes a Perſian, was the author, and of him, S. Auguſtine (almoſt in euery place) maketh mention, and inſted of Manes, calleth him Manichean, a word that ſignifies one out of hit wits. For this Manes was a Demoniacke, and a madde man, and I am of the minde, that thereof came the word Maniacus. The ſame reuerend Father addeth further, that the diſciples of Manes, had formerly chaunged the name into Greeke, and called the author of their opinion Manicheus, that is to ſay (quoth they) A Diſtributer or Diſperſer of Manna, only thereby to auoyde the other Title of madneſſe. This wicked man (as Epiphanius reporteth) called into his Companie, twentie two Diſciples. Euſebius ſpeaketh but of twelue, after the imitation of Ieſus Chriſt our Sauiour: among which number, three of them wer named Thomas, Hermas, and Abdas, and they helde the moſt falſe and monſtrous Opinions, as euer were heard of. Afterward, the King of Perſia cauſed him to be flayed aliue, with a Reede or Cane, becauſe his Sonne died in his cuſtodie, hauing taken him foorth of the Phyſitians hands, with an abſolute promiſe to cure him. When he had beene thus flayed, his skinne was ſtuffed with Straw: and it is kept (as yet to this day) in Perſia, according as Suidas for credit affirmeth.

Epiph. in Leont. 80. Hereſ.

Euſeb. in lib. 4. cap. 12.

Manes the hereticke was flayed aliue.

After Manes, aroſe vp Hierax in Leontis of Egipt, who promulgated another hereſie: hee was a man exceedingly well learned, and perfectly ſeene in the Sciences of the Egyptians; as alſo, in the Documents of the Grecians, with the addition of Phyſicke and Aſtrologie, which he had not only read, but made profeſſion of Magicke alſo: he was admitted into Chriſtian Religion, but in the end he forſooke it, to deale in thoſe nouell Errors, and dyed aged about ninety yeares.

Hierax the Hereticke of Leontis in Egypt.

Arrius the hereticke of Alexandria.

In the time of great Conſtantine, and when Silueſter was Pope, Arrius the Prieſt raiſed a great hereſy in Alexandria, which verie mightily afflicted the Catholicke Church, and endured a long time. This man, beeing more adorned with outward apparance, and comly ſtature, then any inward Vertue, began to ſow diſcorde in the faith of Ieſus Chriſt, and laboured by his damnable opinion, to ſeperate the ſonne of the eternall and ineffable ſubſtance from the Father, not beleeuing the Sonne to be togither with the Father, in one ſelfeſame ſubſtance & equalitie of dignitie. Which peſtifferous conceite, was condemned in the Counſell of Nice.

The Hereſie of Arrius.

Afterward, during the Prelacy of Iulius the firſt, the Emperour Conſtantine (fauouring Arrius and his Sect, and compelling his owne people to like thereof,) appointed a Counſell in Laodicia, a City of Syria (or as ſome others ſay) in the city of Tyre, where met a great company of Catholicke Fathers, and Arrians alſo, diſputing there daily, whither Ieſus chriſt ought to be conſubſtantiall with the Father,

This was in the year, 315. Conſtantius being Emperor.

A ſpreader abroad of Manes.

ther, or not.

Athanaſius Byſhop of Alexandria (a man of great and profounde Learning) maintained the Son to be conſubſtantiall with the Father, which he approoued by good Reaſons, and ſtrong Arguments. But Arrius beeing vnable to make any auailing anſwere (ore-lying only vpon impudent and villanous Calumnies), Athanaſius was accuſed by him to be a Sorcerer. In regard whereof, the holy and Religious Father was condemned by Conſtantius, and being conſtrained to flight, remained hidden (for the ſpace of ſeauen yeares) in a Ciſterne that had no Water in it. And yet Iohn Carion ſpeaketh nothing heereof, but only ſaith; That Athanaſius being proſcribed by Conſtantius, cam out of Egypt to Treuers. And albeit, the flight was very long, yet was hee compelled to continue baniſhed, and lay hidden verie ſecretly, for the ſpace of eight yeares. Yet was he repealed afterward by Conſtantine the Brother to Conſtantius. And this holy Byſhop made the worthy Symbole & Song, which beginneth thus; Quicunque vult ſaluus eſſe, &c. Whereby he taught the Son of God to bee ὁμοούιος with the Father, that is to ſay, of one ſelfſame ſubſtance, and equall with him that begotte him. While matter thus continued, Alexander, Byſhop of Alexandria, was to diſpute with Arrius, vpon a day appointed by the Emperor. The Byſhop ſpent the whole night before in Prayer, deſiring of God ſo to ſhew his power in the Temple, that he would permit the poiſon of Arrius to ſpread it ſelfe no further. On the Morrow morning, when the hour of diſputation was come, as Arrius entered among the Auditory, a ſudden pain in the belly began to ſeize him, in preſence of a great multitude of Byſhops, & the common people. So that, beeing conſtrained to go to ſome ſecret place, to diſcharge the burthen of his belly, his bowelles and entrailes fell from him, into the Priuy, & there he died ſuddenly. Vndoubtedly, a death well befitting ſo wicked a man; and yet notwithſtanding, the Hereſy of Arrius ceaſed not, but continued verie long time after.

There were many other Hereticks & Schiſmatickes, as the Pelagians, Donatiſts, Albigeois, & others, which I ouer paſſe, becauſe I would not make a Volume of them, rather then a Chapter. It remayneth now to report, what penalties ſuch Authors of Hereſies is to vndergo. Saint Paule, writing to Titus, ſayth; Reiect the man that is the Author of Sectes, after the firſt and ſecond admonition, knowing, that he that is ſuch, is peruerted and ſinneth, being damned of his owne ſelfe. Theodoſius and Valentinian, Emperours, ordained, that Heretickes ſhould be punniſhed by ignominies, ſtripes, baniſhment, and death: as is contained in the Code, titled, De Hæretic. l. Arriani, where the Lawe commandeth, to puniſh this wicked kind of men with the vttermoſt punniſhment. Hoſtienſis, expounding this Edict, in his Summe on the Titles of the Decretales, ſaith; Albeit that in Hereſie, the Law impoſeth the laſt puniſhment, which is another Law, ff. de pœnis interpreteth to be death: yet notwithſtanding, the cuſtome (for ſuch people) is to be burned.

Abbas Siculus was of the ſame minde, after Hoſtienſis, on the Chapter, Ab abolendam extra. de Hæretic. Writing thus; But the Ciuill Law puniſheth an Heretique with capitall puniſhments, to wit; death, by the Lawe Arriani, Codi de Hæretic. & l. vltimum ſupplicium. ff. de pœnis. Now, the Cannonicall, Ciuill, and Common Lawes do conſent heerein, that the Hereticke ſhould commonly bee puniſhed with the paine of fire, as thinking it moſt conuenient.

The Emperour Fredericke, firſt of that Name, in the yeare of our Saluation, one hundered eightie, made a Law, to burne Heretickes, as appeareth in one of his Conſtitutions, beginning, Vt Commiſſi. And Pope Lucius, thirde of that Name, ordayned, that whoſoeuer was a Prieſt, and furniſhed himſelfe with Sacred Orders, becomming an Hereticke, hee ſhould firſt of all bee degraded; and afterwardes, deliuered vnto the Magiſtrates of the place, to put him to death by Fire; as it is declared in the ſaid Chapter, Ad abolendam.

And this appeareth, to be ſufficiently receiued and approoued, by the inſtitutions of Moyſes, who (firſt of all other) had ordained to punniſh (with death) wicked Doctors, and Maiſters of peſtifferous Doctrines, when in the thirteenth Chapter of Deuteronomy, hee ſpeaketh in this manner:

If there ariſe among you a Prophet, or a Dreamer of Dreames, and ſhall ſay vnto ye: Let Athanaſius Byſhop of Alexandria.

Athanaſius accuſed by Arrius to be a Magitian.

Ioan. Carion in Chronol.

Athanaſius repealed from baniſhment.

The Byſhops praier againſt Arrius.

The iuſt and deſerued death of Arrius.

Pelagians, Donatiſts, Albigenſis, and other heretickes.

Tit. 3, 10, 11.

Lawes of Emperors againſt Heretickes.

Code. de Hereti. Arriani.

Hoſt. in Sum. tit Decret.

Ab Sicul. ſup. Cap. Ad abo.

Al Lawes adiudge the hereticke to bee burned.

The Emperor Fredericke, his Law to burne Heretickes.

Pope Lucius the third.

The Lawe of Moyſes.

Deut.13,1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10.

Let vs go after other Goddes, which thou hast not knowne, and let vs serue them. Thou shalt not hearken vnto the wordes of that Prophet, or to that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proueth ye, to know, whether ye loue the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soule, or not. Yee shall walke after the Lorde your GOD, and feare him, and shal keepe his Commandements, and obey his voyce, and yee shall serue him, and cleaue vnto him.

God's triall of his Children, whither they loue him, or no.

But the false Prophet shalbe put to death, because hee hath spoken to turne yee away from your eternal God.

No naturall consanguinity must turne vs away from God.

And a little after, he addeth; If thine owne Brother, or thy Sonne, or thy Daughter, or thy Wife, or thy Friend woulde perswade thee to the like:

Thou shalt not consent vnto him, nor heare him, neither shall thine eye pittie him, nor shew Mercie, nor keepe him secret.

But thou shalt kill him, thine hande shall bee first vppon him, to put him to death: and afterwardes, the handes of all the people.

The falf Prophet must die the death.

And thou shalt stone him with stones, that hee die: because he hath gone about to draw thee from the Lord thy GOD, which brought thee out of the Land of Egipt, from the house of Bondage.

Hee further addeth, When thou shalte heare say, that in any of thy Cities, Wicked men are gone out from among you, and haue seduced the Inhabitants of the City.

Thou shalt seeke and make search, and enquire diligently: and if it be true, and the thing certaine, that such abhomination is wrought among you.

Thou shalt euen slay the Inhabitantes of that Cittie, with the edge of the sword, and destroy it vtterly.

And thou shalt gather all the spoiles of it in the midst of the streets thereof, & burne with fire the City, and all the spoile thereof euerie whit.

Whence grew the custom of burning Heretickes.

Hence (as is supposed) came the obserued custome of condemning heretiks to death, and burning them aliue.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of the sottish and ydle opinions, obserued among the Sects of Phylosophers: discouering (briefely) all Sciences Arts, and Doctrines, with their abuses and vanities.

HAuing (cursorilie) run ouer he Sectes of some Heretickes and finding heere a meete and conuenient place, to speak of those men which were called Phylosophers, I wil proceed to a succinct declaration of them. Questionlesse, all the whole troope of them were contentious persons, Couetous of Glorie, Proud and Contumelious: and, to vse the very words of the Poet Homer, An vnprofitable masse of men on the earth. They were al dissonant in their opinions, and fell into many Sects, and diuers Labyrinths of excogitated fallacies. Some were called Platonists; others, Pythagorians, Peripatetiques, Academiques, Genethliaques, Stoicks, Cinicks, &c.

This beginning is taken out of Homer & out of Lucian in his Dialogues.

Seuerall sects of Phylosophers.

Some other called themselues, by names much more ridiculous & foolish. After they had once vsurped on the venerable name of Vertue, they walked about with exalted countenances, and I know not what manner of misshapen habites. In outward behauiour, they made shew of detesting all other men whatsoeuer, vsing such lookes and actions, as is frequent among Players of Comedies & Tragedies: from whom, if their Maskes, false Vizards and habits were taken, nothing of matter remained in them. They were such as I say, Vniuersall Despisers of all men but themselues. They kepte Schooles of vaine propositions and full of Ambiguities, preaching and enstructing their Schollers, to commend & extoll temperance and modestie, contemning (with bitter execrations) worldlie Riches and pleasures.

Their outward shape & apparance.

Their Doctrine in their schooles.

But when they were alone by themselues, they needed no enstructions how to tosse the Wine-Bowles, as being en-

They were men vtterlie vnprofitable.

clined and burning in libidinous Concupiscence, and Carnall immundicities. And that which (among all thinges elſe) was moſt grieuous, they did not any thing auaileable, either in publicke or priuate: but remained vnbeneficiall, becauſe they were neuer found good, either in counſell, or for polliticke or ciuill adminiſtration of Iuſtice.

Their diſputations.

They would do nothing but diſpute of incertainties, ſtraunge beginninges, and concluſions of thinges, with an heape of Tranſmutations, Metamorphoſis, Symbolizations, Corruptions, and Generations of foure Elements, hauing foure principall qualities in them, which they affirmed to be ſubiect to Corruption & mutation in this fraile world.

Their vſuall kind of talke.

Alſo, they talked of Realities, Identites, and infinite Ideaes, that is to ſay; Formes, Figures, or Originall kindes of thinges: and each one of them woulde conſtrain beleefe by his alledged reaſon, albeit no Co-herence did enſue thereon.

Their opinion of ſupernatural iudgment in them ſelues.

There were ſome among them, who being meerely blinde thorow age, would yet ſay, that they ſaw the Circumference and endes of Heauen. They meaſured the Sunne by their owne immaginatiō, and not ſatisfied with knowledge of palpable and Viſible thinges in this neather World, they mounted vp to places aboue the Moone, and (as if they were newly deſcended downe from Heauen) meaſured the greatneſſe of the Wandering Starres and Planets, and would deſcribe the Figures of the Signes and Starres, with all their Vertues and Effects.

A blinde kind of Comoſgraphy in ſuch high matters.

Many times, ſuch as ſcarſely knew ten miles by Coſmography, would bee ſo bold as to declare, how many Cubites, Miles, or Stades, was between the Sun and the Moone. They would meaſure likewiſe the height and wideneſſe of the Ayre, the profundity of the Sea, the circuite of the whole earth, the diſtance of one Towne or Cittie from another; the Longitude and latitude of all Regions & Climates, according to the meaſure and conſideration of the degrees and minuts of heauen.

Moreouer, they deſigned and portrayed Triangles vppon Quadrangles, with Spherical Paintings, whereby they would meaſure al heauen. Some of them auouched (vnder Oath) that the Sunne was a maſsie body, as hot as fire; Vnder which, the Moone had her motion. And that the Starres were watery ſubſtances, or ſteeped in Water, which the Sunne had drawne vnto them out of the ſea, euen as if hee had powred it out of a Bucket, and ſo diſtributed vnto them all their waterish humor. It was not poſsible for any man to know the woonderfull repugnancie, which conſiſted in their ſeuerall ſayings.

Their iudgement concerning the Sun.

Repugnancie in their ſayings.

Ariſtotles opinion of the world.

First of all, they held diuers and diſſonant opinions, concerning the vniuerſall world. Some ſaide, as Ariſtotle and his followers, that it was without beginning and ſeemed to him that it ſhoulde neuer haue ending. Others, as Plato and his Academiſts affirmed, that it was made by ſome Workeman. Their diſputations of Ideaes, and of things incorporeall, as alſo of Dreames, which they tearmed to bee finite and infinite, was wonderfull. One deſcribed and defined a certaine ending vniuerſally. Others on the contrary, wold ſay, that it was not poſsible to finde anie ending. They made demonſtration, that there were many worldes, and blamed ſuch as arreſted their diſputes vppon one onely. One wiſe man ſtept vp, and maintained diſcord to bee the cauſe of the generation of all things. Another replyed, that it was amity, and a naturall and ſimbolizing colligation. Some thought the Diuinity to be I know not what, without body, and without forme: but others immagined it to be ſome certain body. Som held the Firmament and world, to bee ſupported without anie Lord or guide. Others defended, that the Heauens and the ſuperior world, were gouerned by celeſtiall intelligences of the Diuine Ens, which is the Father, Creator of al things. They wer very curious in enquiring, how great the Moone was, and what was the cauſe, whereby ſhe increaſed and decreaſed. Some ſaid, as Anaximander; That it was a Circle, full of fire. Heraclitus held, That it was a land, round inuironed with one cloud. Pythagoras ſuppoſed, that it was an enflamed body. Others ſaide, that ſhe was as a Glaſſe or mirrour, hanging ouer the Sea, and that the light which ſhe had, was reſpectiuely proceeding from the Sun. They had no finall determination in their ſayings, but ſtill drew the eyes and ſpirits of vnskilfull men into admiration.

Platoes opiniō.

One contradicting another.

The cauſe of generating al things.

Of the Heauens and ſuperior world.

Anaximander his opinion of the Moone. Heraclitus. Pythagoras.

In

Descriptions in Astrology, familiarly exhausted among the Philosophers.

In talking of the Hemispheres, of Poles Articke and Antarticke, of the Circles, Epycicles, and Celestiall Houses; of dimensions and Parales, as well of the Inferiour worlde, as superiours; Of Horoscopes, Aspects of the Planets, both good and euill; Of the Ascendent, Descendent, Triplicities, Quadruplicities, Sextiles, and all that which concerneth the intellection of the Vertue, and Influence of the Starres, and celestiall Orbes: they hadde verie admirable apprehensions.

11. Signes of the Zodiacke.

Also, of the twelue Signes of the Zodiacke, thorow which the Sunne maketh his anuall course, descending so far as the Circkle of Capricorn, and mounting againe to the Circkle of Cancer. These Circkles are the two Solstices, by meanes whereof are made the verie longest and shortest daves, and the Daves like to the Nights; the dayes being called Equinoctiall. These are in two seasons of the yeare, that is to say, at Spring time and Autumne, when hee passeth by the Equinoctiall Circle.

The two Solstices.

No subiection to death aboue the Moone.

Some of them haue saide, that there were many Moones and Sunnes, and that all aboue the Moone is not subie te to death, but euer liuing: and all vnder it subiected to mortality. Some woulde maintaine, that we are gouerned by Diuine prouidence: but others said, by fortune, and aduenturous accident. Some reputed the soules of men to be mortall: Others affirmed them to bee immortall. Some supposed them to be sent into bodies of bruite beasts: but others thought they would speake more mannerly, affecting rather to say, that the soule was a winde or vnlooſed spirit, diffused & spred thorow the body of man.

Of the soules of men in their humain bodies.

To contrary which coniecture, some stucke not to say; That it was a Quintessence, or a Nature without any bodie, euermore mouing it selfe, being totally immortall: but when it departed from the bodie, it flewe away with other thinges, which are of that Nature.

Of the Stoicks, and their peeuish opinions.

As for the Stoicks, they had a perswasion, that the soule of him, who had not liued vertuously in this world, died immediately with the bodie. But that the soule of an honest and Vertuous man; with all her powers and perfections; tooke her seate in the highest Celestiall places, albeit some others constituted the end of goodnesse in the bodye; and their contraries referred it to the minde or reasonable soule.

Magical Arts and Sciences.

There were also some amongst them, that abused themselues in the apprehension of diuers vnprofitable and Diabolical Sciences, getting them sundrie spirits by perticuler Names, which serued them in diuers Offices, by vsing manie Carracters, wherein the Names of them were written about them. Then there were some that Diuined by water; Others, by the earth, by the Ayre, by hurling points of Knives, of Bodkins, and such like: By Aspect and regard of mens faces, by the flight of Birds, and by carrying of Phitonicall Spirites in Ringes or Iewelles; which spirits, they made subiect and bound vnto them for euery day, to make answere of all matters, either in the Ayre, on the Earth, or in the fire, because some of them were said to bee Ioualists, others Mercurialists, others Venerists, and so of many and diuers complexions. Nay, they would mount much higher, presuming to meddle with the Great Worke, to make subiect vnto them those four great Princes, which gouerne ouer the nine Princes, and all the Legions of the saide spirits, which they saide to bee in number sixtie six thousand. To them (on certaine dayes) they offered Sacrifices, giuing them swordes of Golde and Siluer, with some strange Virgin Parchmentes, Licensing them with Amber, Muske, & other abhominable and infamous vnctions, which they offred to them; and (indeed) deserue not to be written. For they adapted all the high and diuine names to such Idolatries, illusions, and follies: As Adonay, Agios, Athanates, Alpha et O Primogenitus, Propheta, Potestas, Redemptor, Altissimus, Paracletus, Trinitas, and others.

Sundry kinds of diuinations.

Phitonicke spirits, wonne to Rings, Iewels &c.

The Great worke of the spirits.

Sacrifices offred to spirits.

High, Holie, and Diuine Names, by them abused.

They had many kinds and manners of Sciences, for some learned Astrology diuinatory or iudiciary, which spake of the reuolutions of yeares; of questions, elections, intentions, cogitations, & vertues, to know al future things, without any exception. Also they would know by Phisiognomy, the affections of the soule and body; and what should be the fortunes & destinies of men, by prouoking one vnder Mercury, another vnder Sol, and another vnder Mars. By Metroposcopy (they saide) they knew (beholding a mans forehead) his reall Nature and inclination, the progresions of his life, & how shold be his ending.

Of Diuinatory & Iudiciall Astrology.

Phisiognomy.

Chiromancy. Chiromancie they obserued, by looking in the palme of the hand: for, in regarde of the Planets number, they formed seauen Mountaines or Hilles, and by Lines there discerned, the Complexions of men were known, their liues, affections, and fortunes.

Pyromancy. Pyromancy, was that, which taught them to Diuine by fire: as when a man obserueth thunder, and the Lightninges flash, to gather thereby what the Fire may signify.

Hydromancy. Hydromancy is performed by Water, and was the principall, and most of all, vsed by Numa Pompilius: yet thereby hee was deceiued, beholding the formes and Images of some dead persons in the Water, which the Deuils would haue had to be reputed for Gods.

Geomancie. Geomancy declares it selfe, by pointes throwne at peraduenture, or by the power of some figures, or thinges attributed Celestiall, composed by number, Par & impar (or Eeuen and odde, as wee vse to say) and by those Figures the Diuination is made. And there is another kind of this cunning, which is done by some Coniectures taken from similitudes, by noyse and sound of the earth or motion, or by a loud cry, or by thunder. Almadack the Arabian was the Inuenter thereof, & Pythagoras therein was instructed. But Magicke Arts were before this, and the Inuenter of them was Zoroastres, King of the Bactrians.

Par & impar.

Almadack the Arabian.

Zoroastres was Inuenter of Magicall arts

Augury. Concerning Augury, they seemed thereby to haue a kinde of light of presaging, descending ouer each creature in this neather world, as especiall signes obserued by their flight, mooning, gesture, sitting, progresion, voice, food, and colour, so that by al these things they could foretell somewhat. The Art Speculatory, made Interpretation of Thunders, lightnings, and other impresions of the Elements, by signes and prodegies; and yet notwithstanding, they had no other help therein, but by coniecture only. They say, that Turgie is profitable to purge the spirituall part of the soule, to witte; the fantasticke or imaginatiue part: because by this Art, men are made to see the Images of Goddes, who are nothing else but Deuils, that transfigure themselues into

The Speculatorie Art.

Turgie.

Deuils vsurping Angels shapes.

Angels of Light. Naturall Magicke, is to gain knowledge in the greatest and most Soueraigne power, of the forces and vertues of all Naturall things. There are likewise Scrutators or searchers into Nature, who by Mathematicall Scriptures only (the influxions of the Heauens beeing appeased) make diuers bodies to goe and moue, which (notwithstanding) haue not their Animall Vertues. Venefiall Magicke, or that tearmed Pharmaticall, is a Science wherein Beuerages, Potions, and sundry poysonous Medicaments are vsed.

Naturall Magicke.

Scrutators of Nature.

Poysonous or Pharmaticall Magicke.

Heereby Democritus made his Children fortunate, making his Birds also to speake. And by Ceremoniall Magicke, which is Turgie & Goetie, they couenanted with false spirites, whom they called by certaine words, charmes, and vnlawfull Ceremonies. These men (by the meanes of euill spirits) enchanted other people, and brought spirits to them, called Paradres: in exercise whereof, they made vse of Infants, Virgins, and Innocents, causing them to looke in a Basen of water, and on their Nailes, which they annoint with Oyle, and then call Diuels to them, who make answere to such questions as they demand of them. And to attain to the effect of their Coniurations, they sometimes menace Heauen, and the Elements, attributing Signes and Carracters to them.

Ceremoniall Magicke.

Paradres.

Abuse of Infants, virgins & innocents.

Some others say, that that kind of Magicke, called Turgie, consisteth in appellation and Prayers to spirits, and such as vse it, must be verie pure and cleare from sin, vsing many Scepters, Rings, swords, and Circkles. But (more especiallie) a great Seale, wherein is Engrauen the 12. Signes of the Zodiacke, and the Carracters of the seauen Plannets, and these are shewn to spirits, to know, to which Planet they are subiect. And the exorcist must be clad in a greene surples, with other new Garments; and in this Art are inumerable Ceremonies and Idolatries. The Prestigiators or cheating Coniurers in Magicke, do vrge conceit of Spirites, Hob-goblins, Apparitions, and manie Myracles, by Circulatorie frauds and deceiptes, they sende foorth and returne Dreames or Delusions, and cause things to appeare otherwise then they are indeede, only by their Charms and Incantations.

A further relation concerning Turgie.

The Signes of the Zodiack, and the seuen Planets.

Prestigators in Magicke.

Ma-

Mathematicall Magicke.

Mathematicall Magicke cannot bee vnderstoode or knowne, without her naturall Vertues, neither without Disciplines and Mathematicall Sciences. It finds out the meanes to attract the influences of the Starres, to such occasions as men would make them; and in this Science, Albertus Magnus was very expert.

Necromancy.

Necromancy or Necyomancie, maketh Diuination and prediction of things, by Conference with dead bodies raised.

Aruspicy.

Aruspicie considereth the flight, songs and gestures of Birds in their flying.

Capnomancy

Capnomancie, is a Diuination made by fumes and smoakes.

Botonomacy.

Botonomancie, is performed by hearbs, and is the only proper Art of Sorceries, with Goetia or Witch craft, whereof we haue formerly spoken.

Clerenomancy. Ichthyonomancy. Coscinomancy. Aseinomancy Gastronomancy. Au. 7. in et 8. de Ciu. Dei.

Clerenomancie, is a Sooth-saying by Lottes.

Ichthyenomancie, is by Fishes. And yet there are diuers others, as Coscinomancie by a Siue; Aseinomanetie, and Gastrenomancie; which are spoken of by Proclus, Porphyrius, Iamblicus, Colophonius, Apuleius, Cornelius Agrippa, and Saint Augustine, in his seuenth & eight Books of the Citty of God. O good God, what brags, arrogances, and Bedlem-trickes? What contentions and Vanities, with scrupulous words, prodigies, & enchantments? What lost labors, Lyes, ambages, and al manner of deceiuings are among them?

The Sciences of the Cabala.

And yet there are some other, who would pretend to knowe the Sciences of the Cabala, and say, that such as can rightly vnderstand them, haue so much power as to raise vp dead bodies. Now, such as haue knowledge heerin, must be irreprehensible of sinne, and of holy life and conuersation. Moreouer, Reuclin and some others haue written, that this Science is nothing else, but a kinde of vn-written Theologie; and that therein is a much greater part of beleefe and speculation, then of discipline. For it consisteth in knowledge of the Angels, that somtimes did administerboth sciences and doctrins of inuisile things to men. And these Sectaries do hold, that in liuing holilie, and neere vnto the Angellicall life; so far as the flesh and rude bodie can imitate, verie great intelligences are to be receiued. And by hauing knowledge in the names of some Princes and Angels of Light, a man may attaine vnto the perfection of things, resembling (or truly being) myracles. But becaufe it is not receiued, but by denuntation of the Father to the son, and that the Hebrewes (on whom it depended) haue written nothing for reuerence of the Mystery: there are but fewe people, so full of erudition, as to produce such effects, as it did customarily restore. Som termed the Art Cabala, diuine Magicke, which diuideth it selfe into the Science, named Bereseith and Merana.

Vnwritten Theology.

knowledge of the angels.

Princes and Angelles of Light.

Diuine Magicke.

Bereseith, according to the Hebrewes, discourseth of beginnings, Originals, and causes of creatures, as also of their properties and inclinations. Merana speaketh of things sublime and high; as of the diuine and Angellicall vertues, of holie Names, which haue great signification and misteries in them, with Letters, Numbers, Figures, Names, and little pointes of Letters, Lines, Punctuations, and Accents. Merana also diuideth it selfe into two Sciences, to wit; Arythmancie, and Theomancie. Arythmancie is as much to say, as diuination made by number, which hath consideration and contemplation of Angellicall Vertues; of Names, Signacles, Natures, and Conditions, both of diuels and other creatures.

Bereseith.

Merana.

Arythmancy.

Theomancy.

Theomancie is a Diuination and Vatication of Diuine things, which consider the Mysteries of the Diuine Maiesty, the Emanations, the holye and sacred names. This Science (according to many opinions) Moses had, by meanes whereof, he wrought so many signes and Miracles, as when he transformd his rod into a Serpent changed water into blood, into Frogs, Flies, Lice, Locusts, and other things contained in Exodus.

Moyses saide to be endued with Theomancie.

There is another science depending on the aforesaide Cabala, called Cosmologie, which consistes in the reason, consideration and contemplation of the world. It expoundeth (by Philosophicall reasons) the great secrets of the Law, and of the Bible. Other fooles (abusing themselues) labor to Philosophize by Mettals, weening to deriue cunning from the sun and Moon, and therin haue proceeded in many maners. For Merlin said, That the Philosophers stone was of many colors, participating of the 4. Elements, beeing by nature Ayry, earthy, watry, and firy; drie in a soft degree and hidden, but hot in a high degree, and manifest; moist & cold, of all these complexions, one is made.

Cosmologie depending on the Science of Cabala

The Philosophers Stone, and what is said thereof by many Authors.

Merlins words of the Phyloſophers ſtone.

Is not farre off from the Nature of fire, and of the Flame; and yet is Licquid and flowing, like to the Oyle of the Oliue. It engroſſeth it ſelfe, and of it ſelfe is conceiued and engendered. It liueth of it ſelfe, and by it ſelfe; and yet it killeth it ſelfe. This ſtone hath a red dye, white & chearfull, and yet it conceiueth and maketh Gold, if it be ioyned vnto the white fume or ſmoake. It is the way wherby we liue; and by which, the true and pureſt Gold is made. Thus farre are the verie words of Merlin.

Geber his Relation concerning the Phyloſophers ſtone:

Geber, ſpeaking thereof, ſayeth; Our Art conſiſteth not in the multitude of things, neither is any iot perfected in or by them. For it is a Stone onely, which is a Medicine, wherein the Maiſterie and height of our Art relyeth. And it is to be vnderſtood, that we adde nothing thereto, that ſhould be, or is a ſtranger, neyther do wee diminiſh any thing, except they bee ſuch matters as are ſuperfluous in preparation of the ſaide Stone. And we conclude, that it is nothing elſe, but an vnſauoury ſmelling ſpirit, and a liuing Vault or Graue, which we may wel term dry, waſhed by an naturall (yet liuely) proportion of ſuch an vnion, as it cannot go out of his eſſence, by the things whereto it is annexed, and is couered in abreuiating the worke, hauing an extenuated & perfect bodie.

What the ſtone is.

Cornel. Agrippa in lib. de Philoſ. Occult.

Cornelius Agrippa, in his Booke of ſecret Philoſophy, ſaith; Fire is an Element which penetrateth and ouer-commeth al things. It is a thing created by God, a ſubiect of al mutability, which can be in heauen, and in the earth. It is moreouer, a thing actually animall, Vegetall and Minerall, that is to ſay, which ſeemeth to haue ſoule and vegetation, and an effectiue Vertue and quality of mineral thinges. This thing ſo high and Noble, is not found out by many people, nor knowne by any perſon, or well expreſſed in his proper name: but is continually hidde in numbers, Figures, and Enigmaes; without which (neuertheleſſe) neither the Art of Alchimy, nor of Magicke, can attaine to, or haue their perfects ends. Augurellus ſaith; This Stone is White, and is nothing els but a powder, long time boyled; and ſo conuerted from a White, into a redde colour. Gregory Reich, in his Marguarite of Philoſophy, ſaith; The Art of making this Stone, is not by any labour; but is (as one ſaith) The worke of Women, and the ſport of children. Virgil, in the ſixt Booke of his Eneidos, ſpeaking of the branch of Gold, which is hidden within a calignious tree, intirely deſcribeth the perfection of this worke.

A ſtrange and hidden ſecret

Augurellus:

Gregor. Reich. in Marg. Phil.

Virgin lib. 6. de Eneid.

Another Phiſoſophers ſtone, which is written Enigmaticall, comming fro the inuention of euill ſpirits

Others do proceed heerin by another manner of way, which is dangerous for the ſoul, for the creature being kept captiue 9. moneths, which they nouriſh and feede with ſtraunge meats, mingled with the iuice of hearbs, Mercury, and Siluer, it maketh him to change his nature, and ſo (with other creatures) is taken and put to confect in a potte very cloſe couered, wherin alſo they put ſeuen ſorts of herbs, the moſt part whereof doo congeale the Mercurie. And the principal is the hearb called Lunaria maior, which turneth the water againſt the ſtreame, & yet maketh it to returne againe at the houre when it is cut. And after the fire hath wrought, then Cibele makes her operation, & Titan alſo for two or three times the principal of the ſubiect beeing receiued, from that which is aboue vs. And when the proiection ſhould woorke it ſelfe within the pottes, then vſe is made of common Salt, Arſenick ſubl mate, and Salarmoniack; and hitherto there is no offence at all. But afterward, for the perfection, caſting the matter in the ſaid pots, and ſeeking to conuert the Saturn or lead which is therein; the action cannot but be dangerous. For euery faithful ſoul knoweth, that this came not from the inuention of men, but from ſome vile and wicked ſpirits: for the ſiluer which is taken forth of the pots, proueth as good as the naturall ſiluer. Then for augmentation of Gold, they make an adaption of Vermillion, Siluer, Crocum Ferri, and other matters by number; which they ſay paſſeth the Teſte, and Ciment-Royall. A man would be amazed to behold them all differing in their opinions, yet each one to auouch ſufficient vnderſtanding in the Science.

The proiection inworking it ſelfe.

The making of Gold.

Very true it is, that by the Artefice of Fire, verie ſinguler things are made, and almoſt as faire as thoſe producted by nature, to wit; Emeraldes, Iacinthes, Saphires, Rubies, Pearles, Corral, Amber, Glaſſes, and Veſſels mingled with diuers Colours: and the principall is, to haue good and freſh ſtuffes, and knowledge in the Art of Fire. But leauing this Argument,

What things may be made by the workmanſhippe of Fire.

Variety of mens studies.

ment, let vs come to the application of other studies, according to mens seuerall inclinations.

Logick.

Some haue delighted most in Logick, which is a Science of disputing, and reasoning in all things. Others affected the Art of Lullyn; to wit, the inuention of Sophistry, which sheweth a Doctrin of quaint beguiling (and had name first of one named Lullius:) it enstructeth how to circumuent in words, by craft, calumnie, fixion, and cauillation.

The Art of Sophistry.

The Mathematickes.

Others, desired to know the Mathematickes, which taketh it selfe (in generall properly) for all naturall Sciences, euen for all them that can be taught to man.

Cosmometry.

Cosmometrie, sheweth the reason of the World, by measures of degrees and minutes of the Heauens, and the differences of Climats, Daies, and Nights; the Eleuation of the Poles; diuersity of the Noone-tides, and shaddowes in Dyals, and deuideth it selfe into Cosmographie and Geography. Cosmography is the generall description and measure of the World; And Geography sheweth how to measure the Earth by Stades, Leagues, and Miles; by Mountaines, Woods, Forrests, Lakes, Riuers, and Seas.

Cosmography. Geography.

It likewise maketh knowne, the difference and distinction of Nations, Kingdomes, Prouinces, Citties, Ports, Hauens, and whatsoeuer is throughout the earth. Some others doe practise the Art of Memorie, which is nothing else (according to Cicero) but an indiction and reason of certaine rules, consisting in places, Images, and Carracters: which doe as much seruice, as proper Writings presented to his eyes, who would speake of, or remember any thing whatsoeuer. This Science was inuented by Symonides Melicus, borne in the Isle of Cea, who also first deuised the Verses called Lyrici.

The Art of Memory. Cicero in lib. de Quæst. Tusc.

Symonides Melicus.

Nor must this be thought any disparagement, to the true Philosophy of the Ethiques, which enstructed men how to liue well among themselues; and likewise in generall, without any carke or care for any kind of Prouision. And the Oeconomique also, giuing rules for well liuing in Domesticke Community, and for best ordering of a Family. The Politique, it gaue Documents of good life, for publique community among Cittizens: because it discoursed on common Ciuility, and in it are comprehended all secular estates. There is yet another part of Philosophy, which is principall, and in double manner; that is to say: Abstracted from mooued, and conioyned with mooued. Abstracted from motion, is called Metaphisique, which discourseth on the highest matters of God, and of intelligences, exceeding our sense and imagination; and the Science is tearmed Metaphisique, because it transcendeth Nature.

The parts of Ethick Philosophy.

Oeconomick Philosophy.

Another part of Philosophy

Metaphisique

That part conioyned with motion, speaketh of mooueable thinges, and is named Phisique: which considereth and speculateth the beginnings and causes of naturall thinges, and accordinglie heereunto hath eight parts of Philosophy. These doe speake of Heauen and the World; of Generation and Corruption; of Meteors; of Mines in the Earth; of Vegetable things; of Plants, and the Natures of Creatures; of watching and sleeping; of Memory, and al other powers of the Soule. Then there is Morall Philosophy, treating of Vices & Vertues; and disputing wherin consisteth humaine Felicity; as also distinguishing good from euill. And the Word Philosopher, is nothing else but to tearme a Man, a Louer of wisedome.

Phisicke, with her 8. parts of Philosophy.

Morall Philosophy.

Wee come now to the seauen liberall Sciences. First Grammer, whereby is knowne the difference, between congruate and incongruate speaking. Logicke, describeth the false proposition from the true. Thetericke, demonstrateth how to speake with ornament of choise words, and elegantly. Astrology, obserueth the course and influence of the Starres, Celestiall bodies, Mansions, Parasanges, Hemispheres, and the Poles Articke, and Antartick. Geometry, describeth the dimension and measure of the Earth, with the distance of one place from another. Arithmatick delighteth most in numbers; And Musique, how to play and sing by due measure. Nor may we omit the Art and Stile of Poesie, very highly and greatly commended. As that named Elegiacall, which is a resctiption of miseries, reciting the calamities of men, the querimonies

The seauen liberall Sciences. Grammer. Logicke.

Rhetoricke.

Astrology.

Geometry.

Arithmaticke Musicke.

The Art and stile of Poesie

Elegies.

Satires.

Comedy.

Tragedy.

Diuine Poets

Heroyckes.

Seauen Mechanical arts. Husbandry.

Cloathing.

Nauigation.

Hunting.

Architecture.

Medicine.

Military Discipline.

The four Morall vertues.

Prudence & her sacred power.

rimonies of loue, and deploration of the dead. Satires, are inuectiues and reprehensions, composed in verse, reprouing Vices, and discouering the secret sinnes of men. Comedy, describeth the affections of men, rauishment of Virgines, and facetious matters. Tragedie, discourseth the calamities of Kings and great Lords, giuing them enstructions for amendment of life. But Theologicall or Diuine Poets, were they that wrote Songs and Hymnes of the Gods: describing Heroycally the deeds and gests of Noble-men and Warlike people, with Martiall attempts, and Militarie Stratagems.

The seauen Mechanicall Arts also, are very cõmendable; as Agriculture or Husbandry: whereby the Art of labouring in the ground is perfectlie known, with planting of Vines, and entring young Trees. Cloathing, comprehendeth all endeuours, vsed eyther in Wooll, Linnen, Haire, Silke, and semblable things. Nauigation, compriseth the Art of all Mariners & Shipmen, as well on the Seas, as other Riuers. Hunting, containeth vnder that name, all manner of Fowling for Birds, and taking of all Beastes and Fishes. The Art of Fabricke or Architecture, containeth the condition of Carpentry, Masonry, Imagery, Gold-smithery, & whatsoeuer is to be wrought, either in Wood, Stone, or Mettalles. And the Art of Medicine, comprehendeth in that one Word, both Chirurgians, Apothecaries, Hearbalists, Maisters of Bathes, and Barbers. The Art Military, bringeth vnder her protection, all subtilties and secret conducts of war, with all good Regiments and Gouernments of Captaines.

Heere may we not omit the due and desertfull praises of the foure Morrall Vertues. As Prouidence, which is the cause of direct and vpright gouernment in all thinges, with fore-sight and good ordination. This Vertue respecteth all the actions of humaine life, ruling, conducting, and consulting (by reason) on great and doubtfull matters, both by syllogismes, and sound debatings. It compareth and conioyneth thinges already past, with such as are present; and by due discussion made of them, giueth iudgement also on future occasions. So that she onely presageth and foretelleth, the aduentures of accidents which are to ensue, and accordingly with-holdeth and hindereth the entrance of casuall & sinister fortunes.

Temperance, and her prerogatiue.

Temperrnce, contemneth all Corporal voluptuousnesse, for (in her) the order of our whole life is discerned; because she holdes the firme and Moderne Dominion of reason, against all Vices whatsoeuer.

Fortitude & her authority, discerned three wayes.

Fortitude, consisteth in the agression and reasonable enterprising of difficult matters. This Vertue maketh contempt of worldly felicities, and is to be vnderstood three seuerall waies. The first, is to be strong by Nature. The second, is to feare no perrillous occasions. The third, is an assured and setled patience. She maketh a man perdurable, when he applyeth his power in the resistance of Vices; supporting her selfe by reason & Iustice. and also in warring against the Flesh.

Iustice & her prehemineĉe

Iustice, rendereth to euery man, that which duely appertaineth to him. It is the measure which God hath established on earth: whereby the weake is defended against the strong, and the speaker of truth, against the lyer.

The Ciuile & Canon lawes.

Vnder this vertue, the Ciuil and Cannonicall Lawes are contained, whereby the vniuersall pollicy of the World is gouerned, as well Temporall as Spiritual.

Now the three other principall Vertues (to make vp this number seauen also) are Faith, Charity, and Hope.

Faith.

Faith, is to beleeue such things, as are not to be seene by our bodily eyes: for such thinges as we see not, firmely wee hope for.

The summe of Faith.

And this Faith is whollie in the blessed Trinity; the actions of the passion of Iesus Christ; that which is contained in the Olde and New Testaments; and the Canonicall Scriptures of our holy Mother the Church.

Charity.

Charity, consisteth in the Soueraigne loue of God, and of our Neighbours as our selues.

Hope.

Hope, attendeth and expecteth that which the Lord hath promised vs, if we accomplish his Commandements.

Behold what Sciences and vertues are profitable, and not the foolish opinions, Problems, and enigmaes of the Philosophers.

What men ought most to esteeme.

But notwithstanding all these, Men ought to hold the sacred Scriptures in higher commendation, then any thing else elſe whatſoeuer; becauſe thoſe things are vaine, wherein the knowledge of God is not. For, by knowledge of the heauenly word, and obſeruation of that which is commaunded vs in the Goſpell: we are made the Lords Children, fellow Cittizens with the Saints in the Kingdome of Heauen, and Heires of God with Ieſus Chriſt. By them, the poore are made rich; the feeble, ſtrong; Fooles, wiſe; Sinners, iuſtifyed; the deſolate, comforted; the doubtfull, reſolued; and Seruants enfranchiſed. There is the way and the truth, and the Key which openeth the Kingdome of Heauen to the faithfull, releaſing them from ſinne: becauſe the Goſpell is the Teſtament, and new Couenant of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt. He is both New and Eternall, that waxeth not old, and faileth not for euer. For he hath been and is the Mediatour, and he hath ratified and confirmed the Scriptures by his death: accompliſhing in them, plenarie, and intire remiſſion of all preuarications, that remained vnder the firſt Teſtament.

The praiſe of the word of God.

The power of the ſcriptures

Of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt.

The Scripture is called the Goſpell, that is to ſay, good and glad tydings: becauſe therin Ieſus Chriſt is declared, to be the onely, naturall, and eternall Son of the liuing God, and was made Man for vs, to make vs the Sons of God his Father by adoption. In like manner, he is our Sauiour, in whom intirely lyeth our Redemption, Peace, Iuſtice, Sanctification, Saluation and life. He dyed for our ſinnes, and roſe againe for our Iuſtification. He aſcended vp into Heauen, to make our entrance thither. He tooke poſſeſſion for vs, and in our name; euermore to aſſiſt vs before his Father, as our Aduocate and perpetuall Sacrificer. He ſitteth on his right hand, as conſtituted King, Lord, and Maiſter ouer all: to the end, that he might repaire all things both in heauen and on earth, which none other elſe was able to doe. He was the great Ambaſſadour, ſent from his Father, here below to performe the ſaluation of all men. All things are demonſtrated, declared, written, and ſigned in his Teſtament; whereby hee hath made vs heires of the Kingdome of God his Father, and appointed vs his will, to put the ſame in execution he being: the only way, life, and ſaluation. In breefe, if we haue him with vs, we ſhall finde nothing ſo accurſſed, but it ſhal be bleſſed by him; nothing ſo execrable, but it ſhall bee ſanctified; nothing ſo wicked, but it ſhall turne to our good.

The Goſpell and meaning thereof.

The great benefits receiued by Ieſus Chriſt.

The great Ambaſſadour from the Father.

This is Iſaac, the dearely beloued Sonne of his Father, who was offered in ſacrifice; and yet (notwithſtanding) could not be ouercome by death. This is the vigilant Shepheard Iacob, which had ſo great care of the Sheepe committed to his keeping. This is the good, louing, and pittiful Ioſeph, who accounted it no ſhame to him, to acknowledge his poore Brethren, euen in his greateſt glory. This is the chiefe Sacrificer and Byſhop Melchiſedech, who made the eternall Sacrifice once for all, and for all the ſinnes of the World. This is the Soueraigne Law-giuer Moyſes, writing his Law in the Table of our hearts, by his ſanctifying Spirit. This is the faithfull guide and Captain Ioſuah, that conducteth vs to the Land of Promiſe. This is the Noble and vertuous King Dauid, ſubiecting (by his hand) all rebellious powers.

Figures of our Lord and Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt.
Iſaac.
Iacob.
Ioſeph.
Melchiſedech
Moyſes.
Ioſuah.
Dauid.

This is the Magnificent and Triumphant King Salomon, gouerning his Kingdom in peace and proſperitie. And this is the ſtrong and vertuous Sampſon, who (by his owne death) ouerthrew all his enemies. He hath paied the debt for all mankind; and he to whom no death was due, hath yet for vs endured moſt bitter and cruell death.

Salomon.
Sampſon.

Hee that was innocent, was written downe among malefactours. Hee was ranked among debtors, that was free frō any kind of debt, and therfore payed the debt of Nature. And when he ſuffered death without any deſeruing; hee deliuered from death all ſuch as had deſerued it. And when he was vniuſtly apprehended; he deliuered out of priſon, ſuch as were there iuſtly detained. Behold (O bitter death) the obligation of nature diſcharged. Behold it faſt fixed vnto his Croſſe: Behold the Enſignes of ſinne there torne in pieces. Behold no more memory of any mallicious ſubſcription. For the eyes of his body, paid the debt of thoſe eyes that had wickedly wandred. His eares made ſatisfaction, for thoſe which had liſtned to impure perſwaſions. Likewiſe, his tongue

Theodoret the Cyprian biſhop, in his Sermōs on the prouidence of God

The benefit receiued by Chriſts croſſe tongue, handes, and other members, satisfied for those members of Man, that had committed all their seuerall euilles. Seeing then that so great a debt is discharged, it remaineth verie conueniently; that such as continued Prisoners therefore, should bee deliuered out of prison, enioying their auncient libertie, and to returne home into their first borne Countrey.

The mine debt discharged.

To conclude, it is he that hath regenerated vs in liuing hope, redeemed vs out of darknesse, and humbled himselfe, to exalt vs. Hee became a Seruant, to set vs free from seruice; became poore, to enrich vs; was solde, that we might be redeemed; was made a Captiue, for our deliuerance; and was condemned, that we might be acquitted. For our Benediction, hee was made Malediction; the Obligation of Sinne, for our righteousnesse; and vtterly disfigured, to bring vs into a perfect figure.

The Authors Conclusion.

He died for our life; so that (by him) rudenesse became sweetnesse; angers appeased; darkenesse illumined; Iniustice made righteousnesse; weakenesse made vertuously strong; discomfort consolation; Sinne impeached; contempt dispised; feare assured; debt discharged; labour asswaged; sorrow reioyced; misfortune happinesse; difficultie easinesse; disorder conformitie; deuision vnity; ignominy fame; rebellion subiected; menaces out-menaced; Ambushes scattered; assaults confronted; power ouer-awed; Combats out-combatted; Warre ouer-warred; vengeance reuenged; torments tormented; damnation damned; perdition perished; abisme ingulfed; Hell harried; Death killed; and mortality made immortality. In briefe, Mercy hath swallowed vp all miserie, and goodnes all wickednesse; so that, wee may well glorifie our selues, and say now with Saint Paule: O Death, where is thy sting? O Hell, where is thy Victorie?

The triumphs of the death of Iesus Christ.

1 Cor. 15. 55.

The glory of a true Christian.

CHAP. XVI.

A profitable Interpretation for all Christians, of some words being Hebrue, Greek, and Syrian, contained in certaine places of the sacred Striptures.

Interpretatiõ of Hebrue, Greeke, and Syrian words.

BEcause in many places of the holie Scriptures, and in the seruice vsed in the Church, wee finde some wordes deriued from the Hebrue, Greeke, and Syrian, vnderstood by few persons, to whom they seeme somewhat strange: I thought it a matter very necessary, to make a further relation of them in this manner. Iesus is an Hebrue name, which (by Interpretation) signifieth a Sauiour; the Etymology whereof, the Angell Gabriell declared to the blessed Virgine Mary, saying in Saint Mathew: And his Name shall be Iesus, because hee shall saue his people from their sinnes. There was one named Iesus, a great Priest, the Sonne of Iosedech, who figured Iesus Christ our Sauiour; as likewise Zorobabell, who was of his royall Linage, and (according to spirituall intelligence) signifyed him. Iosedech is turned (saith Saint Hierome) יהוצדק, that is to say, God Iust. In like manner, Iesus Christ is the Sonne of the Iust GOD. Messias is an Hebrue word, which signifieth as much as Christ in Greeke; and both of them are interpreted Annointed. Saint Augustine writeth, that Messias signifieth in the Punicke Language, as much as Annointed; and the Hebrue, Punicke, and Syrian tongues, do come very neere and resemble one another. The Patriarches (in the Olde Testament) were called Christes, of whom it is written in the hundred and fift Psalme; Touch not mine Annointed, and doe my Prophets no harme. And in the first Booke of Paralipemenon, or the Chronicles, al those which departed or came out of Ægipt, were cald Christs. The same S. August. saith, that the word Christus commeth of Chrismata: because as the ancient Kings were anointed with holy Hierom. sup. S. Math. Cap. 2.

Aug. de verb. Apost. Serm. 8. Et cont. Pelag. Lib. 2.

August. sup. Agge. Cap. 1.

Aug. sup. Ioan. 7 tract.

Conference of languages.

Psal. 105. 15.

1 Reg. 12. 19

Aug. in Serm. clxxxi. de Temp.

holy Oyle; ſo our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt was filled with the infuſion of the bleſſed Spirit.

The Oyle of holy oyntmẽt Exod. 30. 25.

We read in the thirtith Chapter of Exodus, of the Prieſt-hoodes vnction, or the Oyle of holy Oyntment, wherewith (afterward) the Prieſtes (in Leuiticus) are ſaid to be annointed. Then there was another Oyle, where-with Kinges were annointed in their Kingdomes, and whereof the Prophet Eſay maketh mention in his forty fiue Chapter: The Lord ſpake theſe things to his annointed Cyrus. Yet there was a Propheticall vnction, wherewith Helias was commanded to annoint Heliſeus: And Heliſeus, the Sonne of Shaphat of Abell Moholaſh, ſhalt thou annoint to bee Prophet in thy roome. But aboue all other kindes of vnctions, there is one called Spiritual; The vnction of Gladneſſe, where-with our bleſſed Sauiour was annointed, and it was ſaid to him: For this cauſe, thy God hath annointed thee with the Oyle of Gladneſſe, aboue thy Fellowes. I hold this word Fellowes, to concerne them, to whom S. Iohn ſpeaketh in his ſecond Chapter of his firſt Epiſtle, ſaying: But yee haue an Oyntment from that holy one, and know all things. And a little after, he addeth: But the annointing which ye receiued of him, remaineth in you, and ye haue no neede that any man teach you.

Annointing of Kings. Eſay 45. 1.

Propheticall Vnction.

1 Reg. 19. 16.

The Oyle of gladneſſe. Pſalme 45. 8.

1. Ioh. 2. 20 27

Emanuell is an Hebrue word, and ſignifieth as much, as God with vs. Our Sauiour obtained this name, by the effect which followed, to wit: that hee who was God, pleaſed to cloath himſelfe with our fleſh, and to conuerſe with vs. Nazarian or Nazarite, ſignifieth Holy. The ſeauenty Interpreters turned the word Nazarite, to Sanctified; and Symmachus, to Separates. Rabbi is interpreted Maiſter, or Lord. Paracletus is a Greeke word, ſignifying Aduocate, Doctor, Comforter. Paſchall is an Hebrue Vocable, and a Greeke name, as Saint Hierome affirmeth, expreſſing as much in ſpeaking, as paſſage, or Paſſeouer. Epiphany in Greeke, ſounded apparition, manifeſtation, or demonſtration, in our vulgar tongue: becauſe as on that day, our Redeemer was made knowne by a Starre.

Hieron. ſup. cap 9. de Eſay.

Augu. in Serm. 4. de Natiuit.

Pentecoſt is a Greeke word, and is as much in expreſſion, as fifty; becauſe, from the Reſurrection of Ieſus Chriſt, vntill the time of this ſollemnity, there were fifty daies of Interuallum. Scenofagia, is an Hebrue word, declaring the making of Tabernacles or Tents, which was a very ſollemne Feaſtiuall. Encænia were the Feaſt daies among the Iewes, cald the Feaſt of Dedication of the Temple of Ieruſalem. Kyria-eleiſon, is a word compoſed of κύριε, that is to ſay, Lord, and of ἐλέησον, that is, Haue mercy. Alleluya, are alſo two wordes in Hebrue, which ſignifie, Praiſe God: for (as Saint Hierome teſtifieth) there are ten ſeuerall names, whereby the Hebrues tearmed God. * Antiphona in Greeke, is a Song deliuered at times, and it may be turned into one word, as the refret, burthen, or downe of any Song.

πρόκλησις.

The Feaſt of Tabernacles.

The Feaſt of Dedication.

Ten names for God.

* Vox recipruce à duabus Choris alternatim Pſallentibus.

Homilie, is a Greeke word, ſignifying, as when we vſe to ſay, a Sermon, Cannon, or Rule. Oſanna in the Hebrue Language, is as much, as if we ſhould ſay; O Lord ſaue me. Sabbahot is thus interpreted; Lord Almighty, Lord of vertue, or of Armies and Hoaſts. Eucharistia is a Greeke diction, thus conuerted, into Giuing of Thankes, and intending alſo the Sacrament of the Lordes Supper. Euangelium, or Goſpell, ſignifyeth Good, or Glad Tydings. Paradiſe in Greeke, and a Garden engraffed with Apples, is all one. Parable is a Greeke word, ſignifying a ſimilitude or compariſon. Symbole is an aſſembly or congregation; as when a man putteth his part in common, and euery one hath his ſhare or proportion. Peter, in Greeke, ſignifieth a Flint-ſtone, or Rocke-ſtone, as Cephas dooth the like in the Syrian tongue: hauing this implication, of ſolidity and firmeneſſe, becauſe Saint Peter was firme in confeſſion of the truth. Philacteria is a Greeke word, ſignifying keeping or preſeruing; becauſe in warily-kept Scroles of Parchment, the memories of the Iewes Lawes were conſerued.

The Iewes bearing of Willow branches.

Eucharistia.

Euangelium.

Similitude or compariſon.

Scrolles of Parchment among the Phe. ies.

That which the Greekes called a Sinagogue or Church; we may well expound to be an Aſſembly. Mammon, according to the opinion of S. Hierom, is a Syrian name, of the Singular number, and Maſculine Gender, ſignifying Riches. Ethnicke is a Greeke word, ſignifying a man that is a Gentile, Pagan, or ſome other Sect. Proſelite is a Greek word alſo, and (by Interpretation) is as much Hieron. ſup. Matth. Cap. 17.

The Iewes manner of a Proſelite.

The wiſe mens Star.

Pentecoſt.

much to say, as a Stranger. And the Iewes vsed to tearm him so, that (being of another Nation) conuerted to their Law and Religion. Scandalize, is a Greeke Verbe, and valueth as much, as to offend: euen as Angaria (a Persian word) signifieth to smite and expulse. Golgotha is Syrian Vocable, which Saint Hierome declareth, to bee the place of Baldnesse or Nakednesse, tearmed in Latine Caluaria. So was a place in Ierusalem called, by the Mount Sion, towards the North: becausse there lay the heads of such as were condemned to death, and our Sauiour Iesus Christ being crucified in that place, did there accomplish the saluation of all mankind. Corkona, or Gazaphylacium, composed of words Persian and Greeke, relateth a Chest or Coffer, wherin the Mony was reposed, giuen for vse of the Ministers which serued in the Temple. According to that which was said: He that serueth at the Altar, ought to liue of the Altar, for Corbone signifyeth a guift. Eleemosyna or Almes being a Greeke word, implyeth Pitty or Mercy. Diabolus, Deuill, is interpretated a Calumniatour. Beelzebub, is the Father of Flyes, as by the word Fly an Idoll is specified. For S. Hierome enstructeth, that Bel, Beel, and Baal, was among the Hebrues, as the Word Idoll with the Greekes. And Zebub, Fly, as if a man should say, the Idol of a Fly: for εἴδωλον is a simulacre or statue. That which the Greekes called Phantosma, and the Latines Spectrum; wee tearme a vision by dreame, or else some vgly dreadfull Image. But to conclude, Amen is an Hebrue word, signifying so much as So be it: but when it is found to be repeated two seuerall times; as Amen, Amen; then it implyeth Verilie, Verily, for confirmation of a truth.

The place of dead mens skuls.

The Mount Caluary.

The Treasure of the Temple among the Iewes.

Hierom. sup. Ioan. Cap. 7.

Visions by dreames.

CHAP. XVII.

Examples of grosse errors in Polititians, and worldly wise men. Also, how farre a man may trust a reconciled enemy.

LEwes the eleauenth, King of France, and one of the most politique Princes that France euer had, being at war with his owne Brother Charles, Duke of Normandy; Frances, Duke of Brittaine; and Charles, Duke of Burgundy, and desiring greatly to separate the last from the other two, to the end that he might be the better reuenged on them: sollicited him by his Ambassadors, to come to conferre with him. Which the Duke yeilded vnto, so that the meeting might bee in a Towne of his owne, in the frontiers of Flanders and France, for his better security; where-with the King was well contented. The meeting therfore beeing appointed at Peronne (whether the Duke was come with his Army) and safe-conduct sent to the King, by a Letter of the Dukes owne hand: the King went thither without any forces or Guard, to shew the confidence hee had in the Duke, to the end, to oblige him the more, and to gaine his good will. But the Duke seeing now his Enemy in his owne power, and vnderstanding at the same time, that Liege was reuolted from him, by the sollitation of certaine Ambassadours of the King: tooke him Prisoner, and would not release him, vntill he had recouered the Towne of Liege, whither he forced him to beare him company, with no small danger of his person. And in the end, hauing made him to grant to some hard conditions, in fauour of his confederates (against whom the King had especially plotted that conference and treaty) he released him.

Phillip de Commines de verb. gest. Ludouici, 11. in Cap. 33.

Lewes the 11 king of France ouertaken in his owne pollicy.

Liege reuolted from the Duke of Bourgundy.

Now then, who seeth not in this example, how grosely this great Politike erred in two thinges, wherein it might be presumed, that a man (of any experience) could not haue beene deceiued. The one, that hauing imployed certain Agents or Ambassadors, to stirre vp the Towne of Liege against the Duke: hee did not countermaund it, when he resolued to put himselfe into his handes. For who could be so simple, as not to consider, that if the practise should take effect (as it did) whiles he should be in his power: not onely the peace and amity which he desired to make, would be hindred thereby; but also his person endangered? For that the Duke should haue iust cause to detaine him, at least, vntil he had done him reparation of the wrong.

The manifest error of King Lewes in two kinds.

The first part of his error.

Consideration is the conduct to safety

The

The other note of the Kings great folly.

The other error was, that he would (vppon any security or safe conduct) put himselfe into the courtesie and mercy of his Enemy, without any vrgent and inevitable necessity: knowing how little assurance is many times in wordes or Oathes, when present commoditie (eyther priuate or publique) is offered by the breach thereof. Besides that, his own rule (which he was wont to say, & was all the Latine hee would haue his Sonne to learne, to wit; Qui nescit dissimulare, nescit regnare, Hee which knoweth not how to dissemble, knoweth not how to raigne) might haue mooued him to haue doubted in his Enemy, that which he practised in himselfe, and was apt enough to suspect in his best friends: And this he had iust cause to feare in the Duke of Burgundy, whom hee had deceiued before by a false composition, which hee made with him at Constans, and brake presently after: whereby he had both incited, and also taught him, to pay him with Money of the same stampe. Wherein may bee noted, as well his notable error, as also Gods prouidence and Iustice, in punnishing his double dealing with the like, according to the saying of our Sauiour. Qua mensura, &c. What measure you shall make or giue to others, the same shall bee measured or made vnto you againe.

What learning K. Lewes the eleuenth required in his Sonne.

Math. 7. 2.

An example no lesse notable, both of the one and other, may be obserued in Cæsar Borgia, Duke of Valence, whose great wisedome Machiauell so much admireth; that he maketh him a Mirrour and Patterne for a Prince: whom hee might (more iustly) haue made a Mirrour of mischiefe, and patterne of all perfidiousnesse, cruelty, and impietie. This Cæsar, being (after the death of his Father) spoyled of all the estates, which he had by force and fraud laid together in Italie, and in danger (as he thought) of his life, or liberty at least, by the displeasure of Pope Iulius the second, then gouerning: resolued to flye (for his security) to Hernando Gonçales, Generall in the Kingdome of Naples, for Ferdinando, King of Arragon and Castile. Forgetting, or not considering, the manifold causes of offence which hee had giuen to him, and to the King his Maister in sundry occasions. And so, trusting to his safe conduct, hee put himselfe into his hands, and was (shortly after) sent by him Prisoner into Spaine, by order from the King. Whereof Gonçales excused himselfe, pretending, that his Faith and safe conduct, ought not to hinder the execution of the King his Maisters commandement, against whom (he said) he could giue no security. And so the Arch-politick of his time, who had by subtilty and treachery ouerthrowne very many: was himselfe (by Gods iust iudgment) ouer-reached, and (as I may well tearme it) tript in his owne play, to his vtter ruine and ouerthrow, as (vpon another occasion) shal be declared more amply hereafter.

Micha. Princ. Cæsar Borgia Duke of Valence, the patterne of Machiuels Prince, ouerthrowne by his owne pollicy.

Cæsar Borgia the Arch politicke of his time.

Therefore, what was become of all his accustomed craft? Where were all his profound pollicies, that excellent iudgement, that sharpnesse of wit, and those rare inuentions, which made him such a worthy patterne of Machiauels Princes? For, whether we respect true wisedome, or the common craft and subtiltie of worldly men (which is now commonlie called Machiuillian pollicie) he erred in the principles of both. For subtilty and craft (which excludeth all Charity) teacheth so to distrust; as neuer to trust, nor to pardon an Enemie: nor to leaue to hate, hurt, and reuenge, when opportunity is offered, notwithstanding any reconciliation. Besides that, the mallice of men so farre extendeth it selfe in such cases: that Politikes hold it not secure for him that doth offend any man, to trust him euer after. To which purpose, the Italian Prouerb saith: Chi offende, non perdona mai. Whereby it is signified, that he which dooth any notable iniury to another man, can neuer after (with his owne safety) trust him, or yet spare him, if he may ouerthrow him; for feare least (at some time or other) he may seeke to be reuenged. So then, this Arch-politicke (according to the rules of his owne art and profession) should neuer haue put his life into the hands, of one whom he had once offended, and much lesse of an enemy reconciled.

How farre a man may trust a reconciled enemy.

The large extendure of mens mallice

An Italian Prouerbe.

A lesson for crafty Polititians.

Guiciard. Hist. Lib. 6.

And as for true wisedome, though it euer keepe it selfe within the bounds of Charitie, and teacheth vs, not onelie to pardon, but also to loue our enemies; yea, and to doe them what pleasure wee conueniently may: yet it so ioyneth The prudence of the Serpent, with the simplicity of the Doue; that it warneth vs to be beware of them, and not to trust our liues or states in their handes, when we may auoyd it. Remembring euer the counsell of Seneca, who saith: Neuer beleeue that he will be faithfull vnto thee, who of an Enemy is become thy Friend.

Concerning true wisedom.

Seneca Epist. 5. A reconciled enemy not to be trusted.

Eccle. 12,10, 11, 12.

Which also the Holy-Ghost teacheth in the Booke of Ecclesiasticus, where it is said. Neuer beleeue or trust thy enemie, for as old Iron groweth euerie day more rusty then other; so encreaseth his rancour. And if he humble himselfe, and crouch vnto thee: yet haue an eye vnto him, and keepe thy selfe from him. Place him not neere vnto thee, least he put thee out of thy place, and make thee know (to thy cost) how true my wordes are. And again to the same purpose, Salomon saith in his Prouerbs. When thy Enemy shall speake softly vnto thee (that is to say, shal flatter thee, or speake thee faire) then trust him not, for then is his heart full of mischiefe. In all which, the holy Ghost enstructeth, and aduiseth vs to bee wary, but not malicious; to bee circumspect, but not suspitious; to haue an eye to a reconciled Enemy, but not to hate or hurt him, or to reuenge olde wrongs.

Prouer. 12,25

Aduise giuen by the blessed Spirit.

Therefore Salomon counterpeyseth the fore-saide Doctrine, with precepts of compassion, and charitie towardes our Enemies, saying. When thine Enemie falleth, bee not glad thereof, and let not thine heart reioyce in his ruine; least the Lord seeing it, be displeased with thee, and turne his wrath from him. And in another place. If thine Enemy (saith he) be hungry, giue him meat, if he be thirsty, giue him drinke: For thou shalt lay coals vpon his head, and our Lord shall reward thee. Thus farre this King and Prophet, whose words also Saint Paule reciteth, and our Sauiour confirmeth by his Commaundement, saying: Loue your Enemies, and doe good to them which hate you, &c. And the like in sundry other places.

Proue. 24, 17.

Pro. 25, 21, 22

Rom. 12, 14.

Thus we see, how true Wisedome and Christian Charitie doe concurre, and how the prudence of the Serpent, is to bee ioyned with the simplicity of the Doue. In so distrusting our Enemies, that we leaue not to loue thē, and yet louing them so, that we trust them no further, then may stand with our owne safety; euer fearing the mallice of mans Nature, which is so abstruse and hidden, that no man can bee assured of his best Friend, but much lesse of a reconciled enemy.

In what manner we may distrust our enemies.

How to loue our friends.

In which respect, it is Wisedome so to loue and trust our Friends, that wee remember withall; that they may become our Enemies. And therefore Seneca aduiseth vs so to liue: That our actions may bee as iustifiable before our Friendes, as before our Enemies. To which purpose also, the Holy Ghost in the Booke of Ecclesiasticus, saith: Ab inimicis tuis separare, & ab amicis tuis attende. Separate thy selfe from thine Enemies, and beware euen of thy Friends. And in another place. A filijs tuis & domesticis attende. Take heede of thine owne Children, and of thy Houshold-Seruants. Which neuertheless, is not to bee vnderstood, as though a Man should trust no body; which were not onely a miserable case, but also extreame follie. For, as Seneca saith. It is as foule a fault, and as great folly in a Man, to beleeue and trust no body; as to beleeue and trust euery Man. And many (saith he) whiles they feare to be deceiued; doe teach men how to deceiue them, vrging them iustly therevnto, by suspecting them wrongfully. The which Plutarch also confirmeth, saying: That Fooles for lacke of wit, to prouide other-wayes for their owne securitie; doe thinke it the safest and wisest way, to distrust all men, and so (in the ende) they procure their owne ruine. Therefore, in this point of confidence and diffidence, the wisedome consisteth (as all vertue dooth) in the meane, to wit: that wee neither trust nor distrust all Men, neyther commit our liues and whole estates, to any Mans will and pleasure. But onely in case of necessitie, and then also, to make choise of approoued, wise, and vertuous friends; but neuer of a reconciled Enemy. And in this sence, it is well and wisely saide, that Diffidentia est mater securitatis, Distrust is the Mother of Security.

Seneca Epist. 3.

Ecclc. 6. 13.

Eccle. 32, 22.

Seneca Epist. 3. No lesse folly to distrust all men, then to trust euery man.

Plutar. in Dion.

Of confidēce & diffidence.

How distrust may be called the mother of security.

But now perhaps you will aske me, how the rule of perfect Charitie, and of How diſtruſt and ſuſpition may ſtand with true prudence and charity. 1. Cor. 13, 5. Chriſ. Hom. 33. in 1. Cor. 13.

of true prudence can agree herein? Seeing Charity (as Saint Paule ſaith) Non cogitat malum, Doth thinke no euill; that is to ſay (as Saint Chryſoſtome expoundeth it) ſuſpecteth no euil. How then can I diſtruſt my reconciled enemy, but I muſt ſuſpect that hee will betray mee? Whereto I anſwer, that two things are to be conſidered in Charity. The one, that it beginneth at a mans owne ſelfe; for no ma is bound ſo to loue another, that hee hurt himſelfe. The other, that as Saint Paule teſtifieth of Charitie; Non agit perperam, It doeth nothing fooliſhlie or vnaduiſedly. For as Saint Chryſoſtome ſaith, expounding the ſame place; Charitas non eſt temeraria, &c. Charity is not raſh and heady, for it maketh a man wiſe, graue, and conſtant.

1. Cor. 13, 5.

Chriſ. vbi. ſup.

How ſuſpition is excluded from prudent circumſpection.

Now then, to ſhew how ſuſpition is excluded from this prudent circumſpection, which Charity admitteth: is to be vnderſtood, that I may bee wary and circumſpect, though I doe not ſuſpect, but onelie vpon a generall ſuppoſition, of mans ordinary frailty and mallice, and the inſcrutability of his hart.

In ſuch a doubtfull caſe I may take the ſureſt way, to wit; that although I verily hope, that my reconciled Enemy be ſo good and honeſt a Man, that there reſteth no mallice in his heart towardes me: Neuertheleſſe, I will be ſo conſiderate and prouident, that, put the caſe he ſhould haue the will for to hurt me; yet he ſhall not haue the opportunitie, or occaſion to doe it by any Act of mine. In which ſence, our Engliſh Prouerbe may be well vnderſtood, which ſaith: If my Friend betray me, I beſhrew him; but if mine enemie betray me, I beſhrew my ſelfe. And this aduiſed and wary proceeding, is ſo farre from the breach of any Charity: that it ſtanderh well with all kinde of loue and friendſhippe; betwixt Friend and Friend, Father and Child, Brother and Brother, Man and Wife, Prince and Subiect. And therefore, in reſpect that it ſeemeth to include ſome kinde of ſuſpition, and (withall) admitteth all charitable affection: it is called by ſome, Beneuola ſuſpitio, A friendlie or louing ſuſpition. In which ſence, Saint Chryſoſtome ſaith: Malcuolæ ſuſpitiones ſunt calumniantium; benenolæ ſuſpitiones ſunt gubernantium. Mallicious ſuſpitions are proper to Calumniatours; beneuolous and friendlie ſuſpitions, belong vnto Gouernours.

An ancient witty Engliſh Prouerb.

Chriſo. in Hom. de S. Suſanna.

Therefore, to returne to Duke Valentine. Hereby we may ſee, that he was deſtitute, not onely of true wiſedome: but alſo of all wit and reaſonable diſcourſe, when he, in whoſe handes, no Brother or Friend could euer be ſecure; expected ſecurity in the handes of his Enemy, and perſwaded himſelfe, that Faith ſhould bee kept with him, who had neuer kept it with any man. But becauſe I ſhall haue more occaſion to ſpeake of him heereafter; I will paſſe to Moderne example; of mans ignorance and weakneſſe, in the miſerable end of Monſieur Chaſtillion, Admirall of France, maſſacred at Paris: who for the great opinion of his Wiſedome and prudence, had no meane conduct of chiefe affaires in France, ſome yeares in the firſt troubles of King Charles the ninth.

His return to D. Valentine.

The great Admiral of France.

After ſome years of cruell warre, betwixt the Catholiques and the Proteſtants; peace was concluded in the year 1570. And for the better aſſurance thereof, a marriage was agreed on, betwixt the King of Nauarre (afterward, the moſt Chriſtian King of France) and the Siſter of Charles the ninth, then King of France. All the chiefe heads and leaders of the Proteſtants were inuited to the Court, as well for the ſollemnization of the marriage, as for confirmation of the peace. Whereupon, there was held an aſſembly of the Proteſtants at Rochell, to determine: whether it were conuenient, that they ſhould all goe to the Court, or no. And it ſeeming good vnto them, that ſome of the principall ſhould ſtay at home (eſpecially the Lord Admirall) to preuent the worſt, in caſe there ſhould be any double dealing on the Kinges part: The Admirall onely was of opinion, that it was conuenient they al, and eſpecially himſelfe ſhould goe, and alleaged many reaſons to that purpoſe. Yet finding them (neuertheleſſe) vnwilling therto; he did put them in minde, how often hee had yeilded to them (contrary to his owne opinion) in diuers conſultations. And therefore requeſted them, that they would condiſcend vnto him: not doubting, him; yea, and forced him to make a diſting, but it would turne to the publike benefit of their cauſe. Well, to bee briefe, they yeilded vnto him: rather to ſatisfie his importunity, then for any liking they had therto, and ſo he went with the reſt: And within a few dayes after their arriuall at Paris; both he and they all (by damnable treachery) except ſome two or three that eſcaped by chance, were ſlaine by order from the King. Who doth not here behold, an euident example of mans weakneſſe and ignorance in pollicy, eſpecial in the Admirall, who hauing in ſo many occaſions (before this time of his ouerthrow) ſhewne himſelfe ſo prudent and prouident; that he could neither be ouercom by force, nor circũuented by fraud: yet had not ſo much wit, as to follow the aduiſe of others, but thought it ſafe and ſecure for him and them, to aduenture (as a man may ſay) al their goods in one bottome, yea, and without any neceſſity, to put themſelues to the mercy of a Soueraign King, whom they had highly offended. And this may be the more wondred at in the Admirall, for that in the beginning of the ſecond troubles, he wiſely foreſaw the like danger & inconuenience to himſelfe, and warily auoyded it. For the King hauing gotten ſome inckling of new broyles intended, and fearing moſt the Admirall, in reſpect of his great iudgement and experience, both in matters of war and peace: ſent vnto him Monſieur du Tore his Cozin, to aduertiſe him that he had great and important affaires to communicate with him, wherein hee would gladlie haue his aduiſe, and therefore deſired him to repaire to the Court with ſpeed. The Admirall hearing the meſſage, and ſuſpecting (as it ſhould ſeeme) that the King meant no good towards him: ſaid to Monſieur du Tore, that he ſhould tell the King from him; That there were no Count Egmontes in France. Meaning, that he would not ſo eaſily ſuffer his head to be cut off, as Count Egmonte had done lately before in Flanders; and this was all the aunſwere hee would giue him. Whereby it appeareth, how circumſpect and ſuſpitious he was of the king, when (as yet) he had giuen him far leſſe cauſe of offence, then afterwards, when he had the ſecond time rebelled againſt honorable peace. And yet notwithſtanding, he could not be diſſwaded, from putting himſelfe, and all the reſt of his friends into his hands. So blinde is the wiſedome and pollicy of man, when God determineth to punniſh him: for then, the firſt blow that God commonly giueth him, is in the braine, whereby he taketh from him his iudgement, that he may run headlong vpon his own ruine. And as the Pſalmiſt ſaith of vngodly men: That they are ouer-taken in the craftie wilines, which they themſelues haue deuiſed and imagined.

Monſieur Caſtillion ſought his owne deſtruction.

The maſſacre of the Proteſtants at Paris 1570.

Boldneſſe and vndaunted ſpirit, working againſt it ſelfe.

Now, it ſhall not be amiſſe to conſider here, by occaſion of the former examples; whether the moſt valiant, prudent, and pious Emperour Charles the fift, committed an errour or no, when (after many yeares warre, betwixt him and Frances, the firſt of that name, king of France, and the ſaid Kings diſgrace at Pauia, and his impriſonment in Spaine) he paſſed notwithſtanding thorough Fraunce, vpon a ſafe conduct giuen by the King, to giue remedy to the tumults lately before raiſed in Gant. Wherein, the good ſucceſſe, as wel of his ſafe paſſage, as of the ſpeedy pacification of thoſe troubles, may ſeem to be no ſmall Argument of his prudent deſignment. Neuertheleſſe, weighing the matter according to reaſon of State, and not according to the ſucceſſe (which depending wholy on the hand of God, is many times good and fortunate, though the counſell and deſignment bee imprudent) I cannot approue his reſolution therein, for the reaſons before declared, and the extreame danger that he expoſed himſelfe vnto, and the ſmall profit he could expect to receiue thereby; in compariſon of the dammage that might haue ſucceeded to him and his eſtate, if he had bin made away, or detained. For, although it imported him very much, preſently to quench that fire kindled in Flanders, before it ſhould grow to a greater combuſtion: yet the danger thereof was ſo great, as would haue beene in the inconuenience of his death or impriſonment, if it ſhould haue chanced.

For, the reuolt of the Country might haue beene remedied, either by force, or perhaps by faire meanes, as long as hee had life and liberty: but the other had beene

The errour of the politicke Admirall of of France.

Eſtien Paſquier lib. 5. Epiſt.

The anſwere of the Admirall of France to the King.

The firſt blow that GOD giueth to a wicked man when hee will deſtroy him, is in the brain

Pſalme 10. 2.

The paſſage of Charls the fift thorow France into Flanders. Surius in Commentario rerum in orbe geſtarũ. Anno. 1539.

Conſideratiõ according to State.

Quenching the fire begun in Flanders.

Liberty and life are the aſſiſtants of many great occaſions.

beene remedileſſe, and the great detriment that could befall him, and therefore not to be aduentured vpon, but only when it could not be auoided. And this (no doubt) was his owne opinion when he came into France, being admoniſhed of his great danger, not onely by his Siſter, then Queene of France: but alſo (as ſome men thinke) by the Kings owne Son the Dolphin, who, in reſpect of the good affection he did beare him, from the time that he had been hoſtage for his Father in Spaine; caſt himſelfe vp behind the Emperour on his Horſe, at his arriuall before he alighted, and clapping him vpon the ſhoulder (vnder colour to giue him a familiar welcome) ſaid openly and merrily to him; Yeild thy ſelfe Emperour: but after told him ſecretly in his eare, of the Counſels reſolution to ſtay him. Whereupon, the Emperour thinking it neceſſary to gaine Madame d'Eſtampes (who was greatlie fauoured by the King, and thought to be his Enemy) took occaſion as he was talking with her, to let fall before her a rich Diamond, as it were by chance, and when ſhe in courteſie tooke it vp to reſtore it vnto him: he would not receiue it againe at her handes, but entreated her to accept it as his guift. Whereby (as alſo by his good perſwaſions) it was thought hee procured her friendſhip, which concurring with the endeauors of his Siſter the Queene of France, and his owne good dilligences done with diuers of his Counſell; was thought to facilitate his eſcape.

But who, or whatſoeuer was the meanes thereof, it is not to be doubted; but that it proceeded principally, from the prouidence and mercy of Almightie God towards him. To which purpoſe it is to be conſidered, that it was reported, not onely by his owne Seruants; but alſo by the Ambaſſadors of Flanders, who attended vpon him in all that iourney: that hee ſpent two or three houres euery night in prayer on his knees, and as much euery morning ſecretly in his Chamber.

In regard whereof, and of the great ſeruice he had done, and was to doe to Gods Church: no doubt but God did eſpecially fauour and protect him. Wherof alſo it pleaſed his Diuine Maieſty alſo to giue publike teſtimony, by deliuering him twice (while he was in France) from euident daunger of death. One time, from ſtifeling in a ſmoake, that vpon a ſudden was raiſed (in great aboundance) by an artificiall fire, vpon a ſtaire as he was going from his chamber. The other time, from the fall of a great boord, that did light (ſome part of it) vpon his head, and brake it. And although it might haue been conceiued, that theſe thinges proceeded of ſome practiſe (in which reſpect, the King would haue punniſhed the Authours thereof with death, for better ſatisfaction of the Emperour;) yet hee would not ſuffer it, but obtained their pardons.

By theſe daungers, and the happy eſcapes of the Emperour (inferiour in wiſedome to no Prince in his time) three thinges may euidently be gathered. The firſt, his errour; the ſecond, the infirmity and weakeneſſe of mans wit; the third, Gods moſt merciſull and prouident care, in the preſeruation of his Seruants, whom he ſuffereth ſometime to erre, and to fall into great difficulties and dangers: partly for their humiliation, and to exerciſe their Faith, patience & confidence in him, for their greater good; and partly to make manifeſt, as well to themſelues, as to all others, the louing care which he hath of them. And that, as the Pſalmiſt ſaith; Salus iuſtorum à Domino, & protector eorum in tempore tribulationis; The ſaluation of the righteous commeth of the Lord, and he is their Protector in the time of trouble. Heere then may all Princes learne of this prudent and pious Emperour, what is their beſt remedy in like caſes of danger, to wit: to haue recourſe (as he had) to Almighty God, and to craue his aſſiſtance, ſaying with the worthy King and Prophet; Oculi mei ſemper ad Dominum quoniam ipſe euellet de laqueo pedes meos: Mine eyes are euer looking vnto the Lord, for he will deliuer my feet out of the ſnare.

The danger that Charles the fift eſcaped in paſſing throrow France. Surius ibidem.

Madame d'Eſtampes the Kings fauorite.

The great pietie and deuotion of the Emperour Charls the fift. Surius ibidem.

The Emperors admirable eſcape twice from death. Surius ibidem.

The Emperor inferiour in wiſedome to no Prince in his time.

Why God ſuffereth his ſeruants to fall into dangers.

Pſal. 37. 40.

Pſalme 25. 14

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ Of Errors committed by whole Senates, namely of Rome and Venice, &c.

WHat maruaile is it, that perticular men (bee they neuer so wise) are ouerseen in matters of State: seeing that the most wise and graueſt Senates, haue also erred therein many times? Whereof I will (for breuities sake) alleadge onely three or foure examples. Cicero reporteth, that the Senate of Rome hauing taken great summes of Money, of certaine tributarie Citties, to make them free: forced them afterward to pay their old tribute, without restoring them the Mony that they had paid for their freedome. Which he saith, was Turpe imperio, A shame to their Empire. Piratorum enim (saith he) melior fuit fides, quam Senatus: For the Faith of Pirats, was better then the Faith of the Senate. This then being so great a fraud, that (in any wel-gouerned Common-wealth) it could not passe vnpunished in priuate men: must needes be a foule and shamefull fault in a whole Senate, not onely for the In-iustice of the fact; but also for the errour they committed in gouernment, to wit; in giuing to their Subiects, an example of fraudulent and deceiptfull dealing, which being authorised (as it were) by their publike Act, would the more easily insinuate it selfe into the Common-wealth, euen to the great detriment thereof. To which purpose, Cicero saith: Princes and Gouernours, when they offend, doe not onelie endammage the Common-wealth, in that they are corrupted themselues; but also, in that they corrupt others, and hurt more by their euill example, then by the offence it selfe.

Seeing then nothing can bee more pernitious to any State, then that fraud and In-iustice should haue course therin (for, as Cicero saith, Faith is the foundation of Iustice, and Iustice the stay of State) the Romaine Senate did erre most absurdly, in opening the gap to all kind of cozenage in the Common-wealth, by their owne bad example. Besides the losse of reputation, which must needes follow thereon to their Empire, as wel with their owne Subiects, as also with their Friends and Confederats. A thing so daungerous to State, that the same Senate (in former times beeing better aduised) did make restitution and reparation of like wronges, to recouer credite with their Friends and Confederates. And therefore they restored to the Ardeatines, a piece of Land which the people of Rome (against all reason and equity) adiudged and had taken to themselues some yeares before, when the said Ardeatines, and the Aricinians being in controuersy for that land; had remitted themselues and their cause to their iudgement.

Likewise at other times, the Senate resolued to deliuer most notable Men to their enimies; rather then to infringe Iustice, and incurre the infamie of fraud and deceipt. In which respect, T. Verturius, & Spurius Posthumus, both of them Consuls, and T. Mutius, & Quintus Æmilius, Tribunes of the people, were deliuered Prisoners to the Samnites: rather then the Senate would ratifie the peace they had made with thē. Besides that, the famous Consull, M. Attillius Regulus, being taken Prisoner in Affricke, and dismissed vpon condition, that the Prisoners of the Carthagenians should also be deliuered: was (by his owne motion) sent back by the Senate; becausse they neither thought good to deliuer the Prisoners, nor yet to loose their credite and reputation of Iustice, by recouery of their Consull, contrarie to the condition.

But perhaps you will say, that the error which I here reproue, was committed when the Common-wealth was growne to corruption, and declined from the integrity of vertue and Iustice, wherein it flourished in former times. Therfore, let vs consider the same common-wealth in her purity, I meane in her beginning, about 120. yeares after the expulsion of the Kings. For althogh the Senate did (at that time) giue many notable examples of singuler prouidence and exact Iustice: yet it failed sometimes in both, to the great damage of the State.

When

Cicero. in lib. 3. de Officijs.

An errour of the Senate of Rome.

A whole Senates errour exceedeth that of any priuate man.

Cicero in lib. 5. de Legibus.

Cicero in lib. de Officijs 2. et 2.

Restitution made by the Senate of Rome by the Ardeatines.

Tit. Liui Dec. 1 Lib. 4. Idem. Dec. 1. Lib. 3.

The great care that the Romains had of their credit & reputation.

Cicero in lib. 3. de Officijs.

Romes Common-wealth growne to corruption.

Another error of the Romaine Senate.

When Brennos the Brittaine (as some say) being Captaine of the Gauls that passed into Italy, besiedged a Towne called Clusium, beyond the Alpes, and demanded of the Inhabitants some part of their Territory: the Clusians finding themselus too weake to resist them, craued succour of the Romaines, who sent Ambassadors to treate peaceably with the Gauls in their behalfe.

The siedge of Clusium by the Gaules.

During which treaty and siege, there chanced to passe some acte of Hostilitie, betwixt the Gaules & the Clusians, wherein the Gaules perceiued, that the Roman Ambassadors (contrary to the Lawe of Armes) had borne armes against them, and killed a principal personage of theirs. Wherupon, they presently sent to Rome, to enquire the Romaines to punish their Ambassadours, for reparation of the wrong which they had done them. But the Senators, although (as Liuy confesseth) they knew well enough, that the Gaules demanded no more then was reasonable: yet they were partly so partiall in behalfe of the Ambassadors; and partly so confident of their owne forces, that they not only refused to do them Iustice, but also made the same Ambassadors generals of an Army, to be senr in succour of the Clusians.

Tit. Liuius in Dec. 1 Lib. 5.

Great Iniustice done by the Romains.

Vppon the knowledge whereof, the Gaules were incensed with such fury, that calling God and man to witnesse of the wrong, they presently raised their siedge from Clusium, and went directlie in all hast to Rome, and ouerthrowing (by the way) the Armie of the Romaines, they entered the Cittie, sacked, spoiled, and burnt it, with the greatest damage & disgrace to their state, that euer the Romans receiued, in the space of aboue 1100. yeares after that Rome was built, I mean, vntill the first sacke thereof by the Gothes.

Rome sacked and spoyled by the Gauls.

Gods iudgement inflicted on the Romanes, for their iniustice and pride.

The which may be ascribed, partly to Gods iust Iudgement, in punishing their Iniustice, and partly to their error, in that they so much contemned, so huge an army of so valiant people, as to exasperate them by open iniuries, and to draw them vpon themselues with a redoubled furie. Whereas (in all reason of State) they should haue sought to pacify and diuert them by all conuenient meanes; considering, he is no Wiseman that feareth not the doubtfull euents of warre, especially at home, where the victorie of an enemy is most dangerous, and in case most of al, where the whole State was to bee aduentured, against an out-ragious multitude of desperate Vagabonds, that hadde nothing to loose. So that this errour, was no lesse costly to the Common-wealth, then inexcusable in the Senate.

A desperat hazard to fight against a beggerly multitude.

Heereto I might adde diuers examples of the Senate of Venice, to the which, Guicciardine saith: It is fatall some yeares to be deceiued diuers times. But two examples shall suffice. The first may bee their resolution, to make League with Lewes the twelth, King of France, to assist him in the Conquest of Millaine, against Lodouico Sforza, Duke thereof, following the opinion of Antonius Grimanni, which Guicciardine saith, proceeded partlie of passion, and partly of desire to enlarge their Dominions, by ioyning Cremona to the rest of their States in Italy: notwithstanding, that Marchio Trenisano, had disswaded the same, with most strong and pregnant reasons, representing vnto them (by examples then fresh in memory) how dangerous it would be for them, to bring the French into Italy, & to haue so potent a neighbor, in the state of Millaine, as a King of France, whereof they sawe the effect shortly after, when King Lewes hadde it in possession. For then were they in such feares of his forces, as they durst deny him nothing that hee demanded of them, as Guicciardine noteth, in their deliuering of the Cardinall Ascanius, Brother vnto Duke Lodouicus, and Viscount Baptista, and diuers other Noblemen of Millaine, who had put themselues in their protection, vppon their publick safe conduct, with expresse mention of safegard against the French.

Guic. Hist. lib. 4

Ibid. Lib. 4 hist.

The error of the Venetians in making league with Lewes the 12 K. of France.

Another error of theirs, more daungerous and dammageable to them then the former, was their great ouer-sight, as well in their vnaduised proceedinges, towards their Confederate and Friend, Frances the first of that name, King of France, as also in the iniuries which they did to the Emperour Maximilian, and to the Pope, whereby they droue them all (that before were deuided) to vnite themselues with the King of Castile, and diuers other Princes, against them in the leagie of Cambray. And neuertheless, when the Pope demanded of them the restitution of a Towne or two of his, vpon condition,

Guic. lib. 4 in fine.

Guicciard. lib. 8. in vsio.

The error of the Venetians in ioyning with K. Frances of France. Anno 1508.

dition, not to enter into that league, nor to ratifie the same, but rather to procure the dissolution thereof, they refused it by the perswasion of Dominicus Treuisano, Procurator of Saint Markes, though other of the Graue and Wisest Senators, were of contrary opinion.

The issue and cluſiō against the Venetians, to their great losse.

Therefore, the yssue of the matter was, that all these Princes (ioyning their forces together, according vnto their agreement) spoyled them of all their possessions in Italy, and diuided the same amongst themselues. And had prosecuted their victory further, if the Pope had not beene a mediator for them, and procured their peace, vpon their humble submission to the Emperour, whome they most wronged.

Aconsideration of mans imbecility, & weakenesse of wit, and of the neede he hath of Gods direction.

Seeing then, these famous and renowned Senates, consisting of so manie wise and Graue men, haue committed such grosse errors, to their owne great preiudice and danger of their States, what assurance can any man haue, of mans wit, plots, and designments, if so bee he confide either in himselfe alone, or in the only counsell and iudgement of man. How vngratefull & simple then are those men, that presume so farre on their owne wits and sufficiency; that neither for theyr priuate, not for their publicke affayres, they make any account at all of Gods helpe and assistance? Vngratefull, I say, for that hauing good parts and Talents, and many temporall blessings, which nature and reason teacheth them, not to come of their owne purchase and prouision, but of the Liberality and bountie of Almighty God they do neuertheless, so admire the guift, that they forget the giuer, and so enioy the benefite, that they do not so much as thanke him that bestowed it vpon them; yea, and in steade of thankes, praise, honor, and seruice which they owe him, do render him contempt, dishonor, and no seruice at all. And therefore no meruaile, if Almighty God in punishment of so great ingratitude, do giue them ouer sometime to a reprobate sence, to the end, that as they offend him by an ouer weening of their owne Wisedome, so they may be punished, yea, and perish by their owne folly. This ingratitude of man, Saint Augustine worthilie calleth, The roote of all spirituall Euill, the drie and burning Winde that blasteth al our Corne, and stoppeth vp the Fountaine of Gods mercy towards vs.

The ingratitude of such as do not acknowledg the bountie of God towards them.

Proud men giuen ouer to a Reprobate sense.

Aug. in l. Soliloq

But heerein appeareth not onely the ingratitude, but also the extreame follie of such men (be they accounted neuer so wise) seeing that their weakenesse and imbelicity is so manifest, euen to themselues if they list to consider it, that they may easily perceiue, that they are not absolute of themselues, but do depend vppon an higher power. And yet neuertheless, they are so vnaduised, as to cast themselues into the innumerable dangers & difficulties of this Worlde, without any regard, yea with contempt and offence of him, on whome they depend, and who can direct & guide them aright. Wherein they may be compared vnto some simple and selfe-willed fellow, that will needs put himselfe to Sea in a terrible tempest, without a Pilot, or vndertake a iourney thorough a daungerous desert in a darke Night, either without a guide; or els, hauing a deere and louing friend to directe him, vseth him so vnkindly and contemptuously by the way, that he forceth him to forsake him in the midst of the Wildernesse, and so perisheth worthily, thorough his owne folly and ingratitude.

The extream folly of such men as trust wholly in themselues.

An apt comparison of wilful minded men.

Therefore, I conclede with these notable words of Saint Augustine, speaking to man: Thou receiuest (sayth he) the benefit, and doost not acknowledge the author thereof. The guift is manifest, and though the giuer bee hidden, yet thine owne reason may teach thee, that it is not thy due, but the guift of another. And therefore, whosoeuer the giuer bee, thou maist think, that as he hath bestowed exceeding much vpon thee, so hee hath loued thee much, seeing hee would giue thee so much. And this being so, what extreame folly is it, not to seeke and desire the loue of such a potent and kind louer? And what peruerse ingratitude and impiety is it, not to loue one that loueth thee so exceedingly? If then, thou Loue and esteeme his guifts, loue him that bestowed them vpon thee, and loue them as things that are subiect vnto thee, and as things that should serue thee, as pledges of thy Spouse, as guifts of thy Friend, as benefits of thy Lord; & so, as thou maist euer be mindfull, how much thou art his debter; yea, and loue his guiftes, not for themselues, but for his sake, not together with him, but for him. And lastly, loue them so, that thou maist loue him by them,

Aug in Lib. 4. Meditat.

A notable discourse of S. Augustine concerning the ingratitude of man towards God.

them, and aboue them. Thus saith this Famous and Learned Father, which I wish all men would print in their hearts, and practise in their actions. So shoulde their Counsels and deliberations be free from errour, and their actions from ill succesſe, which manie times is not so properly the fruite of mans infirmity, as a punnishment of God for presumptuous sinne, as may appeare by the examples already alledged.

The Authors charitable aduise.

CHAP. XIX.

At what time publicke and Generall Counselles beganne to bee holden: And who was the first Byshop or Pope that Celebrated a Counsel.

HE Hæbrewes and other Nations had an ancient custome, to hold Counsels, & to deliberate in them on such matters as they hadde to deale withall. And by the Testimony of Iosephus, it appeareth that Moyses and Iosuah, assembling the people oftentimes together, were likewise accustomed so to do.

Counsels amongest the Iewes and other Nations.

The like vse was among the Egyptians and Persians, according as Herodotus reporteth. So amongst the Apostles assembled in one place, when they receiued Matthias into the number of the eleauen, when they elected seuen deacons; when by the Authority of S. Peter and S. Iames, it was ordained, that the conuerted Gentiles should not bee charged with the burthen of Moyses Law. But only that they should abstaine from the soyle of Idols, Whoredome, strangled Meats, and from Blood. For, as then the Synod, as well of the Apostles, as of the Priests and Elders had beene assembled, as Saint Luke testifieth in the Actes of the Apostles, Writing there in the same manner.

The Egyptians and Persians. Acts 1,16. Acts 6,3.

The conuerted Gentile, freed from the Lawe of Moyses.

Now, some of the Sect of the Pharisies, which had beleeued, raised vp themselues, saying; that they ought to be circumcised, and commanded them to keep the Law of Moyses: whereuppon, the Apostles and Elders met together, to take order in this businesse. So that heereby it is easie to iudge, from whence proceeded the Institution of holding Counsels.

Whence holding Counsels first proceeded.

The first Counsell that was celebrated in Rome, is saide to be when Cornelius was Byshop: wherein were assembled threescore Byshops, as many Priests, and many Deacons; and there the Nouatian Heresie was condemned.

The first Counsell at Rome.

We read also in Eusebius, that the Fathers assembled themselues two seuerall times in Antioche; the first, in the time of Dionisius; and the other, of Fælixe, Popes, at the encountering of Paulus Samosatenus, Byshop of the sayde Cittie, who being a man of insupportable arrogancie, when he was first created Bishop, beganne to walke abroad in the Fieldes, accompanied with a great number of Soldiers, both before and behinde him, reading and speaking all the way with woonderfull insolence; thorough which audacious pride, Christian Religion grew into much contempt amongst manie.

Two Counsels holden at Antioche.

Paulus Samosatenus Bishop of Antioche.

I think (saith Polydore Virgil) that our Byshops in these dayes, Learned of this Hereticke, the order of their pomps, and the traines which they leade with them. Do ye not see some of them, what Harquebushiers they haue marching before them, and what a crue of Swash-bucklers follow them, horrible blasphemers of the name of God? And do ye not see the Bishops themselues, in stead of preaching to their Diocesians, seeke what meanes they may to prolong them in War and strifes? O times! O manners! We haue good occasion to praise God, who hath graciously prouided vs of so Learned, Venerable, Vertuous, and Worthie an Arch-Byshop, as is my Lorde of Eprnac; who like a good Prelate, and vigilant Pastor, administreth the spirituall foode of the soule, which is the word of God; and preacheth often in his Church, and so Diuinely, as all Learned people are rauished with admiration. God continue him in so holy and good an Office, and defend him from all incomberances.

The words of Polydore Virgil.

Well, in the end, Paulus Samosatenus who denied two Natures to bee in Iesus Christ, and affirmed him to be man only, was condemned in this Counsell. But the.

Paulus Samosatenus his heretical opinion.

the Romaine Emperors being (as then) Maisters of all the World, were enemies to the Name of Christians: so that wee must needs thinke, that those Counselles were then rather priuate, then publicke, vntill the time of Constantine, who (by Gods omnipotent permission) embraced the Holy Faith, and then permitted publicke discoursing, concerning the points of Christian Religion. So that by Commission from Constantine, the Counsell of Nice in Bythinia, was held in the yeare, 324. and it was the first, and (before all other) solemnly celebrated, and in publicke, wherein 318. Byshops gaue their assistance, and (with common consent) declared Arrius to be conuinced of Heresie.

Liberty granted for Christian religion and the first publicke Generall counsel

Afterwards, in the time of Pope Damasus, the Counsell was holden at Constantinople, where Macedonius and Eudoxus, that denied the Holy-Ghost to be God, were both condemned. The Counsell of Ephesus, is saide to be held in the time of Celestine the first, and therein was condemned Nestorius, Byshop of Constantinople, who saide; That the blessed Virgin Marie was the Mother of Christ as man, and not as God.

The Counsel at Constantinople.

The Counsel of Ephesus.

The Counceel of Chalcedon, is reputed to be holden in the time of Leo the first, and there the Heresy of Eutichus was examined. This man was an Abbot of Constantinople. & affirmed, that Iesus Christ after he had taken on him humaine flesh, was not of two Natures, but consented to his Diuine Nature only. These were the foure Sacred Counsels, that augmented and encreased Christian Religion; and which S. Gregory reputed worthy to be receiued, saying; Euen as I confesse to haue receiued, and holde in reuerence the foure Bookes of Holy-Gospel, so do I these foure Councels; I imbrace them with all my heart, and I will keepe them by most entire approbation, because the foundation of Faith is builded on them, as on a foure cornerd stone, and the rule of common life and action (howsoeuer it be) consisteth in them.

The Counsell of Chalcedon.

The 4. chiefe generall counsels.

S. Gregories words of the foure Counsels.

The fifte Counsell was assembled at Constantinople, in the time of Pope Vigilius, and therein were debated and confuted, the impious errors of Theodorus, who maintained; That the Virgin Mary was deliuered of Christ, as man only, & not as God and man. Therefore in this Councell was concluded, that the Mother of Christ should be called Τεοτόκος, Mother of God. Constantine the Emperour, fourth of that name, caused the sixt Councell to be holden at Constantinople, at the humble entreaty of Pope Agathon, which was holden by 289. Byshops; and therein was reproued Macharius Byshop of Antioche, who iudged one onelie will and operation to bee in Iesus Christ. Of this sixt Counsell, Beda discourseth verie amply, in the Booke which hee wrote of Times. Many other Councelles were held in sundry places, as are set down by Gratian in his Decretales, which I silently ouerpasse, because I would not bee tedious to the Reader.

The 5. Counsell at Constantinople.

The 6. Counsell at Constantinople.

Bede on this sixt Counsell, in lib. de Temp.

CHAP. XX.

Heere ensueth summarily, that which was decreed in the Councel of Nice, held by Constantine the Great, in the yeare, 325, to wit; what was to bee beleeued concerning the blessed Trinitie. As it appeareth in the Ecclesiastical History, the tenth Booke, and sixt Chapter.

WE beleeue in God the Father Almightie, Creator of all things, as wel visible as inuisible. And in our Lord Iesus Christ, the only Sonne of God, borne and begotten of him: that is to say, of his proper substace, and therefore God of God, Light of Light, very God of verie God, borne, and not made of the same substaunce of the Father. By which Sonne, were all thinges made, as well in Heauen as in earth, and among vs men. Who also for the loue of vs men, and for our saluation, descended from the Heauens, and tooke humaine flesh on him, and made himself man. And so he suffered death and passion, and afterward rose againe the thirde day. Afterward, he ascended vppe into Heauen; and finally shall come to iudge the liuing and the dead. We beleeue also in the Holy-Ghost. And all such as say, that the saide Sonne was in any time when he was not, and was not before hee was born on earth, and that he was ereated ted of nothing, or of any other substance whatsoeuer, then only of the Father; or, that hee is the Sonne of God, but Conuertible and mutable: the holye Catholicke and Apostolicke Church, doth excommunicate and accurse them.

The constant Faith of the Fathers assembled in the Counsell of Nice.

CHAP. XXI.

That which was Concluded, Decreed, and Ordained, in the Counsell holden at Rome, in the year, 376. against Apollinarius, Concerning what ought to be beleeued of the Sacred Trinity, contained in the Tripartite History.

The Reason of this Counsels assembly at Rome.

BEcause, that after the Councell of Nice, such errors hapned as some haue presumed to say, with a prophane and vnhallowed mouth, that the Holy-Ghost was made by the Sonne: we Curse and Excommunicate all such, as doo not confesse, and freelie preach the Holy-ghost to be of one selfesame substaunce and power with the Father and Sonne.

Sabellius.

Likewise, we curse such, as following the error of Sabellius, doo say; That the Father and the Sonne are both one, and the same thing.

Arrius and Eunomius.

We Curse Arrius and Eunomius, who by semblable impietie, albeit differing in words, do affirme the Son and the Holyghost to be creatures.

We Curse the Macedonians, who polluted from the Roote of Arrianisme, haue chaunged not the impietie, but the name.

Photinus.

We excommunicate Photinus, who renewing the Heresie of Ebion, confesseth our Lord Iesus Christ, to be but only borne of the Virgin Mary.

Two Sonnes.

We excommunicate likewise all such, as confesse two Sonnes, one before the World, and the other after the incarnation of flesh of the Virgin.

The word diuine.

We excommunicate all such, as for the reasonable soule, do affirme, that the word diuine, was conuerted into humain Flesh.

If any one doo not confesse, that the Father hath euermore been, and the son, and the blessed Spirit, let him be excommunicated. Father, Son, & Holyghost.

If any one do not say and confesse the Son to be truly borne of the Father, that is to say of the Diuine substaunce, let him be excommunicated.

If any one do not say and confesse, the Sonne to bee very God, as the Father is very God, and that he can do all thinges, and knoweth all things, and that he is equal with the Father, let him be excommunicated. The Son very God.

If any one shall say, that the Son of God hauing humaine Flesh, when hee was on earth, was not at all in Heauen, nor with the Father, let him bee excommunicated. Denial of the Godhead.

If any one shall say, that the Sonne of God, God himselfe, hath endured in his pasion the paine of the Crosse, and not the flesh with the soule, whereby he was cloathed in the forme of a seruant, which hee tooke vppon him, as the holy Scripture sayeth: Let him bee excommunicated. The suffering of Christ.

If any one do not say and confesse, that in the flesh which hee tooke on him, hee sitteth on the right hand of the Father, & wherewith also he shal com to iudge the liuing and the dead: let him bee excommunicated. The humanity of Christ.

If any one do not say and confesse the Holyghost to bee truely and properly of the Father, euen as the Sonne of the Diuine substaunce, and the worde Diuine to bee God, let him bee excommunicated: The Holy-Ghost.

If any one doo not say and confesse, that the Holy-ghost can doe all thinges; and that he is in all things, as the Father and the Sonne, let him bee excommunicated. The power of the Holighost

If any one shall not say and confesse, the Father to haue done all by the Sonne and the Holy-Ghost, that is to say, all things visible and inuisible, let him bee excommunicated.

If any one shall not say and confesse, one selfe-same Deity of the Father, of the Sonne, and of the Holy-Ghost, one selfe-same Power, Diuinity, Vertue, and one selfesame Glory, Dominion, Empire; one selfesame will and veritie, let him be excommunicated. The Deity of the 3. persons.

If any one shall nor say and confesse, the three persons to bee true, of the Father,

The equalitie of the three persons.

ther, of the Son, and of the Holy-ghost, equall, alwayes liuing, containing all things visible & inuisible, doing all thinges, iudging all thinges, Viuifying all thinges, creating al things, and sauing all thinges : Let him bee Excommunicated.

Adoration of the holighost.

If any one shall not say and confesse, that the Holy-ghost ought to bee Worshipped of all Creatures, euen as the Father and the Son: let him bee excommunicated.

Of despising the holighost.

If any one doo thinke well of the Father, and of the Sonne, but neither beleeueth, nor thinketh well of the Holy-Ghost, he is an Hereticke. For all Hereticks, which conceite not well of the Sonne and Holy-Ghost, are conuinced of incredulitie with the Iewes and Pagans.

CHAP. XXII.

The Confession of a Christian, to the Confutation of all Atheistes, Heretiques, &c.

Whosoeuer shall refuse to make this confession, is worthy to be excommunicated and accursed.

I Confesse in trueth of heart, purely and intirely; that Iesus Christ our Lord, is truly God and man; and that al his heauenly Doctrine, containeth such a firme and assured Veritie, as no one point thereof cannot bee deceiued. Moreouer, that the holy Church is so assuredly grounded on the firme Rocke, that the Gates of hell can haue no power against it. That it is he, who is our mouth, whereby wee speake to the Father: Our eye, whereby wee see the Father: Our right hand, whereby we offer to the Father. The Glasse without staine or spotte, to giue vs knowledge of our pollutions. The Lauer or cleare Fountaine, to wash and make vs cleane. And the infinite Treasure, to make satisfaction to all our Creditors. In whom, and by whome, the Diuine Iustice hath beene fully answered, for the sinnes of al them that haue beene, are, and shalbe to the consummation of the world.

Of the holie Catholicke & Apostolicke Church.

Of Iesus Christ, and what he is to a Christian soule.

All my hope, refuge, health, life, and resurrection, is in the death of him. My merite is his mercie; and therefore, I beleeue and confesse his condemnation, to be my absolution; his crucifying, to bee my deliuerance; his descending into hel, my mounting vp to Heauen; his death, my life; his obedience, our plenary satisfactions.

That by his intercessions, our Prayers are heard. That hee is our Protectour, and faithfull defender. And that he onlie beganne and perfected in vs, life truelie happie and euerlasting. That his blood is our Washing, whereby we are cleansed, purified, and made White. And that hee hath purchased for vs, Righteousnesse and life by his resurrection. And whosoeuer shall not do him this honour, to beleeue, that hee shall bee Iustified and Sanctified, by his Death, Worde, and Sacraments, let him for euer bee accursed.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Summary and briefe Discourse against Atheists, Written vpon occasion of the Authors Conference with an Atheist.

Epicurus, Democritus, and other Atheists

COnuersing one day with an Atheist who vsed to haunt neere the place of my abyding, hee fully acquainted mee with his Wicked and abhominable opinions, such and the like as Epicurus, Democritus, and others had maintained; and whereof some in these Moderne times being transported with vanity of spirit, are not ashamed to make bolde profession. Which beeing so vile, and without any foundation or reason, I forbeare to declare them, saue onely some few in the end of the succeeding Chapter. For, they are woorse (without comparison) then those of all the Heretiques, that haue beene since our Sauior Iesus Christ, euen to this instant.

The Authours whereof, were Iudas and Theudas Magitians. The Symonians, Menandrians, Ebionites, Cherinthians, Nycholaitanes, Saturnians, Carpocratians, Gnosti-

PAGINATION INC

The names of the Sects and Heresies, which haue bin since the time of Iesus christ vntil this present.

Gnostitians, Valentinians, Marcionites, Cleobians, Dorothians, Gorthenians, Masuberthians, Encratites, Basilides, Cataphryges, Arabes, Helchesaites, Nouatians, Cathares, Sabellians, Manicheans, Arrians, Pelagians, Helonitians, Hermogenians, Reputians, Quintillians, Collyridians, Priscillianists, Hemerobaptistis, Anthropomorphits, Chiliasts or Millenarians, Masselians, Dimocrites, Garasians, Paterons, Poore Men of Lyons, Arnoldists, Speronists, Fraticelles, Adamites, Orebites, Taborites, Noetians, Hydroparastates, Artotyrites, Ptholemaits, Stattoicques, Philonites, Helionites, Heracleonites, Antitades, Petades, Phrygians, Hierachites, Colarbasians, Docites, Borborians, Zacheans, Naasanians, Phemyonitains, Sethranians, Caynians, Codians, Ophites, Seuerians, Paulianists, Catabaptists Arbigeois, Archontiques, Hicrarchites, Seleutians, Felicians, Nestorians, Iacobitans, Monothelitanes. The Acephalick Sects of Barcotabas, Cerdon, Tatian, Redon, Apelles, Basilicus, Sirenus, Montanus, Theodorus, Paulus Samosatenus, Ogdoades, Artemon, Natalis, Galien, Berillus, Nepos, Liberius, Macedoncus, Heluidius, Ethicianus, Hermogenes, Epiphanes, Pontinus, Sinerus, Prepon, Pithon, Cleobulus, Praxeas, Asclepiodotus, Hermophilus, Apolonides, Themison, Theodotus, Florinus, Blastus, Isidorus, Secundus, Portitus, Bardesianus, Symmachus, Theodotion, Pope Ione, Lucius, Apolinarius, Acatus, Donatus, Olimpius, Adimantius, Alogios, Bertoldus, Baliardus the Phylosopher, Almericke, Guillaume of Holy Loue, Hermand, Durcine, Quintinists, Anabaptists, Seueriſts, Campanistes, and an infinite number more, which are amply declared in the Holye Councels, Canons, and Decretales, and in the Ecclesiasticall History of Eusebius the Cæsarian, Platina, Saint Augustin, and others.

Mahomets horrible Sect beyond al the other Heretickes.

But the verie greatest Sect, the vilest and most Wicked of all, is that of the false seducing Prophet, which hath subborned, wasted, and lost more then halfe the world. He took his Alchoran, Arfurcan, Law, Collections, and Preceptes, out of the Heresies of all the Heretickes before named; but most principaly aided himselfe with the Olde and Newe Testaments, and some Visions and Interpretations, which he said were declared to him by the Aungell Gabriell. And yet this Wretch, as wicked as he was, did neuertheless confesse, that there was one only God, and that Iesus Christ was his Sonne, his Soule, Image, Spirite, and Wisedome of him. That he was borne of the Virgin Mary, and was a great Prophet; but saide himselfe to bee a much more greater Prophet then Iesus Christ, and that himselfe was the last; and after him, no other was to be expected. For he saide, that God had more fully reuealed his secrets to him, then to any other Prophet that had beene before him; and that he hadde giuen him an estate, and a rule more perfect, then that of Iesus. Confessing withall, that before hee was sent of God, and had receiued the reuelation of his rule: euerie one liued, according to that of Iesus Christ, and thereby was saued, and such also should be saued, as liued thereafter. But yet they could not be made so perfect, as by keeping that order appointed to him.

Mahomet confessed one onely GOD, which the Atheist will not do.

Mahomets abusing the people with most blasphemous Lies.

To confute the errors of this false Prophet, there were many Apologetical and defensiue Bookes made, by sundry great personages, as by Iohannes Cantacuzenus the Constantinople Emperor, Theodorus Bibliander, Lodouicus Valentinus, Nicholaus de Cusa, Cardinall; Bartholomeus Picenus, Æneas Syluius, who was Pope Pius, Hierom de Sauanarola, Phillip Melancthon, and many others: who wrote also well, and with such vehemency, against this Diabolicall Sect, full of Iuetenist fables and folly, that they confuted them, as matters most enormous and detestable, in hauing no foundation, Reason, testimony, neither any true miracles whatsoeuer. And yet the saide Mahomet, and all the other Heretickes togither, continued not a iot of their opinion, in such a fooliſh and freneticall manner, as at anie time to deny one onely God, albeit they failed wickedly, in their opinions & perticuler Sectes. And this Atheist denyed vnto mee, that there was any God at all, demanding further, what I could obiect against his opinion, in approouing the contrary? Whereupon I answered, that I would alledge but one Author only, to conuince both him, and all other of his wicked minde.

Books writte against Mahometerrors

No Sect so wicked as Atheists are.

Then, I produced Hermes Trismegistus, the Prince of ancient Diuinity, who had beene three times, the most great King, Sacrificer, and Phylosopher, that euer was. And these are his verie wordes Herm. Trismegistus, High-priest & King of Egypt.

ORRECT

which follow, wherewith I made my reply to the Atheist.

CHAP. XXIIII.

An Excellent Discourse, out of Hermes Trismegistus, approoving what God is.

Hermes Trismegistus in his Booke of the power of god, and greatnes of his wisdom Dial. 2.

GOD, is the existent cause of all things, helping generally, and in perticuler: for there is not any thing, vnto which a being is permitted, but of him, and in him, it obtayneth his life, sourse, and Originall. And that which is much more, there is not anie thing in this world, which dooth not receiue his byrth and production from that which was made and created by him: because there is not any thing that can take or haue his being from that which is nothing, considering, that that which is nothing, hath not any Nature, whereby it could be made any thing. God is the Thought, Spirit, and Light, it is conuenient to honour him by these two names, to wit; Goodneße and Paternitie, which are proper to him, without a competitor in any manner whatsoeuer: As being alwayes immutable, yet changing all thinges; inuisible, yet seeing all thinges; immortall, without place, and without end; inseperable, ineffable, inscrutable, inestimable; immooueable, yet mooving all things; and woorthy of all Honour and Reuerence.

Goodnesse & Father-hood.

God is not to be apprehended by mans vnderstāding, in regarde of his substance.

Hee is the supreame good, and none other, who cannot be knowne or apprehended by humaine sence as concerning his substance, because hee is a power not limitted.

Not were we created of him, but only to this intent, to beholde the discourse of the Starres, which are his most excellent, Magnificent, and Soueraigne workes, with the discourse of Nature, the example and imitation of goodnesse. Finally, the knowledge of his diuine power & Maiesty, of which knowledge he hath giuen a part and portion, to know, iudge, and discerne betweene good and euill.

But principally, to search the high and meruailous Artefice of the chiefe good; the which, with all other thinges, were made by his word Iesus Christ: by whom he hath created, constituted, and ordayned euery thing in his order and degree, by his only will. And that is nothing else, but an only infinite and incomprehensible goodnes, which is such, as it can appertaine to none but to him onely. And therefore, we must surpasse the Celestiall bodies, the Hierarchies of Angelles, and the circuite and discourse of the Starres, to attaine to the knowledge of him. For, this knowledge is insuperable, inuincible, and infinite, without any limitation: not hauing (as concerning himselfe) any beginning, whereas to humain knowledge there is allowed some beginning.

Iesus Christ, the worde of the Father. Dial. 4.

God is the only Father of all things. Dial. 5.

Hee containeth all, in his inuestigable Treasures and secrets, and is the sole and only Father of all thinges, from whome proceeded one onely Sonne, who gaue himselfe so strongly to be vnderstood by vs, as it is a verie easie matter to touche him. He assigned to the Sea his bornes and Limits, and gaue commaund that it should passe no further: he apointed the earth his full waight, and made his containdure in the middest of the heauens. If then it bee so, that an Image or painting cannot be done, without the industrie of the Image maker or Painter, can we immagine, that so great and woonderfull a building as the worlde is, could possibly be made without a workmā? O man too much blinded! O man too wicked and miserable! O man, buried in the bottom lesse darknesse of ignorance, to think the contrary! Looke to thy selfe well, when thou seekest to rob the workeman of his worke: and inuoke the Lord incessantly, and commend him with singularity, and with a name that can bee attributed vnto none, but him only; holding him continually, to bee the proper and Naturall Father of all thinges, as well visible as inuisible. And that is the onely eternall God, then which most excellent, incompareable, and best of all Names, not anie creature can deuise any other to giue him. He is entirely all that I am, al that I do, all that I thinke, and is all in all; and there is not any thing, but it commeth from him, neither any thing created or increate, but he is the same.

An inuectiue against Atheists, and their miserable condition

He is the Vnderstanding, vnderstanding all

The eternal parts and powers in God.

all things; the eternall Father, building all things; the onely God, woorking all things; the Soueraigne good, creating all goodnesse; the most pure and entire cause of euery matter; Ayre of the ayre, Soule of the soul thought of the thoght; and finally God. By whom all things moue themselues, & in whom, no choise can be made, but of all goodnesse. For about his essence, is a super-eminency of all goodnesse, more pure, cleare, and bright shining, then either can be spoken or expressed.

Dial. 6.

The intire & perfect parts of God.

And the entirest and perfectest parts of God, are Beauty and Bountie, which are his inseperable Kinsmen, and beloued aboue all other things. For in him is such a Beauty, as admitteth no comparison; and such a Bounty as alloweth no imitation: whereby the Worlde proceeded of him, and consisteth in him: Man made in the World, and to command the Worlde. For, God is the beginning of all things, and containeth & ordaineth euery one in his order & proportion. Hee that knoweth him, not only is fulfilled with all blessednesse, but also vnderstandeth and comprehendeth all Diuine knowledges, hardly like to any other. The knowledge of him, is nothing else but a Diuine silence, and an attentiue application of all the sences. He that vnderstandeth him, can think on nothing else: and he that heareth him, can heare no other thing.

Dial. 8.

Of the knowledge of God Dial. 9.

Of knowing and vnderstanding God, Dial. 10.

No Lawe admitteth any man of this World, so much power, as to contemplate the Beautie & Excellency of God, except he be first regenerated, reformed, and transubstantiated into him. He doth all that can bee doone, either present, or heereafter to bee spoken or thought on. His action is a power inuincible, and not equiparable, and that is the reason, that no one ought for to attempt or presume with him, or he to be compared with any other, be he diuine or humain, eyther in heauen or on earth.

No presuming or comparing with God.

The proofe of one onely true God. Dial. 11.

Now, to approoue that this is the power of one only true God, is euidently enough declared: for there is likewise but one World, one Sunne, one Moone, & but one Diuinity. And as concerning God, we beleeue vndoubtedly, that there can be but one, and he onely, that made each thing into many. Doost thou thinke that it should be a matter difficult or Laborious, for God to make life, soule, immortality, and changes of times? Why, thou thy selfe can do as much, & as great things. Thou Seest, thou Heares't, thou Smellest, thou Tastest, thou Touchest; thou speakest, thou goest, thou breathest, and thou vnderstandest without anie other then thy selfe; for all these things are performed by thy selfe. And euen as a man knew not how to liue, but by life; in like manner, God could not liue, without producing all things continually, and inspiring life into them. Vnderstand then, that if thou wilt not make thy selfe equall to God, nor appeare like vnto him; thou shalt neuer comprehend or vnderstande him: considering, that the like is euermore knowne by the like.

What wonderfull things are done by man.

This is vnderstood by knowing GOD rightly.

Extend thy selfe then into an infinite greatnesse; go out of this body, surpasse all times, be eternity, and so finally thou shalt know God. Exalt thy selfe more high then all highnesse; be thorow al the parts of the worlde; in Heauen, on the earth, in the Sea; euen from the beginning, to this present. Dwell out of the Vessell of this bodie; and thinkest thou then that any thing can perish by death? Comprehend all these things together; to know all places, all times, all waight, all lightnesse, all qualities and quantities: and then at length thou shalt vnderstand what God is. For, the verie greatest miserie that can happen to any man, is not to knowe him; and yet hee made all his workes, to the end that he might be knowen by them.

[illegible] him [illegible] God.

He hath not about him, either greatnesse, place, qualitie, Figure, Nouriture: because he is all these, and being al, hath all these about him, and euerie where else.

Dial. 12. The word diuine, Iesus Christ.

This is the diuine word Iesus Christ, therefore honor and worshippe him: and this Honour and Adoration consisteth onely, in being no way wicked, but flying from sinne, with all thy might & vertue. It is he that made regeneration, & tooke on him our humanity, to redeeme vs from the Captiuity of darkenesse, and seruitude of Sathan: and he will be magnified and praised in Silence, that is to say; with the Heart and Vnderstanding. Likewise, hee will bee called GOD, in regarde of his Power; Maker, by reason of his Workes; and finally Father, for the Loue of his Goodnesse, which appertaineth onely to him.

Dial. 13.

Dial. 14.

A familiar Comparison.

If it be lawfull for a Painter, to figure so many and diuers thinges; as Heauens, Earth, Seas, Men, Beasts, Trees, and all other thinges that haue no life; shall we bee so insolent to say, that the power of dooing all these, must bee denied to one onely God? O man too foolish, and vnprouided of vnderstanding! O blindfold man, and without any Diuine knowledg, that darest beleeue, thinke, or speake, to the contrary.

Lac. in Institut. Diuin. l. 1. cap. 5

Sybilla Erythræa could say; That there was onely God increate, and exceeding all Creatures. He is the only Soueraigne that made the Heauens, and diuided the Lights; that is only thorow all Worlds, and before all Worlds; that gaue Life, Generation and Nature vnto all things.

Plat in lib. Tim.

Plato, in his Booke called Timeus, sayth; The Worlde is gouerned by the power and prouidence of one only God, the power and Maiesty of whom is so great, that in regard of this inestimable might, no man can conceiue him in his vnderstanding, neither expresse him by words.

Lac. in l. 4. c. 29.

This Soueraigne and only God, cannot be adored, but by the meanes of his only Sonne: and whosoeuer thinketh to worship the Father onely, and giue no honour to the Sonne, hee can no way adore the Father. But he that receyueth the Sonne, and beareth his name, he truly honoureth the Father with the Sonne, because the Sonne is the Ambassadour, Messenger, and Priest to the Soueraigne father. He is the gate of the most great tẽple; the Way of Light, the Conducter to saluation, and the entrance into Life. The word Diuine, Luminous, and Celestiall: Sonne of the Almightie, Eternall and liuing God. King of al worlds, visible and inuisible; the wisedome of the Father; Splendour of his Glory and Eternall Light; Image of his substaunce; Prince and Captaine of Peace & Faith; Principall Shepheard; his best beloued Sonne, the Vapour of his Vertue; pure emanation or sending forth of his brightnesse; the spotlesse mirrour of his Maiesty, Goodnesse and Eternity; and the beginning of his creature.

Of the father and the son.

The names & Titles of our Lorde Iesus Christ.

He is our Sanctification, Propitiation, Wisedome, Iustice, Satisfaction, & Redemption: Maister of our Requestes, our Aduocate and Mediator, in whome reposeth all the Spirits of GOD; and in whome, are hidden all the Treasures of Wisedome and Knowledge. Hee was made the Oblation and Sacrifice of a sweete smelling sauour, our ample ransome, sufficient price, the onely branch and Diuine roote. The sole way of life, the Councell of the Eternall, the Doore of the Sheepefold, and the good Shepheard; the true Cælestiall Breade, and Treasury of felicity. One totall, consisting of all Vertues and Powers, the author of regeneration, Lorde of Glorie, King of Kings, Doctor of righteousnes, the faithfull witnesse of trueth, trueth it selfe, and the Originall of Life and Concorde. He is the Prince and Consummator of Faith, the Apostle of our Confession, the Angell of great Councell, the Saluation and Sauiour of the World.

The seuerall applications of Christ to man.

Lac. in l. 4. Ca. 6

In briefe, hee is the Sonne of God, who by the mouth of the most wise King Salomon (full of the Diuine spirite) hath saide; God hath begotten mee in the beginning of his wayes and workes, before the worlds. He begot me at the beginning, before there was any earth made by him, and before he ordained the Seas and Deepes. Before that the Riuers issued forth of their Springs, and before the Mountaines were made, hee begot mee. God made Regions and Lands habitable vnder Heauen: when he appointed the Heauens, I was with him; and when hee deuided his seat: whē he made the mighty Clouds ouer the Winds, when he placed the high hilles vnder Heauen; and when he laide the strong foundations of the earth, I was with him in the disposing of all.

Concerning the words of King Salomon.

I was he, in whom he delighted him selfe, and euery day I reioyced my selfe before his face, when hee tooke pleasure to see the worlde created and perfected. And for this cause, Trismegistus calleth him, The Workeman of God. And Sybilla calleth him, the Counseller, who was filled by God the Father with so great Wisedome and Vertue, that hee vsed his Counsell and power, in creating the world. S. Augustine in his tenth Booke of the Cittie of God, saith; That he found in the Books of Plato, that Ante omnia tempora, & supra omnia tempora, incommutabiliter manet vnigenitus filius tuus coeternus tibi: Et quia de plenitudine eius accipiunt, vt beatæ sint, & participatione manentis in se sapientiæ renouantur, vt sapientes sint.

Hermes Trismegistus & Sybilla

Aug. in lib. 10. de Ciuit. Dei.

Be-

The Authors words to the Atheist.

Beholde now, what aunswere I haue made thee, to make thee vnderstand what God is. And if thou wouldst haue anie more great, certaine, and euident Testimonies, looke into the holye Scriptures, and read there what is spoken by the Patriarches, Prophets, and Apostles; but more especially Saint Augustine, in his Booke of the City of God. As for the Idle Disputes which thou hast hadde with me, alledging and saying: What profite receiued God by the making of man for himselfe? Because thou beholdest, that to a good man there doth dayly happen aduersities, Powerties, labors, banishment, and losse of friends. On the contrarie also, thou seest wicked men to be very happy, raised to honours, and encreasing in goods. Thou seest the innocent in daunger, and the vicious to passe vnpunished. That men louing Religion and Piety, are afflicted. And death, hauing no regarde to the condition of men, or respecting their ages, exerciseth his crueltie vppon many, before they can arriue at the state of many yeares, and euen the most bolde and stoutest spirits, do die soonest, or are foiled in battailes. That Temples are burned by Thunder and Lightnings, & many things are doone otherwise then they ought to be done. That prouidence atuayleth not any thing, in the Creation and generation of creatures. That the paines of hell are not to bee feared, because there is no hell at all, and that all soules do die with their bodies. That pleasure and Voluptuousnes is the chiefest happinesse. That there ought not to be any humain society, but euery man to haue care of his perticuler profit. And not to loue his Neighbour, but for his own aduantage. With many other thinges which thou alledgest, that are the very same disputes of Epicurus, Democritus, Lucian, and Dicearchus.

The Atheists ydle Allegations.

Good mens misery & bad mens prosperous.

Old & young all one to Death.

Prouidence not to any purpose.

No Hell.

No humaine society, or loue of our Neighbour.

Lac. Firm. in lib 3. Cap. 16. et in lib. 7. Cap. 5.

In these cases therfore, I wil send thee for further resolution, to Lanctantius Firmianus, who hath conuinced al their sottish errors. So that, such as haue seene what he hath written, and they that haue expounded the Psalme, Dixit insipiens in corde suo, non est Deus, woulde neuer fall into such diseases, so farre from sence and vnderstanding, as thy freneticall Follye and madnesse reacheth vnto: Vnderstand but what the Wiseman sayth; That such as are great searchers into the Maiesty eternal, shalbe confounded with glory. Attempt not then such things as are hidden with God: but reserue plaine sight vnto their due times and seasons. Beleeue Salomon, who saith: We are not to say, what is this, what is that, and to what end. For all things are created vnto their seueral vses. Seeke not after things that are too high for thee, neither enquire after matters that are too strong for thee, but euermore thinke on those things which God hath commaunded thee, and remember him in sobriety and simplicity of heart. Vnderstand what Saint Paul saith, O the deepenesse of the Riches, both of the wisdom and knowledge of God; how vnsearcheable are his iudgementes, and his wayes incomprehensible, past finding out?

Theodoret the Syrian Bishop, in his Sermons of life eternall, and the Diuine prouidence.

Rom. 11, 33.

Therefore it behoueth vs, not vnwisely to enterprize impossible thinges; but with all our vertue and vnderstanding, to wonder at, and to praise the workes Diuine. For wee are able to speake by experience, that such as haue studied most, & practised how to behold the Sunne more then neede required, saw no such thinges as they stroue to see, but spoyled their owne sight, and were drawne into darkenesse. And oftentimes, when a man (by contention and folly) striueth to seek for that which is hidden in the earth, or to know the foundation thereof; & whereupon it dependeth, or thinges aboue in Heauen, and out of this vniuersal world, not onely hee cannot finde what hee seeketh for, but filleth his owne soule full of troubles and darknesse, such is the infirmity of the spirit. For we know wel what Saint Paul saith, by good admonishment. If any man imagineth himself to know something, he hath not yet learned what appertaineth to knowledge. Let vs then not seek so farre into things, which we are not possible to attaine vnto: but let vs be content with that which we haue receiued; and, according to our best power, blesse the Lorde, his dearely beloued Sonne Iesus Christ, and the Holyghost, vnto whome equally, belongeth all power, might, maiesty, and dominion, for euer and euer.

Gazing on the bright sun doth but dazle the sight.

Rom. 11, 19.

CHAP. XXV.

The Atheist further confuted, by allegation of Magicall Sciences; because he denied, that there were any such Sciences, or any Deuils or Spirits.

SAint Augustine, in his one and twentith Booke of the Citie of God, saith, There is no contradiction of Magicall Arts, except we will gainsay the Scriptures; and they are spoken of in many places of the Bible; namely, that the first, second, and third signe, which Moyses did performe, the Magitians or Sorcerers of Pharaoh, did accomplish the same. And when (afterward) they could not attain to the performance of other great signes and myracles, then they could say; This is the finger of God, in the power whereof those things are doone. Read the twenty eight Chapter of the first Booke of Samuell, howe King Saule went to Edor or Endor, to see a Woman that had a Phitonicall spirite, who raised vp the likenesse of the Prophet Samuell, that had long time bin dead, & the spirit saide vnto him: After to morrow, the Philistims shal giue thee battell, thou shalt loose the day; and both thou and all thy Children shal dye, only Lame Mephiboseth reserued, and this fell out to be true.

In the eighteenth Chapter of Deutronomy it is sayde; When thou shalt come into the Land which the Lorde thy GOD giueth thee, thou shalt not learne to doo after the abhominations of those Nations. Let none be found among ye, that maketh his Sonne or his Daughter to go thorough the Fire, or vseth Witch-craft; or is a regarder of times, or a marker of the Flying of Birds, or a Sorcerer, or a Charmer, or a man that asketh Councel of familiar Spirites, or a Diuiner, that demaundeth aduise of the dead. For all these thinges, and they that do them, are abhomination to the Lord: And because of these abhominations, the Lord thy God doth cast them out before thy Face. See in the Actes of the Apostles, Symon Magus, and what hee did by Art Magicke; togither with the Chamberlaine, which gayned his Maisters life by Magicke.

We finde also in the Ecclesiastical historie, Written by Eusebius the Cæsarian, how a man named Manes, an Hereticke, mounted himselfe vp into the Ayre, before a great number of people, flying quite out of their sight. In the same Historie, we shall also see, that the Empetours Maxentius, Maximinus, & others, vsed Magicall Arts, and had no Gouernours, Captaines, or Officers, but such as were enstructed therein: nor woulde they do any good, or giue anie aduancement, but to them that vnderstood those Sciences.

In the fift Booke of Lactantius Firmianus, in his Diuine Institutions, he speaketh of the God Apollonius, whome the Emperour Domitian should haue put to death: but in the presence of the said emperor and al his assistants, he made himselfe inuisible, so that no one knew what was become of him.

Lactantius Disputing against Democritus, Epicurus, and Dicearchus, who sayd, that the soule was mortall, plainly telleth them; That they durst not abide in the presence of Magitians, who by charmes and Enchantments, called and made deceased soules to come out of Hell, and shewed them to bee seene before the eyes of men, speaking and foretelling of things to come.

Wee reade in the Historie of Ioseph, that it is saide to his Bretheren, You haue taken and stolne the drinking Cup, wherein my Lord is wont to performe his Augurses and Diuinations.

In Platina, who Wrote the Liues of the Popes, wee may see; that Gilbert (who was Named Pope Syluester the second) a Religious man, in the Monasterie of Saint Benoist de Fleury, neere Orleance, & had bin School maister vnto the Emperour Otho; Robert King of France, and to Lotharius, Arch-Byshop of Sens, saide himselfe; that because (by his Councell and Magicke) hee gaue his soule to the Deuill, hee obtained the Papacy. For which, he was afterward verie sorrie and penitent; and confessed generally & publickely, the great sinne and offence which he had committed, Platina and others do likewise testify, that Ioan the Papesse, obtained the Romaine primacy by Magick, which she had long time studied at

Aug. de Ciu. dei lib. 21. cap. 6.

Exo. 7, 10, 11.

Exod. 8, 19. 1. Sam. 28, 8. Saule consulteth with a Witche, whē God had refused him.

Deut. 18, 9, 10, 11. The abhominations of the Gentiles to be auoyded.

Acts 8, 9. Symon Magus.

Manes the hereticke. Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History. The Empetors Maxentius & Maximinus.

Lact. Firm. in Lib. 5 cap. 3. de Institut. Diuin. The God Apollonius.

Lac. Firm. in lib 7 cap. 13. Democritus, Epicurus, Dicearchus.

The brethren of Ioseph accused. Gen. 44, 5.

Plat. in Vit. Pon. Of Pope Syluester the 2. that gaue his soul to the diuel to be pope at Athens. Comming thence to Rome, she read there publikely, and disputed against all Commers; not any one being found equall in knowledge to her. So that after the death of Pope Leo, by consent and voyce of all the Cleargy: she was elected in the Papacy, not knowing that she was a woman. The Seat she held two yeares, one month, and foure daies, euen vntill shee fell in trauaile of child publikely, in going to the Church of Laterane; in which trauaile she dyed, being an English Woman by birth.

Ioane the Papesse got the Primacie of Rome by Magicall Arts.

The death of the Papasse Ione.

Saint Augustine, in his Celestiall Citie, writing against Apuleius, who wrote a Book of the Demon of Socrates, that had a Deuill, which told him whatsoeuer hee should doe: sheweth by great disputation (as well against the saide Apuleius, Labeo, Varro, Porphyrius, as others) wonderfull things of those cursed and forbidden Sciences, discoursing of them more then any other matter, and in a great number of Chapters. He saith, that he himselfe hath seene some, speaking in all kinds and manner of deuils, good and bad, and the places where they make their abiding: as also such as haunt among men, which were called Lares and Lemures, beeing inuisible Deuils; whom they tearmed priuate Gods, and Manes, Goblins and Spirits. The euill Angels they named Syluani and Fauni, otherwise tearmed Incubus, and Succubus. Incubus is the Man deuill, & Succubus the woman; by whom they accomplish their wil with women. The deuils called Dusians haue done the like. Lactantius, in the second Book of his Diuine Institutions, discourseth largelie on this matter, as well concerning Deuils, as the Magicall Arts.

Aug. in lib. 9. de Ciuit. Dei.

Apuleius, Labeo, Varro, Porphyrius, &c.

Lacres, Lemures, Manes, Goblins, &c.

Incubus and Succubus.

Lactan Firm. in Lib. 2 de Diuin Instit. Cap. 15.

Marcus Varro speaketh meruailous things, of the transformation of Men, who made themselues to be Wolues; and he speaketh of one that continued so ten yeares, and yet afterward returned to his shape againe. And Saint Augustine saith, that he being in Italy, heard that there were certaine Women, who in giuing impoysoned Cheese to Men: conuerted them into Mares, and afterward they came to be men againe, and lost no vse of their reason. Circes also transformed the companions of Vlisses into Swine, by a certaine kind of drink which she gaue them. Yet Saint Augustine saith, that these are but illusions, and it appeareth to such as are transformed, that they are in a Dreame. Neuertheless, the Deuils doe carry the deceipt in such manner: according as he speaketh of one Prestantius, who dreamed that he was in great paine and torments, by carying victuals to the camp of his Enemies. And albeit he was all this while in his bed, yet hee found it truely irkesome, and very offensiue to him.

Marcus Varro.

Augustine, at his being in Italy.

Circes metamorphosed the friends of Vlisses.

Aug. in Lib. 18. de Ciuit. Dei.

Hee that wrote the manner of the Turks liuing, a man of great knowledge and experience, & who remained more then twenty yeares Prisoner in their hands, saith: that the very greatest part of their religious men, are Enchanters and Magitians. Moreouer, that there was one in his time, who in all hidden and concealed matters, could giue a true and certaine iudgement, especiallie of any thing lost, or stolne: by meanes whereof, all the Theeues in the Countrey were grieuously punished, which caused, that no Theefe durst come nere the place where hee dwelt. And that which is most to be marueild at; before such as came vnto him, could declare the occasion of their iourney: himselfe would intirely tell them the truth, of whatsoeuer they were to demand. And to the end, that they may the sooner draw the people to their false Faith, by Miracles, Prodigies, Illusions, & lyes: they make Sathan the Deuill to appear in the shape of a man, and raise vp dead bodies, which they onely see to moue, but liue not. They can likewise cure al kinds of diseases, and reueale the secrets of mens harts, as also places where any treasures lye hidden; for the Authour speaketh in these very wordes. Videbis mortuos resuscitare, omnis generis morbos curari, secreta cordium reuelari, & abscondita à seculo Thesaurorũ loca reperiri.

The Authour of the Turkes liues, in his 18 Chapter.

A cunning Magitian in Turky.

Deceipts and illusions of the Turkish Enchanters.

All the Historics and Bookes of the Ancient Greekes and Latines, are full of such as haue vsed Magicall Arts. As of the Serpent that followed Æsculapius: The Gods which Æneas brought with him from Troy: The Virgine that brought a Sine full of Water to the Temple of Vesta, without spilling one drop. The great Waxe Taper of the Goddesse Venus, whereof Saint Augustine speaketh, that it could not be extinguitinguished. The Sorceries of Medea, and an infinite number more, which are to be found in Trithemius and Hinibaldus, two very auncient Historiographers. They also record, that before Pharamond, and the fortie Kinges and two Dukes, which raigned before him, and before the Kinges of France receiued the holy Charracter of Baptisme: there were many that vsed, and made profession of those Sciences, and especiallie the King named Basan. Yet well we know, that such thinges haue euermore bin forbidden, vpon paine of corporall punishment.

The ancient Greekes and Latines, what strange tales are recorded by them.

Trithemius and Hinibaldus two ancient Historians.

Pharamond the first King of France.

We read, that the Bookes of Numa Pompilius were burned (after they had beene found in a vaulted Caue in his Sepulcher) by the counsell and commaund of the Romaine Senate. And by the Law of the twelue Tables, hee that vsed this Art had bodily punnishment. According as we finde in the Chronicles of France, that the Count of Fouex was put to death, for hauing made a compact and couenant with deuils. So we may yet daily behold witches and Sorcerers punished, who haue any way cõpromitted with Spirits: for euery Sunday they are proclaimed and accursed, and all such as ad-here vnto them. And not onely such as beleeue in Magicke; but also in the Sciences thereon depedding, whereof we haue already spoken sufficiently. Apuleius, who was accused before the Christian Princes, for vsing those Sciences: durst not defend them, albeit he saide, and wrote more then any other. In the Code of the ninth Booke, & thirteenth Chapter, you shall finde, that Ars Mathematica damnabilis & interdicta est omni modo, & que eorum scientia punienda, & seueriſsimis merito legibus vindicanda est. The sacred Scriptures, the Church, Canons, and Decrees, doe forbid the vse thereof on paine of damnation; although there should be any truth therin, because the Lord himselfe hath prohibited it.

Numa Pompilius, his Bookes burned.

The Law of the twelue Tables.

All kindes of Magick haue before beene declared.

Apuleius accused of sorcery

In Code Lib. 9. Cap. 13.

Magicke Arts vtterly prohibited.

I haue seene and heard by a number of wise men, who haue assured me, that they haue seene very strange and admirable thinges, which would be tedious heere to rehearse. That by a certaine number of daies, a man may obtaine so many Spirits, and haue them all made subiect to him; by the vertue of high, Diuine, and Celestiall Names, in performing the great worke. The foure great Princes, which gouerne ouer the nine Princes, and sixty sixe thousand Legions of Spirits, that obey according to their Charracters, and promises made vnto them, wherein are vsed great Ceremonies, Homages, presents, Idolatries, and things most enorme and detestable, which are not to be written, and which a faithfull mind, that hath placed his hope among the heauenly Inhabitants; will hold all such foolish censures in horror and detestation. But all that I haue hitherto spoken, is to no other end; but to exclude the sottishnesse of idle-headed Atheists, in denying and gaine-saying, that there are not any Deuils.

The great worke in Magicke.

The ceremonies in Magicke.

The reason of inserting this Chapter.

And Lanctantius Firmianus, speaking against them, saith. Seeing that alreadie such people are lost, in hauing no beleefe: I would counsell them to learn those Sciences, whereby they may attaine to haue some Spirits familiar with them. And hauing gotten them, according to such rules as will be giuen them: they shall know by them, that there is a God, to whom they obey, and doe tremble when his holy name is vttered. Yea, they will say, affirme and beare witnesse, that if they will not be obedient to the Lord of might: they shall be damned with them, for God is the onely true and great God.

Lac. Firm. in lib 7 cap. 13.

CHAP. XXVI.

A briefe description of the Table of Apelles, the most excellent Painter of the World in his time: which Table made a liuelie representation of humaine life.

APELLES, the admired Painter, ingeniouslie drew a Picture, concerning the life of man and the abuse of drunkennesse. Whereby this man of incomparable skill plainely declared, that his Soule was no lesse exercised in Philosophy, then his hand in painting. In this Table, he liuely pourtrayed, and presented to all beholders, the

The deformity of drunkennesse.

the whole eſtate of humain life. In the firſt place he Painted a Garden, with a very pleaſant Arbour in it, which was embelliſhed with Hearbes and Floures of all ſorts, that might be thought able to yeilde delectation, to ſuch as ſhould enter into this Garden; as well in regard of their beauty and appearance, as for their fruites and pleaſing ſauour. At the entrance into this Garden or Orchard, there was a great Gate figured on the right hand, the way and paſſage whereof was very delightſome, & much frequented: for thereby reſorted thither (from many other by-pathes) all ſorts of people, young and old. On the other ſide, beeing the left hand, there was another little doore, very ſtraite, & narrow to paſſe in and out at, which had a ſharpe and difficult way thereto, all couered with Buſhes, Brambles, and Thornes, and that way ſeemed very little frequented. Before the firſt gate, there were goodly Tents erected, with beautifull Seates and Lodgings, fit for royall entertainement: and there ſtood alſo faire Tables, ready furniſhed with all Viands neceſſary for the life of man, diſpoſed in very good order, and all commers ſate preſently downe, banqueting together very iocondlie.

A faire Garden and an Arbour.

The entrance into the Garden, on the right hand.

Another little entrance on the left hand.

Preparation before the firſt gate.

The Hoſtes or Miſtres of the place, named her ſelfe Sobrietie, who had all her Chamber-maids about her, waiting on the Table very honeſtly, with all diligence and exceeding good grace. One of them tearmed her ſelfe Chearefulneſſe; another Modeſty; and the third Honeſty. They had alſo the Graces (their Siſters) with them in this place of pleaſure, where Sobriety pleaſed to liue with her Houſhold. Some gaue themſelues to Wraſtling; Others delighted in other honeſt paſtimes; without any debate or diſcontentment. Some alſo conferred together; and others wore awaie the time, in playing vpon muſicall Inſtruments, while others ſung ſweet and honeſt ſongs to them.

Sobriety the Miſtres, and her waiting-Maides.

Of Sports & paſtimes.

In breefe, they had all ſeemely paſtimes, both to exerciſe and recreate themſelues, before and after their repaſts, according as was thought requiſite for the ſupport of health. After they had honeſtlie taken their refection, one part of them retired (very merily, and in good order) home to their houſes and affaires; after they had firſt thanked, and taken leaue of their Lady Sobriety. But the reſt that remained, being a farre greater number then they that returned, not contented with this hauing receiued good fare, and ſpending the time ſo much as was thought requiſite: would needes paſſe on further, and entred into the Garden at the great Gate, without making any account of Sobrietie their firſt Hoſteſſe, or yeilding her any thankfull requitall.

Their order after Refection, in ſuch as were gueſts.

At the entrance of the Arbour, there ſate a Woman, looking euery where about her, ſhe being very groſſe and fat: her Cheekes ſwolne and puffed vp; her Lippes great and red, and her Face like a flat platter: and ſhewing her ſelfe very ſeruiceable, ſhe called to the troope of people, making them courteous ſignes with her head, and ſhewing them (with both her hands) the doores open entrance.

The deſcription of Gurmandiſe and Gluttony.

This Woman was called Gurmandiſe, or Gluttony. In the midſt of the Arbour ſate another Woman, in Garments like a Queen: but ſhe was drunk, yet ſhe gouerned there, and was chiefe Miſtreſſe of the Lodging. She had a Crown of young Vine ſprouts on hir head, and held a great Cup in both her handes, as one that was alwaies readie to drinke: beeing attended and accompanied with her Ladies and wayting-Maides, who ſerued all ſuch as entred preſently with drinke. The firſt was named Folly; the ſecond Madneſſe; and the third Luxury; on whom ſtill waited her Brother Exceſſe, all of them fitted with Garments according to their conditions.

The Image of drunkenneſſe

The Ladies & waighting women attending on drunkenneſſe, deſcribed in their ſeuerall qualities and conditions.

A fourth Hand-maide was alſo preſent by, called Forgetfulneſſe, who ſeemed to ſtand as one aſtenied: And then there was another, ſitting on the ground, called Slothfulneſſe, Siſter vnto Idleneſſe, and Daughter to Carleſneſſe. She ſitting halfe aſleep, as it were; held a Cuppe of Wine in her hand, which (negligently) ſhee ſpilled on the ground, Scurrility and Scoffing, with Taunting their Brother, and Brabling their Siſter, tooke her Kinſman Debate by the hand, who was not far of, but ſate cloſly conferring with Infamy, Rage, & Fury, who (for want of better company) ſupplied the laſt place.

This

Men transformed into all kinds of beasts, by drunkennesse

This comely company, were guarded and enuironned (as by hedges and bushes) with Beares, Bulles, Goates, great Asses, Horses, huge Mastiues, bleating Cattle, Hares, Buckes, Apes, Marmosets, Wolues, Swine, and all other kindes of Beasts; that (of liuing Men) had beene Metamorphosed into such Monsters, after they had drunke of the Wine, from the hand of the Lady. When they entred first to her; they were all Men, and so continued (for some time) in their humaine shape: but when they had thoroughly tasted of her drinkes, they lost their true formes, and were suddenly changed into Beasts. But it was a horrour to behold their countenances, and the life which these beasts led, crying and howling altogether, with a most confused hermony, and accord.

Horror to behold men changed into beasts, & what strange filthinesse then issueth from them.

Vpon the one side, some were discharging their stomackes of Wine, & then they which were Dogges, came and licked vp this loathsomnesse againe. The Swine wallowed in filthy puddles, vomiting horrible Serpents and Lizards. The Bulles and Kine, they did cast vp Frogs and Flyes: The Buckes, Pearles: The Asses, Bookes: The Bears, swords and Glaiues: The Wolues, Cats and Mice: But the Apes and Marmosets, they skipped & danced about very pleasantly. Contrariwise, the Beares and Wolues bit, and fought very furiously each against other, so that their bodies were torne and mangled.

Debates, quarels, and contentions in Drunkennes.

Vpon the left hand, where the narrow passage was, whereof we haue formerly spoken, and the small path so sildome haunted: lay the bodies of beasts stretched out along, sleeping verie soundly, although it was in their owne Dung and Vomitings. All were wounded with Wine, and many other hurts, and there they lay heaped, as a Hill of dead bodies. Some arose vp faintlie, after they had slept and digested their Wine, and afterward returned speedily to their former behauiour; but hauing on still their skinnes of sauage Beasts.

The vnwholsome and vnsauoury sleeping of drunkards.

Their returning out at the narrow gate.

These men, after they were well wearied with drunkennesse, went staggering forth of the Arbour, and found a passage out at the strait or narrow gate: but many of them in this returning, were halt and lame of their members; others were halfe Men, & halfe beasts, as Centaures, Satyes, and Sauages. When they were out of the little door, there they met with aged people, that kept the passage, who came vnto them with Bonds and Chaines, where-with they bound them hand and foote, and afterward did beate them very soundlie. If any one offered to rebell, they gaue him many blowes with a Bastinado: and they would not suffer any to escape them, vntill they had made their account with them.

Aged people that contended with Drunkards.

The most dangerous old fellow of al the rest, that gaue the most blowes, and (indeede) was most cruell; named himselfe the Gout, who had a very hideous shape. He had his members lanke; his ioynts grosse; his hands and fingers knit with great knots, and crooked. The second, had one while a pale countenance, and another while it was as red as any fire: and hee tearmed himselfe the Feauer or Ague. The third was the Dropsie, very big swolne, with a colour like to Lead and Sulpher: and he was also a shrewd smiter, tormenting vetie cruelly. For in some, he blew vp their bellies as big as Drums; others, their Legges; others, their stomacke and face; others, their whole body, and brought them into such an alteration: as they could neuer bee satisfied with drinke, but the more they dranke, so much the more thirsty were they, and insatiable. Hard at his heeles followed the Palsie, who seemed to be wholy impotent, and that he had not any Nerues, which were not broken: but such as he could lay hold on, he bound them in such strong and sure bonds; as he made them quite impotent eyther in halfe of their body, or all their members.

The most angry old man, was the Gout

The Feauer.

The Dropsie.

The Palsie.

The fift, called Apoplexie, or the dead Palsie, tooke some strictly by the coller, and beat them so about the head: that they remained as halfe dead, without any vnderstanding or mooning. The Itch and Scab accompanied all these, but closely pursued by their Sister Leprosie, who did so beat those poore tame Roysters, that all their bodies became an hard crust, and their faces adorned with goodly Saphires. Their Noses also cost more the painting; then if they had bin limned

The Apoplexie.

The Itch, Scab, and Leprosie.

The Cuſtome of Lazers and Rogues.

limned with Gold and Siluer. Theſe fel a tugging one another by the eares, & ſo cruelly fighting; that hardly any one of them remained aliue.

So many men ſo many diſeaſes.
The Falling ſickneſſe.
The catarrhe

Thus grew ſuch a number of diſeaſes among men; that moſt of them could lay claim to a ſeueral name. But among the reſt, there was the Falling euill or ſickneſſe, and the Catarrhe, which continually lay buffeting about the head. The Falling ſickneſſe lay al along, beating his head againſt the ground, and againſt hard ſtones: that many times it brake, and the blood followed; with foaming at the mouth like an angry Swine. But woe to him whom he could faſten on; for he would fall downe vpon him, and make him in as bad a caſe as himſelfe. Neuertheleſſe, hee was not ſo cruell as his Kinſman Apoplexy, for albeit he took away al vnderſtanding: yet he left ſome motion, and reſted ſatisfied with offending himſelfe onely. Catarrhe, or the Rhume, had a groſſe head, ſo heauie and ſleepy, as very hardly could he ſupport himſelfe. His gorge was like a Sinke, euermore caſting forth vnſauory ſmels. His Noſe like a Limbeck, alwaies diſtilling: but not Roſe-water, for it was foule ſniuell, like to ſuch corruption as he bred himſelfe. And ſuch a deale of Water came forth of his head, onely to quench the heat of wine: that the ſmell thereof annoyed many, and almoſt ſtifled others.

The falling ſickneſſe not ſo bad as the dead Palſie.

Of the Catarrhe or Rhume.

Among all theſe old wretches, there was one that had more then fiue hundred thouſand pieces and patches on his Garment, his face was couered verie thicke with dirt and filth, and he looked very meager and hideous: which made all the reſt, ſeeing him to be ſuch a poor Snake, and one vnworthy to hold ranck with them; to beat and bruiſe him, till the blood iſſued forth. This Picture of miſery was called Pouerty. After al theſe before named, came Old decrepite Age, mounted on a Charriot made of dead mens bones, and his next Neighbour Death triumphed ouer him. The Chariot wheeles went ouer both young and old, breaking them in pieces as it went along. Thus may you ſee by the Picture of Apelles, a liuely deſcription of Sobriety and Drunkenneſſe; deliuering apparantly to euery eye, both the good and euill that happeneth to men.

Pouerty in his beſt bracuery.

Old age and death.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Morall of Apelles Table, is by the Authour more ſignificantly interpreted.

COncerning this Table of Apelles, wee muſt firſt conſider, that it expreſſeth two ſeuerall kindes of life, and two manners of liuing which are among men. That is to ſay, the one, of Abſtinence and Sobrietie; the other, of Gurmandiſe, Gluttony, and Drunkenneſſe. The firſt is reputed neceſſarie for al men, for, as we cannot liue without eating and drinking, conſidering we are not Angels, but Mortal Men: euen ſo as needfull is it, to gouerne our life by the rule of Sobrietie. Therefore we ſhould all enter into the Houſe of Sobriety, without deſiring to paſſe any further: for wee liue not to eate, but eate to liue. And becauſe taſting is one of the ſences, which wee haue moſt in common with other creatures: it is very requiſite, that man ſhould moderate and temper the ſame, both by Abſtinence and Sobriety, as alſo reaſon which onely is giuen him; if he will not only ſhew himſelfe to bee a beaſt, but that which is more, worſe then a beaſt. For this cauſe, Apelles figured the dwelling of Sobriety without the Garden or Orchard, to let vs vnderſtand thereby; that we are not to paſſe any further, to venter on exceſſe: but to reſt contented, with receiuing our refection honeſtly, for ſatisfying the neceſſities of nature. In like manner, he gaue no other abiding to Sobrietie, then Tents, Pauillions, & Tabernacles, to ſignifie: that we ſhould make no long ſitting at the Table, no more then Paſſengers do in their Inne, who enter not to remaine there alwaies, but onely to content nature, and then to paſſe on vpon their iourney.

Two ſeuerall kinds of life, and liuing among men.

The habitation of Sobrietie.

The reaſon of Sobrieties dwelling without the Garden.

Tents and Pauillions alowed to Sobriety

If Apelles, who was no other then a Pagan, could take knowledge heereof: much more ought we to conſider the ſame, Apelles was a Pagane.

same then he, considering that we haue the testimony of holy Scripture, which admonisheth vs; That we haue heere no permanent Cittie; That we dwell in this body, as in a Tabernacle, vntill such time as it shall please the Lord, that gaue vs such Lodging, to dislodge vs hence. I thinke also, that he gaue vs admonishment heerein, by the Feast of Tabernacles, and the life which the ancient Israelites led in the Wildernesse. Because our life is so short, & as we feed but to lengthen and continue the same: we should therefore bee fearefull of diminishing and curtalling our time, in spending the most part of our life at the Table, where many crackes and flawes are made by excesse. Therefore they may well be counted wise, and woorthy to beare the name of men, that would goe on no further: but returned honestly to their home affaires, after they had soberly receiued their sustenance.

By the Sportes, Pastimes, Musique, and Songs, which were exercised in this Meadow of Sobriety; I thinke hee purposed to demonstrate, that the life of Man hath some honest pleasures and recreations allowed it. For God doth not prohibite vs, to vse such good gifts as he hath bestowed on vs; liuing in moderate ioy, when the time so requireth. It is written: That there is a time to laugh and a time to mourne; a time for ioy, and a time for sadnesse. And therefore a Christian man may learne, to vse both the one and other well, and all to the glory of God.

Most certaine it is, that God permitteth vs honest pleasures and delightes, which he hath not forbidden, or are to his dishonour, or any occasion of euill. All honest and vertuous exercises are permitted vnto vs, in rendring thankes to God for them, and acknowledging his benefits by them: prouided also, that we keepe our selues alwaies within the rule of Sobriety, Modesty, and Honesty. Thus we see one manner of life, and that which most conuenientlie beseemeth man.

The other is more brutish, then humaine, the sense and description whereof, taketh it selfe thus. First, for the large and common beaten way, whereby men entred into the Garden, and concerning the vnbrideled multitude that made vse thereof: I vnderstand his meaning to be thus, that euery man affecteth ease, idlenesse, and voluptuous pleasures.

Some knew how to giue a meane to their desires, and tooke not so much Meat and Wine, as should trouble their vnderstanding: but could well returne to their ordinary businesses, and vse reason in all thinges. Now, there were others, that knew not any meane or measure, neither had regard to time or place: but would needs venter further, and fell into such extreamity of follie, as they lost their senses, vnderstanding, and memory. So that thereby they became brute beasts, and could no way retire from this disordered battaile: till diseases, pouerty, and necessity admonished them of their duty. For they are the last Companions of drunkennesse, and the Wages for all Carrowsers, that doe her the greatest honour. By the Hand-maides or waiting Weomen on drunkennesse: I vnderstand those seueral vices, as their apt Names doe signifie, and they are the meetest for her company. And by the drinkes which shee gaue to her Quaffers, hee meaneth the venome and poyson of voluptuous excesse, which maketh such a transport of mens vnderstandings: that they grow like vnto brute beastes, according as they take lesse or more, & according to the complexions they are of; representing euen those very beasts, whose nature and manners they come neerest vnto, and refusing all friendlie counsell and aduise; do delight more in such barbarous and vnciuill courses, then any other manners that should shew them to be men.

Great helpes that a Christian man hath.

The Feast of Tabernacles.

Short feasting auoydeth surfeiting.

Honest sports and pleasures allowed to mans life.

Eccle. 3. 4.

God permitteth vs al honest pleasures

The other brutish kinde of life in the dwelling of drunkennesse

The Scholers of ryot and excesse.

Diseases, Pouerty and necessity, the last companions of Drunkennesse.

CHAP. XXVIII.

¶ A Paradoxe in praise of imprisonment; maintaining, that it is more healthful & profitable to be in Prison, then at libertie.

IF goods lockt vp in the smallest houses, are of greatest price and most in request; yea, with more diligence looked looked vnto and preserued, then those displayed and exposed to their iudgements, that haue a will (by them) to offend others: I may then by good reason maintain, that the Prison is better then the publike place of liberty, which often times turnes to his greatest dammage, that had the highest desire vnto it. Nor ought (vnder correction) the tearms of Prison and Prisoner, be so offensiue to the eares of any man, as if they were sharp pricking Thorns, neither to bring such molestation to their minds, as to make them sometimes tremble, quake, and ready to swound with feare. Considering, that in this Citty wherein wee dwell, euery man may well call and repute himself to be a Prisoner; but especially in this world, where no one can call himselfe free, vntill the breath bee forth of his body. And this was the reason, why the holy Apostle of God so loudly demanded: What was he that could deliuer him frō this mortal prison? He ment the prison of this fleshly body, which appears to me, to be nolesse profitable to the life of man; then a strong Prison walled with stone, that serues him as a rampier and safe defence, against al dangers which might daily assaile him.

The greatest treasures lye in the smallest roomes.

The tearme of Prison and Prisoner no way offensiue

The words of Saint Paule.

I may speake this, by the example of many great personages, to whom imprisonment brought no meane happinesse: as keeping them in assurance frō their enemies, and thereby made their poore life the more tranquile to them. Lastly, when it became hatefull to thē: then it more apparantly witnessed, what good it had done them. For they were no sooner deliuered, and set at libertie; but they were miserably slaine by their Aduersaries.

The great benefit of imprisonment to men.

Poore wits, that are ignorant of prison benefit; vnderstand not the priuiledges ensuing thereby: which indeede are such, as neuer can iustly make any man agreeued. If it do, for a little while; it recompenceth it afterward with vertue, glory, and honour. If not in this World; yet it failes not in the other, which is perpetuall and euerlasting: as we haue gathered by diuers Saints and iust persons, who (after the imprisonment of this world) haue (vndoubtedly) entred into eternall liberty. And for proof of the blessed recompence, which imprisonment bringeth to men of vertue, let vs take example by Marius, honoured with the great Empire of Cæsar. By King Matthias, who after he had bin detained in Hungaria, by King Ladislaus: from Prison entred suddainely to the Crowne. Lewes the twelft, scarsely was he set in assured liberty, and out of Prison: but immediatly hee was made King of Fraunce. Ye shall finde an infinite number, who after they were restored to freedome from imprisonment; became more glorious and excellent persons, then euer they had beene all their whole life time before.

Reward of greese by imprisonment.

The recompence of vertuous men, by imprisonment.

Now, as I will not deny, but imprisonment, stocks, chains, and manacles, may somewhat impeach ouer worldlie operations: yet dare I then (withall) maintaine, that they cannot any way disturb them, if they be honest and holy cogitations, nor the noble and vertuous conceipts of men, or their high, hopefull, and excellent enterprises. For, in despight of all those meanes, as were imployed to hinder this resolution: it held credit, not onely in the Castle and Prison at Paris, in the Dungeon at Rouen, in the Hell-house at Florence, the Limbo at Monce, and the Stone-house at Luca; but had power beside, to passe the Crosse of Theodorus Cyrenæus, to enter the Bull of fierce Phalaris, and penetrate into the cruell Tunne of Attilius Regulus.

Impeachment of worldlie operations.

Proofs of honorable and resolute constancy.

To prooue this, Signior Ascanio Colonna (who was kept in the Prisons of Andrea Damia) could not by all extreamities vsed against him, be any way impeached in his most rare prudence, when (after long consideration thereof) the saide Damia, of a Capitall enemie, became a most faithfull and affectionate Seruant of the Emperour.

Let vs consider the infinite benefits, whereof imprisonment is the only cause. First of all, it keepes the Spirit of man, frō cōmitting many enormous sins; his eyes, from beholding spectacles to offend them, or motions stirring vp carnall concupisence; his eares from hearing irkesome and infecting speeches, and the ouer readie and sinfull tongue, from blaspheming the holy name of Almightie God.

The infinite benefits ensuing by imprisonment to men.

Beside these, he liueth more sober and temperately, and is in safe securitie, be it in the times of peace, war, or peſtilence. Priſoners are exempted from paying taxations, borrowings, or houſe-rents. They cannot be ſuſpected to haunt euill companies, the frequenting whereof, is oftentimes the cauſe of ten thouſand exceſſes. Laſtly, in this holy place, eaſily are obtained the vertues of patience and humility.

The vertues of Patience and Humility.

Haue we not ſeene, and do yet daily behold, that good Fathers (to chaſtiſe the diſobedience or pride of their miſgouerned Children) cauſe them for a while to be ſhut vp in Priſon? Whence they returne ſoone after, endued with better manners and behauiour: then if they had ſpent more ſpace, in the Schoole of wiſe Socrates, or in the Academy of moſt prudent Philoſophers.

The chaſtiſing of lewd and diſobedient Children.

Was not that marueilous, of the Viſcount Paulo Vicino, who, being for ſome cauſe (whereof hee was accuſed) Captiue vnder the power of Duke Frances: gaue himſelfe wholy to the ſtudy of diuine Letters? Wherein (during the time of his impriſonment) he became ſo feruent and frequent, as few were found to excell him in Religion. And this was a matter, whereof (in all his former life time) he neuer had ſo much as a thought: albeit he enioyed the ſubſtance of a right good Byſhop, and of a better Abby. I may not omit in this place, my Lord of Roſſes, Biſhop of Pauia, who at the houre when he entred Priſon; gaue himſelfe wholly to God, where as yet he liueth like a right Hermit. Peter Fatinell, a Cittizen of Luca, hauing liued many yeares moſt miſerably, neuer comming to the Church, nor knowing God to be his Superiour: ſo ſoone as he was brought into Priſon, he deſired that a Prieſt might be ſent vnto him, to talke with him concerning his Soules health; and from thence forward, he liued in all duty and obedience.

The Marques Paulo Vicino.

The Lord of Roſſes Biſhop of Pauia.

Peter Fatinell of Luca.

What ſhall wee ſay of a Knight in France, whoſe haire (by being ſome few daies in Priſon) became all white, onlie by the alteration of his former life: ſo that, neither by Head, Beard, behauiour, or ſpeeches, he could be knowne to be the man he had beene before. The like may be ſaid of an Italian Preſident, who parting (in his lateſt houre) from the Priſon; declared by his wordes and diuine perſwaſions, in cõparable ſanctitie. The Priſon then is found, to be the beſt Schoole of Philoſophy, and the onely ſinguler Academy: wherein to learne all Morall vertues and Chriſtian profeſſion, and no place elſe may compare, with the Diuine and moſt praiſeworthy Priſon.

The strange alteration of a Knight of France.

The Priſon is the beſt ſchoole of Philoſophy.

O holy and glorious houſe! Wherein the Maker and Redeemer of the world vouchſafed to lodge. The houſe of al goodneſſe and vertues: and which ought more to be deſired for peereleſſe holineſſe, then the Pallaces of Kinges and greateſt Princes. For they are more ſemblable to ſome Hell, or place of eternall death; then is the bleſſed and deuout Priſon: wherein men may paſſe their liues more religiouſly, then among all the obſeruant Fryers in the World. For there ſhall no man plead againſt ye, or picke any iniurious quarrell with ye. There they ſildome ſwear, or very little. There ye ſhall continually hear, an infinite number of faire vowes made; with a thouſand Prayers and ſupplications, both by day and night.

The glory of impriſonment

The holy priuiledge of impriſonment.

O life moſt ſweet, and full of repoſe! How much more conſolation is to bee found in thee, then in following the Courts of the mightieſt Princes? For there, no right from wrong can be diſcerned, or any other good; then trauaile and vnquietneſſe, both of the body and minde. Seeing then it is ſo, that impriſonment bringeth with it ſo manie commodities, as I haue already declared vnto ye: I may eaſily conclude, that we ought not to be grieued, when we are made ſubiect thereunto. But rather highly to praiſe the name of God, for beſtowing on vs (thereby) the moſt ſinguler beneſit, which in this World we can receiue from him.

The Authors Concluſion.

CHAP. XXIX.

A briefe Summarie, of the firſt Booke of Ciceros Tuſculanes; concerning the miſpriſall and contempt of the World.

THe whole life of a wiſe man, is nothing elſe but a memorial, and continuall

The life time of a wiſe man continuall regard made of death. Nor can any man iuſtly ſpeake againſt it, in regard I am verily perſwaded, that all things elſe are hurtfull to man, and that there can be no greater happineſſe then this: becauſe it is moſt certaine, that after our fraile life is ended, we ſhall bee with God. The griefe is litle or nothing at all in death: for it is oftentimes without feeling, and ſometimes with pleaſure. In what manner ſoeuer it be, it can be of no account: becauſe the paine is paſt in a moment, and we ſhould not be fearefull thereof, but rather long and deſire to embrace it. For after we haue made that happy paſſage, there remaineth no more care or ſollicitude for vs. It is but a departing hence, to goe into another Countrey, where they doe already dwell, which are departed out of this life. It is therefore a matter of ioy and felicity, and a man ſhould march thither with a cherefull courage, and not thinke much to dye, euen during his faireſt fortunes, becauſe therein is no paine, greefe, or vexation. Neither doth it procure any extinction of the Spirit, but is only a change of habitation, from earth to Heauen, which is the proper dwelling of the Soule. Wee ought not then to fear that, which cannot be auoyded, and is likewiſe neceſſary for all in generall; therefore no one can be eſteemed miſerable therein. If therefore we be mindfull thereof, and of our lateſt daies; we ſhall neuer ſinne. But may ſafely ſay with Saint Paule: Ieſus Chriſt is our life, and Death aduantage.

Little or no greefe at all in death.

Our departure into another Country

No quenching of the Spirit.

The End of the Sixt Booke.

The Seauenth Booke.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kingdome of Tunis; The Lawes, Customes, and Ceremonies vsed among the people, and other Obseruations well deseruing memory.

The afincient hame of Tunis.

THe Citty of Thunis, or Tunis, being very great, was by the Latines cald Tunetum, & of the Arabians Tunus: but they do hold that name to be a very corrupt vocable, because (in their Language) Tunus doth not signifie any thing. This Citty was anciently called Tharsus, as that other which is in Asia, and was at the first but a very little Citty, builded by the Affricanes, vpon the Lake which was formed vpon the Goletta, distant from the Mediterranean Sea, about twelue miles. But after that Carthage was destroyed, then did the Citty begin to encrease, both in number of Habitations and dwellers: in regard that the Armies which surprised Carthage, being vnwilling to tarry there (for feare of fresh supplies from Europe) came to abide at Tunis, and there they builded many houses.

The destruction of Carthage.

Not long after, there came thither a Captaine, named Hucha di Vtmen, who gaue them to vnderstand, that an Army ought not to shut vp it selfe in any Citty, that should touch or be neere vnto the Sea: And therefore they made a Citty, which they named Cairoan, about the distance of thirty sixe Miles from the Sea, and accounted to be an hundred miles from Tunis. Then did the Armies forsake Tunis, and inhabited this new City: other people gouerning those houses in Tunis, which had beene abandoned by the Armies.

Hucha di Vtmen a valiant Captaine.

Cairoan, a new citty builded.

After this, about three hundred and fifty yeares, the Citty of Cairoan was destroyed by the Arabians; so that the Rector or Ruler thereof, fled thence into the West, and raigned in Buggia, as also ouer all the neighbouring partes: but ther remained in Tunis, a Familie or kinred of the said Rector or Gouernor, that fled from Cairoan, who still possessed the same, as Soueraigne Lordes thereof. About ten yeares after, they of Buggia were expulsed by Ioseph, the Sonne of Tasino, and beholding the humility and kindnes of those Lords: they left the State to them, wherein they continued in tranquilitie, so long as the Family of Ioseph raigned. Wherefore Abdul Mumen, King of Marocco, hauing regained Mahdia, which had bin taken by the Christians: passed homeward (in his returne) by Tunis, where he tooke on him the gouernment. Therefore, all the time that Abdull Mumen liued, and Ioseph his Sonne, with their Successours, Iacob and Manfor: Tunis continued in peace, vnder the rule of the Kings of Marocco. After the death of Manſor, his Sonne Mahumet Ennaſir mooued Warre againſt the King of Spaine: but was ouercome and forced to flight, whereupon he retyred backe to Marocco, and liued there ſome few yeares after his foyle. Then election was made of his Brother Ioſeph, who was ſlaine by certaine Souldiers to the King of Teleſin.

Cairoan destroyed by the Arabes.

Tunis gouerned by the Kings of Marocco.

Mahumet Ennaſir, warred on the King of Spaine.

Now, in the interim, betweene the ouerthrow of Mahumet, his death, as alſo the murthering of his Brother Ioſeph; the Arabes returned backe on Tunis, and beſiedged it. But the Gouernour of Tunis, gaue notice thereof to the King of Marocco, and that if he ſent him not ſome immediate ſuccour: hee ſhould bee conſtrained to deliuer the Citty to the Arabes. The King well conſidering, on a caſe of ſuch importance; did as became a man of his high Spirit and experience; electing (aboue all other in his Court) one borne in Ciuill, a Cittie of Granado, named Habduluaihidi, whom hee forth-with ſent thither, with the very ſame authoritie, as if he had gone himſelfe in perſon. Being accompanied with twenty goodlie great Shippes, hee arriued at Tunis, which he found euen halfe vanquiſhed by the Arabes. But by his wiſedome, prouidence, and flowing eloquence, he foyled the enemy, pacified the State, ſet all thinges in good order, and made the Countries entrance ſure againſt all Intruders. After him, his Sonne ſucceeded, named Abu Zaccherias, who in wiſdome and learning excelled his Father. He cauſed to be builded in Tunis (on the Weſt ſide of the Citties very higheſt part) a mightie great Rocke, and many goodly Pallaces in the Citty: with a beautifull Temple, which had an high Tower on the top thereof, round engirt with ſtrong walles.

Tunis beſieged by the Arabes.

Tunis deliuered from the Arabes.

Abu Zaccherias K. of Marocco.

This Abu Zaccherias went likewiſe to Tripoli, where his valour won him ſuch renowne, and his wiſedome made ſo good benefit of the Countrey: that (at his death) he left an infinite Maſſe of treaſure behinde him. He being dead, his Sonne ſucceeded him, who was an ambitious proud young man, & would no longer ſuffer himſelfe to be gouerned by the Lordes of Marocco: becauſe hee ſaw their declining and downefall, and that the Family of Marino began to ſet in footing, raigning ouer the Regions of Fez, as Beni Zeiren did in Teleſin, and in Granado.

The death of Abu Zaccherias

The declining of the Kingdome of Marocco, and riſing of that of Fez.

These two great Potentates began to Warre vpon each other, and to contend for priority of State: but by this their diſcord, the power of the Lordes of Tunis encreaſed, ſo that they went with an Army againſt Teleſin, and compelled them to pay them tribute. Whereupon, the King that new aroſe from the Houſe of Marino, and had bin at the ſurprizall of Marocco: ſent many rich preſents to the Gouernour of Tunis, recommending both himſelfe, and his whole State vnto his fauour. The Gouernour accepted him as a Friend: alwayes prouided, that he ſhould be inferior to him. And ſo hee returned in triumph to Tunis, cauſing himſelfe to be called King of Affrica: which Title was thought very deſertful for him, becauſe (as then) there was not a more powerfull Prince in all Affrica, then he.

Entercourſe between Marocco and Tunis.

The King of Tunis King of Affrica.

He began then to ordaine his Court Royall, with Secretaries, Councellers, and à Captaine Generall: vſing all thoſe Ceremonies, that the Kinges of Marocco formerlie had done. And from the time of this Prince, euen vnto our daies: Tunis held on the ſame encreaſing Dignitie, as well in Habitations, as in Ciuility; ſo that it became the onely and ſinguler Cittie of Affrica. After his death, his Sonne, to whom the Royall Crowne came in right; cauſed certaine Townes or Burroughes to be builded about the Cittie. One, without the Gate, called Bedſuuaica, containing about ſome three hundred Houſes. Another, without the Gate, called Bed Elmancra, amounting to a thouſand Houſholds. And theſe two Townes are full of infinite Artificers. As of Fiſher-men, Apothecaries, and diuers other.

Ordination of the Court Royall and Councellers.

Building of Townes and villages without the Citty.

In the laſt named Borrough, there is a ſeparate ſtreete, as if it were another little Towne by it ſelfe: wherein doe dwell the Chriſtians of Tunis, that are imployed in the Princes guard, and in other Offices, which the Moores cannot, nor are permitted to doe. Afterward, another Towne was added, which is without the Gate, called The Chriſtians of Tunis.

Bed

Bed and Bahar, that is the Marine or seagate, which is neere to the Lake of the Goletta, about halfe a Mile.

The Warehouses of Christian Merchants.

In this Towne, doo lodge Christian Merchants, and Strangers; as the Genewayes, Venetians, and Catalanes, who do all hold their Ware-houses & their Lodgings seperately, of the Moores. This Towne is bigge enough, and maketh about three hundered fires, betweene the Christians and the Moors: but the houses are little. So that, between the walled Cittie, and the Townes about it, may be accounted some nine or tenne thousand Houtholds.

The Cittie it selfe, and maner thereof among the Inhabitants.

The Citty it selfe, is faire and well ordered, to wit; euery Art is seuerall by it selfe. Beside, it is very populous, and wel inhabited: but the Inhabitantes (for the most part) are Artificers, and especially Weauers of Cloath, because in Tunis is made a very great quantity of most perfect cloath, which is sold thorow all Affrica. And they are very choise, in hauing their cloath to be strong and good, for the Women of the Cittie, are excellent Spinners; and when they Spin, they vse to sit in some place, that the Spindle may descend downe low, or out of some Window, answering to some Court of the house; or by some hole, made out of one roome into another: so that by the waightinesse of the Spindle, descending such a depth, the thredde is well drawne, made round and ceuen.

The women of Tunis are singuler spinners.

The Market-place of the Gity, & howe it is traded.

In this City, is a market place, whereon standeth a great number of Shoppes, appertaining to Merchants, Trading in Cloath, and they are helde to be the Richest men in Tunis.

The conditiō of the people in their seuerall degrees.

There are other Merchants and Artezans; as Apothecaries and such as sel Sirrops, Electuaries, Perfumes: And Silkemen, Taylors, Sadlers, and other Handicraftes men. The people are verie benigne and louing, and the Tradesmen, Merchants, Priests, Doctors, and al they that haue the managing of any office, do go well Garmented, wearing great Tulipantes on their heads, made vp of a long and large Towell. Thus do the men of the Kinges Court weare, and Soldiers; but there they do not vse to couer their heads.

Great scarsity of Graine, & the cause thereof.

Of wealthy men indeede, there are but few, in regarde of the great dearth of Graine: for the ordinary price of a measure vsed amongst them (valuing with vs a quarter Sacke) is three Doubles, which are four Ducates of them of Venice. And this scarsity ensueth, by reason that the people of the City, cannot husband their Neighboring grounds, thorow the great molestation which they haue by the Arabes. Therefore, their Corne is faine to come conducted from farre thither, as from Vrbs, from Buggia, and from Bona.

Citizens haue houses without the City.

Some of the Cittizens haue certaine little Farme-houses neere to the Citty and well walled about, where they sowe such small portions of grounde as they haue, with Barley or Wheate. And those grounds must be well watered; therefore in euerie Farme they haue a Well, out of which they draw water by the help of a Wheel, and so conuey it then by channels, ingeniously deuised and made. The Wheele is turned about by a Mule, or a Cammell; and so the Water running along, by men the ground is watred therewith.

The great drought of their grounds

As for the quantity of Corn that may be produced from one of these smal Farmes, and Husbanded with such paine & endeuour: It will not last the owner for halfe the yeares space; and yet notwithstanding, the Bread is fair, white and wel Baked. For, they do not boult out any Flower, but let it go wholly together, although it asketh much labour in the making: especially, when they conuert it into Paste, which they beat with great Pestles, made after the manner of those, wherewith they beat Rice and Flax in the Countrey of Egypt.

The perfection of their Bread.

A rude kinde of food eaten by them.

The Merchants, Artezanes, and Cittizens, haue an equall Custome, to eate (in the day time) a vile and rude meate, which is Barley Dow, steeped in Water, and reduced like a kinde of Glew: then is it put into a little Oile, or the Iuice of Limons, or some of Orenges: and this coorse kind of food they swallow down, without any chewing, receiuing it by little and little, and calling it Pessis, but indeed they eate it very beastly.

The Barley market place.

There is a Market place, where nothing else is sold but Barley Meale, and it is onely bought to make that kinde of meate. They vse another meate, which is somewhat more cleanly and handsome. They take a light kinde of Paste, and then boyle it in water, and when it is well sodden, they put it into an Earthen Vessell; and & gathring it togither in the midst of the Dish, they poure Oyle vppon it, or the broath of fat meate, and so eate it as they do the other, and this kind of food is termed among them Bruzin. Neither within nor without the Cittie, is there anie Mill, that grindeth on the water, but they are all mooued by Beastes; so that a Mill can hardly grinde a Soame of Corne in a day.

No Water-Mils within or without the Citty.

There are no Springs, nor Riuers, or VVelles of wholsome water: but out of Cesternes, wherein they gather raine water. A little without the Cittie, there is a Poole of running water, but it is somwhat brackish, and thither resorts all the Water-bearers, with their Beastes and other cariages; where when they are filled, they make sale of them in the Cittie, and the people vse to drinke it, as beeing more wholsome then the Cesterne Water. Other Wels there be of verie good water; but they are for the Prince, & for his Courtiers.

Wels of water reserued for the prince

There is a verie faire Temple, and great in Circumference, furnished not onely with a number of Priests; but also, with great Rentes and Reuennewes. Other Temples there are in the Cittie, and neighbouring Townes, but of much lesse and vnable quality.

Temples in the City.

Many Colledges of Schollers there are, and Monasteries of some Religious people, for whom the Almes of the people is their best allowance. If any one be a Natiue of Tunis, and his follie doo lead him, to hurle stones about the streetes, their wisedome is so great, that they repute that ydle Asse to be a Saint. The more part of the houses are beautifull enough formed, and made of squared stone, verie morkemanly: On the roofes whereof, are goodly Ornaments, and curious Carued Plaister, painted with Azure, and other fine Colours. And thus they do, because Woode and Timber is verie scarse in Tunis; and therefore their Wood-worke must needs bee verie vnhandsome.

Colledges of Schollers and Monasteries.

The maner of their houses.

They were wont to paue the Streetes before their Doores, with certaine calcinated and shining stones, and the Courts within, with equal squared broade stone, glistering and shining in like manner: which yet is obserued in many places, & euery house generally hath his Tatras. The doores or entrances are very beautiful, shewing as if they were between two Porches, one toward the streete, and the other, betweene the entraunce and the house, ascending vp certaine degrees or staires, of verie comely and wel wrought stone. Euery one striueth to haue his houses entrance most curious, & indeed, more costly then all the rest of the house: because the Cittizens do most commonly sit at their doors, conferring there with any of their Friendes, and apting what businesse is to be done by their seruants.

Pauing of their streets.

The doores and entrance into the houses.

VVithout the Cittie are goodlie possessions of fruits, which grow but in smal quantity, yet are all good. Of Gardens there are almost an infinit number, planted with Orenges, Lemmons, Roses, and verie sweet floures: especially, in one place called the Bardo, where are the gardens and Noble Pallaces belonging vnto the King, verie proudly builded, and excelling in Carued woorkes, and curious Colours.

Orchards & Gardens without the City.

Round about the Cittie, for welneere the space of fiue or sixe miles on euerie side, are lands of Oliue trees, which yeild such plentiful quantitie of Oyle, as not only furnisheth the Cittie and neighboring parts; but also great store sent into Egypt. Of the Oliue tree VVood also, they make a kind of Coales, which is very helpful to the Cittie, and other partes of the wood they burne beside. The weomen go neatly clothed and adorned, and (out of their owne houses) their faces are couered: and they spende most of their care, in fine polishing and perfuming of themselues; for the Perfumers Shoppes are the latest open in all the Citie. As concerning the Magistrates of the sayde Cittie, they follow in their due Descriptions.

Great store of Oliue trees

The order for their women.

1. THE King of Tunis, is created by inheritance, and by election of his Father, with Oath taken of the principal Officers; as the Captains, Doctors Priests, Iudges, and Readers. So soon as the King dyeth, his successour is immediately placed on the Seat Royal, and al do yeild him their obeysance. VVhich being doone, they present him before the man, that holdeth the greatest degree in office, who is called the Munasid, and is as a Vize-King in gouerning the Kingdome. This Munasid rendereth an account of all occasions by him administered,

The election of the King of Tunis after his Fathers death

The Munasid, or chiefe officer next the King.

red, euen to the preſent day, and (with the Kings conſent) he diſpoſeth of Officers, deliuering full information of all Mandates, and for the prouiſion of the Soldiers.

The Meſuar, the ſecond great officer.

2 Next to the Munafid, the ſecond man of dignity in the Kingdome, is the Meſuar, who is as a Captaine Generall; hauing full authority ouer the Soldiers, and ouer the Kinges Guard. Hee may diſpend, encreaſe, and diminiſh the Soldiers Wages, as ſeemeth beſt to himſelf. He may make election according to his owne will; Either in remouing the Armies, or doing any thing, euen as if the King himſelfe did ouerſee all things.

The Caſtellano, or keeper of the Tower, and ſuch occaſions as concerne his Office.

3 In the thirde degree, followeth the Caſtellano, or Lieutenant of the Tower, a man of much reputation, who is appointed vnto all buſineſſe concerning the Tower or Caſtle. He hath charge of the Soldiers planted therein; and for all buildings of Caſtels and Pallaces belonging to the King, as alſo of all priſoners committed to the Tower. Wherefore, it is a Cuſtome obſerued amongſt them, that whē any important offence is found to be done, the tranſgreſſors are referred for impriſoment to the Caſtle, as nowe adayes is vſed in the Court of Rome. He hath likewiſe Authority (as a Iuſtice of Peace) to examine all Offenders comming before him; and no otherwiſe, then as if the King himſelfe were there in proper perſon.

The Gouernor of the Citty.

4 The Gouernor of the Cittie, is the fourth man of the Kingdome, and is ſuperiour ouer all Capital cauſes. He chaſtiſeth al ſuch as commit Ribaldry, or any euill actions in what Nature ſoeuer. And to ſpeake al in a word, he is diſpleaſed at al things that go againſt Iuſtice.

The cheefe Secretarie of Eſtate to the King for all Occurrences

5 The chiefe Secretarie of Eſtate, is he that receiueth Letters from al parts of the world to the King, or writeth vnto them in the ſame Nature. Hee hath Authoritie to open all Letters out of the Kinges preſence: thoſe onely excepted from the fore-named Gouernor, and the Caſtillian. When he hath read the Letters to the King, hee writes and anſweres in his name, according as hee is directed by the King. And queſtionleſſe, hee is a man of great reputation, as he that knoweth all the ſecrets, yea, and moſt concealed in his Soueraignes breſt. Vnder him are many inferiour Secretaries, appointed for Supplications, Mandates, & other occuring buſineſſe, which depend moſt of all vpon the Kings mouth.

Maiſter of the Haull, and authority of his Office.

6 He that is ſtiled Maiſter of the Haule, on ſuch daies as the Councell doe meet together; hath eare to adorne the place with Tapiſtry, and the walles with Hangings: aſſigning each Councell (at his entrance) to his meet place, and commaunding the Curſores or Meſſengers (in the Kinges name) to diſpatch al ſuch buſineſſes as they are ſent about by the Councell, or to apprehend any man by them appointed. And this Maiſter hath great familiarity and diſcourſe with the King; becauſe he goeth in and out, and conferreth with him, when, and as often as himſelfe pleaſeth.

The Treaſurer and his charge.

7 The Treaſurer ſtandeth bound to receiue the Monies of the Officers, and to aſſigne the ſame to others deputed for the Caſh, and to lay it out according to the Kinges commaund. His Office is very important and Honourable.

The Officer for deceipt of Tolls and Cuſtomes.

8 The eight man in order, of any credit, is the Cuſtomer, or Receiuer of Touls and Cuſtomes. He gathereth the Touls for things, which come into the Citie from al parts by Land. He collecteth the dues of Merchants Strangers, which is two parts and an halfe on euery hundred. He keepeth a great number of Officers and Catch-poles, who, as they ſee any Stranger enter, that appeareth to be a man of any account or credit: doe preſent him to the Cuſtomer; or if he be not preſent, or at leyſure, they keepe the party in Priſon, vntill ſuch time as beſt opportunity ſerueth. And then he is compelled to pay ſuch a ſumme of Money, as he impoſeth on him, vrging him thereto by many oaths.

The Officer for Sea dues and Collections.

9 There is another Toule-taker or Cuſtomer, that gathereth the Toules brought and carried from forth the City, or are to be ſent away by Sea, from any Port vpon the Coaſt. And the place of this Toule-Takers abiding, is on the Lake of the Goletta, neere to the Citty.

The Authoritie of the Stewarde or Spenditore.

10 Next vnto the forenamed Officers, there is a Spenditore, or Steward. He is (in effect) Maiſter of the Houſhold, and hath the charge of furniſhing the the Kings Pallace, with Bread, flesh, and all other things necessary for the Court. As apparrell, to cloath the Women and Ladies attending on the King; the Eunuches, and the Negro slaues, who are as Chamber-waiters to the King, and attending on the Nurses. Hee hath charge also, to dispense with the Offices that happen in the Castle, or out of the Castle, among the Christian Slaues, and prouideth them of meat and rainment, according as necessity requireth. His care likewise extendeth, for the expences of the Kinges Children, and all their Nurses.

Other Officers of lower esteeme and repute.

11. Beside all these forenamed degrees in the Court Royall, and those in greatest place, by whom the State is gouerned: there are other Officers of meaner reputation: As the Maister of the Stable, the Maister of the Guardrobe, the Chaplaine, the Iudge for the Fielde, the Maister of the Kinges Children, the Commander of the Footmen, and such like. The King keepeth a thousand & fiue hundred Light-horse, who for the most part, are Christian Renegadoes, and euery one of them hath prouision for his owne person and Horse. Ouer them, there is a Captaine appointed, who placeth or dismisseth them after his owne pleasure. There are also an hundered and fifty horse of Natiue Moores, who ordinarily do giue counsell to the King, in matters appertaining to the wars, and serue as Maisters of the campe. Also 150. Crosse-bowes, who are all Christian Renegadoes, and these do alwayes go about the King, when hee rideth either in the Citty, or abroad. But the most secret & especiall Guard vnto the King, which alwaies are neerest to his person, consisteth wholly of Christians, that dwell in a certaine neere bordering Towne. Before the King, there goeth another Guard on foote, and they are all Turkes, armed with Bowes and Pistols.

Christian Renegadoes.

Christians are the speciall Guard to the King.

Then before the King, rideth the Commander of the Footemen: and on his one side, rideth hee that beareth the Kings Partezane, and on the other, hee that carrieth his Target: and next behind his horse, he that beareth his Crosbow. About him, rode diuers other Officers; as the Constables, the Mace bearers, who are appertaining vnto the Ceremonies. The goldend ucat of the King, waigheth 24. Carrats, and is one Ducat and a third part, of those Ducates which are currant thorow Europe. They stampe also certaine Mony of Siluer, foure square, containing the weight of a Carrate; and thirty or two and thirty of them, do make a Ducate. Their Money is termed Nasari; and in Italy, their Ducate is called a Double.

The waight of the Kinges gold Ducat.

CHAP. II.

Of the most potent King, called Great Tamberlaine; What Kingdome and Prouinces were Conquered by him; And the manner of his Military Discipline.

AMong the Greeks, Romaines, Carthagenians, and other Nations, were manie verie excellent Captains and Soldiers, who as they were Wise, and very fortunate in warre, so they were as happie in hauing Historians, that wrote most amplye of their generous actions.

Captains and Souldiours of note & name, in diuers Nations.

But in our time, there is found a notable man, who may be saide (deseruedlie) to equall all the other how excellent any way soeuer they were; and yet (notwithstanding) vnfortunate in this, that hee could finde no man to write or describe his deeds. So that I, beeing desirous to say somwhat of him haue been constrained to begge and borrow among manie; and yet I shall speake but little, and confusedly also of him.

The man was named Great Tamberlaine, who (at his beginning) was a toyling Labourer in the Fields, or (as some others say) a poore Soldier: and yet neuertheless, he attained to so great Seigniories and Victories, that hee could bee thought no lesse then mighty Alexander, or if he were, it was very little; and this man raigned, about the yeare three hundered and ninety.

The description of Tamberlain, at his beginning.

Some do report, that hee was descended of the Parthians, a people much feared in the Romaines time, and yet notwithstanding, slenderly renowned. His Father and Mother were poore people, and yet himselfe of good and gentle disposition; ſpoſition: well compoſed of his members, ſtrong, and luſty, a man quicke and ſudden, ſharpe of ſpirit, and of good and reſolute iudgement.

The descent & parentage of Tamberlaine and his Description.

Euermore, his thoughtes aimed at haughtie matters, as wel during the time of his pouertie, as after his attaining vnto wealth & riches. He was of great Courage, ſo that euen from his Infancy, hee was Naturally enclined to warre, and he gaue his minde thereto with ſuch ſollicitude, and ſtudious endeuour in learning the Art Military, as it ſeemed verie hard to iudge, wherein he was moſt happy, either in valour and dexterity, or in Wiſedome and a ſetled ſpirite. With which Vertues and promptitudes, beſide ſuch as we are to ſpeake of hereafter, he won (in ſmall time) the very greateſt reputation, that euer man could reach vnto.

The great & happy inclination of Tamberlaine.

His beginning, according as Baptiſta Fulgoſa declareth, was, that hee beeing the Sonne of a poore man, and keeping Cattle in the Field, with other Boyes of the ſame profeſsion, it hapned vppon a day, that his Companions and hee ſporting together, they would needes make choiſe of him to be their King. Now, albeit this their election was doone but in ieſt; yet he whoſe ſpirit applyed it ſelfe to great occaſions, in the ſerious purſuite of their ſport and play, made them all ſwear vnto him, that they would do whatſoeuer he commanded them, and to obey him, as if he were their King indeede.

Baptiſta Fulgoſe, of Tamberlaines Originall.

Tamberlaine made a King in ſport among Boyes.

After he had taken this oath of them, he commanded that euery one ſhoulde ſell his Cattle; and leauing this baſe ſeruility of life, to follow the exercise of Armes, retaining him as their King & Captaine. All which they did; and within few dayes after, fiue hundred Herdſmen were gotten togither, by whoſe aſsiſtance, the firſt acte that euer he did, was to rob Merchants, as they paſſed that way; and afterward, he diuided the booties ſo iuſtly amongeſt his Companions, that they vowed their following ſeruice vnto him, with all vnfaigned loue and fidelitie, and this courſe of life, drew many other new ſeruants to him.

Tamberlaines firſt acte, was robbing of Merchants.

Theſe matters being vnderſtoode by the King of Perſia, he ſent one of his Captaines with a thouſand horſe, to take him and al his Conſorts. When the Captaine was come vnto him, hee handled the caſe ſo ingenuouſly with him, that of an enemy, he made him an intimat frend, yea, and his companion and Coadiutor. So that they ioyned their forces together, and beganne to vndergoe greater enterpriſes, then any which formerly had bin done.

The King of Perſias Captaine, and his power ioyned with Tamburlaine.

During theſe entercourſes, there hapned diſcord betweene the King of Perſia, and one of his Brethren; by means whereof, Tamberlain tooke part with the kings Brother, and ordered all thinges ſo well by his induſtry, that helping him to win the Victory, and making him King, the King indeede was quite deſtroyed. Afterward, in requitall of this fauour, the new King created Tamberlaine, Captaine of the great part of his Armies, hee pretending to win new Countries for him; and for accompliſhment whereof, he muſtered more ſtore of people together. In the performance whereof, he found the meanes to make them reuolt, and grow rebellious againſt their new King. Againſt whom he went with his owne forces ſodenly, and taking the kingdom from him (which hee did helpe him to Conquer) made himſelfe King of Perſia, which queſtionleſſe he could neuer haue don, without moſt great induſtry, and very admirable deeds of armes.

War between the King of Perſia, and his Brother.

Tamberlaine maketh himſelfe King of Perſia.

This done, he did ſet his owne Countrey at libertie, which long time had bin ſeruile to the Sárazins, and Kings of Perſia, and by being himſelfe King, releaſed them out of thraldome. Afterward, hauing ſuch a goodly great armie in readineſſe, he raiſed Rebellions in the Neighbouring Prouinces; & by theſe meanes (in proceſſe of time) conquered Syria, Armenia, Babylon, Meſapotamia, Scythia, Aſsiatica, Albania, Media, and other prouinces, with many great and moſt ſtrong Townes, and famous Citty.

The conqueſtes of Tamberlaine.

Now, albeit there is nothing ſet down in Writing, concerning his ſtout warres and battailes, in the acquiſition of theſe Lands and Countries, yet it muſt needes be preſuppoſed, that wonderfull inuentions, and incredible deeds of armes were by him performed. For all ſuch as haue Written any thing, do plainly ſay, That great things were done by this excellent man, and that alwayes hee carryed ſuch good gouernment in his Army, as neuer could be found any mutiny therein. For he was very faithfull and liberall, beſtowing Honors on all ſuch as followed him, and

No memorie in recorde, of his wars and battailes.

His discreete order among his men of Warre.

and each one according to his merrite, wherby he was both beloued and feared. He enstructed and ledde his men in such good readinesse, that euen in an instant (when he saw time to fauour him) by a meere signe which hee made, each man knew what hee had to doo, and how to come againe into his meete place. For (indeede) he led so powerful and great an Armie, as the World would hold it rare in any man to do the like.

His Iustice in carriage of his Campe.

In briefe, his Camp resembled one of the best Cities in the world, because all Officers were there in good order, euen as if yee beheld a great number of Merchants, well furnished with all things necessary for the field. He would not suffer any Pillings, Pilferies, Thestes, Forcings, or Violences, but chasticed such as were guilty therein, very rigorously. By these meanes, he carried his Campe so well prouided of al things, as the best City of any Land (in the most assured times of peace) could desire no better. Hee would haue his Souldiers to make their glory in their valiant behauiour, vertues, and prouidence. And in those regards, he would see them well payed, honored, praised, and cherished them, and (yet for all this) held them in strong subiection.

His delight in his soldiers Tamberlaine both King & Emperor.

Being becom thus both King & Emperor, of manie kingdomes and Prouinces in Asia, he had an infinite number of people resorting to him from all partes, (beside them that depended on him) only for the faire renowne of his Royall Vertues, so that he commanded a farre greater Army, then euer did King Darius or Xerxes. For they that speake of him, do say, that he had foure hundred thousand Horsemen, and sixe hundered thousand foot Soldiers, with whom he went in conqueste of the lesser Asia. Whereof when the great Turke (named Baiazeth) was aduertised, who was Lord thereof, and held then his siege before Constantinople, hauing formerly conquered many Prouinces in Greece, and her Neighbouring Territories, making himselfe the richest and most feared king on the earth, he was constrained (immediately) to rayse his siege, and passe into Asia with all his people, mustering vp so many more as hee could all the way he went. It is reported, that he had as many horsmen as Tamberlaine, and a great number of foote men, all well experienced: especially in regard of the wars, wherein hee had long before exercised them against the christians. So Baiazeth, like a worthy-minded Captain, perceiuing he could by no other meanes resist this puissant Emperour, resolued to make head against him, & giue him battell, confiding infallibly in the great Vertue of his followers. Wherefore, being come neere to the confines of Armenia, where each of thē hauing prepared their people like aproued good warriors, euen vpon the point of day-breake, they began the most braue & cruell battel (as I think) that euer was fought, considering the great number of their men, with the solid experience declared on either side in cases of warre, sustained by valour and dexterity in all their Captaines. So that they fought most cruelly all the whole day, killing themselues, because they could not conquer one another, nor behold to which side the victory enclined. Til towards the Euening, when the Turks power began to faile and stoop, yet more by multitude then power; for there dyed the greater number of them: and (as one saieth) there remained 200000. men on his part, but al the rest were discomfited, and turned their backes.

Baiazeth resolueth on battel against Tamberlaine.

A whole day spent in the battell.

Baiazeths army foyled, & he taken prisoner, & kept in an Iron Cage.

When Baiazeth beheld this aduerse Fortune, to giue fresh courage vnto his warriors, and to turne them to a Newe fight, he shewed the true valor of an vnconquerable spirit, and ran amongst his enemies, with royall indignation. All which notwithstanding, hee was so ouercharged with blowes, that he was beaten from his horse, and taken before any help could rescue him. Then was he brought to great conquering Tamberlaine, who caused him to be shut vp in a Cage of Iron, and led along with him whersoeuer he went. He was fed with the crums of Bread that came from Tamberlaines Table, and with scraps and morselles which were throwne vnto him, as if hee had bin a Dog, as alreadie wee haue declared in the life of Baiazeth: which may serue to vs as a memorable example, lest we should glorify our selues in the flattries of worldly pompe and riches. For he who (but yesterday) was such a powerful ruler ouer men, was brought to day into such extreamity, as to feede like a Dogge, and in Dogges company. And this happened by the Fortune of one man, who formerly had beene but a sillie Heardes-man, or Baiazeth the great Turke besiedging Constantinople.

The great & miserable deiection of Baiazeth, to bee fed and vsed like a Dogge.

or (as others say) a poore Soldier, grown vp to such an estate of greatnesse; as (in his time) not any one could bee found, that durst or might equall himselfe with him. As for the other, who was borne in such height and magnificence, behold how one day could quite ouerthrowe him. These things are sufficient in themselues, wholly to reclaime men from worldly affectations, onely to loue and desire the fauour of Gods blessings.

Great Tamberlaine proceedeth on in his conquests.

Great Tamberlaine hauing thus ouercom all Asia the lesser, which before was subiect to the Turke; he turned towardes Egypt, and razed all Syria, Thaenis, and Palestine, with all their Neighboring Iurisdictions, taking (by force of arms) many notable and famous Cities. And among others, Smyrna, Antioche, Tripoli, Sebastia, and Damas. Afterward, beeing come into Egypt, the Soldane and the King of Arabia, beside many other Prouinces assembled themselus against him: but in trying the fortune of battaile, they were throwne into the rout, spoiled and vanquished. so that the Soldan was glad to saue himselfe by flight. Neuertheless, the Conqueror might easilie haue taken Egypt from him, had hee not found it ouer-difficult, to conduct so puissant an Army thorow the sharpe deserts. For which cause hee deferred to pursue him any further, but contented himselfe (as then) with subduing the rest of the limitrophing parts.

The Soldane of Egypt, saued his life by flight.

One reporteth, that he was euer very iocond, when hee found any stout resistance in his enemy, because it affoorded him the better occasion for emploiment of his wit and industrie. As it happened to him at the Cittie of Damas; for after he had taken it by power, the cheefe and principall men that were within it, withdrewe themselues into so strong a Fortresse, as was verily reputed to bee impregnable for any humaine strength Yet afterward, they would com to composition with him, which he vtterly refused, and would haue them either to fight it out, or else to submit themselues to his mercie. And perceyuing the scituation of the place to be good & high; within few dayes, he builded a strong Forte, both neere and much higher then the other, wherein hee vsed such speedy expedition, as the enemy could not by anie meanes hinder the erection thereof. And hauing finished it to his owne liking, his battry plaied so mainly on the other Fort both Night and day that they could enioy no rest, vntill he had it in his full possession.

The Citty of Damas taken by Tamberlain

The strong Fort of Damas spoyled by Tamberlaine.

Another Author also hath recorded, that he obserued certaine Ceremonious Customes in his assaults. For first he would haue a White Tent or Pauillion, to bee erected before the City or Towne which he came to besiedge. Heereby hee signified to the Inhabitantes, that if on that day, while his White Tent stoode vp, they had any will to yeeld themselues to him, hee graunted their liues, and all their goods in safety.

Three Ceremonious conditions obserued by Tamberlaine.

His White Tent.

The second day, a Red coloured Tent was set in the same place of the other, & thereby he declared, that if (as yet) they submitted themselues to saue the residue, the Heades and Maisters of each house, should be put to death, and all the other liues preserued.

His Red tent.

But on the third day, his dismal black Tent was aduanced; whereby hee gaue them plainly to vnderstand, that the gate of all clemencie & compassion was now quite shut vppe; and whosoeuer on that day, or any day after, either yeelded, or were taken; men or Weomen (without any regard of sex or quality) were all certaine of death, and the Citty it selfe both sacked and burned.

His Blacke Tent.

Therefore, it cannot be denyed, but that the man was very cruell, albeit hee was otherwise endued with many excellent vertues. In this respect, it was especially obserued and reputed, that God had raised this man, to chastice insolent Kings, and proud people. For confirmation whereof Pope Pius, who liued in his time, or at the vtmost, within eight or ten yeares after, wrote of him in this manner:

Tamberlain was thought to be raised of God, for a scourge vnto Kinges and proud men.

Tamberlaine beeing come to besiedge a strong Citty, that would not submit it selfe, neither the first or second dues, which were the limitations for pittie and mercie. The third day being come, the Inhabitants confiding on an vncertaine hope, as perswaded, that they should begge compassion of him, did set open their gates; and marshalling their Weomen and Children in the formost rankes, all cloathed in White, and carryeng Oline Branches in their handes, cryed out with lowde voyces, humbly desiring mercy, which doubtlesse they could not haue fayled of in any other. But notwithstanding al this humiliation, when Tamberlaine beholde them in this equipage, he declared not anie signe of mildnesse, but in a contrary rough and sterne humour, called for a squadron of his Horsemen, and commaunded them to Gallop fiercely on them, and treade them all to death with their Horses, and not to spare the life of one. Which presently they did, according to his command: and afterward, he burned and defaced the City, euen to the lowest foundation thereof.

Pope Pius his Wordes concerning Tamberlaine.

A Geneway Merchant, much fauored by Tamberlain

Another good Writer addeth to this of Pope Pius, that there was (at the verie same time of this bloody acte) a Geneway Merchant in the Campe, a man in high respect and familiar fauour with Tamberlaine, for continually he would conuerse friendly with him. This cruell deede, seeming horrid and hatefull to this Merchant, hee would needes enter into such boldnesse, as to demand of him: wherefore he vsed such crueltie, to them that yeelded, and humbly sued for mercie? He entering into immeasurable choller, his face fiered with rage, and his eyes seeming to shoote foorth fiety sparckles, returned this answere vnto the Merchant.

His answere to the Merchant.

It appeareth to thee, that I am a meer man; but therein thou much abusest thy iudgement. For I am none other thing, then the wrath of God, and the destruction of the World: therefore, looke wel to thy self, that thou presume no more into my presence, except thou meanest to bee punished, according as thy audacious folly well deserueth. Which Wordes, when the Merchant had heard, he departed suddenlie, and was neuer afterwardes seene within his Tent.

The returne of Tamberlain home to his Countrie, after all his victories.

These thinges beeing thus accomplished; and this Great Man hauing Conquered most potent Countreyes; as also preuayled against, and slaine many Kings and great Lordes, not finding anie in all Asia able for to resist him: hee returned home to his owne Counrrey, laden with infinite spoyles and riches, beside woonperfull supplies of people, from all the parts he went thorow, where the thirde moitie of their wealth also, was willinglie brought vnto him.

There he caused to be builded, a very strong magnificent Cittie, and inhabited by those people, which (as wee haue alreadie saide) he brought home with him, from the lands and straunge kingdomes, subiected to his obedience: which Companies of so manie Nations, were great personages, and abounding in Treasure: and therefore (by the helpe of Tamberlaine) they made it the most sumptuous Cittie in the world, in regard of so many people, which enlarged it both in circuit and ampleneſse, so that it abounded in pompe and wealth.

The most sumptuous Cittie in the world builded by Tamberlain

But in the end, this great Emperour Tamberlaine, albeit he maintained his estate in so powerfull authority, yet notwithstanding (as a fraile man) hee payed the debt due to Nature; and ending his dayes, left two Sonnes behinde him. But they diffred very farre from their father, as appeared by most euident signes, not only in regard of the great discord which was betweene them, but also their incapacity, not knowing how to keepe and maintaine so great an Empire, as their father had conquered and left vnto them. For the Sonnes of Baiazeth (whome they kept as prisoners) beeing aduertised of their dissention, got away into Asia, wher what by vertue of their great spirite, and diligence vsed among the people (whom they found willing and forwarde in their assistance) they recouered their former lost goodes and possessions; the like did the other Kings & Princes, whom Tamberlain had despoiled of their estates. So, by succession of time, the Empire began in such sort to decline, as comming to our daies, ther is found no mention made of him or his linage.

His death and discord betweene his two Sonnes.

The Sons of Baiazeth recouered their lost possessions.

True it is, that Baptista Ignatius, a great inquisitor into Antiquities, saith, that he left two Sonnes, in possession of those Countries and Prouinces which their father had conquerd in the parts about Euphrates, & that their successors inherited them, vnto the time of K. Vsancasanus, against whom, Mahomet the Turke waged battell. It is also said, that the heirs of this King Vsancasanus (according to the opinion of many) came to bee first Sophye, and from them the Sophies Empire was deriued, which to this day, maintaineth it selfe as a great enemy against the Turk. But bee it howsoeuer, it is easily presupposed, that the history of this great man (if it had bin really set downe in writing) would haue bin most memorable, beecause many worthy thinges, might haue bin therein obserued. As for my selfe, I haue neither seene or read more then ye haue Baptista Ignatius, a famous Historian, cõcerning the historie of Tamberlaine.

The Sophies Empire came from Tamberlains heirs heard; and I am verily perſwaded, that there is not much more recorded of him. One onely thing is confirmed by all that haue written of him, that he neuer ſawe fortune to turne her backe againſt him: neuer could he be any way vanquiſhed; neuer did he enterprize any thing, but he effected it; and neuer did his induſtrie and courage faile him, in any attempt whatſoeuer. And therefore wee may (by good reaſon) equall him, with any other (without exception) of the moſt renowned in former ages. And al this diſcourſe I haue collected out of Baptiſta Fulgoſa, Pope Pius in his ſecond part of the worldes deſcription; Platina, in the life of Boniface the 9. Baptiſta Ignatius, Mattheus Palmierus, and out of Campinus, in his hiſtory of the Turkes.

Fortune did neuer truely turn hir back on Tamberlaine.

Baptiſt. Fulgoſ. in lib. de Collec. Pap. Pius in deſcrip. Orb. part 2. Plat. in vit. Bon. 9.

CHAP. III.

Of Heliogabalus, Emperour of Rome; his moſt ſtrange vices, and deformitie of life.

I haue ſpoken of a valiant and famous man, who by the meanes of his worth & valour, attained to the verie higheſt degree of Fortune. But now I am deſirous to ſpeake of another man, the moſt voluptuous & impertinent perſon that euer was, named Heliogabalus, Emperor of Rome contrary to all right and reaſon. I am the rather deſirous to ſpeake of him, to the end, that theſe contrarieties being compared togither, the ſtrength and wiſedome of the one may be the more clearely diſcerned; and the ſin and puſilanimity of the other auoided. And yet let me tell yee, that the vices and diſorders of Heliogabalus (and many other like him, & as vicious as he) were in ſo great number, as it is no way poſsible for me to recount them all. Beſide, I haue euer helde it fitting, to leaue ſuch horride infamy vtterly vnſpoken of, euen for the preſeruation of cõmon honeſty. For, in very deede, there haue bin ſome kings and Emperors ſo vicious and wicked, that meere modeſty forbiddeth any ſpeech of them, to auoide diſperſion or divulging of their memory, leaſt the people might thereby bee infected, and their ſucceſſours ſhould heare, that ſuch abhomination hath beene tollerated and ſupported by men, or ſuch enorme and ſinfull acts committed. Neuer heleſſe, I am conſtrained to write of him, who (in all kinds of iniquity) out-went all his predeceſſors, and admitteth no compariſon of any other that followed him, how peruerſe and wicked ſoeuer hee was. And therefore, I ſay, that our Naturall Phyloſophers, who deſcribed the Nature of hearbes, did no way leſſen their benefit and aduantage, by declaring ſuch as were hurtfull and venemous, to the end, that we might ſhunne them: then in reuealing thoſe of greateſt Vertue, for our vſe and ſeruice. For a Prince now liuing, and he that ſhall come after, by beholding how deteſtable the one was and is, in the memory of men, he will ſhun all occaſion of his reſemblance. And likewiſe, any people, that haue a good, wiſe, and vertuous King, knowing howe much other Nations haue been or are afflicted by the turbulent and wicked gouernement of euill Princes, will be the more thankefull to God, and eſteeme themſelues verie happie, in meeting with ſuch a wiſe and well-minded Prince. So praying for the life of ſuch a Soueraigne, they will ſerue him with the greater loue and loyaltie. And thoſe people, that haue an euill and bad diſpoſed Prince, wil patiently indure him; knowing, that there haue bin ſome more wicked then he. Moreouer, the Reader, by peruſing the liues and deeds of thoſe euill Princes; well conſidering, what vnfortunat ends they haue had, and the paucity of time that their raigne laſted.

Compariſon by the nature of hearbs.

Example by good and bad Princes.

Example of people towards good Princes and Tyrants.

The reaſon why the Author ſpeaketh of Heliogabalus

The wicked liues of ſome Emperors & Kings, and omiſsion of their publication.

But let vs come now to our Heliogabalus, the ſonne of Antoninus Caracalla, welneere as wicked as his Son, for the great diſobedience he ſhewed to his father: for he ſlewe his Brother, and then marryed with his Stepmother, Mother to his brother whom he had ſlain. So ſoone as this Antoninus Caracalla the Father, was ſlain by his owne houſhold ſeruants, the Soldiers and men of armes in the camp, elected one named Opilus Macrinus for their Emperor, who was grand Prouoſt of the houſhold. This man, much about the ſpace of one yeare of his Empire, was ſlaine in Bythinia, with his Sonne, by the Heliogabalus the Sonne of Antonius Caracalla.

Opilus Macrinus elected Emperor, and ſoone after ſlaine in Bythinia.

of Antoninus Heliogabalus, who getting the greater part of the Romaine Army to ioyne with him, attained to such reputation in the Army (by Challenging the Antonines name, so highly renowned in Rome) that immediately after the death of Macrinus, he was chosen Emperor by the Soldiers; which hee accepted, and sent his Letters to Rome, where hee was also confirmed Emperor by the Senate: vnder this hope and perswasion, that hee would proue to be a good Prince. Returning home afterward to the Cittie, and perceiuing himselfe to bee both well receyued and obeyed, he made no long delay of discouering his bad life. And because I desire not to tardie his History, or stay at any perticuler points thereof, I would come to his manners, whereby he was knowne so much shameleſſe and depraued in his Carnall Concupiſences, lubricious affections towards women, & other abhominations in Luxurie, as (I thinke) no man can be found so copious in words, that could bee able to expresse them. Beside, hee was so cowardly faint-harted & subiected to women, that at the first time he entred the Senat, he brought his mother with him to make his entrāce, and would haue her opinion and Iudgement to be demaunded, vppon the difference of occurring occasions, so that she was alwayes present, at all determinations and Statutes of the Senate, which neuer before had beene seene or heard of, that any womans voice was allowed in the Senate.

Heliogabalus chosen Emperor, & confirmed by the Senate.

The incontinent and luxurious life of Heliogabalus.

His pusilanimity and cowardice.

Not contented heerewith, he erected a Senate and congregation of women, to iudge and discide matters of State; and such things as appertained to their Feminine Lawes and customes; in which Senate, women only ruled & commanded. Ouer & beside this, he had in his pallace (in steade of Pages and braue attending Squires) a company of imodest & common women; in whose conuersation he tooke such pleasure, that he brought into Rome (from al parts of his empite) al such women as were found to be of that quality. Of them he made a publick Chapter, and came himselfe amongst them in the habit of a woman, and (like a valiant Captaine amongst his warlicke troopes) made a long Oration to them, calling them his Companions in armes, which are the proper tearmes of our worthiest Captaines, when they purpose to congratulate their Soldiers. Whatsoeuer he deliberated and consulted in this Senate of Strumpets, was newe and vnusuall fashions, of immodest and veneriall behauiour, wherewith his lustfull appetite could neuer be satisfied. After this Senat and Capitoll of common Whores, hee made a receptacle or Colledge of both he and she Bauds, and of lewd shameles Children, which prostituted themselues publickely: for whose prouision and norishment, hee appointed certaine great sums of money.

A Senate or Congregation of women.

Women ateding on him in sted of Pages, & a chapter of women

His consultation among his shee-Senators.

A Colledg of shee and hee Bauds.

This vnwoorthy and immodest man, was so copious in all kinds of wickednes; that albeit he was (by nature) a very comly personage: yet he would paint himself, as vaine Women vse to do. Nay more, he declared his disposition to bee so effeminate, and desirous to be a woman indeed; that, for his better attaining thereto, he assembled the most excellent Physitions and Chirurgions of those times, and suffered them to make woundes and open places in his body, whersoeuer they could best deuise them; prouided, that he might thereby bee the more enabled, to haue the companie of a man, euen as with a Woman. And resoluing to become so indeede, hee caused the secret parts of a man to be taken from him, to the end, that hee might receiue delight by the one lewdnesse, when hee was past the other. The most infamous and abhominable villaines in this lubricity, were his most esteemed frends and fauourites, and while his authority continued, hee gaue them the full administration of the Empire, and gouerned himselfe only by their Counsell, banishing all the wise & learned men; amongst whom, were expelled out of Rome, those two most famous and renowned Lawyers, Sabinus and Vlpianus. He was very curious in finding out new lasciuious inuentions, and meanes for Paillardise, such as (before) had neuer beene thought of. Hee would bee drawne in his Chariot by great and mighty Dogges; and other whiles by tamed Lyons, but that was seldom; and oftentimes hee was starke naked, sitting so in his Chaire, and then hee woulde bee drawne thorough the Cittie, by four the faireſt and youngeſt Weomen, who likewise must bee wholly naked, to manifest publickely his excesiue turpitude. His vtmost

He coueted to shew himselfe euery way like a woman

Sensuality the like seldom heard of.

Sabinus & Vlpianus banisht out of Rome.

How he rode in his chariot thorow Rome

vtmoſt intention and principall end, was to decke, paint, and ſo compoſe himſelfe, that he might therby incite others of the like humor, to purſue his wickedneſſe in the ſame Nature.

He rauiſhed one of the veſtal virgins.

Beſide all this, he violated one of the Nunnes and Veſtall Virgins, who (in the Romaines vaine Religion) were held to be moſt ſacred, and in them, Chaſtitie was aboue all things moſt commended. Onely in ſuch skirmiſhes and battayles, this diſhonourable Emperor ſpent moſt of his life time.

His waſting of the wealth and treaſure.

In like manner, hee employed not his riches and reuennewes in the warres, or in publicke buildings, but to inuent and finde out all meanes, whereby to incite and prouoke people, to bee inſatiable in beaſtly Luxury, voluptuous lubricity, & other Vices whereof we ſhal ſpeak heereafter; but eſpecially his lauiſh expences were intollerable, in delicate and delicious Viands, ſu ch as were rare, and neuer vſed before. Neuer would he ſit downe, but amongeſt Flowers and odorifferous ſmels, of Muske, Amber, with other ſinguler and excellent ſauours. Neuer wold he eat any meats whatſoeuer, except they were of vnvalewable price, for it was his vſuall ſaying; That there could be no better ſawce or appetite, then by deeren ſſe. Hee cloathed himſelfe in Garments of Gold and Purple, enriched with Pearles and other precious Stones. Not ſo much as his ſhooes, but they were decked with ſtones of ineſtimable value: for they were cut and carued with Medalles and other Engrauings, of extraordinary and admirable Art and coſt. In theſe things, hee ſpent more then the reuennewes of al the Princes, as well Chriſtian as Heathen; & yet they ſufficed not.

His ſitting, diet, & feeding.

His coſtly apparrel, & his ſhooes.

His exceſſe in expences.

The Chaire wherein he ſat, was wholly couered with rich Silks and Gold. His Chambers & Guardrobes, al ouer thick ſtrewed with Roſes and others Flowers. And from his bed-chamber to his chaire of State; and from thence, to the place where he mounted on horſebacke, it was all ouer adorned with coſtly Tapiſtries, great Pearles, Diamonds, and ineſtimable precious Stones.

The decking of his Chambers.

Gold & ſiluer duſt ſpred like pin duſt, wher he ſhold tred.

At ſuch times as he pleaſed to mount on horſ back, he would haue the ground couered with the duſt of Golde and Siluer, eſpecially where he ſhould ſette his feete, becauſe he ſcorned to tread vppon the earth, as other men did. His Chambers, Hals, and other places of delectation, were alwaies couered with Roſes, Violets and Lillies. He would neuer put on a ſhirt twice, nor lye in linnen ſheetes after they were waſhed. Hee neuer wore a Garment, Hoſe, or ſhooes, two ſeueral times; and Rings which he hadde once pluckt off his Fingers, hee would neuer put them on againe. Likewiſe he would neuer drinke twice in one Cup, whither it were of Gold or Siluer, but it remained onely to him, whoſe Office was that day attending on that ſeruice. His beds whereon hee vſed to take his reſt, were not of Wooll, Feathers, Purfled Silke, or ſuch like, as thoſe of other men: but made of the ſoft skinnes of Hares, and the ſmalleſt Down Feathers of Patridges Bellies. His Tables, Couches, Cheſts, Seats, and al other things, either for his Chamber kitchin, and his whole houſe, were al of fine Gold, yea, euen to the veſſell employed for the baſeſt ſeruice belonging to man. In ſted of vſing Oyle in his Lampes, hee cauſed them to be filled with the richeſt Balmes that could be brought out of Iudea and Arabia. Nay, his very Vrinals of priuate ſeruice were carued out of Chriſtall, and deckt with precious ſtones.

His wonderful ſingularity in many things by himſelfe, as neuer the like was heard of.

When he rode abroad into the fields, to take the Ayre, there went with him ſix hundred Chariots and Litters, ful of vnchaſt Damoſels and buggering Boyes, with Maquereaux and Maquerelles: and he was ſo ſtrangely addicted to luſt, that hee would neuer haue knowledge twice of one Woman. His meats (as we haue formerly ſaide) were of wonderful charges; for he neuer had a meal, which coſt leſſe then threeſcore Markes of Golde, which (according to common Computation) do value 2500. Ducates nowe in vſe: and ſometimes hee was ſo riotous, that a dinner woulde coſt more then 60000. Ducats. He ſought out al means, ſuch as the like was neuer heard of, to be extream in expences: & to make it more apparantly knowne, he would promiſe aboue 2000. Marks of gold, that he might eate of a Phœnix, vvhereof it vvas ſaid, to be but one onely in the vvorld; and hee gaue the money, that ſearch might bee made for that matchleſſe Foule. In the greateſt heate of Summer, hee vvoulde haue Snovv brought to his Pallace from the Mountaines. When he vvas vpon

His diſorderly riding abroad, with Whoores, Boyes and Bawds.

His coſtlie meales & feeding.

His large offer to eate of a Phœnix.

His delight in contrary diet.

Impoſsible meats to bee had, beſt pleaſed him.

The prodigal diet of his Courtiers, & food of his Grey-hounds Dogges, and Lyons.

The emperor went beyond the Deuill, in one new deuice.

Heliogabalus was extreame in all his behauiour.

the Sea-coaſts, he would not feed on any Fiſh, but dainty Foules and Birds, fetcht the furtheſt off: and when hee was moſt remote from the Sea, then he would eat nothing elſe but Fiſh, which muſt bee brought in all poſt haſt, to the end, that it might coſt the dearer, and appear impoſſible to be had; for otherwiſe, he took no pleaſure in his meat. He would feede on ſuch things as were neuer herd of, for he would haue Pies made of diuers ſtrange Foods: As of the creſts of Cocks, & the tongues of Peacocks and Nightingales, excuſing his pride heerin, by ſaying, that ſuch meats were wholſom againſt the Epilepſie, or falling ſickeneſſe: hee would haue all of his Court to eate verie Delicate meats: As the Liuers of Pea-cocks, Patridges Egges; heads of Parrates and Popiniayes, Pheſants, and Pea-cockes. He had a great number of Grey-hounds and other Dogges, which were fed with nothing elſe but the fleſh of Swans and Geeſe. His Lyons that had beene made tame, were fed with Parrats, Popiniayes, and Pheſants. Whereby it may be euidently diſcerned, that his whole delight was in incredible expences. When he paſſed thorow the ſtreets of Rome, and ſaw nothing but ordinary things: hee would ſay, That he had compaſsion of the publicke Pouerty.

The diſorders of the Emperour were ſuch and in ſo great a number, as they can no way be declared, but in a confuſed order. He ordained for the good gouernment of Rome, and for a new manner of vice, one eſpeciall and ſinguler conceyte whereof the Deuill himſelfe neuer was aduiſed. For he gaue ſtrict commaund, that thoſe workes which ordinarilie were performed by day, ſhould be done in the night time, and thoſe of the night to bee done in the day. So that, men aroſe when the Sunne began to ſet, and when they ſhould ſalute each other with a Good night, they vſed then to giue a Good Morrow, whereby it ſhould appear, that the world went wholly backward. Hee was extreame in all things. The Baths wherein he vſed to bath himſelf, were all filled with moſt precious Vnguents; and onely for this cauſe.

He made many Bathes in ſundrie places, becauſe hee neuer would waſh himſelfe but once in a Bathe: for then, it muſt bee broken in pieces, onely to prepare other new Bathes for him. When he came to any Port or Hauen on the Sea, whatſoeuer Ships of Merchandizes were riding there, muſt bee drowned with all their Wealth, only to pleaſe his idle fancie. Hee was reproued by a verie deare friend, becauſe his lauiſh expences were ſuch, as muſt portend the iſſue of pouertie, whereto he replied, That there could be no better fortune for him in the Worlde, then to be heyre to himſelfe, and to his wife. He ſaide moreouer, That he did not deſire to haue any Children, becauſe they ſhoulde not conſpire any way againſt him. For, if the Gods ſhould giue him any, perhappes they would proue to be ſuch in nature, as he himſelfe was to others.

His Anſwere vpon reproof of his lauiſh prodigality.

He had Bouffones, Stage-players, and idle Ieſters, vpon whom (in ſport, and to pleaſe his humour) he would haue ſometimes ſo many Roſes and Flowers caſt, as ſome one among them, was ſure to bee ſtifled with the verie ſmell of them. Vpon a time, hee would needs haue them ſerued at a dinner, with all ſuch meats as were ſerued to his owne Table, which were great and many in number, and exceſsiue in coſt.

How he dealt with Bouffones, Stage-players, &c. in apparant ſcorn & mockage of them

At another time, he cauſed the ſame kind of ſeruice to be ſet before them: but their meats were all made counterfet, eyther of Marble or wood, ſo that they wer kept at the Table, without eating of any thing. And yet afterward, they muſt waſh their handes before they roſe, euen as if they had fedde of all kinds of meats: and during this dinner time, drinke was offered them, but yet they might taſte none. One while he would pretend an honorable inuitation of them, and all the veſſels belonging to the ſeruice, were of curious Glaſſe, and all the counterfet meates in them, were of the ſame ſtuffe. Another while, their ſeruice was of nothing elſe, but Wood, painted and figured in a liuely reſemblance, ſo that in ſtead of ſatisfying their hunger, hee delighted to ſtarue them. Many times, he would make feaſts wherto none might be bidden gueſts, but eight Baldheaded men, other eight, lame crook-backt men; other eight, very gouty men, 8. deafe men, 8. dumb men, eight Moors, 8. very lean men, 8. very fat men, 8. of the leaſt men that could be founde, and eight other of the greateſt and Talleſt men: onely, that theſe ſeuerall diuerſities of men, might make a confuſed iarring

A Dinner of Glaſſe, & another of wood

As confuſed feaſts as euer were heard of, onely to pleaſe & delight himſelfe iarring among themselues, and thereby fill his spleene with the more laughter. Afterward, when the Feast was ended, he would bestow vpon these Guests, all the Gold and Siluer Plate wherein they had beene serued at the Table.

His bounty to his Cookes & deuisers of new and strange meats

He had very excellent Cookes, vpon whom he bestowed great Wages; beside, he was extraordinarily liberall and bountifull, to such as deuised, or found out new inuentions, of Daintie, Delicate, and vn-vsed Meats. If any Cooke had prepared a new kind of food, which himselfe much commended, & yet was disliked by the Emperour: he that had so dressed and prouided it, should feed himselfe with no other Victuals, vntill he could inuent some other, which (by the nouelty thereof) might yeilde him contentment. When he had inuited many of his Friends to Dinner or Supper, and made them drunke with variety of Wines, till sleepinesse should lay hold vpon them: He would then make fast the doores vpon them, and (by a secret prepared way) send in Beares and Lyons, which had neither teeth nor clawes, so that by the behauior of those Beasts, many of the Guests haue beene found to be dead with feare. He was continually at very great and excessiue expences, by keeping all kindes of furious Beastes in Rome, which were brought thither from all strange and farre off Countries. Behold the verie best and honestest exercises, of this humorous Emperour.

His kindnesse to his friends, when he had made them al drunke.

Heliogabalus had deuised and prepared means for his owne death.

But being wearie with speaking of so bad a man, let me tell ye what his ende was: albeit himselfe had determined to worke his owne death, by other meanes then it happened to him. For, he had prouided diuers precious Instruments, where-with to take away his owne life, whensoeuer any necessity should thereto enforce him. And it was a common speech vsed by himselfe: That as his life had beene extreame, euen so he would haue his death to be; to the end, that all men might say; No Man euer liued and dyed like him.

He had prepared sundry Cordes or Halters of Silke, where-with to strangle himselfe when neede required: because wicked and bad minded men, doe continually liue in feare. He had also a Poyson readie, very quicke and speedie for death, which he kept enclosed in vials made of Emeralds and Iacinths, only for the excellencie thereof. He had likewise made an high Tower, wholely couered and engirt with Leaues and Plates of Gold and Siluer: the pauement whereof was of rich and inestimable sharpe-pointed Stones: whereon he purposed to cast himselfe naked and head-long downe, when misfortune should reduce him into such extremity. And yet notwithstanding, none of these deuises did any way auaile him; because (long time before) a secret conspiracy was contriued & vowed against him.

Tyrants and leudmen liue daily in fears.

A conspiracy deuised and sworn against him.

After that the Souldiers of his own Guard, had slaine all his ad-herents and fauourites in the Pallace: they found him hidden in a darke nooke or corner of a Chamber, where, without permitting him to make any election of his death, or the least leysure that could be; they stabd him with their Weapons. Afterward, hauing drawne him (like a Dogge) thorow all the streets and precincts of Rome: they fastned two verie great stones about his necke, and then threw him into the Riuer of Tyber, to the end, that his body might neuer after be found, but so to remaine without any other Sepulcher; and this was done by consent of all the people. And as concerning the Senate, order was taken among them, that the name of the Anthonius (which had beene attributed to him) should be taken away: and when any speech was to bee made of him, they should tearme him the Tyberine, or the trailed through the streetes, because these names would preserue a memoriall of his death. Which (indeed) was worthy and conformable vnto his life; for any good minded man, when he maketh due consideration thereof, will be both satisfied and comforted, approouing the righteous iudgements of God.

The manner of his death, and casting his bodie into the Riuer of Tyber.

The decree of the Senate for altring his name.

These thinges are related in the life of this Emperour, by diuers learned and worthy Authours, among whom perticularly, as men of good note and credit, are Ælius Lampridius; and Iulius Capitolinus speaketh a little thereof, in the life of Macrinus. Spartianus, in the life of Septimius Seuerus; And likewise Sextus Aurelius Victor; beside Eutropius. And Aelius Lampridius.

Iulius Capitolinus, in vit. Macrin.
Spartian in vit. Septim. Seuer.

And becauſe the matters which I haue declared, may appeare hardly to be beleeued: I thought good to alleadge the Authours names, for teſtimony of the truth, and mens further ſatisfaction; eſpecially in ſuch ſtrange caſes, depending vpon ſo great a difficultie of credence.

CHAP. IIII.

The Admirable Continency, both of Alexlexander and of Scipio; And which of them was moſt to be preferred for that vertue.

The ſauour of vertue taketh away the foul ſmell of vice.

HAuing read the abhominable deedes and vices of wicked Heliogabalus: mee thinkes, it fitteth beſt, to declare the vertuous actions of ſome Princes, only to take away the foule taſt and ſauour, which our ſences haue receiued by his horrid pollutions. And among the moſt remarkable, I finde Alexander and Scipio, of whom Aulus Gellius made a Probleme, to wit: which of them both was moſt vertuouſly enclined. Scipio entring by force of Armes into the new Citty of Carthage, among other Captiues and Priſoners brought vnto him: there was a young Gentlewoman (of admired beauty) preſented vnto him. He being then in the very floure of his youth; could eaſily conquer his owne affections, and would commit no act of diſhonour with the Virgine. But after he was informed, that ſhe was of great birth, noble houſe, and affianced to a worthy Lord of Spaine: he ſent for her Parents and betrothed Husband, to whom hee gaue (as a dowry) the whole ranſome both for her ſelfe and Father; which (vndoubtedly) was a ſigne of great continency, in a victorious Captaine towards his Captiue.

How Scipio entreated a young beautifull Lady of Carthage.

We reade likewiſe of Alexander the Great, who hauing ouer-come King Darius in battaile; his Souldiours took (in flight) the wife and Mother of that powerfull King. This Queene was of ſuch exquiſite perfection in beauty, as in all Aſia ſhe had not her equall. She was young, and of a moſt gracious countenance. He alſo was of like years to this Lady, and had no ſuperiour ouer him, to whom hee ſhould yeild an account of his actions. And yet, albeit he was aduertiſed by all his people, of her rarity in beautie: yet would he not haue an euill thought towards her, but ſent an eſpeciall fauourite of his, named Leonatus, to comfort her. And, to the end that he might auoid all occaſion of ſuſpition; he would not ſee her, neither ſuffer that ſhe ſhould bee brought before him: but cauſed her to bee ſerued with no leſſe honour and reuerence, then as if ſhe had beene his naturall Siſter. Hepheſtion, a Greek Author, hath ſo ſet it downe; Aulus Gellius referreth the Hiſtorie to him, and Plutarch credibly confirmeth it. And yet neuertheleſſe, Aulus Gellius leaueth it in doubt, in which of theſe two great men appeared the greateſt continency.

How Alexander the Great vſed the wife and mother to king Darius

Hepheſtion.
Aulus Gellius.
Plutarch.

It may be ſaide, that they were both equall, becauſe they both determined to containe themſelues, the occaſions being equall: but, for my ſelfe, I would open the way to diſpute on this queſtion. And me thinkes, he that would defend in fauour of Scipio, may ſay, that he aſſured himſelfe moſt on his continence; and had very great iudgement therein: conſidering, that he durſt ſuffer ſo ſweete and faire a Virgine, to bee brought into his preſence, by the ſight of whom, no inordinate appetite could ſo preuaile ouer him, as to ſtirre him one iot from his firſt reſolued purpoſe. But it was not ſo in Alexander, who ſtood in feare of ſeeing his Lady, and knew not what he might be forced vnto, if he ſhould ſee her. On the other ſide, a man may alleage on the behalfe of Alexander, that (in this caſe) he merited more then Scipio, and excelled him in one point: to wit, in that he would not ſee the Queene, becauſe hee would not ſinne ſo much as in thought. For in his vertue, hee had a much greater fancy to preſerue his continence, in regard, that (knowing humaine frailtie) he would ſhun all occaſion that might happen, whereby he ſhould be drawne into perill. And heerein we may ſafelie ſay

The differēce in whom appeared the moſt continency.

Scipio preferred before Alexander.

Alexander extolled beyond Scipio.

say, that hee equalled Scipio in continence; yea, & exceeded him in thought, and diligence for preseruing it. I haue but touched these two pointes, to the end, that euery man may iudge according to his owne mind.

Quintus Curtius. Diodorus Siculus in vit. Alexander.

Neuertheless, true it is, that Quintus Curtius, and Diodorus Siculus, doe write in the life of Alexander; that hee saw and saluted both the Wife and mother of Darius, on the day after the victorie, and that then he vsed wordes of good and true amity. For, as he entred into the place where they were, with a purpose to see them; he was accompanied with his intimate friend Hephestion, who resembled him both in age and habits.

Whereupon, the Mother to King Darius, thinking him to be Alexander; saluted him with such reuerence, as beseemed a Prisoner to behold her Conquerour. But finding her selfe (afterward) to be deceiued; as ashamed therof, shee lookt red, to excuse her errour, which Alexander perceiuing, he said vnto her: Mother, doe not displease thy selfe for that which thou hast done, because there is no errour committed: for this man is Alexander as well as my selfe. Declaring by these wordes, that his Friend was another selfe to him. It seemeth, that this visitation contradicteth that which others say, reporting that he would not see these Weomen. And yet notwithstanding, both these opinions may bee maintained. For they which say, that he would not see the Wife of King Darius: doe inferre thereby, that he would not immediatly see her, so soone as she was taken, but sent to visite her by Leonatus. And after her greefe was in some measure qualified: he went in person, both to see and honour her. But be it howsoeuer, it was an Act of great honesty, and if it were not greater then that of Scipioes: yet (in my mind) it may be equalled with it.

The words of Alexander to the Mother of K. Darius.

The Authors defence of both the opinions.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers Lakes, Springes, Fountaines, and Riuers, the waters whereof haue contained very strange and wonderfull properties.

IN a former Chapter, where we discoursed of waters, we made a promise to relate more at large, concerning the effects and properties of some other particular Waters. The first whereof, shall be that of the Lake in India, named * Asphaltites, or Asfaltida, which since hath beene called, Mare mortuum, The dead Sea. Of this water, many thinges are reported by Pliny, Columella, and by Diodorus Siculus. First of all, one affirmeth, that it engendreth neither Fish, Fowle, or any other liuing thing, and that not any thing (hauing life) can be sunke or drowned therein. So that if a man, or any other Creature be throwne thereinto, bound in such sort, as no way able to mooue, stir, or swimme; yet no drowning is to bee doubted, these thinges are declared by Pliny.

* A poole full of Brimstone, and neuer moueth.

And Aristotle, to yeild a naturall reason for this cause, saith: That the water of this Lake is grosse, very salt and thicke. Cornelius Tacitus addeth also this propertie, that by reason of some strong Winds blowing thereon; it should vse motion, and yet it stirreth not at all, neither is sailed on. The same Author, and likewise Solynus in his Polyhistor, saith, that at certain times, there is bred in this Lake a kind of Scumme or Lees, which is a most strong Ciment, & glueth or holdeth more strictly, then any Pitch whatsoeuer, and it is called (by Diodorus Siculus) Bitumen and Asfaltis. Whereupon it appeareth, that the vocable Asphaltis or Asfaltis, was deriued of this Lake named Asphaltida. We read beside of other Pooles and Lakes, which yeilded the like Ciment or Morter; as of one neere vnto Babylon, with the Morter whereof, Semiramis caused the Plin. in lib. 4. Ari. in Meteor Lib. 2.

Cornel. Tacit. in Lib..

Iul. Solin. in Polyhist.

Diodor. Siculus Bitumen or Asfaltis.

The walles about Babylon cimented together.

the ſtones to be knit together, which builded the great and renowned Cittie Walles of Babylon. The Riuer Iordane (the Water whereof is good and excellent) falleth into this Lake of Iudea: but through the diſcommoditie of the Lake, and falling into it; the Water loſeth his vertue and goodneſſe. It is reported, that Domitian ſent thither to make tryall thereof, and found it to bee very true.

Plin in lib. 5. cap. 3.
* A Lake dedicated to the God of Hell, and thought to be an entry into Hell.

Pliny writeth of another Water, in Campania in Italy, named * Auernus, neere to the Sea, by the Gulfe of Bayas, and this Poole hath ſuch a propertie, that no Bird or Fowle flyeth ouer it, but it falleth downe dead into the Water: The like is ſaid to be in Puſola. The Poet Lucretius, in rendring a naturall reaſon about it, ſaith: That through the thickneſſe of Trees growing about it, and a mighty ſhaddow thereby occaſioned: a groſſe and infectious vapor ariſeth from it, which meerely ſtifleth the Birdes in their flight. Whereto he addeth, that the chiefe cauſe proceedeth from great Mines of Sulphure, which are in like manner neere it. Theophraſtus and Pliny doe ſpeake of a Fountaine, named Lycos, which is in Iudea, and of another in Æthiopia, the Waters whereof, haue a like power and efficacy, containing the very property of Oyle; for when it is put into Lampes, it burneth brightly.

Theophraſtus. Plin. in Lib. 5. Cap. 7.

Pomponius Mela, and Solinus, writing of Æthiopia, doe relate, that there is a Poole or Lake, the Water whereof is ſweet and cleare: and yet notwithſtanding, if a man doe bath himſelfe therein, his body is in like ſort annointed, as if he came out of a bath full of Oyle. The like is affirmed by Vitruuius, and he ſaith moreouer, that there is a Riuer in Cilicia, and likewiſe a Fountaine or Spring neere to Carthage, which haue the very ſame properties.

Pompon. Mela. Iul. Solin. in Polybiſt.

Vitruuius.

Solinus, Theophraſtus, and Iſidorus, ſpeaking of two Welles, doe auouch, that if a woman drinke of one of them, ſhe ſhall become barren. And contrariwiſe, if a ſtirrile Woman do drinke of the other Well, it cauſeth her to be very fruitfull. They write moreouer, that there is another well in Arcadia, whereof whoſoeuer drinketh, dyeth immediatly. Ariſtotle in his naturall queſtions, ſpeaketh of one that is in Thrace, which worketh the like effect, and alſo of another in Sarmatia. In like manner, Herodotus ſaith in his fourth Muſe, and Pliny and Solinus doe affirme the ſame, that the Riuer Hypanis, which is great, and deſcendeth out of Scythia, hath his water ſweete and good. And yet notwithſtanding, there is a little Well or Fountaine entring into it, and ſo farre as his ſtream extendeth: the bitterneſſe of the water of this Well, maketh the reſt of the Water in the Riuer ſo bitter, as no man can poſſibly endure to drinke thereof.

Solin. in Polybi. Theophraſtus. Iſidorus.

Ari. in Quæſt. Nat.

Herodotus. Plin. in lib. 4. Iuſt. Solin. in Polybiſt.

The very ſame Authours, and likewiſe Iſidorus, doe write of two other Fountaines that are in Boetia; the one of which doth cauſe the vtter loſſe of memory; and the other is no meane comfort thereto, procuring withal, that ſuch as drinke thereof, ſhall remember all thinges, whatſoeuer they haue before forgotten. They ſpeake alſo of one Well, which temperateth and appeaſeth the entiſing prickes or Spurres of the fleſh; And then of another, which as ſharpely dooth incite them. There is a Riuer in Sicilie, named Arethuſa; of which (beſide their recordation of abounding in numberleſſe ſhoales of Fiſhes, and ſuch as ſeeme very good for foode) they write one wonderfull thing, to wit; that oftentimes there hath beene found in this Riuer diuers notable things that were throwne into the Riuer Alpheus, which is in Achaia, a Countrey of Greece. For this cauſe, they doe all maintaine, that the Water of this Riuer, paſſeth through the entrailes of the Earth (from the maine Fountaine) quite vnderneath the Sea, which is betweene Sicilie and Achaia.

Two Fountaines in Boetia of very ſtrange quality.

The Riuer Arethuſa in Sicilie.

Alpheus a Riuer of Achaia in Greece.

The Authours that make this report, are ſuch great perſons, and worthy of credit; as they may well giue boldneſſe to any man to write and certifie the ſame. Seneca affirmeth it; ſo doth Pliny; Pomponius Mela, Strabo, and Seruius, vpon the tenth Eclogue of Virgill.

Seneca in lib. 3. de Quæſt. Nat. Plin. in lib. 7. Pom. Mel. lib 1 Strabo in lib 6. Seruius ſup. 10. Eclo. Virg.

Solynus and Iſidorus make mention of of a well-ſpring, on the water whereof, if a man (that is to take an oath) do lay his hand; he muſt be carefull that hee take his oath truely and iuſtly, for if it be otherwiſe, his eyes will dry vp, and dye dye in his head. Pliny maketh the like relation of another Riuer, which will burne a periured persons hand, swearing thereby, and putting his hand into the water.

Philostratus in lib. 2. de vit. Apol. Thian.

Philostratus, in his second Booke of the life of Appolonius Thianeus, saith, that there is a Riuer, wherein if a Man doe wash his hands and feete, after hee hath taken a false and periured oath; he shall be immediatly couered ouer with Leprosie. Diodorus Siculus affirmeth as much of another Riuer. Now, if it do appear to any man, that these things are very hardly to be beleeued: let him know, that Isidorus, a religious, holie, and most learned man, hath at large deliuered these reports out of no meane Authours. As also of Iacobs Well in Idumea, iustifying, that foure times in the yeare it changeth colour; and that from three moneths to three moneths, it becommeth troubled of it selfe; swelleth, looketh red; then greene; and yet afterward receiueth cleerenesse againe. He speaketh also of a Lake which is among the Troglodytes, that three times (by day and night) changeth his sweet relish into bitternesse, and from bitternesse, to sweetnesse againe. Likewise, of another little streame in Iudea, which euery Sabbaoth day, waxeth dry of it selfe.

The writings of Isidorus doe carry good credit.

Iacobs Wel in Idumea.

A Lake among the Troglodites.

And the same is verified by Pliny, where he describeth another Fountain, that is in the Countrey of the * Garamantes: which in the day time is sweet, but yet so cold, as it is impossible to bee drunke of. And in the night time it is so extreame hot, as whosoeuer putteth his hand thereinto, is sure to burne it; and it was called the Fountaine of the Sunne. Concerning this Fountaine, and that it is a matter of truth, diuers good Authours haue written: As Arianus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, and Quintus Curtius, in his History of Alexander the Great, and Lucretius the naturall Poet, yeildeth a reason for it.

* People in the midst of Lybia, next to the Psylli.

Arianus. Diodo. Sicul. Sol. in Polyhist. Quint. Curtius in Hist. Alexan. Lucre. in lib. 6.

But now I shall speake of a wonderfull thing indeed, concerning the Wel or Fountaine Eleusina, which is a reposed, setled, and most cleere water. Neuertheless, if any Instrument be sounded (or plaid on) so neere it, as the water may be said (in opinion) to be within compasse of hearing the sound: it beginneth immediatly to boyle so extreamely, as the water swelleth and seetheth aboue his bounds, euen as if it reioyced at the sound of Musique. This is credibly confirmed by Aristotle, in his Booke of the mirruailes of Nature; by Solinus in his Polihystor; and by the Ancient Poet Ennius.

The strange Fountaine Eleusina.

Arist. in lib de Mirab. Nat. Solin in Polyh. Ennius in lib 4.

Vitruuius speaketh of a Riuer, named Chimæra, the Water whereof is verie sweet: and yet notwithstandidg, where it deuideth it selfe into two small streames or gullets; the one is sweete, and the other bitter. Wherefore it is to be presumed, that it draweth this bitter taste, from the earth where it glideth along, and therein appeareth to be the lesse maruailous. In which respect, as easily may be credited, the sundry properties of so many Riuers, whereof we haue already spoken: which would seeme no matter of wonder vnto vs, if their true occasions were apparantly knowne; no more the Riuer * Silarus, (auouched by the same Authors) which conuerteth into stone, any wand, stick, or branch throwne thereinto, as in many other places the like hath beene noted.

The Riuer Chymera, recorded by Vitruuius.

* A Riuer of Lucania, deuiding it from Picenum.

There is a Well in Illirica, the water whereof is sweete: but it burneth all things put into it, euen as if they were cast into a fire. Also in Epirus is another Well, whereinto if a flaming Torch be put, it quencheth it: but let it be put in before it be lighted, and of it selfe it giueth flame thereto. Alwaies till noone, and after, it waxeth ebbe and dry: but as the day declineth, it beginneth to encrease in such abounding manner, that by mid-night it is top-full, and floweth ouer the brimme. It is said, that there is a Well in Persia, which causeth their teeth to fall out of their heads, that doe drinke thereof.

The Riuer in Epirus, that lighteth a quenched Torch.

In Arcadia there are certaine Wels or Fountaines, which doe deriue their Sourse and Current, out of diuers hils & Mountains, whose waters are so extreamely cold; as no vessell, eyther of Gold, Siluer, or any other Mettall can contain them, but whatsoeuer measure is filled there-with, is presently broken in pieces, for they cannot be contained in any other Vessels, but such as are made of the Horne-hoofe of a Mule. We should hardly beleeue, that Riuers (though

Of strange Fountaines or Springs in Arabia.

Riuers falling into the earth and rising vp againe great distances of.

(though exceeding in greatnesse) some of them should haue a sudden fall into the earth, concealing themselues there quite out of sight; and yet breake vp againe many miles of. We haue sundry good examples, to ease our doubt in this case: As Vadiana in Spaine; Tygris doing the like in Armenia, though it be in Mesopotamia; and Lycus in Asia. There are likewise sundry Riuers of sweete and fresh Water, which entring into the Sea, doe passe along vppon the salt water, neuer mingling there-with. In number whereof, one is betweene Sicile, and an Island, called Enaria, vpon the Coast of Naples.

Fresh Riuers floating on the salt Seas.

The Riuer Nilus.

We know very well, that in Ægypt it neuer raineth, but (euen by Nature) the Riuer Nilus disbordeth it selfe, and watering all the Countrey, leaueth it moist, and apt to yeild fruite. There are two Riuers in Boetia, one of them is the cause, that such Sheepe as drinke thereof, doe beare blacke Wooll; and the other (in like manner) beareth all white Wooll. In Arabia is a Well, which maketh the VVooll of Sheepe, (drinking thereof) to looke Vermillion red: And of all those Riuers that haue this propertie, Aristotle hath spoken very largely. The Riuer * Lyncestris hath this quality, to make all men drunke that drinke thereof, euen as if it were with wine. In the Isle of * Cea (according to Pliny) there is a wel, which whosoeuer drinketh thereof, becommeth nummed in all his sences.

Two Riuers in Boetia.

* A Riuer in Macedonia.

* Where Silk wormes were first found.

A poole in Thrace.

In Thrace there is a Poole, which causeth the death of him, that eyther drinketh of it, or batheth himselfe therein. In Pontus also is a Riuer, which yeildeth a kind of stones that do burn, and when any winde ariseth, they breake into a flame, and the more they are in the water, the longer while they burne. These Authours haue also written of diuers Waters, that doe heale many diseases: whereof one is in Italie, named Zizza, which cureth all harmes happening to the eyes. Another is in Achaia, which if women doe drinke of, that are great with Childe; they shall haue a safe and speedy deliuerance. Many other there are, that doe cure infinite other infirmities: as the Stone; the Leprosie; the Feauer Tertian and Quarrane, whereof more is said by Theophrastus, Pliny, and Vitruuius. In Mesopotamia is a Riuer, whose water is most sweet and pleasing to smell. Baptista Fulgosa, in his Booke of Collections, recordeth, that there is a well in England, which if any kind of wood be cast into it; in lesse space then a yeare, it is conuerted into stone.

A rare Riuer in Pontus.

Waters of riuers that cure diseases.

For Women great with Child.

Baptist. Fulgos. in lib. 7.

The same man also testifieth, what likewise is confirmed by Albertus Magnus, concerning a Well in the higher Germany. And Albertus saith, that hee himselfe hauing a little woodden Boxe in his hand, did hold it in the Water: & so much of it as was within the water, became truly stone; but the rest remaining in his hand, continued Wood, as it was before.

An experiment made by Albertus Magnus.

Fulgosa further relateth the property of another Well, which is very strange indeede. For, if a man do walke about it, looking stedfastly into it, and keeping silence, not speaking a word, or vsing any voyce at all: the Water then continueth (as before) cleare and still. But if he speake (being by it) how little so euer it be, or neuer so low, eyther in going on, or in his returning: the Water presently troubleth it selfe, and beginneth to boyle in very strange manner. And hee deliuereth this vpon his own credit, as hauing (in person) made proofe thereof. For, while he heedfully looked into the Water, not whispering, noysing, or speaking one fillable; he beheld it to be faire and cleare. But when he spake, the water was so strongly mooued and troubled; as if some liuing body had bin in it, to perplexe it in that disorder.

Baptist. Fulgos. in lib. 7.

A wonderfull property in a water.

There is record made of a VVell in France, which is extreamely cold; and yet notwithstanding, great flashes and flames of fire haue beene seene to rise out of it. Pliny plainely saith, that many men make a conscience, in giuing any credence to these thinges: but they may well say, and assure themselues, that Natures great and wonderfull workes, doe demonstrate their power more apparantly in this one Element of water, then in all the rest beside. And maruailes doe hence arise, in so great number, that we should not repute any thing to bee impossible: especially such as are warranted by so good writers, as those which formerlie I haue alleadged.

A strange wel in France.

Plin. in Lib. 2. cap. 9.

Nothing should be esteemed impossible.

More-

Moreouer, we are sufficiently enough certified, by testimony of those which haue seene it in our time, that in one of the Canarie Islandes; named Ferra, a place well inhabited with people, where, both there, and a great space likewise round about it, the Inhabitants haue vse of no other Water (as is very well knowne) but what they can (in a Bason or other Vessell) get from the weeping or distilling, which sweateth it selfe (in some abounding and plentifull manner) out of a Tree, which is in the midst of the Island. And yet, neither at the foote of this Tree, nor in any place neere about, is there any Spring, Well, or Riuer: all which notwithstanding, the Tree is continuallie full of moysture; so that from the Leaues, Branches, & Boughs, into such Vessels as are placed there for the purpose; the Water distilleth forth both day and night, and sufficient store is still fetcht thence, to serue the necessities and seruices of all the dwellers in the Island. And yet wee should hardly beleeue this, if it were but recorded by Writing onelie, and not maintained by liuing eye-Witnesses: Therefore, let no man account that strange, which wee haue already declared: in regard that this Element of Water is so powerfull and necessarie; as his strength and qualities can neuer be sufficientlie knowne.

Ferra in the Isle of the Canaries.

Water distilling out of a Tree in abundant manner, for the reliefe of a whole Nation.

Simple people will credit nothing, but what they see themselus.

As for the Sea, it is saide to be more hot in Winter, then it can be in Summer, and more salt in Autumne, then at any other time elsse: but this is a matter of greater marualle, that by throwing Oyle into the Sea; his rage and violence is thereby appeased. Beside, wee know it for most certaine, that into those partes of the Sea, which are furthest off from any firme Land, neuer any Snow doth fall, at what time soeuer.

Heate of the Sea in winter, and sundry other strange properties thereof.

For all which thinges, many good reasons haue beene deliuered; the most part whereof, are attributed vnto the propertie and qualitie of the Earth; and to Mines, where Springes haue their originall, and win their Current into Lakes, Welles, and Riuers. For proofe whereof, it is manifested by that which wee daily behold, both in Vines and other Fruites of the Earth: that they prooue better in one place, then they doe in another; because some are sweete, and others sharpe and sower; some good and very profitable, others hurtfull and mortifferous. The Ayre also becommeth corrupt and pestilentiall, in passing ouer an vnwholesome and noysome Countrey. What meruaile is it then, if Water, which pierceth and washeth the Earth, the stones, Mettals, Hearbs, Plants, and Roots of Trees: should receiue their good or euill conditions, in whatsoeuer strange Nature it be; especially, beeing ayded by the power of the Starres and Planets?

A matter especially to be obserued, concerning waters.

Example of Fruits.

Example of the Ayre, and lastly of the Earth.

CHAP. VI.

On what day of the yeare was the Incarnation, Natiuity, and Passion of our Lord Iesus Christ; And at what Age hee dyed. Of the auncient Houres; And of the errour which is now in our common yeares.

WE haue declared already, in the Chapter of the World, how long the time was since the Creation thereof, vnto those daies of our Lord Iesus Christ, God & Man, when he pleased to take humaine Flesh on him, and to bee borne of the most pure, holy, and immaculate Virgine Mary. Therefore I hold it both good and profitable, to relate and specifie, vpon what day of the yeare, and at what houre (with this blessed Natiuity) happened his holie Incarnation, and afterward his death; according to those sacred, true, and approued Historians which haue written thereof. We must vnderstand then, that the Emperor Octauius raigning at Rome, was the first that properlie might stile himselfe, to be Monarch and Emperour of all the World: for his Vncle Iulius Cæsar was Dictatour onelie, and but for a small time too. This Monarch, hauing also shut vppe the Gates of Ianus Temple, and made peace vniuersallie throughout the World; In the two

The Authors reason, vpon what cause he added this Chapter.

Octauius was the first Monarch and Emperour of the world.

and fortith yeare of his Empire, and seuen hundred and one and forty yeares from the foundation of Rome (according to Paulus Orosius, and others Authours) the fiue and twentith day of December, was our Lord, Sauiour, and Redeemer Iesus Christ borne. Saint Augustine attesteth the same, following the Ecclesiasticall History, and other Historians.

Paulus Orasius. in lib. 7.

Aug. in lib. 15. 18. & 21. de Ser. in Natiuit.

It is further to be vnderstood, that this day was the shortest day in the whole yeare: because the Winter Solstice was then the fiue and twentith day of December. The same Saint Augustine goeth on further, in his Sermons on the Natiuity: and yet notwithstanding, we shall speake hereafter, of those daies of December, whereon we haue the Solstice in our times. The holie Saints of Gods Church haue also written, that the day of our Lords birth, was the Sunday; so affirmeth Pope Leo likewise, and Vincentius the Historialist, in his Histories: and the hour of his being borne into this World, was midnight; according as the Church giueth vs to vnderstand, by this authority out of the Booke of Wisedome.

Leo Papa. in Hist. Cap. 75. Quod dic.

Sunday the day of christs birth.

Wis. 18, 14. 15

Dum quietum silentium tenerent omnia, & nox in suo cursu medium iter haberet: sermo tuus Domine à regalibus sedibus venit, &c. While all thinges were in quiet silence, and the night was in the midst of her swift course: Thine Almighty word came downe from Heauen, &c.

Of the Angels salutation to the virgine, and her conception.

The most part of Historians doe hold, that at midnight also, the salutation of the Angell was made to the virgine Marie; and that she conceiued on a Fryday, beeing the Equinoctiall of March. True it is, that some doe maintaine this conception to be in the euening, and at the beginning of the night. So then we may conclude, that his Natiuity or birth was on a Sundaie at mid-night, and his Incarnation or conception on a Friday, at the beginning of the night. Now, according to the most common opinion, at the like houre of his natiuity in December, and his Incarnation in March: the death & passion of our Lord (according as all do agree) was at the same houre of his Incarnation, hauing accomplished those yeares, that it pleased him to remaine here on earth with men, and that it was the fiue and twentith day of March. S. Augustine saith so in the places before alleaged; so doth Tertullian; S. Chrysostome; S. Cyrill; S. Hierome, and other holy Doctors. And it was in the Equinoctiall of the Spring time, according to S. Augustine in his Books of the Trinity, and his fore-named Sermons. Also, Paulus Orosius saith, that he should come the fiue and twentith of March, and that this equality of daies and nights, named Equinoctiall, was then in those dayes which wee haue spoken of. Prophane Historians doe say as much, especially Macrobius, and others. To this purpose, there is one thing to bee noted, whereof few people haue made any regard, and I thinke not very many vnderstood it: to wit, whosoeuer hath wel considered the true course of the Sunne, and of the yeare, and the day whereon our Lord came to bee borne; the same day cõmeth not now to be as the fiue & twentith day of December, neither his death and passion, to be the fiue and twentith day of March, becaus the Winter Solstice is aduanced, and is now the eleauenth day of December, and the Equinoctiall of the Spring time, is now likewise the eleauenth day of March, little more or lesse, as any Man may easilie know, that hath but attained to any beginning in the knowledge of Astrologie. So that, to speake of our instant dayes, the yeare of the birth of our Lord, doth perfectlie compleate it selfe the eleauenth day of December; and the years of the Incarnation and Passion, on the eleauenth day of March. Because now at this present, the Sunne effecteth at these seuerall eleauen dayes, that which hee was wont to doe in those seuerall fiue and twenty daies.

Aug. in lib. de Trinit. & in Serm. de Nat. Paulus Orosius. in lib. 7.

Macro. in lib. 1.

An especiall matter of obseruation, whereof but slender regard hath bin made, concerning dayes and yeares.

And albeit, it would require some length of time, to declare the cause of this variation: yet I hold it not much amisse to speake somewhat heerein, to satisfie the mindes of honest meaning Men. Let me then tell ye, that this alteration ensuing, by reason of the accustomed yeare, where-with ordinarie account is now made, and which was so ordained by Iulius Cæsar: dooth not conforme

A reason deliuered, concerning the variation of times

The hours of our Lordes birth and Incarnation, compared with the houre of his death and passion.

forme it selfe perfectlie with the true solitary or Solarie yeare, which containeth in it selfe, the true course and reuolution of the Sunne. For the common yeare (as makers of Almanackes, and other Computers of Calenders doe demonstrate) is presupposed to haue three hundred sixtie fiue dayes, and sixe houres. Foure yeares make one day more (by those odde houres) aboue the yeare, which nameth it selfe Bissextile.

The common yeare, what it containeth in daies & hours

The true year and course of the Sunne.

Neuertheless, in this obseruance, there is a generall errour, because to speake vprightlie; the true yeare, and course of the Sunne, hath three hundered sixty fiue daies, fiue houres, fortie nine minuts, and sixe seconds or more, which are fiue sixe partes of an houre, or verie little lesse. Wherefore, these sixe houres being not perfected, but remaining defectiue by a sixt part: the foure yeares cannot make an intire day of foure and twenty houres, there wanting two thirds of an houre, and some small matter more beside.

Then wee may say truely, that this errour is as a small Pilfering Theefe, stealing away (in foure yeares onelie) two thirds of an houre and somewhat more: how much preuaileth hee then in a thousand, sixe hundred, and the ouer-plus yeares? And yet in all this times great space, there are but foureteene or fifteene dayes: which is the cause, that these especiall and remarkeable dayes, are come to the seuerall eleauenth daies of December and March, which were wont to bee on those other seuerall fiue and twentith daies.

A consideration how the error ensueth by the ouer-plus-house.

Now, concerning this errour, it may not be said (for all this) to proceed from our Astrologers; for they make their account perfect of the yeare, by the true and intire course of the Sunne. Neuertheless, our Callendarians and Computers, doe hold the common yeare, making it to consist of three hundred sixtie fiue dayes, and sixe houres, albeit that the quantitie is lesse; as wee haue already approoued. By this meanes it happeneth oftentimes, that Easter, and some other of the mooueable Feastes, are celebrated on other dayes then they ought to bee: in regard of the rules and orders, which our fore fathers obserued in making their Calenders and Almanackes, who held assuredlie in their pre-supposing, that the Equinoctiall continued firme.

The errour proceedeth not from our Astrologers.

Of Easter, & other mooueable Feasts.

Now, considering that this imported nothing to the saluation of mens Soules, little account was and hath bin made thereof: yet it were good (notwithstanding) this errour should bee corrected. And I thinke, in the first generall Counsell hereafter to be assembled; there would bee prouision made for this case, as thereto fitly appertaineth: For many worthy men haue written sundry Treatises on this Argument; as Stoeflerus, Albertus, Poggius, Ioannes Fernelius, and diuers others.

Authors that haue written on this alteratiõ of daies.

But returning againe to our purpose, to know of what age our Redeemer was when he died, the most part of holie Doctours that haue spoken thereof, do say: that he was aged thirtie three years and somewhat more; by so much as was from the day of his Natiuitie, the fiue and twentith of December, to the like day of the moneth of March, when hee suffered. Others are of the mind, that hee dyed at two and thirtie yeares, and three moneths: And for eyther of these opinions, there are very apparant reasons; albeit I am loath to weary my Readers with the recitall of them. The Passion of our Lorde, was in the eighteenth yeare of the Empire of Tyberius, Successour to Octauius; according as Eusebius reporteth, and Beda in his Booke of Times. As for such as write, that he suffered in the fifteenth yeare of Tiberius raigne (as Eutropius, Lactantius, and others) it appeareth to mee, that they haue much fayled therein, because themselues do say, that hee was borne in the two and fortith yeare of Octauius his Empire. So then, considering that this Emperour raigned yet fifteene yeares after, and confirming the time to the age of Iesus Christ: it may bee verie euidently knowne, that Tyberius had raigned eighteene yeares, when our Lord and Sauiour suffered. Ouer and beside these things, I remember one more high and especiall matter, found out and noted by Albertus Magnus, in his Book of vniuersall occasions, and which (in my iudgment) is very notable, and this it is.

Of our Sauiours age whē he died, sundry opinions.

Euseb. in Hist. Eccles. Cap. 7. Beda in lib. de Temp.

The time cõpared by iust account.

Alber. Magnus in lib. de Reb. Vniuers.

A matter well worth the obseruation.

It being a most certaine thing (saith he) as it is approoued by the authoritie of holie Fathers, that our Sauiour was borne, the Sunne then being in the first degree of the signe of Capricorne, and iustly at midnight: in the selfe-same instant, mounted in the Horizon of the East parts, the signe of Virgo. Whereby appeareth, that the Starres declared, that he which was to bee borne of a Virgine, had for ascendent the signe Virgo.

The exaltation of the Son of Iustice.

And in like manner, when the Sunne of Iustice or righteousnesse dyed, and was exalted on the Tree of the Crosse (which was at mid-daie, as the Euangelistes doe confirme:) the Plannet of the Sunne was in the signe of Aries the Ramme, where it made the Equinoctiall, and where was then his exaltation; And this signe was accompanied with thirteene Starres, which might signifie Christ and his twelue Apostles. I set not downe this discourse to any other end, but onelie to shew; That all thinges obeyed, and yeilded themselues to the will of their Creatour, as is more amply declared by Albertus Magnus.

Of our Sauiours suffering at mid-day.

Now, that it should bee most true, that our Sauiour suffered at mid-day; I hope to proue it very apparantly. The holie Euangelists doe write, that hee was crucified at the houre called the sixt houre, and that he died at the ninth houre. It is to bee vnderstood then, that the sixt houre was iust at mid-day. For the Iewes and other Nations deuided (anciently) all the daies of the year, (how great or little soeuer they were) and likewise the nightes, into twelue equall portions, which they called * Planetarie houres. So that the houres of the daies in Winter, were small or short, and those of Summer great and long; and the houres of the night likewise opposite.

The Iewes diuision of daies and nights.

* Twelue for the day, and twelue for the night.

The houres of day began at the Suns rising, and the houres of the night, at his setting: by this meanes, at sixe houres it was mid-day, and at nine houres, it was three houres after mid-day. For the daie whereon our Sauiour suffered, was equall to the night, as we haue alreadie saide: and therefore the houres of the day then and there, were equally with ours now heere. In which respect, it is to be vnderstood, that the houres then, were meant for such whereof our Sauiour spake, saying: Are there not twelue houres in the daie?

The daie of our Sauiours suffering equall with the night.

Of the same houres it is spoken in the Gospell, of the Vineyard, that the Father of the Family went out at the eleuenth houre, to hyre Worke-men for his Vine-yard, and he payed the latest Commers as well as the other, which had been at the businesse from the daies beginning. In regard whereof, the first Workemen complained, saying: These last haue wrought but one houre, and wilt thou equall them with vs? Whereby may clearely be discerned, that from eleauen to twelue hours, was the ending of the day, because they said; These Men haue wrought but one houre: for if those eleauen houres had been as now, then it had beene other-wise. Againe, S. Luke saith in the place of the Passion; That the Sunne was darkned from the sixt houre, vntill the ninth houre. Whereby then we may know, that the sixt houre was the houre of mid-day, and the darknesse endured vntill the ninth houre; that is (with vs) three hours after mid-day. For if he had meant at sixe houres, as now in these dayes, it had beene a thing but naturall, for the Sunne to set, and bee obscured at sixe houres of the euening in March: but the sixt houre then, beeing our mid-day now, it was therefore a great and wonderfull Miracle.

Math. 20. 12.

Luke 23. 44.

Difference of the houres then and in these dayes.

CHAP. VII.

Of many thinges that happened at the birth and death of our Sauiour Iesus Christ, declared by diuers learned and worthy Historians; beside those which are recorded by the holy Euangelists.

ALbeit that those things certified by the blessed Euangelists, happening both at the birth and death of Christ, were not only great and miraculous, but worthy (beside) of all Faith and beleefe: yet I account it verie conuenable, to make mention of some other admirable accidents, which were seene and recorded by other persons.

Paulus

Paulus Orosius, and Eutropius, Writers belonging to Octauius, and Eusebius also doth say, that at such time as Iesus Christ was borne on earth, there happened in Rome, that in a common Inne or Tauerne; a Well or Spring of pure and excellent Oyle brake vp out of the ground, which for the space of a whole day, ran and issued forth incessantlie in great aboundance. It should seeme, that this Spring of Oyle, made application to the comming of Christ, which Word signifieth Annointed, in whom likewise all Christians are annointed. And that the common Tauern, whereinto all people were (indifferently) entertained and housed: should expresse our holy and true Mother of Church, the great Inne or common Harbour for all Christians; from whence should continually issue forth, all Christians, Catholickes, and louers of God. Eutropius addeth moreouer, that in Rome, and the neighbouring places there-about, euen in the full, plaine, calme and cleareſt time of the day; a circle was seene about the Sun, of as bright splendour and radiance, as the Sun in it selfe. The same Paulus Orosius further saith, that at the very same time, the Senate and people of Rome made free offer to Octauius Augustus, to entitle him chiefe Lorde: which hee refused, and by no meanes would accept; prognosticating to himselfe (yet without thinking thereon) that a much greater Lord then hee was then on the Earth, to whom that Title more worthily appertained.

Commestor, in his Scholastick Historie, affirmeth, that in Rome, vpon the same day: the Temple dedicated by the Romaines to Peace the Goddesse, fell in ruines to the earth. For they had formerly consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, to know how long the Temple should stand in good estate, and answer was made them; Vntill a Virgine should bring forth a Child, which they reputed to be vtterly impossible, and therefore their temple should stand for euer. Notwithstanding, at the Virgines deliuerance, Mother to the King of Heauen; it fell to the ground.

Hereupon, Lucas de Tuy, in his Chronicles of Spaine writeth, that hee found in the auncient Histories of his Countrey (hauing conferred and made iust account of the time) that the very same night wherein our Sauiour was borne, and at the very houre of mid-night: there appeared a Cloud visibly seene in Spaine, which gaue so bright a splendor, as if it had beene then the middle time of the day.

It is also to bee remembred, what I haue read in Saint Hierome, that at the same time as the virgine fled into Ægipt with her young Son; all their false Gods and Images fell downe, and vtterly defaced themselues. Also, the Oracles of those Gods, or Deuils rather, as wee may more iustlie tearme them, wherewith the people in those times were deluded: ceased their idle babling, and neuer afterward gaue any aunswere. This Miracle alleaged by Saint Hirome, seemeth to be approoued by that excellent man Plutarch; albeit hee was a Pagane. For, without giuing credit to those thinges, nor knowing wherefore they thus happened: hee made a perticular Treatise, of the imperfections of Oracles. For euen then in his time, (which was soone after the Passion of Christ) men began apparantly to perceiue; that Oracles failed, and were ful of defects. And he could alleage no other reason for it, in that Treatise: but that (as he imagined) some Dæmons or Spirits were dead. But he spake this as a man vncapable of Faith; becausse he vnderstood not, that Spirits were immortall.

Neuertheless, this matter is marueilous, and truely worthy of great consideration, to note how euidently the deuill shewed himselfe (euen suddenlie) to bee ouercome and conquered, and that after our blessed Sauiours death, he remained so confounded: that he neuer durst presume to giue any answere. And the Gentiles themselues, without any capacity of the reason; could haue knowledge of this defailance. By means whereof, Plutarch wrote that Tract, wherein he did set downe these words, whereof Eusebius maketh mention, writing to Theodorus, as of a most notable thing.

I remember (saith he) that I haue heard (concerning the Dæmons death) of Æmilianus the Orator, an humble, wise, and worthy man, and well knowne to some of you; that his Father comming (on a time)

Paulus Orosius, and Eutropius, Historians in the time of Octauius.

A Spring of Oyle arising out of the ground in Rome, when Christ was borne.

A bright circle seene about the Sun in the day time.

Commestor in lib. de Hist. Scholast.

Templum Pacis fell to the ground at the birth of Christ.

Lucas de Tuy, Chronicler of Spaine, in the Authenticke History of Spaine.

The downfall of all the false Gods & Idols

Plutarc in Tra. de imperf. Orat. The defayiance of Oracles in those daies.

The Deuils plaine manifestation of his foyle and ouerthrow.

Eusib. in Hist. Eccle. & ad Theodo.

Ataman a very skilfull Pilote of Egypt.

by Sea towardes Italy, passing and coasting (in the night time) an inhabited Island, named Paraxis, at what time, all the men in the Shippe were in silence and repose: they heard a graat & feareful voyce, which came out of the Island, and the voyce called Ataman (for so was the Pilot of the Ship named, who was a Natiue of Ægipt.) And albeit that this voyce was heard once or twice by Ataman, and others: yet had they not so much hardinesse, as to returne any answere, vntill the third time. And then hee said: Who is there? Who is it that calleth mee? What wouldst thou with me? then the voice spake much louder then before, and said vnto him. Ataman, my desire is, that when thou shalt passe by the Gulfe, called Laguna: that there thou remember to cry aloud, and giue it to vnderstand; that the great God Pan is dead. This being thus vnderstood, all in the Shippe were in great feare and terrour, and aduised the Patrone of the Shippe, to make no account thereof, neyther to speake one word, or make any stay at the Gulfe: but if the time prooued fauourable; to passe on further, and entend the finishing of the voyage. But beeing come to ioyne with the place, whereof the voyce had spoken and made designement: the Shippe stayed, the Sea was becalmed, and no winde stirred, so that (indeede) they could sayle no further. By meanes whereof, they all resolued, that Ataman should deliuer his message. And that he might the better performe it, he went vp vpon the poupe of the Shippe, and there hee cryed out so loud as possiblie he could, saying: I giue ye to know, that the Great God Pan is dead. But so soone as he had vttered these wordes, they heard so many voyces crying and complaining, that all the Sea resounded their dreadfull Ecchoes, and this wofull lamenting continued a long while, to the no little amazement of all them in the Shippe. But finding the wind immediatly prosperous, they sayled on-ward, and arriuing afterward at Rome; there they declared the whole aduenture. Which comming to the eare of the Emperour Tyberius; hee would needes be further informed thereof, and found it to bee most true.

The death of the great God Pan.

The cõming of the ship to the gulfe of Laguna.

Ataman deliuereth the message as he was commanded.

Whereby it is plaine and manifest, that (euen in all parts) the Deuils complained on the Natiuity of our Lord, because it was their vtter destruction. For by the supputation of times, it is found, that these things hapned, at such time as he suffered for vs; or a little before, when they were chased and banished out of the world. And hath beene presupposed, that this great Pan (according to the imitation of the shepheards great God Pan) whom they said to bee dead: was some Maister Deuill, which (as then) lost his Dominion, as all the rest did. Beside these thinges, Iosephus the Iew writeth: That in those very daies, a voyce was heard in the Temple of Ierusalem (albeit there was then no liuing Creature in it.) Let vs speedily bee gone, and leaue this Countrey. That is to say, they plainely perceiued, what persecution they were to suffer, and that he was not far from them, and that their destruction should ensue by the giuer of life. In the Nazarites Gospell it is found, that on the day of his Passion; the Gate of the Temple fell dowue, which was so sumptuous, and thought to continue for euer. Thus we may see, what wonderfull things hapned in those times, although the Euangelistes doe make no mention of them; as being no necessary matters, or worth their remembring.

Ioseph. in Antiquit. Iud. lib. 4.

The Deuils euery where complained of our Sauiors Natiuity.

We are likewise to consider, that the great Eclipse of the Sunne, which lasted three houres, so long as Christ was on his Crosse: was no natural matter, like those which we sometimes behold, by coniunction of the Sun and the Moone; but indeede was miraculous, and contrary to all naturall course or order. Therefore, such as are ignorant, how the Sunne becommeth Eclipsed; must know, that it cannot be, but by the coniunction of the Sun and the Moon, the Moone being interposed betweene the Sunne and the Earth. And yet notwithstanding, the Eclipse which happened then at our Lordes Passion, was in opposition, the Moon being at ful, and distant from the Sun by an hundred and fourescore degrees, in another Hemisphere, inferior to the City of Ierusalem. To shew that this is true, beside that which is written by sundry good Historians; the Text of the holy Scripture maketh proofe thereof. For it is most certain, that they neuer vsed to sacrifice the Lambe, but on the 14. day of the Moone: which Lambe was eaten by Christ & his Disciples, the very day before his death; according as it was commaunded

Three houres Eclipse of the Sun, while Christ was on the Crosse.

The reason of the Sunnes Eclipse in his vsuall course.

The sacrificing of the Lambe.

Exod. 12,6. Leuit. 23,5.

manded in Exodus, and in Leuiticus. And on the morrow, which was the Feast of vnleauened bread, Christ (the immaculate Lambe) was crucified; the Moone being then on necessity in her full, & opposite to the Sunne, which then coulde no more Eccliplse the Sunne, then anie other Planet had power to do. Therfore it was very myraculous, contrary to the order of Nature, and onely done by the omnipotency of God, who depriued the Sunne of his light for all that space of time.

Dionisius Areopagita in Athens, whē the Sunne was darkned, and his words.

Furthermore, in regard of this admirable accident, Dionisius Areopagita beeing on that day in Athens: and beholding the Sunne to bee so strangely obscured; knowing also (as a man learned and skilfull in Astrology, & the Celestiall courses) that this Eccliplse was contrary vnto the rule of Nature, he cried out with a lowd voyce, saying; Either the world will finish, or the God of Nature suffereth. For this cause saith one, that the Wisemen of Athens being amazed heereat, caused an Altar immediately to bee builded to the Vnknowne God. And Saint Paule arriuing there afterwardes, declared vnto them, what and who that vnknowne God was: that it was Christ our Redeemer, God and man, who had then suffered, by meanes whereof, he conuerted many people to the faith.

An Altar erected to the vnknowne God.

Some haue beene doubtfull and desirous to know, whither this Eccliplse and darknesse of the Sunne, was Vniuersally thoroughout the whole world; and builded their argument on this; that when the Euangelist saide, ouer all the Earth, that is to say; by a manner of speaking, al the Country thereabout, and Origen was of this opinion. But yet wee see, that in Greece; and namely in Athens, this darkenesse was visibly seene, which maketh me verily beleeue, that such an Eccliplse was vniuersall thoroughout all our Hemisphere, and through all partes where the Sun could be seene.

Concerning she vniuersal darkenesse.

I speake to this end, because in all the other Hemisphere, where it was then night, nothing could be seene, nor the sight of the Sunne be any way discerned. For he cannot illuminate in one instant, but the moitie or halfe of the earth, in regard of the shaddow which hee maketh of himselfe. Neuertheless, wee must know, that the Moone being then in her full, and hauing no light, but what shee receiueth from the splendor of the Sun; and being also in the Hemisphere which is meerely vnder vs, becam then likewise to bee violently eccliplsed and darkened, onely thorough the lacke of the Sunnes beauty and clearnesse. And therefore, it may be iustly saide, that an vniuersall obscurity was thoroughout the world; because, neyther the Moone or the Starres coulde yeelde any light, but what they themselues must first borrowed from the Sunne.

Concerning the Hemisphere vnderneath vs.

An vniuersall darkenes throughout the world.

CHAP. VIII.

Of many passages and places, quoted and cited by diuers Learned Authours, which doo make mention of Christ, and of his life.

IHaue many times heard sundrie curious questions moued. yet proceeding from men of good Learning; what should bee the cause, that the Gentiles and Ethnickes (in their writings and Doctrines) haue made so slender mention of the life of Iesus Christ, and of his Myracles, they beeing so great in number, yea, so publicke and manifest, especially by his Disciples? Considering, that the Ethnicks make large mention in their Bookes, of other perticuler thinges happening in those times, albeit they were not of so maine importance as the other. Wherevnto I answere first of all, that it were meerely against the trueth, to say, that prophane writers haue not spoken thereof, because there are an infinite number, from whome, I haue deduced some examples for their ease, that haue no knowledge in anc ent Histories. My second reason to bee considered in this case, is, that the holy Faith, and Lawe of grace giuen by Christ, beganne in him, and by him and his Apostles, they were published to the world, and was embraced and receiued by some, who determined to liue and die therein. Albeit there were others, more obstinate in their sins and vices, that not onely made refusall thereof; but also persecuted it vnto their vtter-

The Gentiles and Ethnicks small remembrancers of Christ.

The Authors first reason of answere.

His second Reason.

The Holye Faith & Law of Grace.

vttermoſt power. There were yet ſome others (who held the middle ranke) that though this Doctrine ſeemed to them to be good: yet for fear of Tyrants and perſecuters, with other humaine conſiderations, that this holie profeſsion would be deſpiſed, they likewiſe grew careleſſe of embracing and entertaining it.

Timerous & weak harted people.

The Worlde diuided into, three opinions.

The World then being diuided into three opinions, they which confeſſed Christ, did notable and marueilous thinges, many of which gaue great teſtimony of the truth. And amongeſt this number, were Dionisius Areopagita, Tertullian, Lactantius Firmianus, Euſebius, Paulus Oroſius, and many others, who would require too long time to recite them perticulerly.

The firſt, holy beginners.

The other wicked ſorte, that perſecuted this profeſsion, as a matter ſtraunge and hatefull to their Law, laboring wholy to confounde it, and to hide the myracles, life and Doctrine of Chriſt, were ſuch as (in this reſpect) would haue no ſpeech thereof amongſt them; or if they did make any report at all, it was done to this end, onely to obſcure, contemn and darken the glory thereof. As did the wicked Porphyrius, Iulian, Vicentius, Celſus, Affricanus, Lucian, and other ſuch like diuelliſh minded men: againſt whome, Wrote very learnedly, Cyprian, Origen, S. Auguſtine, and others.

The ſecond, wicked Contemners.

The third number, who for feare, or other worldly conſiderations, held backe from becomming chriſtians, and to loue and know the trueth: for the verie ſame cauſes refuſed to ſpeake thereof, but if they vſed any litle touch or ſpeech, it was done in ſcoffing and lying manner, or in a negligent and curſory kinde. All which notwithſtanding, euen as when a man ſtriueth to conceale a matter of trueth, vnder the Vaile of lying and deceitful colours, many times it comes to paſſe, that by a meere hidden property of trueth it ſelfe, hee that would ſo faine obſcure it, doth diſguiſe and palliate it in ſuch bungerly manner, that his owne lies and trecheries are not only thereby made manifeſt, but concealed trueth ſhineth in the fairer luſter. Euen ſo fell it out in this nature, with both theſe fornamed people; for althogh they ſtroue mainly to exterminate & deſtroy the miracles of Chriſt and his Doctrine; yet which way ſoeuer they framed their ſpeech, ſomething ſtill came from them, whereby their owne malice was apparantly diſcerned, and the goodneſſe of truths Doctrine farre more ſoundly warranted.

The 3. ſort, fearfull time-ſeruers.

A very excellent comparison of cõcealing the truth.

Alluſion to the comparison.

I could ſpeake of many things, which were both vttered and written by the Sybilles: but in regard that whatſoeuer they did, proceeded not from their own proper iudgement, but thorow the ſpirite of Propheſie, and according as God hadde communicated thoſe guiftes vnto them, (notwithſtanding they were Infidelles) I will be ſilent of them, and proceede to other authorities.

The ten famous Sybils, viz. Perſica, Libica, Delphica, Cumea, Erythrea, Samia, Cumana, Helleſpontia, Phrygia, Tiburtina.

Our firſt and moſt euident teſtimony (albeit not the leaſt common) ſhal therefore bee deriued from our greateſt Enemies, among whoſe number is Ioſephus, not only a Iew by Lineage and Nation, but alſo by his life and profeſsion, & theſe are his very words. At the ſame time liued Ieſus, a very Wiſe man, if it bee lawfull to tearme him a man, becauſe indeed and verity, he did wonderful things, and was Maiſter and Doctor to ſuch as loued and ſought for truth. He aſſembled and was followed by great troopes of Iewes and Gentiles, and he was Chriſt. And although he was afterward accuſed by the principall men of our Faith, and crucified: yet hee was not abandoned of them which had formerly followed him: but three dayes after his death, he appeared aliue again vnto them, according as the Prophets (inſpired of God) had foretolde and propheſied of him. And euen in theſe dayes of ours, the Doctrine and Name of chriſtians perſeuereth to thorow world. Behold, theſe are the words of Ioſephus, who wrote of the deſtruction of Ieruſalem, as an eye-witneſſe of beholding it, which happened forty yeares after the paſsion of Christ.

Ioſ. in lib. 2. de Antiq.

The deſtruction of Ieruſalem fortie yeares after Christ.

Pilate, in like manner, who had pronounced the ſentence of death vpon him did beare witneſſe (neuertheleſſe) of his great myracles, commending them by his Letters to the Emperour Tiberius. So that he conſulted with the ſenat, to know whether they wold receiue Ieſus Chriſt to be God: and albeit they woulde not conſent thereto, yet Tyberius expreſſely prohibited, that Chriſtians ſhoulde not be abuſed and perſecuted. As concerning the trembling and quaking of the earth, with the darkening of the Sunne, during ſuch time as Chriſt ſuffered vpon his Croſſe, we haue likewiſe diuers teſtimonies monies of Ethnickes. Phlegonius, a Greek Historian, of whom Suidas maketh especiall mention, reporteth for a wonderfull thing: That in the fourth yeare of the two hundred and tenth Olympiade (which by iust account, was in the eighteenth yeare of the raigne of Tiberius, and at which time our Sauiour suffered) There vvas an Eccipse of the Sunne, the very greatest that euer had beene seene, or euer founde to bee written of, and that it continued from the sixt houre, vntill the ninth houre. And that during this Eccliplse, the trembling of the earth was so great in Asia and in Bythinia, that infinite strong builte houses fell to the ground.

Pilate a Witnes of Chriſts myracles.

Phlegonius a Grecian born in Asia, recorded by Suidas

It appeareth moreouer, that besides this Phlegonius (who should seem to liue at the verie same time) Pliny also felt and wrote of the selfsame matter, for he saith; In the time of the Emperor Tiberius, the quaking of the earth was much greater, then euer before had beene. By meanes whereof, (saith another) twelue Cities were ruined and ouerthrowne in Asia, with infinit other goodly buildings and houses. So that, the Historiographers amongst the Gentiles, (albeit they knewe not the cause) did not forbeare to write of the Miracles of Christ.

Plin. in Lib. 2.

12. Cities in Asia, ruinated by the Earthquake of christes death.

The other Myracle, of the Vaile of the Temple, which rent in sunder, Iosephus also giueth faithfull testimonie thereof. Of the cruell murther or massacre committed by Herod on poore harmlesse Innocents, mention is made by another Iew, named Philo, an Historian of great authority, in his Abridgement of times, where he saith; Herod caused certain Children to be slaine, and his owne Sonne with them: because he had heard, that the Christ a King promised to the Hebrewes, was then borne. And this Author liued in the same time of the other Herod, named the Tetrach, as himselfe hath said.

Ios. in l. 2. de an.

Philo. Iudaic. in Abbreu Tep.

This History of the Innocents, is yet much more amply declared by Macrobius, who was a verie ancient Ethnick, and Latine Historian; for, in discoursing som iouiall and facetious matters of the Emperor Octauius (in whose time our Lord and Sauiour was borne) hee sayeth; The Emperor hauing heard of the cruelty of Herod, both toward his owne Sonne, and the other Children, said; He had rather be a hog in Herods house, then his Sonne. And this he spake, because the Iewes neuer vsed to kill their Swine, or eate their flesh. This pleasant iest is also alledged by Dion the Greeke, in the life of the same Emperor. So that there were great store of miracles, whereof both the Iewes & Gentiles (without thinking on them) beare witnesse to bee doone by Christ, ouer and beside them which are written by Christians.

Macrobius an ancient Ethnick, and Latine Writer.

Dion. in vit. Oc.

What shal we further say, concerning the ancient Emperours, and what opinion they had of our faith; as also their cruell proceeding against Gods seruauntes? The first good Byshop, Saint Peter and Saint Paule likewise, were put to death by the commaunde of the Emperour Nero, thirty sixe yeares after the death of our Sauiour; and then, was the Churches greatest persecution, whereof the Gentiles spared not to make mention; and perticulerly, Suetonius Tranquillus, and Cornelius Tacitus, who liued in those times and were of great authority. Suetonius in the life of Nero, speaking concerning some of his ordinances, saith; He tormented and afflicted (with great paines and punishments) a kinde of people, that cald themselues Christians, and followed a new manner of beleefe and Religion. And Cornelius Tacitus, displaying the deedes of the same Nero, saith: He persecuted and chastised with terible torments, a sort of people, which were vulgarly called Christians. And the Author of that Name, was Christ of Ierusalem, whom Pilat the Gouernor of Iewry caused to bee crucified. And by the meanes of his death his Doctrine began to exalt it selfe. Now let vs obserue what some other Gentils haue written, who were no way of any lesse reputation.

The aunciente Emp. against the christians.

S. Peter & Paul put to death by Nero.

Suet. Tranquillius & Cornel. Tacitus.

The words of Corn. Tacitus.

Plinie the younger, in one of his Elegant Epistles, demanded of the Emperor Traiane, for whom he was Pro-Consull in Asia, how he would haue the Christians to be punished, which were accused and brought before him? And the better to informe his Lorde concerning such matters as hee found to bee obiected against them, he wrote thus: Amongst other thinges, these Christians doo rise at certaine houres in the night, and assemble themselues together, to sing Hymnes & songs of praise to Iesus Christ, whome they honor as their God. And beside their meeting in such Congregations, they make solemne vowes, not to do any euill, Plin Secund. in Epi ad Traian.

The accusations laid to the Christians charge.

euill, or any harme to other men: but promise that they wil not steal any thing; that they will not be adulterers; that they will not falsifie their promises or Oathes; & not to deny whatsoeuer is left in their charge and keeping.

The causes why Christians were persecuted.

This Pliny saith moreouer: They feede all together, without possessing any thing, as priuate or perticuler. Whereby may be knowne, what the exercises of Christians were, and for what cause the worlde abhorred and persecuted them. These things were written by an Infidell and Idolater, threescore yeares after the passion of our Lord and Sauiour. Vnto which Letters, the Emperor returned this aunswere.

The Emperors answere to his Pro-Consull.

Forasmuch, as they are accused of no other abuse or euil doing, let them not in any wise be afflicted or punished, neither make anie further inquisition against them. Neuertheless, when they shall bee eft-soones accused before thee, do thy best to withdraw thē from that Religion: but if in no wise they wil forsake it, yet see that thou doe not offer them any eternity. Howbeit, very true it is, that this Emperor Traian, had formerly (and like an Infidell, deceyued by the guile of false accusers) persecuted the Christians.

Elius Lampridius in vit. Ad.

After him his Nephew Adrian succeeded in the Empire, of whom Ælius Lampridius the Historiographer Writeth, that hee was an Infidell and an Idolater: and yet neuertheless, he began to honor the Christians, permitting them to liue in their Religion: and himselfe also worshipped Christ with diuers others, and caused Temples to be newly erected. Yet afterward, he altered his minde, and became both odious and cruell towards the Christians, being deceyued and abused by the Maisters of his false Ceremonies, and by the Byshops attending vppon his idle Gods. For they perswaded him, that if any way he fauored the Christians: the whole world wold be conuerted to their Religion, and so the faith of the Goddes should be ouerthrowne. And this is credibly auouched by Petrus Crinitus. It is written in the life of Saturnius, that a letter was sent from Seuerinus the Consull, to the same Emperor Adrian; wherin he declared to him, that there were diuerse Christians in Egypt: amongest whom, some called themselues Byshops, whereof no one was found Idle at any time: but still seriously employed about one exercise or other, and euen (to the blind and Gowty) all liued by the labour of their hands; and yet they all worshipped one GOD, who also had beene ordered by the Iewes.

Adrian the Emp. perswaded against the Christians.

Read more of this in the life of Saturnius, concerning the life and behauiour of Christians.

The false instigations of the corrupt Byshops.

We read also in the Histories of those times, that this Emperour hauing begun to misintreat the Christians by perswasion of his false High-Priests, there was a certaine Ambassador of his, named Serenus Eranius, an Ethnicke, like him that had written the Letter to him, who gaue his opinion, that the cruelty of consenting to oppresse the Christians (being accused of nothing else, but obseruing their Religion, and could not iustly be charged with any other crimes or offences) deserued mittigation. And so by the means of this Letter, the Emoerour Andrian inhibited Minutius Fondanus, then Pro-consull in Asia: not to condemne any Christian, except he were conuinced of some other offence, then that concerning his Christian Religion.

Minutius Fondanus Proconsul in Asia.

CHAP. IX.

What opinion the Auncient Emperours did hold, concerning the people that followed Christ and Christianity, by those testimonies which are deriued out of Ethnicke Histories.

AFter this Emperor Adrian (of whome wee spake in our last chapters) succeeded Anthonius the Debonaire, or meek, who, albeit he had that Gentle name, yet was hee peruerse and Wicked; for hee misliked the Faith of Christ, and persecuted the Christians. But Marcus Aurelius his successor, became therein much more moderate: for in stead of persecuting them, he led them along with him in his Armies, and by their deuout Prayers, he was deliuered from a daunger which hee was in, thorough want of Water, which his enimies had cut from him, wherin God only holpe him, and bestowed Lightning and thunders vpon his aduersaries. Himselfe Anthonius the meeke succeeded Adrian.

Marc. Aurelius was milde to the christians

Iul. Capitolinus.

selfe maketh mention of these thinges in one of his Letters; and Iulius Capitolinus speaketh the same; howbeit hee doth not attribute it wholy to the Christians. And these things hapned about 145. yeares, after the death and Passion of our Sauiour.

Elius Spartianus concerning Seuerus.

About 15 or 20. yeares following, Ælius Spartianus (an Ethnicke, as himselfe confesseth) writeth, that Seuerus was elected Emperor; and hee made a Lawe, prohibiting (vnder great penalties) that no man shold conuert to be either Christian or Iew. After which, Seuerus, Antoninus Heliogabalus was Emp. whose dissolute life we haue already described; and Lampridius reporteth (who wrote his life) that he builded a Temple in Rome, dedicated to his God only, and hee woulde haue had the Christians to offer vp their Sacrifices therein; but they by no means would yeeld thereto. The successor vnto this Heliogabalus, was the Emperor Alexander Seuerus, in the yeare of our Lord, 192. and much ado was made, beecause he would haue become a Christian.

Heliogabalus his Temple in Rome.

Alex. Seuerus.

The Christians much fauoured by Alexan. Seuerus.

Wee finde moreouer recorded in his History, that hee held a good opinion of our faith, and honoured the Christians verie highly, graunting vnto them places and precincts in Rome, where to haue their Temples and Oratories. Himselfe also had an Oratory wherein he kept the Image or figure of Christ, according as it is testified by Elius Lampridius, where he speaketh largely of the Christians. Adding withall, that many Cookes and Tauerners went to the Emperour, to complain against the Christians, saying, That they had taken their houses and Loadginges from them, therein to make vse of their hypocrisies, and that they obserued a Religion contrarie to that of the Romaines. To which complaint the Emperour answered: Hee thought it more conuenient, that God shold there be honoured, then their affayres and vocations be vainly followed.

The Christians complained on, & the Emperors answere.

This Seuerus being dead, Maximinus succeeded him, an enemy and persecuter of the Christians: but he liued not long, and finished his dayes by an euill death. After whom; and two others beside, that had but small continuance, the Empire came into the hands of Phillip, who was baptized, as diuers do confirme; and the first that receiued the Christians: and yet Eusebius maintaineth, that the Gentiles

The Emperor Phillip baptized.

Histories do speake nothing thereof.

Day by day after (though by small degrees) God gaue illumination vnto the hearts of men; and a great number were conuerted to the Faith, in despight of the Emperors Decius, Diocletian, and such other, vntill such time, as (being wearie of persecuting) they dissembled their cruelty, and suffered them to liue peacefully a while: as most plainely appeareth, by a Letter of Maximinus the Emperor, companion with Diocletian, which was aboue two hundered yeares after our Redemption: The Letter followeth thus in our Language.

Tyrants weary of persecuting the christians.

The emperor Maximin his Letter, concerning the christians

CÆsar Maximinus, Inuincible great High-Priest of Germany, of Egypt, Thebes, Sarmatia, Persia, Armenia, Carpia, and victorious (besides) ouer the Medes: And for his Conquestes, named nine times Emperour, and eight times Consull, and Father of his Country, &c. At the beginning of Our Empire, amongest other things which wee determined to do for publicke good, We ordained, that the Order to be held in all thinges, should be conforme vnto the Auncient Lawes, and the publicke Discipline of Rome conserued. And by the same meanes Wee commanded, that the Men which name themselues Christians; and who haue left Our ancient Religion, shoulde be pressed, constrained, and enforced to leaue the New which they haue taken; & that they should obserue Our Auncient, established by Our Predecessors. But it being come to Our knowledge, that notwithstanding this command, and rigors vsed against them, to make them obserue it, they haue left off to follow Our Will, and are so firm and constant in their purpose, as neither force, nor any greeuous punishments whatsoeuer, can withdrawe them from their Religion, and cause thē to keepe Ours; but rather, they desire to expose themselues to more bitter Torments and death: continuing still to this day, in the same constancie, without any will or intent to honor any of our Gods of Rome: Wee being memorative of our wonted clemency and pittie, do purpose to expresse the same towards these Christians. And therefore we do permit, that from hence forward any man may make and name himselfe a Christian, to haue

The woorthy and constant resolution of the christians.

places

places for their aſſemblies, and to builde Temples, wherein to offer their Sacrifices and Prayers. Which Licenſe and faculty we graunt vnto them, vnder condition that they ſhall doo nothing againſt Our Weale-publicke and Religion; and that (in other things) they ſhall keep Our Lawes and Conſtitutions. Moreouer, that in acknowledgement of this permiſſion, they ſhal ſtand obliged, to pray vnto their God for our life and health; and likewiſe for the good eſtate of the Roman Commonwealth, that the City continuing ſafe and in proſperity, they themſelus may liue by their labor in repoſe and ſecurity.

The Chriſtiās bound to doo nothing againſt the weal-publick.

Well may we terme this man a moſt infortunate Emperor, for if he ſought to compell the Chriſtians, to forſake and renounce their faith, as being badde and wicked: why then, would he haue them to praie for him, and tie them to be mindful of him in their Prayers? But this letter maketh ſufficiently againſt him, becauſe himſelfe doth thereby teſtify, what conſtancy, vertue, and ſpirit appeared in the Martirs and holy chriſtians, ſuffering patiently (for ſo long time) ſuch torments and punniſhments, as were inflicted on them for the loue of Chriſt. Within ſome while after Maximinus, Conſtantine came to ſucceed in the Empire, who was ſir-named the Great, Son to the good Q. Helena, that found the Croſſe of Chriſt, which was about 290. yeares after the redemption of mankind. Hee was a good Chriſtian, and performed ſo manie worthy actions, in the honor of God, and his holy Church, and likewiſe to the Miniſters therein, as would require too long a time to recite. He permitted all men indiffrently to becom Chriſtians, for whom he builded ſumptuous Temples: and ſuch as formerly had bin dedicated to the ſeruice of Idols. were nowe conſecrated to the ſeruice of Chriſt and his ſeruants.

The Chriſtians muſt remember the Emperour in their prayers

The emperor Conſtantine the great, became a good Chriſtian.

Idolaterous Temples reduced to the ſeruice of god

After this time, although the Church of God ſuffered ſome ſcandales and perſecutions, as thoſe of Iulian the Apoſtata and others: yet notwithſtanding, dayly, and in many parts of the worlde, Chriſt became to be publickely adored. And from thenceforward, all Hiſtories are ful of the Saints deeds; moreouer, the moſt part of the ſubſequent Emperors, were faithfull Catholickes, as Theodoſius, Iuſtinian, and others of the ſame minde. I could alledge many more Authorities of Ethnick Hiſtorians, who haue ſpoken of Chriſt, but this ſmall number ſhall now ſuffice me, becauſe they are both famous and of great approbation.

Chriſt honored in moſt places of the World.

CHAP. X.

That a man of meane birth or condition, ſhould not therefore deſiſt or forbeare from honourable attempts; but endeauour (by all meanes poſsible) to winne fame and preferment: With ſundry examples tending to that purpoſe and argument.

WE ſee, that (euen naturally) men deſcended of high and generous Linage, do oftentimes beecome the greateſt and moſt excellent perſons, by imitating the natiue Nobleneſſe, and ancient vertue of their anceſtors. Neuertheleſſe, becauſe there is not any Law or rule ſo certaine, which admitteth not ſome kind of exception: this alſo may be allowed to paſſe in that number. For many times, a wiſe, vertuous, learned, and well-diſpoſed Father, doth beget idle, abiect, indiſcreete, and bad qualited Children. And yet for all this, if this rule were more certaine, and of leſſe infallibilitie, then indeede it is: yet it ſtandeth not as any expreſſe inhibition, that ſuch are deriued of meane and poor parentage, ſhold not eleuate their humble eyes, and (by any paine or trauaile whatſoeuer) climbe to the faire abiding of vertue and honor. And ſo much the rather, becauſe the moſt auncient, noble, and beſt eſteemed families of theſe daies, had their ſourſe & originall from the well-head of vertue, & therby ennobled their ſucceeding poſterity. Therefore, the better to encourage men, to mount vp their depreſſed minds, and to aime at matters of moment and eminency, I will relate a few examples of ſome, that haue deſcended from poore parents, who (neuertheleſſe) becam great men, illuſtrious and excelling both in Vertue and Nobility.

Natiue Nobilitie the true Nurſe of honor.

No inhibition againſt true & reall Vertue.

A Spurre to humble and lowly minds, none greater then vertue.

We

Viriatus a Portuguize, seuere against the Romains.

We will begin with Viriatus a Portuguize, so much renowned among Historians, and especially the Romans, in whose blood so many times he died his weapon. This man was the Son of a poore Shepheard in the Fields; and all his younger yeares holp his Father to tend his flocks: but his thoughts lifting themselues vnto much higher occasions, he lefte this domesticke and priuate kind of life, depending on tame and harmlesse Creatures, to pursue those of sauage and sterner Nature; and so (indeede) became a great Hunter. It hapned afterward, that the Romaines comming to inuade Spaine, he leauied a great troope of his Companions togither; by whose assistance he gaue the enemy many bolde skirmishes, and spared not also his Natiue friends, onlie for practise, and to whet on his youthful spirit. He prooued so valiant and apte to Armes, that (in very short time) he had won people enowe about him, to make vp an whole army, and shew themselues resoluedly in the Field. VVith them, he made warre vpon the Romans, in defence of his owne Country; and the wars continued aboue 14. yeares: in which time, he won many great & famous victories against them. Thus liued he powerfully, honourably, and feared of his enemies: but in the end, he was vnfortunatly slaine by Treason, to the no little greefe of his VVatre-Companions, by whom, hee was most Noblie brought vnto his Graue.

The Romans proceede to make warre in Spaine.

Viriatus slaine by treason.

Arsaces, King of the Parthians, was of such meane and simple Parentage, that no mans memorie could make report either of his Father or Mother. After hee had retired himselfe from subiection and obedience to Alexander the Great, hee was the first that constituted a kingdome among the Parthians, the people so much renowned and feared of the Romans. And by the meanes of his manhood and valiancy, the Kings successors (in reuerend respect and memory of his name, albeit they helde not the Kingdome by Hereditarie succession) were in regard of him named Arsacides, as the Romaine Emperors tooke first the name of Cæsar, in affection to the name of great Cæsar Octauianus Augustus.

The poore birth of Arsaces K. of the Parthians.

The Kings of Parthia, named Arsacides

The excellent Captaine Agathocles, who for his wisedom and dantlesse spirit was King of Sicily, and made most cruell VVarre on the Carthagenians, was of so poore and humble birth, as at the vtmost, he could be said to be but a poor Potters Son: and yet neuertheless, he attayned in time, to the honour and dignitie of a King. Whensoeuer he made his royal Feasts and Banquets, among his Vessels of Gold and Siluer, wherewith hee was serued at his Table, hee would also haue set before him, Cups, Pots, and earthen Vesselles, to declare that he was not vnmindfull from what pouerty of place his first Originall grew. There is another, as memorable an example of Ptolomey, one of the chiefest Captaines to Alexander; after whose death, hee was King both of Egypt and Syria: yet such was his fame, as all his Successors, the Kings of Egypt, were named Ptolomeyes, in remembrance of him. This Ptolomy, was Sonne to an Esquire, called Lagus, who neuer had any higher preferment, then as a Squire in Alexanders Army.

Agathocles K. of Sicilie a poor Potters son.

Ptolomy king of Egypt and Syria.

Iphicrates the Athenian, was most excellent in the Science of Militarie Discipline, for he conquered the Lacedemonians in a fought battell, and valiantly resisted the impetuositie of Epaminondas, the excellent Captaine of Thebes. The same was the man, whom Artaxerxes King of Persia, elected to be Lieutenant General ouer his Armies, when he purposed any Warre against the Egyptians. And yet notwithstanding these eminent aduancements: al such as haue written of him, do confesse him to be no better borne, then a poore Coblers Sonne.

Iphicrates the warlick Athenian, the Son of a poore Cobler.

I had almost forgot Eumenes, one of the most excellent Captaines that Alexander had, both in valour, knowledge, & good Counsell, whose life and woorthy deeds of Armes, are written by Plutarch and Paulus Emilius. This man, although he was not fauoured (like the other) in riches, and the goods of fortune: yet could no man march before him in the Art of warre. For his vertues and glories grew out of himself, gaining no aduancement but by his owne labours: he being son to a man but of mean condition, & (as some write) a poore Carter.

Eumenes recorded by Plutark & Emilius

Among our worldly Dominions and Gouernements, none euer was so great and powerfull, as the Roman Empire, and ruled and commanded by many most excellent men, both in Manners and Vertues. And yet neuertheless, manie haue aſpired and attained to that Soueraigne degree of Authority, who were but of poore and meane deſcent. Elius Pertinax Emperor of Rome, was the Sonne of an Artificer, his Grand-father was a Libertine (that is to ſay) ſuch a one as ſometime had bin a Bondſlaue, and afterward had purchaſed his liberty. And yet notwithſtanding, in regard both of his vertue and valour, he came to be the Romain Emperor. Afterward, to leaue an example to others of poore parentage, and to encorage them to vertuous attempts, hee couered with coſtly & fine carued Marble, all the Shoppes where his Father hadde wrought to get his liuing. Nor was this Elius the onely man of meane birth, that attained vnto the Empire; for Diocleſian, who made Rome ſo gloriouſly ſhine with triumphant victories, was only the ſon of a Scribe or Notary. Some ſay, that his Father was a Booke-binder, and himſelf a bondſlaue. Valentinian alſo came to the Empire, albeit he was but a poore Rope-makers Son. The Emperor Probus, was the Son of a Gardiner. Aurelius, whoſe fame and vertues were ſo great, was of ſuch meane and poore deſcent: that Authors could neuer agree, concerning the place where he was borne. Maximinus was the Sonne of a Smith; but others ſay that his Father was a Waggon-Wright. Marcus Iulius Licinius, and likewiſe Bonoſus, they did both gouerne the Romaine Empire: and yet the firſt was but an husbandmans ſonne of Dacia, and the other the ſonne of a poore ſtipendary Schoolemaiſter.

The Romain Empire greatest of all other.

Elius Pertinax an Artificers Sonne.

Diocleſian was the Son of a Scriuener.

Valentinian, a Rope-makers ſonne.

Probus a Gardiners ſonne.

Maximinus a Smiths ſonne.

M. Iulius Licinius & Bonoſus

Many other Emperors of this degree, were in Rome whom I ſpare to ſpeake of, for breuities ſake, as Mauritus Iuſtinus, predeceſſor to Iuſtinian and Galerius, who firſt were Shepheards, before they came to be Emperors. From this high and ſupreame dignitie, let vs come to the Prelacie of the Romaine Sea, whereto likewiſe men of as humble a condition haue attained. Pope Iohn, the two and twentith of that name, was a Shoue makers Sonne, and borne in Fraunce, yet by his learning and wiſedome he came to that degree, and encreaſed the patrimonie & power of the Church. Pope Nicholas the fifte, formerlie named Thomas, was the ſonne of verie poore parents, that went about the Cittie, ſelling Egges & Poultrie. Pope Sixtus the fourth, firſt named Frances, and a Cordelier, was the ſonne of a Mariner, or Sea-faring man. I coulde name a number more, whom purpoſely I do omit; becauſe this dignitie is not to be had by Nobilitie of blood, but onelie by vertue. Ieſus Chriſt himſelfe left vs an example thereof, for the firſt man by him appointed to that Office, is ſaide to bee Saint Peter, who formerly ſought his liuing in the Seas, like a poore Fiſherman, but he brought him from thence to bee a Fiſher of men.

Examples of the Byſhops See of Rome.

Pope Iohn the 22. a ſho-makers ſon.

Pope Nicholas 5. a Powlters ſonne.

Pope Sixtus 4 a Marriners ſonne.

S. Peter reputed to be the firſt Byſhop of Rome.

Comming now to a ſuruey of Kinges and Princes, we finde, that the Romains elected Tarquinius Priſcus for their king, who was the ſonne of a Merchant of Corinth, and one that was baniſhed from his owne Countrey. Yet he comming to bee King, enlarged the Confines of his Kingdome, and the number of Senators, as alſo of his Cauallerie. Hee inſtituted new eſtates for the ſeruice and Ceremonies of their Gods; ſo that the people neuer repented themſelues for electing him their King, although he was a ſtraunger to them. Seruius Tullius, who was likewiſe King of Rome, raigned long time with verie great victories, and triumphed three ſeuerall times, in pompe and power of an excellent King: and yet hee was knowne by many, to be the ſon of a poor Bond-woman: from whence (for euer after) he held the name of Seruius.

Tarq. Priſcus, a Merchantes ſonne.

Seruius Tullius the ſonne of a poore bond woman.

The Kings of the Lombards, although they were not of ſuch Antiquity, as the Kings of Rome, yet (in due reſpect) they had as great puiſſance. The third of them being named Lamuſius, was the ſonne of a poore common woman, who was deliuered at the ſame time, of two other Sonnes. And yet, like a lewde and wicked woman, ſhe threw them into a deepditch wherein was ſome ſmall ſtore of Water. It fortuned, that King Agelmond paſſing that way, eſpyed the Infant (well-neere) drowned in the Water. And hauing a Launce then in his hand, hee touched it gently with the end thereof, to perceiue further what it was. But the Infant (as young as it was) feeling himſelfe pierced with the Launces point, caught holde thereon with his hand, and would not let it go. Which when the King beheld, woondering not a little, that ſo young a creature ſhold declare ſo much ſtrength, he cauſed him to bee taken foorth of the water, and to bee nurſed with great care and Lamuſius K. of the Lombardes a Strumpets ſonne.

K. Agelmond finding the yong child in the water, cauſeth it to bee well nurſed.

and coſt. And becauſe the name of the place (where hee found him) was called Lamus, he was ſir-named Lamuſius, and became ſo greatly fauoured by Fortune, that he was King of the Lombards, & his ſucceſsion continued to King Albouinus, in whoſe time that Kingdome was vtterly ruined.

The reaſon of calling him Lanuſius.

Another accident (of no leſſe raritie then this) happened in the Kingdome of Bohemia, where a man named Primiſlaus (Sonne to a Peazant of the Countrey) was choſen to be king, euen when he was labouring the ground in the fields. For, the Bohemians being then in ſome doubt, whom they ſhould elect to be their king, ſent foorth a Horſe vnbrideled into the wilde fields, ſuffering him to run whither ſoeuer he would, being fully determined to elect him their King, with whome the horſe ſtayed.

Of Primislaus K. of Bohemia

A ſtrange election of a king

It came ſo to paſſe, that the horſe made his ſtay directly before Primiſlaus, euen as he was holding the plough in the field: whereupon they made choiſe of him to be their King, and hee gouerned them both excellently and wiſely. He ordained many good and profitable Lawes, and encloſed the Citty of Prage with ſtrong walles, performing many other notable things.

Great Tamberlaine, whoſe woorthie deeds are in ſome meaſure before remembred, was but a Heardſman at his beginning. The valiant and vertuous Captain, Father to Frances Sforza, whoſe ſons and ſucceſſors euen to our time, haue continued Dukes of Millaine, was borne in a poore Villaine, called Cotignol, and Son to a needie labouring man. But being naturally addicted to Armes, and endued with a dauntleſſe ſpirit: hee forſooke his Fathers ſilly vocation, and followed a band of Souldiers paſsing thorough the Countrey, and ſo became a very famous Warriour.

Great Tamberlaine.

The Father to Frances Sforza, Duke of Millaine.

Caius Marius, Conſul of Rome, being iſſued of poore parents, and born in a ſilly Country Village, called Arpinum, was one of the beſt and worthieſt Warriors in his time, as is well known to the whole world; for hee was ſeauen times choſen Conſul. During which ſpace, he won many great victories, and had two magnificent triumphs in Rome.

Caius Marius Conſull of Rome.

Marcus Tullius Cicero, the Princely Father of eloquent Latine, and moſt lerned in all Diſciplines, was Conſull in Rome, and Pro-conſull in Aſia: and yet notwithſtanding, his original was from the poor Tuguriole of Arpinum, the moſt abiect & meaneſt parentage that could be. Ventidius a poore mans ſonne, was a Muleter: but leauing that baſe vocation, hee came to be of note in Cæſars warres, thorough whoſe fauours, only by his vertue and valour, he came to bee Commannder of a band of men, afterward Marſhall of the Field, next to the High Prieſt, and then Conſull of Rome.

M.T. Cicero, Conſull of Rome, and Pro-conſul in Aſia.

Ventidius a poor Muleter his rare Fortunes.

In fighting againſt the Parthians, he ouercame and triumphed ouer them; and was the firſt man that brought the moſt apparant & notable victory from them. It would require too long a labor, to ſet downe examples of meane deſcended perſons, who (thorough Learning, Vertue, and Knowledge) haue attained vnto great degrees and renowne. Virgill was no better then a poore Potters ſon; and yet he was the beſt Poet amongſt the Latines. Q. Horace, Euſtatius, and Pepinus, all excelling in Poeſie, yet the ſonnes of enfranchiſed Bondſlaues. The admyred Phyloſopher Theophraſtus, was the Son of a Botcher, or mender of Garmentes. And Menedemus the Phyloſopher, vnto whome the Athenians erected a coſtlie Statue, onely in regard of his Learning, was a meane Handy-crafts mans Sonne. By al which examples we may eaſily perceiue, that a man of what condition ſoeuer he be borne, may (if himſelfe wil) attaine to greatneſſe, if he but followe the ſteppes of Vertue; for which there is no better Schoolemaiſter then paine & trauel; yet not wandering out of the way to Heauen. For he that ſwerueth from that only path, the acquiſition and aduantage of the worlds glorie, cannot ranſome his ſoule from perpetuall and neuer-ending torments.

Virgil a poore Potters ſonne

Horace, Euſtatius and Pepinus.

Theophraſtus and Menedemus Phyloſophers.

CHAP. XI.

Of diuers things which happened to the Emperor Iustinian, and many other of his time: with some memory also concerning Lodouicus Sforza.

Iustinian the Emperor, named by some Iustine.

IN the year 686. the Empire being reduced to Constantinople, Iustinian the 2. was chosen Emperor, albeit (by some others) he hath beene named Iustine, being but a bad Christian, and addicted to most Wicked inclinations. At the beginning of his raigne, his affaires succeeded very well, because the Sarazins (who had vsurped Affrica) made peace with his Captaines. But in regard of his cruelty, he was ill affected, so that he receiued deserued punishment. For, in the tenth yeare of his Empire, a Conspiracy was contriued against him, by Leontius a Senator of Constantinople, and Galenius the Patriark, euen at such time, as he imagined himselfe to bee in his very greatest prosperity.

A conspiracie plotted against Iustinian.

This Leontius armed with the peoples fauour, and some of the cheefest of the Empire, came to the Pallace, where without finding any resistance, he tooke Iustinian, and cut off his nose. Some others do report, that hee did cut out his tongue likewise. And entitling himselfe to be Emperor, banished Iustinian to the Towne of Cherronesus, on the Pontique Sea, where he remained alone, poor, and so disfigured. Leontius hauing thus attained vnto his owne intention, and seeing himselfe permitted Emperor in peace, he sent one of his Captains, named Iohn, into Affrica against the Sarrazins, who as yet kept possession there. Hauing gotten the victory ouer them, and left his armie there in such good order and equipage, as best he could, he returned home vnto Leontius, to render an account of his imployment.

Iustinian taken his nose cut off, and banished to Cherronesus by Leontius, who made himself Emperor.

But in the meane while, one named Asimarus, attained to some respect in the Army, and afterward was called Tiberius by the Soldiers. This man (by generall consent) taking vppon him to be Emperor, matters succeeded so happilie with him: as (with all diligence) hee came to Constantinople: where laying holde of Leontius (who had beene Emperour three yeares) he caused his Nose to be cut off, according as he had dealt with Iustinian, & commaunded him prisoner into a Monastery, to make his torment worse then death to him; and yet afterward, did put him to death also.

Asimarus, otherwise called Tiberius, chosen Emperor.

In like manner, he expulsed and banished into *Cephalenia, one named Phillippicus, because he dreamed, that an Eagle had seated her self on his head: which (by presage) appeared to him, that the Empire should come into his command. By which meanes, Tiberius continued Emperor peaceably, and raigned sixe or seauen yeares, without feare of any man. In which quiet time of gouernment, the deuill preuailed so farre with him, that hee must needs determine the death of Iustinian, as doubting least hee should deuise some machination against him. But Iustinian getting aduertisement therof, fled for safety to the house of a Prince of Barbary, by whom he was kindly entertained, with promise of his daughter in mariage, and many other great matters besides. Thus remaining there in some hope, and no further cause of feare appearing vnto him: he had secret intelligence, that his new made Father in Law, for a summe of money promised by Tiberius) meant suddenly to seize him, and sende him forthwith vnto his enemy. Which made him vndertake a second flight, & betake himselfe to the King of Bulgaria, named Ouellus, by whose assistance (hauing promised to receiue his Sister in Marriage) he leuied an Armie, which he conducted with him against Tiberius, and ouerthrew him in battaile. Which hee neuer could haue done, if Tiberius would haue permitted him to liue in quiet, without molesting him in his exile: for this now prooued Iustinians best helpe vnto the recouery of his Empire, though not of his Nose, which he had in a manner forgotten, but was vtterly hopelesse of, hauing had experience of Fortunes power, who (for all this fauour) frowned agayne on him.

*An Iland in the Ionian Sea beyond Corcyra.

The death of Iustinian deuised by Tiberius.

Iustinian to be betrayed againe, and therefore enforced to a second flight.

Beeing come vnto Constantinople, hee found Leontius there in prison, who had disfigured his face, and thrust him into ba-

Iustinian foiled Tiberius, and recouered his Empire again banishment: in requitall whereof (after many torments) he caused both him and Tiberius to be put to death; and as many times as he remembered the cutting off of his nose, one of them that had conspired against him, was sure to dy. When he was fully re integrated in his dignitie, he began to thinke vpon one thing, which was the cause of loosing his Empire againe: for he would needs haue that Philippicus put to death, of whome wee haue already spoken, that was banished for the Dreame of the Eagle, and liued quietlie in his exile, not thinking on any thing to be contriued against him.

The death of Leontius and Tiberius.

Iustinian purposeth the death of Philippicus, for his dream of the Eagle.

In like manner, he quarrelled with the Inhabitants of Cherronesus, saying; That they hadde not well entreated him in the time of his exile; and therefore, leauied men to worke his intention, albeit he was most earnestly desired, to be compassionate towardes the poore banished man, whose offence was nothing but an yule dreame; and yet he would by no meanes be disswaded. Hereupon, when Philippicus perceiued the Emperour to bend himselfe against Cherronesus, like a man wholly desperate, euen on meere constraint, he tooke courage to defend himselfe: and hauing no other remedie, with so many men as he could assemble togither, hee went against Iustinian, vanquished him in fight, and cut off both his head and his Sonnes; which being done, banished as he was, hee made himselfe Emperor.

Phillipicus resolued to defend himself, & cutteth off Iustinians hed and his Sons.

In this manner, it pleased Fortune to play with Iustinian, vntill she had bereft him both of life and Empire. And the very same successe she bestowed on Philippicus; for at the end of sixe months, one, named Anastasius, arose against him; and after he had pluckt out his eyes, he tooke the Empire from him, retaining it in his owne possession. And yet but for the space of a yeare only: because about that very time, another man, called Theosus, banded his power against him; and causing him to bee shorne a Monk, deprined him of the Empire also.

Anastasius taketh the Empire from Philippicus.

Thus you may see, how Fortune shewed her true fickleneſse, both with Iustinian and diuers other, in making exiles Emperors, & Emperors exiles, restoring to the dispossessed, more then they had before; that her despoyle of them might bee the more notable, prouing in the end cruell to them all; not dooing anie good to one, in regard of the euill endured by each other; for from some shee tooke that which shee gaue to others, to take away all from them in the conclusion.

A true testimonie of Fortunes fraitie, both in Iustinian & others

At the beginning, she would bestowe but little on them, vntill shee had lifted them vp to lofty estates; and shee exalted them the higher, to make their downfall the lower; giuing them aboundance, because she scorned to take final things from them. She would not suffer any of them to die in his prosperity, but hee must see himselfe dispossessed of all, before he dyed. Now, albeit these Histories wer most true, and might well haue serued for other mens examples: yet, in following successe of times, euermore one or other would be climbing, and grewe desirous of Empire: As whosoeuer readeth Biondus, Platina, Antoninus, and other good Authors, may fit their owne turne, with many more like Histories.

The downfall of Great men should serue as examples to others.

Hauing thus related, howe Fortune delt with many, now I purpose to declare what course she tooke with one man only, who was Duke of Millain, named Lodowick, Brother to Galeas Sforza, Duke of Millaine, named by some John Andrea, whom he nourished and brought vp, and slew in the Church of S. Stephen in Millaine, as hee was there present at the hearing of Masse; albeit, they were both Sons to the famous Warriour, Frances Sforza.

This Lodowick was educated with his other Bretheren, in great estate and power, as beeing Children vnto one of the most Woorthy Princes of his time: and who was in like manner, a verie Famous Soldiour. By the death of Galeas, a Sonne of his (Named John, and verie young in yeares) remained his successor, in the tutelage and Gouernment of Donna his Mother; and of one, called Chico, a Native of Calabria, who hadde beene much fauoured by the father and grandfather.

The true History of Lodowick Sforza.

This Chico, immediately banished the Bretheren vnto the deceased Duke, by meanes whereof, Lodowick (being one of them) wandering as a Fugitiue thorowe straunge Countreyes, learned to tast the mutabilities of Fortune; or, to speake more truely, of the World. And indeed his griefes must needs bee great, beholding ding (at an instant, and at the verie enterance of his youth) his Brother slaine by treason, and the right of his Nephewe, which in reason he ought to administer, to be in the hand of a stranger, of base & wretched condition; in regard whereof, little assurance was to bee had of his life. Neuertheless, this Wheele turned, and he (like a man of wisedom and courage) sought the meanes of fortunes fauor and assistance, and found it. For hee entered forcibly into Millaine, and expeld thence both Bonna and Chico, whereby he continued a peaceable Gouernor of al the Fathers goods. His Nephew was so weake, and himselfe so valiant, that he ruled all, for the space of aboue xx. yeares: during which time, his great wisedom and spirit so ordered al things, that he increased the publick good both in war & peace; Millaine growing rich, feared, and well affected throughout Italy, and himselfe perticulerly very highly esteemed. He atained to great honors in the time of peace, but much more in war, especially that which the Florentines then had, against Pope Sixtus the 4. and against Ferrand, K. of Naples. In which warre the Florentines were in danger to be destroied & ruined: but the authority of Lodowicke was their speedy remedy, reducing them to peace and safety. King Ferrand also hauing lost some places in those warres, which hee had in Calabria against the Turk: he gaue him present succour both with men and money, whereby those losses were quickly recouered.

Lodowick, and his Brethren banished.

Lodowick forcibly entered into Millaine.

Lodowicke sole Gouernor aboue 20. yeares

Lodowicks great honors won in warre and peace.

By Armes likewise, hee defended the Duke of Ferrara, against the power of the Venetians, who had brought him to such extreamity, as he could no longer make resistaunce. And then the Venetians making war vpon him, he withstoode them so powerfully, as he entred into their landes, and brought it in compasse of his owne power, to agree peace with them when he pleased, and no sooner. At another time, the king of Naples being much molested by some great men of his country, that rose in rebellion against him: he lent him such aide and support, as kepte himselfe within his owne Kingdome, and al his estates. Genes rebelling against him, and Bonna his Sister in Law, hee brought them vnder his obedience: and gaue such supply to the Duke of Sauoy, (whose subiects would not endure his gouernment; that he made them obediently to submit themselues to him. Knowing also, that Pope Alexander the 6. so soone as he was elected, fell into great necessity, hee succoured him graciously with a great sum of mony. He maried the duke his nephew to the King of Naples daughter, & gaue his Neece as wife to Maximilian King of the Romaines. He reseated the Marquesse of Saluces in his estate & possessions. After all these prosperities, his nephew Iohn died, leauing a childe very young: wherefore, he as absolute Lord, by the permission of the Emperor Maximilian, entitled himselfe Duke of Millaine.

His defending the Duke of Ferrara against the Venetians.

His helpe to the King of Naples.

His aid to the D. of Sauoy.

The marriages of his nephew & niece

At this time he was aged, standing on the height of his honours and successes; when fortune began to turne her backe vpon him, and the Venetians became his enemies, in fauour of Lewes the twelfth, King of France, who pretended the Dutchy of Millaine to appertaine to him in the right of his Mother. For this cause, he had war on both sides; and although he was a very potent Prince, yet notwithstanding, either because he grew distrustfull of his people, or helde himselfe not strong enough to withstand such combustions, without the backing & assistance of some of those Princes, who had receiued from him so many helpes and good turnes; hee resolued not to attend the shocke or brunt, but taking the best Order (for all things) that hee could deuise, forsooke his estate, which in lesse then a month, was vtterly lost. And yet not long after, Fortune kindled some sparkes of hope againe; for beeing fled into Germany, hee found there such succour and assistance, as at the expiration of 5. moneths, he returned with a great army and his entraunce prooued very successefull, because he tooke many places and towns in his owne territories, and was in good hope to recouer all.

Fortune turneth hir back on him, after all his good successes, and in his age.

A flattering smile of faire hope againe.

But when he stood ready for the fight, not onely the Switzers refused the battaile; but they seized him, and deliuered him into the Frenchmens handes, who led him with them into Fraunce, where (at length) he dyed prisoner in the Castle of Loches in Touraine. It nothing auailed him, that he had been rich and mightie, for Fortune gaue him all those Glassie Felicities, to loade him (in the end) with the more greater Aduersities. These are the very best blessinges, that this

The Switzers deliuerd him to the French, and his death in Torraine.

this World can afford vs. Wherefore I say, he that hath least, and least desireth; liueth in the most contentment & assurance. O that men then would rest satisfied with such goods as they haue, making vse and seruice of them in peace, and as God hath bestowed them on them: for I haue read of diuers, who haue coueted many thinges, which (after the enioying of them) haue beene the onely cause of loosing their liues, and God knoweth best, what became of their Soules, by such extreame dealing.

He that hath little, is sure not to loose much.

CHAP. XII.

What opinion the Romaines, and others (our Ancient Predeceſſors) had of Fortune: How ſhe was numbred among the Goddes. In what forme and figure they vſed to paint her. With apparant proofe, that (among vs Chriſtians) there is no Fortune; becauſe all thinges are referred to God.

Vpon what cauſe this Chapter is induced.

BEcauſe wee haue ſhewne the inſtability of the world, by ſundry examples of men, which ſome haue falſely attributed to Fortune: I hold it fit and reaſonable, that we ſhould a little conferre in this caſe, on thoſe vanities holden by the Gentiles and Ethnickes, and afterward to conclude with Chriſtians. Among thoſe other errours, which the wiſe Philoſophers held, concerning humaine ſapience (they beeing depriued of the true and diuine) this was the chiefe and principall occaſion. For, in not knowing the cauſes whence effects proceeded, neither vnderſtanding who made and ordained them: many among them, tearmed them to be the workes of Fortune, with all ſudden happenings, and things neuer hoped, or before thought on. And yet they could not be contented to ſtay themſelues there (Fortune being nothing elſe, but a meere imagination without Eſſence) but many of them verily beleeued, that Fortune was a Diuinitie, and a particular Goddeſſe: to whom they aſcribed all humaine accidents, whether they were of proſperity, or of aduerſity. To her they referred gouernance and adminiſtration, of all things eyther good or euill. Nay, this follie tooke ſo ſtrong a head, that Virgill named her Almighty; And Cicero in his Offices, dared to vſe theſe words: What is he, who knoweth not, that the power of Fortune is moſt great equally in good and euill? Becauſe, if ſhee doe ayde vs with her proſperous winde, wee ſhall come to the iſſue of our deſires: if ſhe deale contrary, we ſhall be afflicted euen to extreamity. Saluſt, an eloquent and learned Hiſtoriographer, ſaide: Fortune is the Lady and Miſtreſſe of all thinges. Iuuenall conſented with them, ſaying; If Fortune pleaſe, of a ſimple Aduocate, thou ſhalt be made a Conſull: but if ſhe be contrary, thou ſha't of a Conſull, become a ſillie Aduocate. So that they aſcribed all powerfulneſſe to Fortune.

Virg. in lib. 8. de Aenei.

Cicero in lib. 2. Officijs.

Saluſt his opinion of Fortune.

Iuuenall his words.

And yet notwithſtanding, it is a wonderfull thing, that beeing in this opinion; they would blaſpheme ſo mightily againſt her, impoſing names and Epithites on her, which were voyd of any reuerence and honour. Pliny ſaid, Vndoubtedly, in all the world, in all places, at all houres, and by all perſons; onely Fortune is inuoked, ſhe onely is called, ſhe onely accuſed and purſued. She alone is thought vpon, commended, and blamed with iniuries and reproaches. She onely is honoured, eſteemed; yet reputed mutable, and (by ſome) blinde, vncertaine, inconſtant, treacherous, and fauourable to the vnworthy. To her ſolie, is referred all expences and receipts, and in all matters and reaſons of Mortall men, ſhe filleth vp all the Pages of our rationall book. So that, by theſe wordes, wee are in a moſt ſubiected condition, for if we ſhal repute Fortune to be a God or Goddes; we muſt thereby approoue God to be moſt vncertaine.

Plin. in lib. 2. Cap. 7.

How Fortune is both blamed and honored.

In thoſe elder daies alſo, they made Statues and Images to her, in ſundrie ſhapes and figures, according to ſuch effects as they perſwaded themſelues to be in her. Whē they attributed victorie vnto her; then they formed her ſtrong and manly, and they had a Temple likewiſe, perticularly dedicated to inuincible Fortune, which (according to Titus Linius) was built by Camillus the Conſull,

Variety of Statues and Images erected to Fortune.

The onelie ground of the Philoſophers errors.

Fortune reputed to be a Diuinity and Goddeſſe.

A Temple built to Fortune by Camillus the Consul full, with the prey and spoyle which he tooke from the Hetrurians. And long time after it was ordained, that her sollemne Feast should be celebrated, on the fiue and twentith day of Iune: because, as on that day, Hasdruball was defeated and foyled; and King Massiniſſa, a Friend to the Romaines, the selfe-same day vanquished King Siphax.

Another temple built out of Rome to Fortune.

Moreouer, the Romaines erected another Temple to her, about two little miles from Rome, where she was figured in the shape of a Woman; because in that place, Coriolanus comming in Armes against his Countrey, hauing listened to the entreaties of his Mother: became gracious, and returned, pardoning Rome, which he had formerlie determined to sacke and spoile, euen from the top to the bottome. Into this forme of a Womans mounted Statue, the deuill made his entrance, giuing answere therein many times, and so reputed to be an Oracle. They had another Temple also, which was dedicated particularly to euill Fortune, and such was their blindnesse in deuotion, as they verily beleeued, that he who was deuoutly addicted to this Fortune; all things should happen well vnto him. But hee that did the contrary, all thinges with him should turne to vnhappinesse. Of all which delusions and abusings, the Deuill onely was the Authour, to make men relye and trust on him the more confidently. As it happened to Galba, who hauing taken a Collar or Chaine of Gold from this Image of Fortune, to bestow it (as an offering) on the Goddesse Venus, as it is recorded by diuers Historians: Fortune her selfe appeared to him the night following, and threatned him, whereon (soone after) his death ensued.

A third Temple dedicated to euill Fortune.

The Deuill is the Authour of these deludings.

Galba, his taking a Chain of Gold from the Image of Fortune.

The vanitie of these people was so extreame, that they had also another Statue, of a bearded Fortune, perswading themselues; that such youthes as did hold her in veneration, should the sooner haue Beardes and comely proportion: but such as contemned her, should both want beards, and all good disposition. All these things they did, for diuersitie of respects and considerations: and yet their maine intent, was to signifie the whole power, which (according to their opinion) remained in her, and the contrarietie of her nature, they declared also in diuers kinds.

A Statue of bearded Fortune, to send young men beards.

The Philosopher Cebes, painted her in the shape of a Woman, but furious, blind, and without vnderstanding: hauing her feete placed vppon a round stone, thereby to demonstrate her instabilitie. Vupalus was the first in Greece, that made an Image to Fortune in the Citty of Smyrna: she had the Heauens ouer her head, and in one of her hands a Horne of aboundance. The Scythians made her a Woman without feete, hauing (neuertheleſſe) handes and wings. Others figured her with the stearne or guide of a Shippe in one of her hands, and in the other a Cornucopia: inferring thereby, that she gouerned all thinges, and graunted blessings to the World. Others made her of Glasse; because she was fraile, and broken in pieces with the least mischance.

Cebes his figure of Fortune.

Vupalus his picture of Fortune.

The Scythians Fortune.

Diuers shapes and figures of Fortune.

There were others, who painted her turning a Wheele, on the top whereof some were seated; others climbing to get vp, and others thrown down quite vnderneath it. One tearmed her to be like a Comedie, wherein some persons entred (one white) like Kings and great Lords, and presently changing their Garments, entred againe like Slaues & Seruants: because our humaine life is gouerned in like manner, for men are to day rich and pompous, but to morrow poore, abiect, and miserable. Socrates compared her to a publike place, or disordered Theater, wherein many times it commeth to passe, that the best persons sit in the worst places. Those of ancient times, describe her to be blind, and, to that purpose, Apuleius hath these words in his Golden Asse. Not without cause, did men of old learning, paint Fortune to be blinde: considering, she continually bestoweth riches on peruerse people, & such as are vnworthy of them, neuer making any good election among men; but most commonly fauoureth and communicateth her selfe to wicked people, whom (if she had eyes) she would fly and shunne.

Compared to a Comedy.

Socrates his comparison of Fortune.

Apuleius in his Golden Asse, concerning Fortune.

There are an infinite number of authorities, which might bee produced, concerning the good and bad names attributed to Fortune. Valerius and Claudian called her Enuious. Ouid in his Fasts tearmeth her strong and doubtfull; and in his Epistles, wicked. Iuuenall in his Satires, Valerius Maximus. & Claudian. Ouid in Fast. Iuuenal in Sat.

Satires, calleth her Vile and peruerse. Lucian, Traitresse and periured. Siluius Italicus, Craftie and subtile. Virgil in one place, calleth her Omnipotent; and elsewhere he raileth on her, saying; Shee is Inconstant, faithlesse, and disloyall Cicero, of whom we haue already spoken, and who attributed vnto her so much power as to entile her; The Guide and conduct of Men in liuing well: saith yet beside, That there is nothing so contrarie to reason and constancie, as Fortune is. And yet neuertheless, the vanity of the ancient Romaines was so great, that they would adore her, whom they knew to be blind, false, and inconstant, building Temples to her. And so curious were they in imployment of their superstitions; that the Emperours of Rome kept the Image of Fortune, in the very same Chambers where they vsed to sleepe: and when any of them dyed, shee was transported from his Chamber, into that of his Successour.

Lucian.

Cicero in lib. de Orat.

The vanities of the ancient Romaines.

The superstition of the Romaine Emperours.

The first that erected a Temple to her in Rome (according as Titus Liuius declareth) was Seruius Tullius, sixt King of the Romaines. Yet Plutarch, in his Booke of the Romaines Fortune, saith (of virile or manly Fortune) That albeit Martius, fourth King, was the first that builded a Temple to her: yet it was Seruius Tullius, that imposed many names on her, for each of which names, they made her a Temple. One to manly Fortune; others to little Fortune; prosperous Fortune; aduerse or bad Fortune; and to triumphant Fortune, with other such like names.

Seruius Tullius Plutarc. in Lib. de Rom. Fort.

The names of Fortunes temples.

The Temple of virile or manly Fortune, was builded neere to the Riuer of Tyber, and (according to some others) hard by a Lake or Poole. In this Temple, all such Maides as were of marriageable yeares, came and presented themselues in great deuotion, despoyling themselues into their Smocks, before the Statue of Fortune. If they had any blemishes or imperfections on their bodies, they would discouer them vnto her: beleeuing verily, that Fortune would keepe them hidden and concealed, and order the matter in such sort, that such as were to enioy them in mariage, should neuer perceiue them; this is testified by Ouid in his Fasts, & much more beside.

The Temple of manly Fortune, for marriageable maides.

Ouid in lib. de Fast.

Now, as the power of the Romains grew to encrease and enlarge it selfe, so much the more was this Religion of Fortune aduanced; and still new Temples were builded to her, answerable to such names as wer imposed on her: not onely in Rome, or there-about, but likewise in diuers Countries of Italie. This then must be our conceipt, that not only these vanities, but many more which might be discouered to this effect: were meere deceiuings, and deluding of men walking in darknesse, confiding onelie in their owne knowledge and wisdome. For, according to truth, all things that can bee done in the vniuersall World, be it in Earth or in Heauen, yea, or in Hell: they proceed from the vnsearchable prouidence, and supreame wisedome of God. They ensue neither by Fortune, Chance, or Aduenture: for all things haue their being in him, and so are continued in their course and order.

The enlarging of Fortunes religiō.

How men are to iudge according to truth.

Moreouer, be it that among vs men, (thorough want of knowledge and vnderstanding oftentimes) some causes are begotten of others, which come not by accidentall Chance: yet in the end, all thinges make their stay on the first and chiefest cause, which is God, the Motiue, Maker, and Gouernour of them all, and this is that truth, which ought to bee beleeued, knowne, and held, by euery true and faithfull Christian.

God the motiue, maker & gouernour of all things.

Lactantius Firmianus, wisely mocked such men, as attributed the accidents of this World to Fortune. And Saint Augustine in his Retractions, denyeth that, which (by common manner of speaking) he had formerly attributed to Fortune, concerning the happy successe of a man. In the same place also, he commendeth Dauid, because hee ascribed all his tribulations to the iudgment of God: and so ought euery Christian to hold, that all thinges still doe proceede from God.

Lactantius Firmianus.

Aug. in lib. de Retract.

Many of the Ancients had some tast of this truth, for Salust could say: Euery man is the principall cause and motiue of his owne Fortune. And in his Proheme to the Warre of Iugurth, he saith. Sloathfull and negligent persons, make their complaint on Fortune, without any occasion. Iuuenall in his tenth Satire, speaketh more

The words of Salust. In Prohem. Bel. Iugurt.

Iuue in Sat. 10.

cleare-

clearely: That where Prudence is, Fortune hath no power or dignity, although we make her to be a Goddesse, and extoll her to the Heauens. Other Philosophers there were, who although they said; That Fortune (of her owne proper vertue and power) could not do any thing: yet they credited, that she was the Minister and Instrument of the Diuine prouidence; as if God should stand in neede of some other, to performe his workes for him, which is no lesse vaine, then those opinions before recited, and others that might be heere remembred, which I auoyd for prolixities sake.

The opinion of some Philosophers.

Neuertheless, I could wish that simple Christian people (too ignorant in many thinges) would forsake that bad Custome which they haue held ouer long: in making their complaint on Fortune, when any thing happeneth contrary to their hope or expectation. For it is an infallible rule, that there is not any thing whatsoeuer; but God is the only disposer thereof, and recourse should be made to none but him, in all our wordly wants and necessities.

An aduise to ignorant Christians.

CHAP. XIII.

That ouer and beside the properties of Elementary thinges; There are great store of other concealed and wonderfull properties, which be not of the Elements.

SOme of the ancient Philosophers, hauing discouered by their knowledge, infinite properties and vertues of herbs, Plants, & Stones, I speak of those which the Spirit and industry of Men could hardly attaine vnto, but that necessitie, and time (ioyned with experience) haue declared, and from whence so many remedies and benefits haue descended; In regard also, that humain vnderstanding neuer taketh rest, or can bee satisfied in perfectly knowing things, vntil it reach also their causes and reasons, and beholdeth their qualities and effects: It hath therefore beene the occasion, that men haue made narrow search, and dyuing into their originall, from whence such power and vertues should ensue, and haue found (in this contemplation) certaine occasions, which they could know and vnderstand, consisting particularly, on some naturall principles and apprehensions, of the qualities of the Elements, whereof all inferiour things are composed. And such are the causes and properties of those thinges, which we call Elementary; as to make hot, to coole, to moysten, and to dry, which name themselues, as principall or first qualities.

The naturall qualities of the Elements in their seuerall degrees.

Desires and affections in men, are sildome capable of any rest.

These Philosophers did likewise know, that these proceeded from the foure Elements; Water, Earth, Ayre, and Fire, whose qualities are Colde, Drought, Moysture, and Heat. There are beside, sundry other qualities in things, which they knew also to deriue themselues of the Elements, and by the mixtion of them; and they were named second qualities: As one thing had the property to asswage; another to mollifie; sundry other in their kindes; to strengthen; to comfort; to be sweet or sower. Which forces or properties, are found in thinges composed of the foure Elements, although they know none of the foure Elements simply; but because the commixture of them causeth such properties.

Other deriuations of the Elements, tearmed second qualities

Therefore, such men as did vnderstand whence the causes proceeded, did hold them for cleare and certaine. Neuertheless, there are other proprieties and vertues in thinges, which name themselues concealed and meruailous: because no man knoweth from whence they come, neither is their reason any way vnderstood. Howbeit, a Man may plainely perceiue, that they deriue not themselues from the Elementary qualities: and of such thinges as these wee purpose to speake, as of matters most desired, and least apprehended. We see that the Adamant or Load-stone, otherwise called the Calamite, exalteth peeces of Iron and Steele from the ground, which doe poize the fourth part of his weight; as any occasion may easily make manifest, although we well know, that this quality proceedeth not of the Elements.

Of other secret and wonderful things, not knowne from whence they proceed.

Example of the Adamant, Loadstone, or Calamite, which hath no elementary quality.

It is neither the heat of Fire, which causeth causeth it, nor the drineſſe of the earth; but another hidden and ſecret vertue. Moreouer, this Calamite Stone, hath not this propertie perticular to it ſelfe, but dooth communicate it to other things.

To approue the truth heereof, if one whet the point of a Knife thereon, the point receiueth and pertaketh ſo much of his vertue; as it will take vp a Naile, a Needle, or ſome other ſmall peece of Iron or Steel, without any touch (then) of the ſtone it ſelfe. In like manner, a Needle touched with this Stone, receiueth another meruaylous propertie, for being at his owne liberty; it prepareth and turneth it ſelfe towardes the Pole Articke, or Northerne Region. Vpon which occaſion, Marriners did inuent the vſe of the Compaſſe, not knowing how or whence that this vertue commeth.

Of a Needle touched by the Adamant ſtone.

It is knowne likewiſe for a thing moſt certaine, that a very little Fiſh, called in Greeke * Echeneis, and in Latine Remora, if it cleaue faſt to the Keele of a ſhip (though it float neuer ſo faſt vnder ſaile:) it with-holdeth it from ſtirring, and will not let it goe. And yet wee know it a matter impoſſible, that this can be done by ſtrength of Man: neyther can this Fiſh (beeing ſo ſmall of it ſelfe) doe it by any power it hath; but by ſome hidden vertue and propertie. Agarick, purgeth Phlegme; Rubarbe, dryeth and expelleth Choller; and the Hearb called Epythimon, cleanſeth away Melancholly, yet no man knoweth, frō whence theſe concealed vertues doe proceede.

* A Sackſtone or Sea Lamprey, a verie ſmall Fiſh, that can hold a ſhip a floating vnder ſayle.

Of Agaricke, Rubarbe, and Epithymon, purgatiue Drugges.

If I ſhall be anſwered, the reaſon enſueth, becauſe theſe Drugges are hot: it ſhould then as well follow, that Orpiment (which is hot alſō) ſhould work the like effect: and yet we ſee, that (of his owne Nature) it heateth and reſtricteth. The Oſtridge eateth and conſumeth Iron, and that by ſome ſecret property, and not in regard of her heat: for the Lyon is much more hotter, and yet cannot doe it. Quailes do feed on Helleborus, without receiuing any hurt at all thereby; and yet if other Birds do eate thereof, they die immediatlie. Fire burneth and conſumeth all things: and yet we read it (and auouched by good Authours) that the Salamander, and a Fly, named by the Greekes Pyraſta, by ſome ſecret in Nature; Fire is to them both life and nouriſhment. I read, that a man, if hee haue a Dogge with him, and doe ſmite an Adder once, hee dyeth: but if he ſtrike a ſecond blow, the reuiueth againe.

Orpiment.

The Oſtridge eateth and digeſteth Iron.

Quailes eate Helleborus.

The Salamander, and the Fly Pyraſta.

Of the Adder

The Iaſper, and ſome other Stones, haue the power to ſtench bleeding. The precious Stone called a Carbuncle, gliſtereth, and brightly ſhineth in night and darkneſſe. The Iacinth (according to ſome Writers) is good againſt thunder and lightning. The Turqueis is helpfull, to keep a man from caſuall falling: For, by breaking it ſelfe againſt the Liuer Veine, it preſerueth the man from any harme. The Diamond is good for Weomen great with Childe. Now, if demaund be made, from whence ariſeth all theſe admirable properties, few Men (I am perſwaded) can make any anſwere.

Of ſundry precious ſtones, and their vertues.

In theſe powers and properties ſo ſecret and wonderfull, there is another thing worthy of conſideration to wit; that ſome of theſe thinges, do containe the power wholly in the matter alleaged, and in part. According as we haue ſpoken of the Fiſh Echeneis, or Remora, that is able to retain the ſwifteſt courſe of a Shippe: this is not proper to any one part of the Fiſh, but to the whole body. In like manner, the ſhaddow of the Hyenna maketh the Hounds hoarſe and broken voyced: but it is to bee vnderſtood, that it is the ſhaddow of the whole body, and not any part thereof. There are other things, whoſe properties conſiſt not onely in whole, but alſo in part. As the Hearb Selandine (tearmed in French Eſclere) which is good for the ſight, both in whole and in part; the roote being as good, as the Leaues and Seedes. Of other thinges, there are ſome that haue theſe ſecret vertues in part only by it ſelfe; as we read concerning the eyes of a Wolfe, if they firſt behold a man, before he do behold the Beaſt, the Man becommeth hoarſe and wheezing.

The power of theſe properties conſiſting wholly in the thing, and not in part.

Not onely in the whole, but alſo in part.

In part onely, and not all.

The Hyenna alſo, hath a particular property in his eyes: for, if he looke on a Beaſt, ſeated any where to reſt himſelfe: the looke onely maketh the beaſt ſleepy, and ſo drouſie headed, as he hath no ability to ſtirre himſelfe. The Baſi-

liske

liske onely hath poyſon in his eyes, and killeth with his very ſight. It it ſaide, that the Hart of a Dogge hath this property, that if a man beare it about him; it cauſeth all Dogges to auoid and ſhun him. And the Gaule of a Goat beeing put into a Veſſell of Braſſe, and ſet in a place where Frogges and Paddocks are; they will all preſently gather about it.

The Hart of a Dog.

The Gaule of a Goat.

Here we are further to obſerue, that ſome one of theſe thinges, and namely in Beaſts; do not containe the property, but while they are liuing, and then by death they are loſt: yet ſome others do continue after death. As the Eagle, who in her life time is victorious ouer all Birdes or Fowles: likewiſe after death, her Feather being put among others, it deuoureth and conſumeth them. The Skinne of a Lyon, ſpoyleth the Skinnes of other Beaſtes: And the Skinne of a Wolfe, eateth and conſumeth the Skinne of a Lambe. We behold alſo in Hearbes, that after they are withered and dryed; yet they ceaſe not to keepe and preſerue their properties. Theſe vertues, and diuers other, haue both beene ſeene and knowne by mens curious Inquiſition, who yet haue refuſed to tearme them ſecret or concealed vertues, becauſe they did not hold them for certaine: albeit they had made good experiment of them, and no one of them could deliuer the cauſe, whence any of theſe vertues ſhould proceede.

Properties in ſome thinges, during life, & in others after death.

What vertues men haue found by ſearch, they will not confeſſe.

Alexander Aphrodiſeus, in the beginning of his Problemes, tearmeth them Vnknowne Vertues, ſaying moreouer: That they are knowne to God onely, the Authour of all thinges. There are likewiſe ſome other writers, who haue diſcourſed on the properties of diuers thinges, making the cauſes of them, to bee as matters out of their knowledge; and of this minde were Theophraſtus, Dioſcorides, Iſaac the Iew, and many others. And yet notwithſtanding, there were others beſide, who being loath to confeſſe their ignorance in theſe thinges; gaue them yet ſome originall, but were very different in their opinions. Plato and the Academickes, attributed the originall of this vertue, to the Idea of all thinges immediatly; which they intended to be God, as the Originall, beginning and firſt cauſe of all. Other naturall Philoſophers, attributed the cauſes of theſe operations, to Celeſtiall Spirits, or Angels.

Alexan. Aphro. in Problem.

Theophraſtus. Dioſcorides. Iſaac. Iudaic.

The opinion of Plato and the Scholiſts.

Naturall Philoſophers.

Albertus Magnus thinketh it to come, from the eſpeciall forme and ſubſtance of each thing: whereto conſenteth Leonardus Camillus, in his ſecond Booke of the Myrror of Stones. Hermes, and many other Aſtrologers, with whom alſo ioyneth Marſillius Phicinus; attributing the whole power to the Starres and Celeſtiall figures. And this is the moſt common opinion which wee follow now adaies: although it appeareth that they hold one opinion by conformity of ſubiect, arreſting all vpon God, who is the firſt cauſe and Creator of all things.

Albert. Magnus.

Leonard. Camillus.

Marſilius Phicinus.

But returning to our Starres and Planets, which are the Inſtruments and Gouernors of this neather World: for theſe ſecrets and perticular properties whereof we haue ſpoken, ſhould ſeeme to forme their deriuation thence. It is then to be vnderſtood, that theſe ſecret powers in thinges, are in a like manner diuers and variable, as they be ſubiected to diuers and variable Starres and celeſtial Images. Becauſe that of the ſundry natures and forces of influction, which the Starres haue with their light (conſidering the Celeſtiall motion in inferious thinges, which perticularly they are ſubiected vnto) the particular excellencies in any thing is cauſed. And therby moreouer happeneth, that one thing may haue two vertues, and ſecret properties, onely by the influence of diuers Starres. And theſe powers beeing ſo ſinguler, doe worke the much greater effectes and efficacy; when the elementary qualities of the thinges, are not thereto repugnant and contrary. And becauſe examples will make theſe matters the more cleare and euident; wee will giue ye a taſt of ſome. But whoſoeuer is deſirous of further information; let him read Porphyrius, Sineſius, Marſilius Phicinus, Leonardus Camillus, in his Mirrour of Stones, Cornelius Agrippa, Albertus Magnus, and others.

The ſtars and Planets, Gouernours of our lower World.

The diuerſity of Natures in the ſtars, cauſeth diuerſity of vertue in things.

The Elementarie qualities not repugnāt.

Marſil. Phicin. in lib. de trip. vit.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

Of many meruailous properties in sundrie things; And to what Stars and Planets they are subiected naturally.

The vertue of Saffron receiued from the Sunne.

FIrst of all, we will speak of Saffron, which hath the power to awake or rouse vp dull spirits, and his vertue goeth immediatly to the hart, procuring ioy, gladnesse, and smiles. It is saide, that these properties are imparted thereto, by particular influence of the Sun, wherto it is subiect: and by him therefore is assisted, thorow his subtile nature, splendant and Aromaticall. Mirrhe, Incense, Balme, wood of Aloes, Spikenard, these also are subiect to the sun. It is said moreouer, that Gold, in being of the nature of the Sun; hath therefore the vertue, to comfort and glad the hart, & to be shining. The same Sun also giueth vertue to the Carbunckle, to be so splendant in the night, and to bee powerfull against poyson. The propertie which the Iacinth hath, against thunder and lightning, is held to proceede from the influence of the Planet Iupiter: for which cause it hath beene thought very conuenient, that a man should alwaies carry it about him. The Eagle-stone, beeing commonlie found in an Eagles nest, among al other vertues, is meruailously proper for women great with Child, and at the time of their deliuerance: which is occasioned by the vertue of Venus, and of the Moon; and Rasis affirmeth, that he hath made experiment thereof. If a man be but touched with the hearbe Piony, otherwise called Kinges-bloome, or Rose of the Mount, especially of that which is the Male: the party so touched, shall be defended from the falling sicknes. And this onely commeth by the Sunnes influence, to whom this hearb is alwaies subiect. The Corall, and the Chalcidony, which is a kind of Onix-stone, doe contain the selfe-same efficacy, thorow the perticular influences of Iupiter and Venus.

Other things subiect to the Sunne.

Gold.

The Carbuncle.

The Iacinth, by Iupiter.

The Eagle-stone by Venus and the Moone.

The Hearbe Pyony, by the Sunne.

Corall and Chalcidony, by Iupiter and Venus.

By the vertue of the Sun, and which it communicateth to Ginger: it is receiued among meates, and is very proper against weaknesse and emptinesse of the stomacke. Iupiter lendeth vertue to Sage, and maketh it soueraigne against the Palsie. Those beasts which are subiect to the Sunne, and doe receiue influence from him: are courageous and valiant, affecting superiority and dominion ouer others. Among whom is the Lyon, much more then all the rest; the Crocodile and the Bull, and according as one Planet or one Starre yeildeth aduantage of influence more then another, either vppon beast, or any other thing: euen so is the influxion thereby receiued of superiority in excellency, either in beasts or other things subiected to this Planet. And therefore you may note, how it hapneth to the Lyon, of whom we haue already made relation, that he standeth in feare of the Cock, & flyeth from him. The reason is, because they are both subiect to the Sunne, and the Cocke is superiour in that order or degree, by meanes whereof, he danteth the Lyon. The power and vertue of the Adamant, is infused by the Celestiall Image, cald Vrsa minor, or Charles waine, which containeth seauen and twentie Stars. Now, because Steele is subiect to these Stars, and the stone is by them more qualified, or raised into the higher degree: it vrgeth thence the sufficiency of moving or attracting, and so by Vrsa Minor is this vertue imparted vnto the Stone.

Some do hold, that the Eagle is subiect to the sun; others say, to Iupiter, & that this perperty is deriued from Iupiter, that it can (at no time) bee smitten with lightning or thunder. But if we speak of the cause concerning the Sun, & his influence: then she is said to haue another wonderful property; which is, to be chiefe Lady; to make all other Birds stand in feare of her, and to haue the most pure, cleare, and perfect sight beyond all other. Beside, that her Feathers should consume them of other Fouls, whensoeuer they are mingled together. The Moone imparteth as much vertue, to the stone cald Selenitis, which is found in Arabia, whereof Plinie speaketh, saying; Within the body of this Stone, the Moon apparantly sheweth her selfe, and increa-

Ginger, by vertue of the Sunne.

Sage, by Iupiter.

Beasts subiected to the sun, and how they receiue their vertues.

The Lyon & the Cocke, both subiect to the Sunne.

The Adamãt, subiect to Vrsa Minor.

Opinions concerning the Eagle, by the Sunne, or by Iupiter.

The Stone Selenitis, gouerned by the Moone. Plin. in lib. 9. Cap. 3.

increaseth or decreaseth, as shee doth her course in Heauen.

Of Cats, subiect to the Moone.

Cats haue a peculiar property by domination of the Moone, that the haires which grow on their eye-edges, do increase or decrease euery day, according to the diurnall course of the Moon, and her aspects: as any man may apparantly behold, at what time he pleaseth to make proofe thereof. Among the very worthiest Stones of the Sunne, that which hath the most power, is the stone called Pantaurus, which is reported to be first found by Apollonius Thianeus. The Sun giueth such force and vertue to this Stone; that it draweth all other Stones vnto it, euen as the Adament doth Steele or Iron: and hee that beareth this Stone about him, cannot sustaine any harme by poyson. It is saide moreouer, that this one Stone hath included in it, the properties and vertues of all other Stones. Pliny, and all the rest doe affirme, that the Stone called Acates, by the domination of Mercury, helpeth greatly his eye-sight that carrieth it about, causing him to speake freely and liberallie, and yet it is wholly poyson. Mercury in like manner, by influxion which he bestoweth on some Beastes, that are subiected to him, as Dogges, Apes, Foxes, and other such like, enudeth them with wonderfull vnderstanding, craft, and subtilty.

Pantaurus the most excellēt stone of the Sun, a preseruatiue against poyson.

The Stone Acates, subiect to Mercury.

Beasts subiected to Mercury.

The Palme and the Laurell or Bay-Tree, are likewise subiected to the Sun, and from him doe receiue their perticuler properties; against lightning, tempests, and stormes, as also against all venimes and poysons. By the same occasion, the Ywe, Cedar, and the Ashtrees, are proper against venimes, and doe hold their perfect greeneneſſe all the yeare long. In like manner, the Stone, called Heliotropium, whereof Pliny and many other do report wonderful things; to wit, that it prolongeth life, and that it maketh a man constant and verie well willed; moreouer, that it can cause a man to walk inuisible: all these properties are deriued vnto it by influence of the Sun.

The Palme & Laurell, subiect to the Sunne.

The Stone Heliotropium, subiect to the Sunne.

The Iacinth Stone, by communication of the Sune, to whom it is perticularly subiect, and also to Iupiter, if a man doe beare it about him, and touch his flesh there-with neuer so little: it defendeth and preserueth him from all poysons, as also against al euill vapours and corrupted ayres. It gladeth and comforteth the Hart and Spirit, and is reputed beside, to make Men or Weomen very amiable, and well enclined. There is likewise another kind of Iacinth, named the Chrysolite, which shineth with a golden colour quite thorow, and partaketh of the Suns vertue: it is also very good against frenzy or madneſſe, melancholly humours, as also against strange imaginations and euill visions. The Scarabe, which is otherwise commonly called the Beetle-flye, a little old Creature, is maruelously subiect to the Moon, and thereof is found both written, and by experience: That she gathereth or maketh little pellets, or little round bals, of Mens Excrements, and therein encloseth her young Egges, keeping the Pellets hid in the ground eight and twenty daies; during which time the Moone maketh her course, & the nine and twentith day shee taketh them foorth, and then hideth them againe vnder the Earth. Then, at such time as the Moone is conioyned with the Sunne, which wee vsually tearme the New Moone: they all issue forth a-liue; and flye about. The Moone also hath Sbueraignety and dominion ouer many thinges, and particularly on such as are white and greene, and (among Mettals) ouer Siluer especially. For this cause, all Trees (in the encreasing and waine of the Moone) doe extend or shut vp their moysture and strength. Also, all Birdes or Fowles, which haunt and liue in Riuers, or Marishes and marine places, are subiect to the Moone. And likewise the Camelion, who receiueth (from her) his property of changing, and altring into such colours as are laid before or neere him.

The Chrysolite to the Sunne.

The Scarabe-Fly, subiect to the Moone

Coniunction of the Sunne with the Moone.

The Moones power ouer thinges white and greene.

The properties of Myrabolanes are infinite. They doe nourish and preserue the life of all such as shall often eate them. They prolong youth; strengthen the senses and Spirits of Man; causing quickneſſe of memorie; comforting the stomacke; and chearing the heart. All these guifts and vertues, doe proceede from the Planets Iupiter and Mercurie, according as it is testified by very many learned and great personages. The Iasper stone, by influence of the

The Iacinth, to the Sunne and Iupiter.

The East-Indian Plum, called a Myrabolane Plum, subiect to Mercury & Iupiter.

The Iasper stone, subiect to Saturne.

the Planet Saturne, hath the power and vertue to mittigate and remooue the prickings of the Flesh; and to stay excesse of bleeding at the Nose, or any wound receiued. Heere might wee enter into a much larger discourse, of many other properties (verie strange, great, and mernailous) and singuler qualities, both of Stones and other things, which the seauen Planets, and principall Starres (being in the Orbes of the Heauens) doe graunt by their influence to thinges heere beneath. But those which wee haue already related, shall serue and suffice. And now, we will proceede, to speake of such vertues in certain things, as do ensue from the fixed Starres of the eight Heauen, which haue great domination and power ouer those thinges, that partake with such qualities, which the other Planets giue influence vnto.

Concerning the fixed stars of the eyght Heauen.

Medusaes head, subiected to Iupiter and Saturne.

The Starre called Medusaes head, yeildeth force and vertue to the Diamond, and to the Hearbe called Mugworte, or Saint Johns Hearbe: causing them that carry them about them, to be bold and hardy of heart and Spirit; and this Starre is of the nature of Iupiter and Saturne. The Starres, named the * Pleiades, haue power ouer Christall, and ouer Fennell-seede: And thence it ensueth, that these are comfortable and beneficial to the eye-sight, because that these Starres are Lunarie and Martiall. The selfe-same Hearbe Mugworte, Mandrake, or Mandragon; Mint or Munts; the Saphire and the Rubie, doe receiue their influence from the Goate-Starre; and it is saide, that whosoeuer weareth them in Ringes or otherwise, shall bee pleasing and amiable.

*The seauen Stars, subiect to the Moone and Mars.

The Saphire and Ruby, to the Goat.

The vertue whereof we haue last spoken, is likewise imparted to the Agate Stone: and it is reported to proceede also, from another Celestiall Image, called the Little Dogge. The vertue of the Emeralde, and of Sage, is communicated vnto them by the Virgines-Starre, or the Starre that appeared at Christs birth. The power of the Stone Celidonius, of Celandine, and of Matticke, to represse mellanchollie humours; commeth from the Starre called the Lyons Hart, or the Royall Starre, which is of the Nature of Iupiter and Mars. The Blood Stone, receiueth his vertue of staying or stanching bleeding, from the Starre called Artameth, or Bootes in Greeke. The Topase Stone, and the Trefoyle or Three-leaued grasse, which containe the property of Chastity, to represse the Flesh, and to cause ioyfulnesse in the bearer of them: doe receiue their vertue from the Starre named Alpheta, or the Septentrionall Crowne; being of the nature of Venus, and of Mars. The Amatist, and the Hearbe called Aristologie, or Aristolochia Sarmentitia, Saracens Hearbe, commonly tearmed Long Hartwort, or Birtworte, and Saffron also; doe cause a faire complexion, and viuacity of Spirit in him that beares them about him, and are said to be the meanes of chasing away euill Spirits. All which vertues are imparted to them, by the Star cald the Scorpions Hart, of the nature of Iupiter and Mars.

The Blood, to Bootes.

The Topase and Trefoile, to the Northerne crown

The Amatist and Aristology, to the Scorpions hart.

By these examples then, concerning the secret properties of thinges, which proceede not from the Elements, but by the influence of Starres they ought to bee highlie esteemed, and not misprized; especiallie, because they haue beene written by such worthy men, and approoued by good experience. We likewise read in the third Booke of Kinges, and in the eight Chapter of Wisedome; that Salomon knew the occasion of thinges, the Natures of Creatures, and the vertue of Hearbes. Iosephus also (because I would not be ouer-long) writes in his Booke of the Iewes Warres, of a Roote named Barharas, growing neere vnto a place called Mecheranta, and saith, that it shineth in the night time like fire, and hath the vertue to cure such as are possessed with Spirits, beside diuers other excellents properties.

None of these proceeding from the Elements.

Ioseph. in lib. de Bel. Iudaic.

A Roote that cureth men possessed with Spirits.

The stone Celidonius, Celandine, and Matticke, to the Lyons heart.

But there is so much labour bestowed in the gathering thereof, as verie few or none can attaine vnto it; because although they see and discerne it a farre off: yet notwithstanding, when they approach neere vnto it, they can neyther take or touch it. And yet by much endeauer (making experience of that which the Deuill, or rather the Angell pleased to discouer) it grew to be found out, that a man, bathing himselfe ſelfe in the Vrine of a Woman, when ſhe ſpendeth her floures; might both touch, take, and gather it. Neuertheleſſe, he that thus tooke it vp, was ſure to dye, except he carried ſuch another like Root thither with him. Or, for his greater ſafety, when hee ſhould ſee the root (after bathing as before is ſaid) he muſt dig the earth round about it, and faſtning a ſtrong Cord about the root; binde a Dogge as faſt to the other end thereof, who ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſtrictly hampered, with ſtrugling and ſtriuing would plucke vp the Root, and then die immediatly. This beeing thus done, any man might then ſafely come to it, and make vſe thereof for his beſt ſeruice. The Authors that doe auouch the truth of theſe things, are they whom I haue alleaged in the former Chapter, and many others beſide, of whom I ſpare to ſpake, to auoyde tedioufneſſe.

A dangerous aduenturing to gather the root.

CHAP. XV.

¶ That brute Beaſts haue enſtructed many Men, in ſundry Medicines, and Remedies for hurts receiued; And in the properties of great ſtore of other thinges.

Beaſts intelligent in curing their owne harmes.

IT is no matter deſerning meruaile, if men haue attained to the knowledge of the properties of things: conſidering that beaſts (by meere naturall inſtinct) are very skilfull in the knowledge alſo of many things, which they can apply to themſelues as cures and Medicines. Nay, we may preſume to ſay further, that Beaſts haue ſhewen and declared Medicines to men; by beholding how they haue healed themſelues, and found out their owne Remedies, without other helpes. Notwithſtanding, we al know wel enough, that men neither could, or can skill of any cures; but ſuch as they haue heard of, and learned from others that went before them.

Plin. in lib. 10. Cap. 7.

In regard whereof, Pliny had good cauſe to ſay: That men ought to be thankfull to Beaſtes, for many medicines and remedies, which they haue learned of them. The hart firſt ſhewed vs, that the hearb called Dittanie, or Dittander, is good to draw out an Arrow-head, or the pieces of the Shaft, when he is wounded there-with: becauſe the Hart himſelfe (being ſo hurt) vſeth it as his onely remedy. Ariſtotle ſaith, that the Wilde Goats of Candie doe obſerue the verie ſame. Harts alſo, when they are bitten or ſtung by a venomous kinde of Spiders, called Phalanges; they heale themſelues by eating Creuiſſes, though other do hold, that it is by an Hearb growing in the water. The property of the hearb Celandine, otherwiſe called Eſclere, was taught vs by Swallowes, to be apt and conuenient for our eye-ſight; becauſe they make vſe thereof, to the eyes of their young ones.

Dittany, cald Garden Ginger.

Ariſt. in lib. de Anim. Cap. 11.

Spiders called Phalanges.

Celandine for the eye ſight.

The Tortoiſe, by eating wilde Marierome, defendeth himſelfe againſt Serpents: and thereby the property of the Hearbe was firſt found and knowne, to be good againſt poyſon. The Weezell eateth Rew, or Hearb-Grace, when he purpoſeth to fight with Rats. Wilde Boares doe heale all their diſeaſes or harmes, with feeding on Iuy, or the Hearbe called Ale-Hoofe, and ſome ſay on Creuiſſes; eſpecially ſuch as the Sea throweth vp on the ſhoare. The Snake or Adder, to diſpoile himſelfe of his writhen skinne; keepes in the earth (in the Winter time) feeding on nothing but the iuyce of Fennel. And to cleare his eye-ſight, which he hath much impaired and offended, by being ſo long vnder-ground in darkneſſe; he rubbeth and ſtreaketh his eyes vppon Fennell, which the Greekes called Marathrum, that both reſtoreth and cleareth his eie-ſight, and thereby may the vertue of this Hearb be wel known. The Bear being poyſoned by the Hearbe named Mandragoras, Mandrake, or Mandragon; doth purge his body by the eating of Ants or Piſmires. There is no Hearbe, how venomous ſoeuer it bee, that can hurt the Hart, Stag, or Red-Deere; if he haue eaten of a Thiſtle or Cardoone, which is called by learned Pliny, Cynara. The Dragon, by feeding on wilde Lettice, purgeth and cureth any harme receiued. It hath beene daily obſerued, that Dogges, by eating on an Hearbe, which

Wilde Marierome, good againſt poyſon

Rew or hearb Grace.

Iuy, or Ale-Hoofe.

Iuyce of Fennell, for the eye-ſight.

How the Adder cleareth his eye-ſight.

Ants a purge for Beares.

Plin. in lib. 8.

Wild-Lettice

which Pliny ſaith he knew no name of (though others haue tearmed it Dog-graſſe, or Knot-graſſe) haue prouoked themſelues to vomit, and ſo cleanſed their ſtomackes, when they haue been very ſickly. Ringdoues or Woodculuers, Iayes, Mearles, or Black-Birds, & Partridges, do vſe the leaues of Laurell or Bayes for their purging. Other Pidgeons, Turtles, and Fowles, to purge themſelues; doe take Pellitories, which Pliny calleth Helxine, which is an hearb that groweth vpon wals. Drakes, Mallards, Wild-geeſe, and other Fowles of Riuers or waters, do ſerue themſelues alſo for their health, with an hearb called Sideritis or Feuerfew. Cranes and ſuch like Birds, make vſe of Mariſh-Ruſhes.

Dog-graſſe, or Knotgraſſe

Laurell or Bayes.

Patitarie, or Pellitory of the Wall.

Sideritis, or Feuerfew.

Ibis a Bird of Egypt.

The Bird named Ibis, when ſhe feeleth her ſelfe not well diſpoſed; purgeth her body by the meanes of her owne beake or bill, with Water comming forth of her lower parts. And Pliny ſaith, that (by this Bird) men learned how to remedy themſelues by Gliſters. When a Dog doth receiue any wound whatſoeuer, if hee can reach thereto with his tongue; he hath no better meanes then licking the ſore, and ſo helpeth himſelf. When the Panther (which Anicenne calleth a Leopard) hath fed on a venomous hearb, named * Pardalianches: he recouereth himſelfe, by eating the dung or excrements of men. Which being knowne to Huntſ-men, they conuay it into a veſſell (apt for the purpoſe) and hang it on the higheſt branch of a Tree, where the Panther ſtaying, and labouring by hopefull meanes how to get it; the Huntſmen haue opportunity to kill him. Ariſtotle writeth hereof, and Pliny much more amply then he; ſo doth Albertus Magnus. And Pliny ſaith moreouer, that by the meere enſtructions of theſe Creatures: men both haue, and may learne to auoyd many perils; yea, and death ſometimes. Becauſe (ſaith he) when any houſe is in danger of falling, Rats and Mice doe get them gone, and quite forſake it; declaring to men, that they ſhould do the like. Spiders alſo do ſhun all ſuch wals as run to ruine, or are like to be ouerthrowne. Whereto he addeth; That Swallowes will neuer ſtay, or build their neſts, in places ruinous, or ready to fall.

Plin. in Lib. 8.

A kind of Aconitum, called Leopards-bane.

Ariſt. in lib. Anim.
Plin. in lib. 6.
Albert. Mag. in Lib. de Anim.

Rats & Mice.

Spyders.

Swallowes.

CHAP. XVI.

Of many Beaſtes and other Creatures, that (by meere inſtinct of nature) haue fore-knowledge of things to happen afterward. And that diuers little Creatures, haue cauſed ſome Countries to be deſolate and vninhabited.

NOt onely the natural inſtinct of ſome beaſtes, hath been ſufficient for vs, in giuing vs knowledge, concerning the innated properties of diuers thinges, and what vſe or ſeruice we might make alſo of them, either for Phiſick, Medicines, or otherwiſe: but many more of them beſide, as well earthy as ayry, haue knowledge of the mutation of times, and when any rough winds, raines, tempeſts, or fair weather ſhall enſue, and thereof doe deliuer apparant ſignes to men, euen as true predictions. For example, when Sheep do mount and skip about the fielde, as ſeeming very iocond and merry; it prognoſticateth immediat raine. The like is declared to vs by the Oxe or Bullocke; when he licketh himſelfe againſt the haire; and lifteth vp his Noſe towardes Heauen; or loweth and ſnuffeth on the ground, ſtriuing to feed ouer-haſtily, & more then he was wont to doe. When the Ewe diggeth the ground with her foot; and Goats, when they ſleepe too nere one another; when Ants alſo walk the thickeſt, and more then in vſuall numbers, meeting together confuſedly, all theſe are manifeſt ſignes of raine. If Lyons diſlodge themſelues, out of one Countrey into another; it is a certaine ſigne, that the yeare following ſhall be droughty. Ælianus writeth of the Goats of Lybia, that they knew the comming of the Caniculer or Dog-daies, and declare both by ſmell and ſhew, when it is likeſt to raine. When Wolues are noted to enter houſes, to walk on ploughed Lands, or approch neere to people; it is ſaid, that they doe it, to ſhun ſome great tempeſt neere at hand.

The rare intelligence & vnderſtanding in many Creatures.

The skipping of ſheep.

The licking of Oxen, and noſing the ayre.

Ewes, Goats, and Antes.

Diſlodgings of Lyons from one Ioyle to another.

The Goats of Lybia.

Wolues walks

Fiſhes alſo haue wonderfull proper-

Dolphines playing in the water, and troubling the water.

ties, in knowing & expreſſing the changes of times. When Dolphines leap and play in the ſeas, diſcouering themſelues aboue the Water: it is then ſaide, that great winds will ariſe from thoſe parts, whence the Dolphines ſeeme to come. And when they trouble the water, and but bath or beat themſelues therein; it is a ſigne of ſerenity, calme and faire weather. When the Frog is heard ſinging loudeſt, and more ſtrongly then his wont: it is a plaine ſhew of raine and tempeſt. Birds likewiſe are not voyd of this priuiledge, for wee can ſpeake as much, or rather more of them (to this purpoſe) then of all the Beaſts. When the watery Foules do leaue the Sea, & enter farre vpon the Land, it is a ſigne of ſtormes, raine, and tempeſts. If Cranes fly in the ayre & make no noiſe; it preſageth fair weather. But if they cry, and fly out of order; then looke for the contrarie. When the Crow flyeth directly towardes the Sea; it prognoſticateth raine, as alſo when ſhe keepeth ſtill on the Sea ſhoare, in melancholly manner, and her notes are ſorrowfull. If the Owle ſing (after her manner) in rainy weather, it denoteth a ſuddaine change to faire breaking vp: but if ſhe ſing in calme and ſweete weather, it is an immediate ſigne of raine. Plutarch ſaith, that when the Crowes notes come from a hoarſe voyce, and he flappeth or beateth his Winges; it is a ſigne of winds and tempeſts. The ſame is alſo to be gathered, if when the Sun is low declining into the weſt, Rauens, Crowes and Pyes flocking together, do ſing, mount and fly vp towards heauen, and then deſcend downe againe, renewing their former notes: theſe are ſaide to be predictions of cold and windie raines. The congreating of many white Fowles iogether, doth ordinarily proceede from ſome great tempeſts and ſtormes.

The Frogges ſinging.

Of Sea Fowls comming on Land.

Cranes flying in the Ayre.

The Crow fly ing to the ſea.

The Owles ſing.

The Crowes hoarſe note.

Rauens, Crowes, and Pyes flocking together.

White Foules aſſembling to gether.

When Houſhold Poultry, as Cocks, Capons, Hennes, &c. doe beate their Wings, and mount vp, (merily chattering or reioycing) it is an euident teſtimony, that they feele winde and raine approaching. When the Larke ſingeth very early in the morning, and Duckes doe willingly bath themſelues, with picking, imping, and pruning their Feathers with their billes; it is a relation of wind and tempeſts. When the Swallowes flye ſo neere vnto the Water, that they ſeeme to ſmite it with their Winges; it fore-telleth raine preſently to follow.

Our houſhold Poultry.

The Larkes early ſinging, and Duckes bathing.

Swallows flying neere the Water.

Ælianus affirmeth, that the Snite knoweth the waxing and waining of the Moone. But gentle Friends, I feare I haue beene too vnſeaſonable in the precedent examples, therefore I will ceaſe any further purſuite in that kind: but will now ſpeake of certaine Beaſts, which haue expelled and driuen people out of their Countries and dwellings; yet being no Creatures of hugeneſſe or ſtature, but very weake, little and ſmally regarded. Ælianus writeth (to this purpoſe) concerning diuers places in Italy, where mighty multitudes of Rats, made ſuch ſpoile and deſtruction of the Roots of Trees, Hearbes, and Graſſe: that the Inhabitants (not knowing how to kil or ſpoile them) endured extream famine, and were enforced to forſake the Country. Marcus Varro teſtifieth, that a great Towne in Spaine, beeing builded in a ſandy ground, was ſo delued and vndermined by Conies: that in the end it ſunke, and was quite ruined, to the great danger of the people.

Beaſts expelling men fró their habitations.

Rats compelled men to fly their country.

A Towne vndermined by Conies.

Nor haue theſe things happened only in firme and maine Land; but alſo in Iſlands enuironed with the Sea, where both Rats and Mice haue ſo aboundantly ſwarmed, and with ſuch vnreſiſtable boldneſſe: that the Inhabitants haue bin glad to ſaue themſelues by flight. Hereof beareth teſtimony Gyarus, or Gyara, one of the Iſles of Cyclades, or Sporades, in the Ægæum ſea; which (by the means of this vermin) became vtterly deſolate, and no way habitable. The ſame Authors doe further report, that there was a Towne in France, which alſo fell into ruine and diſpeopling, thorow the ouer-abounding of Frogs and Toades. The like chance happened in Affrica, by Locuſtes, or Graſhoppers. Theophraſtus recordeth another Countrey, which was vninhabitable by Caterpillers. Another Prouince in Lybia, all the men were thence expulſed by Lyons. Now, wee hold it no great diſparagemẽt, for men to be ſurmoũted by lions, when humaine weakneſſe is ſufficientlie declared, by that which Pliny reporteth, concerning a Prouince on the limits

Iſlands ſwarming with Rats & Mice.

Frogges and Toades deſtroyed a Towne in France.

The like done by Caterpillers.

Plin. in lib. 9.

limits of Ethyopia, where Antes, Scorpions, and other little Wormes, such as the * Palmer Worme, were the meanes of exiling thence all the dwellers.

*A Worme with manie feete, called in Latine Bruchus, or Campe.

*Flies also forced the Inhabitantes of Megara in Greece, to leaue their Countrey: And Waspes did the like to the Ephesians. Anthenor writing of the Isle of Crete (with whom also ioyneth Ælianus) saith, that a great multitude of Bees, chased al the dwellers out of a City, and vsed their Houses in stead of Hiues. Manie other like strange things haue happened in the Worlde, which are to bee read in ancient Historie.

Of Waspes & Bees.

CHAP. XVII.

The subtle and ingenious deuise of Archimides the Phylosopher, to know thereby, how much Siluer was mingled with Gold, in a Crowne of Gold (by a Golde-Smith) without any breach or iniurie done to the Crowne in the triall.

The great skil of Archimedes.

HIstorians haue declared themselues, to be neuer slack or weary, in reporting the ingenious inuentions of spirite, and great skil of Archimedes the Syracusan, but especially, in Astrology and Geometry. Among all which, I purpose to relate a verie singuler conceit, notably deuised by himselfe, according as it is reported by Vitruuius. This Phylosopher liued in Syracusa, a Citty of Sicily, at such time as Hieron raigned there, a verie rich King, & highly beloued of the Romans.

Rich Hieron k. of Sicily, did make a crown of Golde for his Gods.

In the second warre of Carthage, this King caused a Crowne of Golde to bee made by a Goldsmith, which was a verie excellent Worke-man, because hee had made a promise thereof to his Goddes, and Religion bounde him to the performance. After that the fashion, price, & value was agreed on, which indeede was great: the King commaunded so much Gold to be deliuered to the Workman, according as he purposed the iust weight of the Crowne. With great ingenuitie and admirable skill, the Goldsmith made this goodly Crowne, and of the same Gold which had been deliuered him: neuertheless, like a cunning and crafty deceiuer, hee had falsifyed it, by intermedling some quantity of Siluer among the Golde.

The Goldesmith falsified the Crowne with Siluer.

The Crowne beeing thus finished, it was presented to the King, who causing it to bee waighed, and finding his full waight, was well contented, and thoroughly satisfied the Workeman for his paines. But being (within a while after) certified, that there was a suspition of some Siluer to be mingled among the Gold: the King grew exceeding desirous to knowe what quantity of Siluer there might be, yet without defacing or breaking the Crowne.

Archimedes being a man of no meane esteeme in that Countrey, made tender of his seruice (in this case) to the King, & the whole trust and charge thereof was reposed in him. Sitting alone by himselfe, studying by what meanes he might best accomplish this difficult triall: it chaneed, that his Bath stood readie prepared by him; for they held it as a religious custome, to cleanse and wash their bodies, before they enterprized on any doubtful occasions.

Archimides vndertaketh the Crowns triall.

As he entered into his Bathing Tub, which was full of Water, he considered (as Learned men doe hardly omitte anie thing, without obseruation) that so much Water did ouerflow the Tub, as his bodie had emptied in place thereof. Making vse of this conceite in further iudgement and vnderstanding, hee departed thence ioyfully; assuring himselfe, that he had found what he sought for.

He findeth out his meane of trial very strangely.

Heereupon, he caused two Ingots to be made of equall waight; the one being of Golde, and the other of Siluer; & the ponderousnesse of each Ingot, was equal to that of the Crowne. Afterward, he had a Vessell made for him of sufficient greatnesse, apt and correspondent to his owne intention, which he filled with water, and then did put therein to the Ingot of Siluer: when presently came foorth of the Vessell so much water, as else would haue supplied the Ingots place. Now, to knowe what quantity of water this ouerflowing amounted vnto, subtilly he took forth the Ingot, and by another Vessel or Measure for the purpose, he kept iust ac-

The manner how he made his experiment by Ingots of Golde and Siluer.

count

count of ſo much Water, as then did fill vp the veſſell againe. So by this account and meaſure (for he well vnderſtood the Ingots waight) hee knew what quantitie of Water, the marke or waight of Siluer had ſent out of the veſſell, by meanes of the reſt remaining ſtill in it, and by the poize of the Ingot.

His valewing of the waters ouer-flow.

When he had made this eſtimation, perſwading himſelfe, the mark or waight of the Siluer, ſupplied the roome of ſo many meaſures of water, he would then make the like proofe of the Gold, which was of anſwerable poize to that of ſiluer. But there iſſued not forth any ſuch ſtore of water, as formerly did, when the Ingot of Siluer was in the ſame place, although they were both equall in waight: becauſe that (as euery man knoweth) the anſwerable weight of Gold doth not fill vp ſo much ſpaciouſneſſe as that of Siluer; and therefore, it ſheddeth the leſſe water.

Triall made of the water, by both the Ingots.

After he had taken forth the Gold, he filled the Veſſell by the ſame meaſure, as he formerly did to the poize of Siluer, & in counting the meaſures as they were put in, he alſo kept iuſt reckoning, howe much water each mark or waight of gold & ſiluer, had truly deliuered out. Which being done, keeping ſtil in memory both the meaſures, he tooke the Crown made by the Goldſmith, containing the ſame weight with either of the Ingots of Gold and Siluer; and putting it into the veſſel, the water ouer-flowed according to the greatneſſe thereof.

Triall made by the crown it ſelfe in the water.

Heereupon, hee tooke it out agayne, and meaſured the Water, which ſufficed not to fill vp the veſſell. And ſo he found, that it had throwne forth more Water, then the Ingot of Gold had done, & leſſe then the Ingot of Siluer: wherby he perceiued, how much there wanted in iuſt poize, to make each meaſure meete and anſwereable to the other; whereupon he began to make his account in this manner.

In what manner Archimedes made his valewation, by trial of the Crowne, and both the Ingots.

This Crowne did eiect forth ſo manie veſſels full of Water, more then the Ingot of Gold hath done: then conſequently, there is as much Siluer mingled with the Gold in the Crowne, as it hath caſt or thrown out more Water then the Ingot of Gold did, which is eaſie to be vnderſtood. For, if the Crowne had bin intirely all Gold, it would haue emptied no greater a quantity of water out of the veſſell, then the Ingot of Gold did: but becauſe it hath caſt forth more, that more giueth plainly to bee knowne, that ſubſtaunce which it hath of Siluer mingled with it. For we know very wel, that two Ingots (conſiſting of one weight, and of one ſelfeſame Mettall) muſt neceſſarilie be of a like bodie and quantity; & therefore, beeing put into a Veſſell full of water, they muſt voide out a like quantitie of Water; in regarde, that two bodyes cannot be in one and the ſame place. But by putting the body of the Golde or of the Siluer into the water, the water muſt needs voide out, and yeelde them place; and ſo much the greater the bodie is, ſo much the more water it emptieth forth. And hence it enſueth, that the Crowne ſent out more Water, then the Ingot of Golde; becauſe the Crowne made vſe of the place with equall poize.

Conſideration of the Crowne, by the Ingot of Gold.

Verily, this inuention of Archimides, was ſubtle and ingenuous; albeit manie other thinges (of much greater importance) were found out by the ſpirite and induſtry of this man. And ſuch as are deſirous to know more ſinguler matters concerning him: let them read Plutarch in the life of Marcus Marcellus, and Titus Liuius, in the fourth and fifte Bookes of the third Decade. Where they ſhall find, that the Engines and frames onely, made by the inuention of Archimedes, were ſufficient (for long time) to defend Syracuſa againſt the Romaines. And amongſt other thinges, recitall is made, that no ſtrength of men, beeing able (with infinit Inſtruments) to draw a great Ship out of the Water, Archimedes onely brought it foorth, euen as if it had floated vppon the Sea.

Plut. in Vit. Marc. Marcel. Tit. Liui. in lib. 4. & 5. Dec. 3.

A great Ship brought out of the water by Archimedes

While the Romains maintained their ſiedge before Syracuſa, hee deuiſed ſuch Engines, that by throwing great grapling hookes of Iron from off the Walles, faſt bound by equall counterpoize in the City, he mounted a Gally aloft in the ayre, which deſtroyed and ſunke many men in the Sea. For he could let it fall when hee liſted, and daſh both it ſelfe & other Gallies in pieces: ſo that by this meanes, and other grapling Inſtruments, hee would dragge the enemies Gallies and Shippes ſo powerfully, that they ſhould breake & ſplit themſelues againſt Rockes, they being no way able to make reſiſtance. He framed framed the like Engines vpon the Lande, whereby he could daily destroy manie of the enimies. And such was the bold withstanding, which Archimedes performed within the Cittie; that Marcus Marcellus (a most excellent Captaine of the Romaines) was enforced to chaunge his course of martiall discipline for assayling the Cittie, because he saw himselfe in verie great perill, and his people in confusion.

A gally mounted aloft in the Ayre, to deſtroy other Shipping.

Mar. Marcellus a Noble Captaine of the Romanes, enforced to forsake his siege to Syracusa.

For Archimedes had thrown such feare and terror among the Romaine soldiers, that when they beheld but some chain or silly beame, descend from off the Cittie Walles, they would runne backe and retire with all possible speede only to auoid the daunger. so highly were they feareful of the Engines and Instruments, daylye deuised and perfourmed by this excellent man.

Cicero attributeth also to this famous Phylosopher, that hee first inuented and made the materiall Spheare, wherein the eye might easily apprehend the motions of all the Planets, with their course, passions, and Aspects. And Claudian sayth, that he made one of Christal; which seemeth also to haue beene confessed by Ouid. He was no lesse studious & contemplatiue, then learned and skilfull. But at length, when Syracusa was surprized and taken by force after so long and admirable resistaunce made by Archimedes: Marcellus prohibited (vppon paine of death) that no man should be so bolde as to kill him, although hee had beene the death of so many worthy Romains. Neuertheless, a Souldier finding him by chance (and not knowing him) as he was making a figure vpon the ground, the soldier demanded what hee was: but others say, that he commanded him, to go along with him to Marcellus. Archimedes returning him no answer, either that he would or would not, but was seriously busied in minde about his Circle; and the Soldier growing angry thereat, slewe him; which was verie highly displeasing vnto Marcellus, who made him an honorable and worthy Sepulchre.

Cic. in Lib. 1. de Tusculan.

Cla. in Lib. 4. Ouid in lib. 6. de Fast.

Archimedes slaine by a Roman soldier and much bemoaned by Marcellus.

This is written by Pliny, Valerius Maximus, Titus Liuius, and Plutarch. Cicero reputeth it as a great glorie to himselfe, that he found the Graue of Archimedes, and maketh high account thereof. For, (saith he) The spirit and industry of a Learned man, hath much more power then a thousande, thousand ignorant mens. By the endeuour of Wisemen, fierce and terrible Beasts haue beene made tame; strong things haue beene reduced to weakenes, and weake matters made strong. By them a small number haue beene victorious ouer a great: because a disordered multitude, and without industry, do but breake themselues, and runne vppon their owne ruine.

Cicer. in lib. 1. de Tusculan.

The endeuor and industrie of Wisemen.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the manner, whereby Socrates perswaded Alcibiades, to become an Orator.

ONE of the verie hardest matters in mine opinion, yet most commendable for a man to haue in himselfe, is to speake in such sorte, that hee may giue occasion thereby, to be listened vnto with heed and attention. For this cause, Orators that spake publickely in elder times, were highly praysed: how much more then beseemeth this excellent quality, in such as are Preachers now adayes? Which beeing well considered by Alcibiades the Athenian, and hee but young in yeares; he durst not make anie publick speech, albeit it was a vsual thing, and necessarie for the cheefest men in the Cittie, amongst which number hee was one.

To speak well and orderly is a difficulte thing.

Alcibiades fearfull to speake in publicke.

The great Phylosopher Socrates taking notice therof; and being desirous to giue him encouragement, with perswasion also to become an Orator, hee practised a subtle and cunning meanes, whereby he ouercame such fearefulnesse in him, and the ouer-curious consideration, which preuailed too much with him. For, meeting him one day in the streete, among a great multitude of people of diuerse degrees, he saide vnto him; Tel me Alcibiades, Art thou not affraide to speake before this Cobler? Whereto hee answered, No truly Socrates. Then hee demaunded againe: Art thou then more timerous, to speake before a Trompet? Shalt thou stand in Socrates practiseth to imbolden Alcibiades in speaking, by diuers questions.

in more feare of him, then of this man? Alcibiades, said no; and that he ſtoode not in feare to ſpeak before any ſuch people. Then Socrates named many other men, who were of trades and mean condition; naming afterward, men of great quality, whereto Alcibiades ſtill replyed, that hee durſt ſpeake before euerie one of them.

Socrates his Alluſion vnto his former demands.

Then Socrates ſaid vnto him; The people are compoſed of all ſuch as I haue named vnto thee, and not of any other: and of all theſe, the Athenian Auditorie (where thou oughteſt to ſpeake) doth conſiſt. So then, this auoyding of feare, in ſpeaking from one to one, ſhould take away all terror in thee, of ſpeaking to them when they are aſſembled together: for they which before ſtood deuided a part, are but then vnited in one Congregation. By which reaſon, Alcibiades was conquered; and making due conſideration thereof, hee loſt the falſe feare that before had poſſeſſed him; then making practiſe of this exhortation, hee became afterward a moſt excellent Orator. Whereby may be obſerued, of what value good Councell is, when it is giuen in due time and ſeaſon.

CHAP. XIX.

The beginning, and the cauſes of the Factions of the Guelphes and the Gibelines.

IN the time of the Emperor Frederick, ſecond of that name and of Pope Gregory the ninth, betweene whom was great diſcord & contention: there were two factions of people, in the Citty of * Piſtorium, or Piſtoia in Italie: the one whereof, was called the Panciatiques; and the other, the Chancellers. Now it fortuned, that two Brethren; the one called Guelph, and the other Gibeline, held diuers opinions in this City; whereof ſome followed the one ſide, & others the other. From whence it proceeded, that of theſe two verie famous men, one part began to entitle it ſelfe the Guelphes, and the other, the Gibelines: And that ſide which was the Guelphs, expulſed the Gibelines out of the Cittie. And becauſe it was a matter ſomewhat note-worthie, to behold two Brethren of ſuch contrary diſpoſition, each of theſe factions woon the fauour of many neighboring people. So that euen as a contagious Peſtilence, this diuorce of amity, diſperſed it ſelfe by little and little, thorough all Italy; and al cauſes and Controuerſies, muſt bee diſcuſſed and diſcided by the Guelphes and Gibelines.

*A Citty in the middle of Tuſcia.

The Original of the Guelphes and the Gibelines.

This fire beeing thus fatally kindled; the Emperour Frederick, who was a Capitall enemie to the Pope, beeing at that time in the Cittie of Piſa, in the yeare, one thouſand, three hundred, and forty: and not knowing which faction woulde be on his ſide; and which would partake with the Pope, made publicke declaration, that he vndertooke the name & part of the Gibelines. Which being done, hee managed cruell warre vpon the Guelphes; and by reaſon of this open publication, al Italy diuided it ſelf into theſe two names; and therby grew great ſcandals and mortalities in euery Citty: yea, euen in perticuler Families, where the Sonne deuided himſelfe from his Father, Brother againſt Brother, Wife againſt her Huſband. Yet vpon no other ground, but becauſe the one affected the Guelphian faction, and the other the Gibeline, and ſo purſued each the other. It was daily ſeen, that the ſtronger ſide ruined and ouerthrew houſes to the grounde, following ſtill on the weaker, euen to vtter hauocke. and deſtruction: and ſuch was the continuance of this quarrell, as neuer were greater cruelties heard of, betweene the Infidels and Chriſtians, in their greedieſt furies.

The Emperor Fredericke enimy vnto the Pope.

Al Italy deuided into the factions of the Guelphes and Gibelins.

Antoninus, Arch-byſhop of Florence, writeth; that by theſe factions, fiue and thirtie of the verie woorthieſt houſes in the Cittie of Florence, were raced to the earth; and that thoſe contentions were thoroughout all Italy. Many people bearing name with the Emperour, expelled the Guelphes whereſoeuer they came and the Gibelines did the like by them. The greater part of Rome, by taking the Emperors cauſe in hand, had alreadie runne into too much forwardneſſe: which the Pope perceiuing, he made a ſolemn proceſſion, wherein he carried the Keyes of Saint Peter, and Saint Paule, deſiring of God, Antoninus Arch-Byſhop of Florence in his Hiſtory.

A ſolemn proceſſion made in Rome by the Pope, and after an Oration to the people.

God, that this cruelty might bee rooted vp out of mens hearts And after the procession, hee made a publicke Oration to the people, or rather a Sermon, declaring what folly it was, for men so to persecute and kill one another: onely in fauour and affection vnto two perticuler Names, which the Deuill had brought into the field, for the generall spoile and ruine of all Italy.

The Emp purposed to destroy all the Guelphian faction.

Moreouer, hee declared manie other things of such great efficacy, as compelled the people to leaue their wilful opinion, & to take part with the Pope against the Emperor Fredericke, who was in very good hope to destroy all the Guelphian faction. These bleeding woundes (for the sinnes of men) continued too long a time in Italy, and was the death of manie thousands of men, beside a great number banished, and greeuously oppressed, infinite faire buildings destroyed, and many goodly houses burned. The Authors that record these thinges, are Platina, in the life of Pope Gregory the ninth, and Antonius Sabellicus, in the thirde part of his Historie, and many other men of great knowledge.

Plat. in vit. Gregor. 9. Anton. Sabel. in par. 3. Hist.

CHAP. XX.

Of the first Martyrs: And of the Persecutions of the Christians.

IESVS Christ our Sauiour came into the world, to instruct men in the truth, as himselfe testifieth in Saint Iohn, saying: For this cause am I come into the World, that I might bear witnesse of the trueth. Whosoeuer is of the truth, heareth my voice. By these wordes, the Iews conceiued enuy against the son of God, so that they would putte him to death, without any cause of offence. And thus truth begot hatred to men, such as were professours thereof, and for their loue to the truth, they grew to be deadly malliced and persecuted, especially if they did but speake in truths defence. Therefore, the first persecution which Christians suffered, began by the Iewes. For, as the Apostles (following the tracke and steppes of their Maister) proclaimed the word of trueth, and S. Peter (more then any of the other) reproued the Iewes, because they had killed Christ, and exhorted them therefore to repentaunce: they entered into such violence and fury, that they stoned Saint Stephen the Deacon, who (almost two yeares after the Pasion of our Redeemer) disputed in the full Synagogue, against the Alexandrians, Cyreneans, as also against them of Cilicia & Asia. Among whom, though manie of them coueted to appeare most learned, yet could they not resist one man onely: but being confounded by Celestial wisedome (wherein the young man was graciously enstructed) they enuironed him with rage and indignation; and hardlie could containe themselues from layeng hands on him, vexing in their hearts, and grinning their teeth against him. But he being full of the Holy-Ghost, hauing his eyes eleuated to heauen, there he beheld the glory of God, and Iesus standing vpon his right hand, whereon he saide; Behold, I see the Heauens open, and the Sonne of man standing on the right hand of GOD. Whereat they all cried out aloude, and stopped their eares, and running on him as with one consent, they threwe him forth of the Citty, and stoned him vnto death with stones. Thus S. Stephen being the first that publickly defended Christs Religion, was martired, that is to say; bare witnesse or testimony, by torment and death, which hee willingly suffered, only for the Faith of Iesus Christ; for the word Martyre in Greek, signifies a Witnesse. Saint Iohn the Baptist, more then a Prophet, and not ignorant in these thinges to come, was the first man slaine for defending the truth; to wit, because hee detested the incestuous marriage of Herodias, according as Saint Luke saith; or after the saying of Iosephus, beecause the number of the people which came vnto him, made Herod suspitious of some new Commotions, whereby he feared to lose his Tetrarchs place. In which respect, it may well be said, that S. Iohn Baptist was the first Martir. But, as all the Mysteries of our Christian Religion, did receiue beginning at the Pasion of our Sauiour Iesus Christ (according to Saint Hierom against Iouinian, who saith, The Gospel also was not before the Crosse of Christ.) So by this reason, S. Stephen the Leuite, of whom

Acts 7, 58.

The extream malice against S. Stephen for the truth.

Acts 7, 56, 57.

The worde Martyre in Greeke expresseth a Witnesse.

S. Iohn Baptist, the first man slaine for the truth.

S. Iohn Baptist, the first Martyr, reputed by some.

Hier. cont. Iouin.

The Iewes enemies to the sonne of God

The first persecutions of christians beganne by the Iewes.

whom we formerly spake) being the first of all Christians that suffered death for the name of Iesus Christ, is held to be the first Martyr.

S. Cyprian his words, approuing iust Abel to be the first Martyr.

Saint Cyprian, deriuing the matter from a much longer continuance, attributeth that degree of Honour to Iust Abel, saying; Most deare Bretheren, let vs follow Abel the Iust, in whom Martyrdome began, when hee was the first slaine for his righteousnesse. But we discourse heere of the beginning of Martyrs, and the other opinion is the more receyueable.

S. Peter & S. Paul put vnto death by Nero, the second persecution against the Christians.

After Saint Stephen, the cruell Emperor Nero, vnderstanding that Saint Peter and Saint Paule, preached the Doctrine of the Gospell at Rome, labouring to introduce a new kinde of Religion, beeing very wrathfull thereat, he made no long delay, vntill hee hadde put them both to death, which was the second persecution against the Christians: for the first was mooued by the Iewes, as we haue shewn already.

The cruelties of Nero to his owne Countrey.

Some neuertheless doe allow this of Nero to be the first, as being first begun by Commission from the Emperors: and this wicked man, to make Christians far more odious to the Romaine people, bethought himselfe of such wickednesse as after followed. Hauing exercised all kinds of cruelties, euen as a plague to humain generation, both in refusing to pitty and pardon his owne Countrey, and defacing and depopulating all the auncient buildinges, desiring (as some haue Written) to see a Fire, which might bee like to that of Troy; the verie greatest and chiefest part of Rome Citty, hee caused to be burned.

Malicious dealing in Nero against the Christians.

This flaming fire, continued the space of sixe dayes, and as many nights, whereby the Temples, houses, and goodes of numberlesse Cittizens, were consumed. And then to set a colour on this impiety, and stand in defence of such a shameless act, he imposed the blame and horror of this ruine, vppon the innocent obseruers of the truth, and produced diuers, falsely to accuse the Christians, to make them culpable of so great a dammage: whereupon, many of them were imprisoned, and some dearely paide the price of their liues. But that the Christians were innocent of such wickednesse, Cornelius Tacitus, an enemy to the name of a christian, is constrained to confesse it, where hee saith; Those men, not so much for the Fires fault, as because they had the hatered of al, were conuinced.

Corn. Tacitus concerning the christians in their persecution.

Afterward, he saith; To their Deathes were added slanders and disgraces. They were couered with the skins of diuers wilde Beasts, and then torne in pieces with Dogs. Some others were Crucified; and others, when day light serued not to burne them; they made darke night look like bright day, with the flaming Fires wherein they consumed them.

The persecutions in the succeeding of the emperors

Domitian ordained (afterwardes) the third persecution against the Christian Church. Traian the fourth. Marcus Antoninus, Lucus Aurelius, and Commodus the fift. Seuerus Pertinax the sixte, Maximinus the seuenth, Decius the eight, Valerian the ninth, Aurelianus the tenth, and Diocletian the eleauenth, counting that performed by the Iewes. For, if wee begin with Neroes time, then there are but ten in number, according as som Historians haue obserued: and that was the most cruell and longest in continuance, of all the other.

Nero his persecution the cruellest of al the other.

Holy Bookes were burned, Churches raced and ruined. And if any Christian had the dignity or office of a Magistrate, it was taken from him, and beeing depriued thereof, he remained infamous. The seruants that attended vpon Christians, could not bee manumised, that is to say; they could not bee freed, or enioy their liberty, as enfranchised men should doo. In like manner, men of warre, and Christian Soldiers, were compelled to sacrifice to the Heathen Idols, or to lose their liues.

Extreamities inflicted on Christians.

Finally, Maxentius, Licinius, and Maximinus, who ioyntly helde the Empyre with Constantine, did very great annoyance to the Christians: but the three first being slaine (as they iustly deserued) Constantine remained Emperor alone, who gaue certaine and assured peace vnto the Christians. Which worthy professors, notwithstanding so many great persecutions, & cruell torments inflicted on them by Tyraunt Emperours, neuer failed in their faith, neither regarded the Commands and Menaces of Infidell Princes, but still maintained their Christian Religion; and chearefully (for Gods cause) yeelded their bodies to whatsoeuer Torments were prepared for them, to the end, that they might winne the perpetu-

The emperor Constantine gaue peace to the christians

all all Crowne of glory, and beare in theyr hands the Palmes of Martyrdome. For as the Apoſtle ſaieth, Hee that hath not fought couragiouſly, ſhal not bee Crowned. Ephes. 6, 16. Our Sauiour alſo giueth vs the ſame verie ſame counſell, when he ſaith: If anie man wil come to me, he muſt deny himſelfe, and take vp his Croſſe, and follow me. Math. 10, 38. Like Wages is promiſed vnto ſuch as followe him, where he ſaith; Hee that looſeth his life for my ſake, ſhall finde it. Math. 10, 39. Seeing then, that the entrance into Heauen, muſt bee thorowe many aduerſities and tribulations, true Chriſtians ought patiently to endure all iniuries and opprobious ſpeeches, for the name of the Sonne of God, and account themſelues happie therein: for by them the way to eternall glorie is laide open.

CHAP. XXI.

Of ſuch men and Nations, as haue been reputed to bee the firſt Inuenters and deuiſers of diuers things.

THe Lydians a people of Aſia, inuented the ſportes or Games of the Cheſſe-play, the Dice, and the Tennis; wherupon Rhodiginus ſaith, Ludi a Lydis videri poſſunt appellati. The Egyptians found out the burning of Lampes. And Anacharſis of Scythia, deuiſed the Bellowes, wherewith to kindle fire. Pyrrhus, King of the Epirotes, was the firſt that had Couriers, Poſts, or ſwift riders. For, as hee had three Armies in diuerſe parts of the world; and himſelfe remayned continually in the Cittie of Tarentũ, he would haue newes from Rome in one day; out of France in two dayes; out of Germany in three dayes; and out of Aſia in fiue dayes; yea, and that in ſuch manner, as his tydings ſeemed rather to flye, then brought on rode waies.

The Lydians.

The Egyptians.

Anacharſis of Scythia.

Pyrrhus K. of Epyre.

Meſſages by Poaſts.

The firſt inuenter of Inke to write withall.

The firſt Inke wherewith our elders vſed to Write, was made of a certayne Fiſh, called Xibia or Xiphia: which afterwardes they conuerted to blacke colour: then to a Vermillion; next to Azure, and at length compounded it with Gum Arabick, Gaules, Vitrioll, and Wine; or rather water. The firſt Bolters for meale, or Searces of haire, had their beginning in Fraunce: and Spaine yeelded the firſt Siues.

Bolters and Searces.

Praxiteles was the firſt Inuenter of the Looking-Glaſſe, which was then called the Siluer Glaſſe, in the time of Pompey the Great: but it is not certainly known, who deuiſed the Glaſſes of Steele, Iron, Lead, Chriſtall, and of other commixed matters. Ceres found out Corne, and enſtructed the maner alſo, how to kneade, molde, and make Bread. To her is aſcribed likewiſe, the making of Wicker Baſkets, or Panniers of Oſiers. Pleaſippus gaue firſt inſtruction for making of hollow Tunnes, or Veſſelles of Woodde, which now a-dayes are called Caske. Medea inuented the meanes to colour Weomens haire; and Abatis to poule or cut the haire, when it grewe too long. The Thebanes deuiſed Hunting. Rhecus and Theodorus of Samia, were the inuenters of melting and Caſting of Mettalles, whereof they made Images or Statues to the Goddes.

Looking glaſſes.

Corne and bread.

Baskets of Oſiers.

Tuns or caſk.

Colored hair.

Hunting.

Melting Mettals.

The Curetes in the Iſle of Negropont, (who were the Corybantes, Sybils Prieſts, and Idæi Dactyli) found out Iron & ſteel, wherewith they made Cuyraſſes, Corcelets, Targets, and other defenſiue Ornaments for the body. Cacus was the firſt Theefe knowne to bee in Italy. Arachne of Colophonia, found out the vſe of Linnen, and to ſpin thread: And Cloſterius (ſaide to be her ſonne) deuiſed the Spindle for Wooll. Pamphyla, a Grecian Ladie, was the firſt that gathered Cotton from off old Shrubbes, hanging looſely thereon. And hauing waſhed and Combed it, faſtened it on a Diſtaffe, and ſo ſpunne it, enſtructing afterwarde how to weare it for cloath.

Cuiraſſes, corſlets, Targets &c.

Spinning linnen & wollen

Spinning cotton Wooll.

Erichthonius the Athenian, found out the meanes how to make Horſſes drawe Chariots or Coaches. Iupiter inuented the Militarie or Warlicke Enſigne, making it of Red colour, wherein was alſo figured an Eagle. And our ancient Forefathers, inſtead of Enſigns did bind bundles or handfuls of Hearbes vppon long Poles, which in Latine were called Manipuli; and they that carried them, were tearmed Manipulares.

Chariots or Coaches.

Enſignes for war, & what was vſed inſted of them.

In the time of Auguſtus, there was one named Hoſtius, who made Mirrours or Looking-Glaſſes in ſuch ſtrange maner, Strange Looking Glasses, delivering as strange representations.

that they presented any thing to seeme much greater then it was; for a mans finger would therein appeare to bee as long and great as the measure of his arme. Another made a Glasse likewise, wherein a man might behold another mans figure, and not his owne. He made some beside of such quality, as being set in an vncertaine place, nothing at all would bee discerned: but being brought thence, many semblances might be discouered. He had one Glasse perticulerly, which woulde shew all shapes the wrong way, or vpside downward; and one thing also shoulde seeme in many formes. Diuers other things might heere be spoken of: but because their very best is but idle and vaine, I am the more willing to ouerslip them.

CHAP. XXII.

Of manie Famous and Woorthy men, that haue contemned and despised Riches.

WE read of diuers illustrious and great personages, that neglected and made no account at all of Riches: but they of most honor and renowne, were Valerius Publicola, Menenius Agrippa, and the most iust Aristides. All these men dying, were buried with the money of the publicke purse, in regarde of their pouertie and lacke of wealth. After the death of Epaminondas, whose victories were so famous, and spoiles so manie by him atchieued, there was no other moueable found in his house, but onlie the Iron head of a Launce. This was the man, that refused two * thousande Crownes, which Iason (a Prince of Thessalie, and a Confederat with the Thebans) sent him as a guift. But hee rather affected, to borrow of a Cittizen of Thebes, fiftie Drachmaes of Siluer (which could be of no greater value then fiue crownes) to maintaine himselfe in the voyage and expedition which hee had vndertooke, and with so small store of money, hee entered in Armes into Peloponnesus. Afterward, Artaxerxes the great King of Persia, sent him thirtie thousand pieces of Golde, of his money called * Daricks: In regard whereof, he grew verie seuearelie angry with Diomedes Cyzicenus, saying vnto him: Hast thou dared to enterprize so long a Nauigation, as hoping to corrupt Epaminondas? Returne againe, and say to thy King, that for as much as he would giue to purchase the good and welfare of the Thebanes, he shall haue mee as his friend, without any of this cost: but in seeking to do thē wrong and iniurie, tell him, I am his chiefest enemy.

Val. Publicola. Menen. Agrip. Aristides iustus.

Bap. Fulgos. in lib. 4. cap. 4

Iustin. in lib 6. Plut. in Apoth.

Erasmus* saith 100 crownes, for victuall & prouisions fit for his armie.

An auncient Coine, with the Image of Darius on it.*

Epaminondas to Diomedes Cyzicenus.

After that Marcus Curius, Consull of Rome, had ouercome the Samnites in battaile; Ambassadours were sent from them, who brought him a great quantity of Gold and Siluer, as a gift; yet finding him sitting by a Fires side, scraping, and putting roots into a pot, that they might seeth for his Dinner; and to them hee returned this answere: Beare all this Golde and Siluer backe with yee, and bestow it on such Captaines, as scorne to dresse their own dinners in earthen vessels: For, I desire no greater riches, then to be the Lorde of such Plate, and the possessions within them. As if he would haue saide; Hee that contenteth himselfe with such a dinner, hath nothing to do either with Golde or Siluer. But, in commanding ouer such as haue them, they seeme thinges more great and honourable, then if hee himselfe had them.

M. Curius conquering the Samnites.

His answer to the Ambassadors.

The Application.

Of this Honourable Band were Apollonius Thyaneus, Paulus Emilius, Phocion, Attilius Regulus, Quintus Cincinnatus, Fabritius, Sextus Emilius, Carus & Marcus Manlius. Abdolominus, being created King of the Sydonians, immediatly refused the Kingdome: as knowing verie well, what trauailes and troubles were hidden & enclosed, vnder the vain splendor of wealth and riches.

A band of Riches scorners.

Abdolonius K. of the Sydonians.

The Poet Anacreon in like manner, hauing receiued (as a guift) from Polycrates the tyrant of the Samians, fiue hundered Attique Talents, continued two Dayes and two Nightes, without anie sleepe. At length, to free himselfe from the Torment whereinto this present had brought him, hee re-deliuered the guifte backe vnto the Tyraunt, with Wordes well beseeming so fayre a minde, in so meane a Fortune to make such a refusall.

The Poet Anacreon, & Polycrates the tyrant.

Seneca vsed to say, Hee was a great man, that made imployment of earthen vessels

The saying of Seneca.

sels, as if they were of Siluer: but much greater is that man whosoeuer, that vseth Siluer, as if it were earth. Crates the Thebane Phylosopher, at his departing from Athens, to followe his studie in Phylosophy, threw all his substance of Gold and Siluer into the Sea, holding it for an infallible Maxime, that hee could not possesse Vertue and Riches together. The like did Socrates.

Crates the Phylosopher of Thebes.

The Inhabitants of the Islands Baleares, would neuer haue any Golde, Siluer, Silkes, nor precious Stones to bee seene in their Countreyes. Whereby such happinesse befell them, that for the space of foure hundered yeares, in all which time, they had warres with the Romains, Carthagenians, Gaules, and Spaniards, yet not any one of these nations euer stirred, to go make a Conquest of those Countreyes, because they knew assuredly, that they hadde neyther Golde or Siluer to make pillage of, and bring away with them.

The dwellers in the Baleares Islandes had neither Gold nor Siluer.

CHAP. XXIII.

The Sentence or Verdict of Apollonius Thyaneus, against an Eunnuch to the King of Babylon, who was found somwhat too familiar, with one of the kings faire fauourites.

Apollonius in his Booke of Hierogliphical letters, writeth; That when the Egyptians woulde make a representation of loue, they did set down the figure of a grin or snare: onely because (as I thinke) it conducteth vs daily to a most miserable condition. Philostratus writeth, that in the time of Apollonius Thyaneus, an Eunnuche was found in loue pleasures (as his abilitie would permit him) with one of the Concubines to the King of Babylon, the veriefairest and best beloued beyonde all the other. Being take in the act, he was dragd (by the haire) out of the Serralia, from the other Women, by his Eunuchs, and brought before the King. To whom, the most ancient of the Eunuches declared, that he had found by heedfull obseruation, how the Eunuch was become amorous of the Woman, and thereof had giuen him admonishment, that he shold not speake to her, nor (in anie manner whatsoeuer) touch her necke, breasts, or hands, and abstaine also from helping to put on her Garments. All which notwithstanding, he had beene now surprized in bed with her, and found in performing the veneriall act.

How the Egyptians figured Loue.

Phil. in vit. Apol. Thyan. lib. 1 Cap. 23.

The Serraglia is the place for the Concubines of the King.

The King waxing extreame angrie at this report, turned himselfe towardes Apollonius Thyaneus (who was at that time in his Court) saying: What punishment do you deeme fittest for me, to inflict vpon this Villaine? Whereto Apollonius answered: It is enough (O King) to let him liue. How! (replied the King, as ashamed of this answere) doo not you iudge him worthy of many cruell deaths, that dared so boldly to violate my bed? My answere (quoth Apollonius) doth not imply any pardon to bee graunted to him, but rather to lay the heauier torments on him, by suffring him to liue. For, so long as he shall remaine aliue, he must abide infinite afflictions, too sharpe and difficult for him to endure. Hee shall not be able to eate or drinke, to receiue any pleasure in shewes, sports, or Pastimes, which easily may delight both you & yours. His heart will faile him oftimes, his dreams and sleepes wil be gastly and fearefull, such as are saide (most especially) to pursue amorous persons. Then neuer doubt Sir, but loue wil force him to feele most bitter and insupportable Martyrdomes. For like vnto the silly Fly, the miserable man wil follow both Fire and death, and yet at an instant, both life and death shal appeare most hateful vnto him. Such was the answere of Apollonius, which the King found to bee so wise and pleasing, that being thereby perswaded, the Eunuch enioyed the benefite of life.

The disseased heareth aduise for the Eunuchs punishment of Apol. Thyaneus.

The answere of Apollonius.

The Eunuch permitted to inioy his life.

And to speake vprightly, Loue is an extreame passion, a meere fury or madnesse in a Woman, and a quenchlesse heate in a young man, whose vttermost refuge is death onely. And for this cause, Epitetus among other definitions which he made of death, called it, Numen Amãtum, because Louers do oftentimes call death to helpe them, and seeme as if they would run willingly thereto, as vnto their surest Anker-hold, as another saith. Who is it but knoweth that loue took away the Epitetius in his cõference with the Emperor Adrian of long life.

Examples of loues violēce in diuers.

sences of Wise Salomon, and made him violate the Sacred Lawe? Loue mooued Biblis to be enamored on her owne Brother Caunus; and Pasiphae with a Bull. Of manie other inconueniences Loue hath been the only cause. But to come again to our precedent purpose. Some few dayes before this disaster happened to the Eunnuch, Apollonius (who had made some obseruation thereof) fell into discourse with his companion Damis, concerning the power and ability of Eunuches, in the acte of venery, beginning thus.

The Authour returneth to his matter, concerning Eunuches.

A conference betweene Apollonius and his friend Damis, of Eunuchs abilitie in venery.

Friend Damis, I am now considering with my selfe, what reason barbarous nations haue, to imagine modesty in their Eunuchs, & to make vse of their seruice waiting on their Wiues? I thinke (aunswered Damis) the cause is cleare and manifest; yea, euen to a childe. For after their spermaticke Vessells are cut away, which inciteth carnall embracing and action, they may be permitted to keep their Wiues, and are expressely employed in that charge, euen as if they suffered them to lodge in bed with them. You conceit then (replied Apollonius) that the power of affecting and knowing Women carnally, is by that meanes quite taken from them? Both the one and other answered Damis, in regard, that if the part be taken from them, whereby the body is prouoked vnto the acte of Venus, I am of the minde, that they cannot haue any inclination to loue.

The power of affecting, and carnally knowing.

You haue a present testimony (answered Apollonius) that Eunuchs can and do loue; and that desire which is introduced by the eye, cannot be quenched in them, but continueth still hot and vigorous in the body: and many things may be alledged, whereby your reasons will be easily confuted. If there do consist any such Art in man, as can gouerne and expell such desires and affections out of the minde: it appeareth then to me, that Eunuchs shold not by any probable reason, bee reckoned or admitted in the number of chaste and temperate men. For, you hold those men to bee wholly depriued of Loue, as constrained thereto, by such an act of violence done on them. Whereas the Office of temperance is, that hee which coueteth, affecteth, or desireth, should not be surmounted or ouercome by lasciuious affections and Concupiscences: but wholly for to abstaine from them, and not to bee vanquished by any greefe or passion, which induceth desire to the matter coueted or affected. All this is saide by Apollonius in Philostratus. But if the Eunuches thorough defect of the Instruments of generation, haue not the power to engender, and to auoyde foorth seede: yet notwithstanding, they are manie time ouercomes with heates, and striue with themselues, both to know and to abuse women, euen as wee do oftentimes behold, that Geldings wil offer to leape and couer Mares.

Of the desires & affections of the minde.

The Law and office of temperance.

Phil. in vit. Apol. Thyan. Lib. 1. Cap. 23.

CHAP. XXIIII.

¶ An excellent and memorable example of Continencie, in the famous Prince Frances Sforza.

I AM loath to omit a verie singuler example of continencie, in the most honourable and worthy Prince, Frances Sforza, well deseruing to bee compared with those of Alexander the Great, and warlicke Scipio. He being Coronell Generall of the Florentines, at such time as Casanoua Chasteau and Forteresses des Luquois, was surprized by force of Armes. During the sacke of that small Cittie, certaine of his Soldiers had taken a young married woman prisoner, of admirable beautie and faire perfections. As they drew her forcibly out of her house, she cried to them, that she would submit her selfe vnto the Count Frances, and not vnto any other. They that thought to haue made vse of her for themselues, hearing her voluntary Challenge, and dreading the displeasure of the Count, made no long delay, but forthwith brought her before him. The Coronell Sforza, who in regarde of his youths verdure, sweet disposition & complexion of body, was much addicted to carnall pleasures, albeit he was violently surprized with the young Womans rare rare beautie: yet notwithstanding, hee demanded of her, whither shee woulde more willingly yeeld her self to him, then remaine in their power that had taken hir as their prize? Whereto the young woman answered, that shee would alwayes be ready to obey his will, prouided, that he should deliuer her out of their hands, that then detained her as their prisoner. Heereupon, Count Sforza commanded that she should be carried to his Tent.

Frances Sforza the Count, Coronell of the Florentines

The young Woman was brought before Count Frances.

A second demand of the Count to the faire young woman.

Night being come, before hee would go to bed, he demanded of her againe, if hir former resolution did yet hold or no, or whether she had changed her purpose? Whereto she answered, that shee helde the same opinion which shee did before. Which when the Count perceiued, he commanded her to prepare her selfe, for shee should lodge with him that Night. She was no sooner entered into his bed, but espying the picture of the virgin Mary (which the Count both in custom and Deuotion, had alwayes hanging as a fair Table in his Tent) beeing stroken full of feare and shame, weeping incessantly, & kneeling with great reuerence, she vttered these words to the Count. My Lord I beseech yee, for that Holy Virgines sake, whose remembrance and figure is heere fixed before vs, that you would bee pleased to preserue my Chastity, and by your clemencie to restore me, not polluted but vnstayned, to my late married Husband, who is among the rest of your prisoners. And although I made ye promise to submit my selfe to your will, and am heere subiected to your pleasure: yet no other respect moued mee thereto, but onely to be freed from them, vvho doubtlesse would haue rauished mee. And in regard of the Iustice and pietie, that I haue often heard to be alwayes in you, those vertues are my firme hope and perswasion, that I shal (by you) be defended from al shame & violence.

The speeches of the young woman vnto Count Sforza being in his bed.

A rare testimony of continency, both for time, place & oportunity.

These words, accompanied with floudes of teares, which showred downe her faire cheekes, found such gracious enterance into the benign and generous hart of the Captaine; and so great was his continency (considering he had a Woman of such exquisite beauty, and in his naked bed by him, being also his captiue and prisoner taken in warre) notwithstanding all these aduantages: vnchast, hot, and lustfull appetite was quite extinct in him; and presently he leapt foorth of the bed, leauing her there to rest in safetie. On the morrow morning, hee sent to make enquiry for her husbandes, whose ransome he payed to his Soldiers out of his owne money. And then deliuered his Wife vnto him, with a solemne Sacred Oath, that he restored her as chaste, vntoucht or vnknowne of him in any vnciuill manner whatsoeuer, as when she was brought a prisoner to him. The Husband falling to the ground on his knees before him, with sighes and teares spake in this manner: Honourable Lord, your deedes do amply declare, the great renown which euerie where is iustly famed of ye, to wit; that there is no man liuing on the earth, that can equall yee in humanitie and clemencie. The highest God, who can do all in all, wil giue you sufficient recompence for vs, that can returne no conuenable guerdon vnto your worth and vertues.

The worde of the husband to the Count.

The Count would haue giuen them great store of Goods and Mooueables, taken as pillage in the City: but the yong Woman would not accept of any. Affirming, that when her Neighbours should see such guiftes, they would repute them to be the prizes of her lost honour, and so she should liue in endlesse infamy, which she desired rather to shunne, then death it selfe. So, hauing leaue and License to depart from Count Sforza, they were safely conducted home to their house.

Bountie and humanitie in Count Sforza

CHAP. XXV.

Of many Woorthy and Learned men, both Ancient and Moderne, vvhose endes and deathes haue beene wretched and miserable.

THemistocles the Athenian, being banished by enuy in the Cittizens of Athens, withdrew himselfe to K. Artaxerxes, by whō being constrained to warre against his owne Countrey, hee made a willing chaunge of death for life, by drinking the blood of a Bull. Gallus the Poet slewe himselfe. Demosthenes the Plutarch. Vit.

Amia. Marcellinus in lib. 17.

Athenian, having incurred the displeasure of Antipater, successor to Alexander, fled into Calabria, an Island in the Ægæum Sea; where he was entrapped by the Sergeants of Antipater: and having taken a pen, as if hee purposed to Write therewith, hee suckt vp certaine poyson, (enclosed therein) and so died. Plinie was burnt to death, with the fire of Mount Etna, which at this present is called Gibello Monte. The same end also had Empedocles the Agrigentine Poet.

A high Hil in Sicily, out of which ariseth horrible smoke and flames of fire

Many other worthy men likewise haue dyed as miserably: among whom was Socrates, that (by commaundement of the Magistrate) dranke the iuice of Hemlock in prison, and died by the draught. Thales Milesius died of drought, by heate of the Sunne as he was beholding the Gymnick Playes. Zeno was slaine by the commandement of Phalaris the Tyrant. Anaxarchus died by command from Nicocreon, in strange diuersity of torments; and being ouercome with the extreamitie of paine, he bit off his tongue betweene his teeth, and threw it in the Tyrantes face. Archimedes the Phylosopher, and most excellent Mathematician, was slaine by the Soldiers of Marcellus. Pythagoras was burned aliue by the Cylonians, as Plutarch saith: But others write, that warre being moued betweene the Agrigentines and Syracusans, Pythagoras going forth to succour the Agrigentines, was massacred (with seuenty of his Schollers) in a fielde of Beanes, by the Syracusans.

Laer. lib. 1. c. 10 *Places of nakèd & anointed men.

Plut. in Moral. Lib. 4. Cap. 2.

Anacharsis was slaine by his owne followers, because he would haue enduced the Religion and Goddes of the Grecians into Scythia. Diodorus Cronos the Logitian, dyed with sorrow and shame, because he could not resolue a question in Sophistry, which was propounded to him (in iest) by Stilpo. Aristotle, after hee had lost the grace and fauour of Alexander, not knowing the nature and cause of Euripus, which is in Chalcis, that is to say, the flowing and ebbing of a Sea, that happeneth continually seauen times, in the space of a day and night, returning into Aulis of Beotia, being a Hauen in Eubœa, grewe weary of his life, only through griefe and sorrow conceiued, because he could not render a sufficient reason for it; and some say, that he drowned himselfe in the Sea, and in the same place. His scholler Calisthenes had his Nose and lips cut off, and being shut vp betweene two walles, dyed of the disease which the Greekes called φθειρίασις, and the Latines, Morbus Pediculuris. Marcus Tullius Cicero hadde his head and hands cut off, and his Tongue pulled out. Terence the Poet, drowned himselfe with greefe, because he had lost 108. Comedies which were Written in Greeke by Menander, and had bin by him conuerted into Latine. The Poet Lucretius hauing drunke an amorous potion, fell into such a fury, that he slew himselfe with his owne hande, being aged about forty yeares.

Plin. li. 7. c. 53.

Greg. Nazian. in Orat. cont. Iul. imperat.

Cœlius Rhodiginus in lib. c. 36.

Seneca, being compelled by his Scholler Nero, to make choise of what kind of death he best affected, caused a Veine to be opened in his foote, as he helde it in a Bason of water; and so by the meanes of loosing his blood, lost his life also. Auerroes was crushed to death with a wheele which went ouer his stomacke. John Duns, otherwise called Scotus, reading in England, in a sudden tumult of schollers, was slaine with the stabs of Bodkins, such as (in ancient times) they wrote withal in Table-bookes of Woodde, or on the Barkes of Trees. But if I were to sette downe the miserable ends of all the learned men in elder dayes; no mean or reasonable compasse could containe mee. Therefore, I will conclude this Chapter, with rehearsall of some more Moderne and later. Frances Petrarche dyed suddenly. Domitius Calderinus died of he plagu. The Reconciler or Peace-maker, was burned after his death, hauing liued but a small while. Laurentius Laurentianus, the Physition of Florence, drowned himselfe in a well. Petrus Leonis, of * Spoletũ, Physition and Astrologer, was likewise throwne into a Well by the commaund of Peter de Medicis, because during the sickenesse of Lawrence de Medicis his Father, he had giuen good hope of his life, by saying, that there was no daunger of death in his disease, as he collected by the rules of his starres, and yet he died. Sir Thomas More, Lord Chancellor of England, was beheaded at London, for withstanding King Henry of England, in his claime of supremacy.

Volat. in lib. 21.

An ill reward of a scholler to his Master.

Learned men of our Moderne times.

* A Cittie of Vmbria in Italy.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVI.

¶ Of a simple Groome, borne in Cremona, who vainely perswaded himselfe, that he was the Pope. And of another, that beleeued he was the Emperour. Of diuers others also, who had sundry strange kinds of folly in their braines.

PHisitions haue generally held opinion, hat there are many & sundry kinds of folly. Not many yeares since, there was a meane Groome or Seruant (borne in Cremona) in the Citty of Millayne, who verily perswaded himselfe, that he was the Pope, and had formed a Consistory of Cardinals, Arch-bishops, and Bishoppes, in his Chamber. At a certaine houre in the day (when he had obtained leaue of his Maister) he would seate himselfe in a Chaire, like a new created Pope; deliuering forth his decree to be kissed, entertaining Ambassadors; making Cardinals; dispatching Bulles; and ordaining Officers for the See Apostolique. This honourable kind of folly (wherein he conceiued wonderfull pleasure) beeing qualified and remooued out of his braine: he would returne home againe to his accustomed seruices, without any disturbance, or appearance, that hee was any such manner of man, but onely when his idle fit was vpon him.

Folly in some heads, hath a wonderfull kind of perswasion.

Folly (for the time) mightily preuaileth.

Triumpho de Camarino, a Horse-keeper o Vrbine, who imagined him selfe to be the Emperour.

The Lord Pedro de Vbaldini, a worthy Gentleman and Knight in the Citty of Vrbine, had a Horsse keeper, named Triumpho de Camarino, who when hee came first into his seruice, made it in condition of his bargaine: that hee would haue one houre in the day allowed him, for his owne pleasure and recreation. During which while, hee would locke himselfe close within a Chamber, where no one could come to him without his owne permission: and there he spreads a Curtain of black Cloath vpon the Wall, whereon the Pope was painted with his Cardinals, euen as when he holdeth his full Consistorie, with many Kinges, Princes, Lords, and Christian Captaines. He taking vpon him to be the person of the Emperour (as in his mind he was verily perswaded so to be) hauing a Crowne of Paper vpon his head, and a Bedstaffe (for a Scepter) in his hand: he sate down as among them, and began in the Popes person, to propose diuers thinges concerning the State of Christendome, after this manner.

The Oration of the imagined Emperor (being Triumpho the Horse-keeper) but deliuered in person of the Pope.

My deare Brethren and Children in Iesus Christ, the effect of our meeting thus together, is to aduise ye, that you loue one another with mutuall affection. And likewise to commaund ye, to gouerne your people in all pietie, laying downe Armes, and ceasing Warres among your selues; onelie to fight for the defence of the Christian Faith, afflicted and vexed by Infidels and enraged Turkes. If you doe not (with high and resolued courage) embrace this my proposition; you will at length loose the grace of this world, and the glory of Heauen, and be sent into the infernall Kingdomes, where you shall be tormented eternally. Wherefore, my most happy Children, vnderstand my words louingly, and follow my counsell. Triumpho hauing deliuered these and diuers matters more, in name of the Pope, spitting oftentimes betweene, for shew of greater pontificality: he would answere afterward in the Emperours name (whose habit hee seemed to haue on his backe, and Crowne vpon his head, with these words.

Triumpho his answer, as in the Emperors person.

Saint Peter, you haue said very well, and it would be very fitting, to doe as your Holinesse hath propounded. But would you haue Men to beleeue your perswasions? Begin then your selfe (like a good Pastor) to giue vs good example. And if you cannot doe it: I intend (for mine owne part) to enioy my Kingdomes, without any feare of Turkes, or of Hell it selfe, where I am sure there is some good abiding. For this last night, I dreamed that I was there, in exceeding great contentment, and pleasure of minde. There did I play at Tennis, with many great Lords and Barons. Afterward, we mounted on light and swifter Coursers; then either Sicily, Apulia, Calabria, or Iberia could euer yeild the like. At length, as I was iesting and playing with some of the fayrest and wantonnest Ladies of the world: I espied Lucifer (whose teeth stuck a great way out of his head) issuing forth of a proud Triumpho his dreame of being in Hell, & what pleasures he saw there.

The Deuils kindneſſe to Triumpho.

proud Pallace, to get vp on Horſebacke. And as I purpoſed to run towardes him, to hold his Stirrup with great reuerence: one bad me that I ſhould not goe, for feare he would deuoure me. Neuertheleſſe, I went on boldly without feare, and the gentle Lord gaue me the kindeſt entertainement, that the world could affoord, ſaying to me. My Sonne, thou art now, and at all times ſhalt be moſt hartily welcome hether. And hauing mounted on horſebacke, hee rode thorow his Kingdome, which is inhabited with many people. Afterward, as I was parting thence to goe to dinner; a Gentle Squire came, and ſaid vnto me: Whither goeſt thou Chriſtian Emperour? Thou mayeſt dine heere. Then I anſwered; Doe Men eate in this place? Excellently well and gallantlie, repyed the Squire. Why then (quoth I) if there be ſuch good cheare heere, I wil depart no more from hence, no, in deſpight of Saint Anthonies Beard: ſeeing a man may triumph euer heere, ſpend the time iocondlie, and lead a merrie life. As for you Holy Father (ſpeaking to the Pope) I vnderſtand, that ſuch pleaſures as you take, are domeſtick and priuate, yet more then all other mens, with your children the Cardinals of the holie See, which ſhould be much more lawfull for me. Triumpho hauing deliuered theſe dreames and idle fancies, giuing a loud ſhout: caperd vp from the ground, and began to diſcourſe of great actions, Warres, and garboyles. And taking vp a Curry-combe in his hand, before the ſuppoſed Kinges, Princes, and Lordes, (in name of them all) hee vttered more friuolous ſopperies, then I am able here to write, or relate vpon. And bethinking himſelfe, that his houre or limitation was (by this time) expired; for, at ſome of his priuacies, his follies would extend into more length, then they did at another: he left his Chamber, departing thence with his Bridle, Spunge, & Curry-Combe, to execute his Office about his Horſes, to make cleane his Stable, and diligently performe all other ſeruices, without any opinion of his precedent conceited dignity.

The conclusion of Triumpho, in his ſerious conſultations.

Bridle, ſpunge and Currie-Combe, the Trophees of this imaginary Emperour.

The Lord Pedro meruailing not a little, how the Groome of his Stable ſhould daily beſtow this licenſed hour: concluded to make ſome prooſe thereof, and ſee how his affaires were then managed. Whereupon, hiding himſelfe one day in the next lodging to Triumphoes Chamber; at a rift or cranny in the Wall, he wonne an eye-ſight to the whole paſtime. Calling ſome other of his Houſhold-Seruants beſide, to bee partaker in this Comicall ſport; where they heard all the Horſe-keepers enterparlance with his owne opinion, and ſaw euerie iot of his fantaſticke behauiour. At laſt, when the Lord Pedro perceiued that his mans ſerious buſines was almoſt concluded, he called out aloud to him, ſaying; VVell done Triumpho, I am highly glad, both of thine owne conſolation and thy Countries, that of a poor Horſe-keeper, thou art become the Emperor of Chriſtendome. Let mee therefore entreat thee, while Fortune holdes thee thus happily on the height of her wheele; thou wouldeſt bee pleaſed, to haue ſome remembrance of thy poore Maiſter. Triumpho hearing himſelfe thus called, and perceiuing his priuate conceit to be diſcouered: ſtood amazed like a Bell-founder, when his Mettall hath not taken good ſucceſſe. And ſuch was his fury, that he ſnatcht his Curtaine from the Wall, and with it he inſtantly forſooke the Houſe, without taking leaue of his Maiſter, or any one elſe: nor could it at any time after be knowne, whether he went, or what became of him. By this we may obſerue, that it is the naturall property of a Foole, to thinke himſelfe wiſe.

Triumphoes Comedy was diſcouered by his Lord and Maiſter.

The words of Lord Pedro to Triumpho.

The fury of Triumpho vpon his diſcouery.

And therefore I conclude, that in this World there is no greater quietneſſe, then for a Man to content himſelfe with his owne eſtate, as did this poore Triumpho de Camarino: who perſwading himſelfe to bee an Emperour, the meere imagination auailed as much with him, as if he had bin really the very man indeede.

Contentation is an eſpeciall benefit.

Thraſyllaus Axoneus fell into ſo ſtrange a follie, that he verilie beleeued, that al the Shippes which arriued in the Port or Hauen, were his owne. And therefore (vpon this ſtronge perſwaſion) alwaies before they came to take landing: with a cheareſull countenance, and hart highlie contended; he would walke forth (a large diſtance from the road) to meete them as they came. In like manner, when they did ſet out againe on any voyage, either for the Eaſt or Weſt: he would beare them company a great way, and praying them to bee care-

Elianus in his fourth Booke calleth him Thraſyllus.

Athenæus in lib 12. Cap. vlt.

careful of his goods and Merchandizes, wish them all fortunate successe. This humour being noted by his Brother Criton, newly there arriued with his Merchandise from Sicilie: he caused diuers wise and learned Phisitions, to take paines for his recouery, who in helping this fond humour, robd him of his chiefest contentment. And beeing afterward remembred of this strange folly: he would sigh many times, & sollemnly sweare, that hee neuer liued more pleasingly, then while that perswasion held him, because in all that time, hee neuer felt any greefe, sadnesse, or annoyance. They make report of another Man, who kept diuers Cats, wherein he took great delight and pleasure; perswading himselfe, and telling to others, that they were Lyons.

Aelianus in lib. 4. Cap. 7.

Arist. in lib. 6. de Anim.

Aristotle declareth, that there was a Man in Abydos, who beeing ouercome with a foolish humour, would go daily to the Theater, & there (as if he would recite a whole Comedy himselfe) performe al the actions in such cases required, not respecting who beheld or heard him; and yet this humour afterward left him. He saith moreouer, that there was an Hoast in Tarentum, who would walke abroad all the night time, and diligently attend his businesse all the day, carrying (both night and day) the Key of his Hoastory hanging at his Girdle; neuer loosing it, neither could it bee stolne or got from him, by very cautelous and crafty attempts.

Arist. vbi. sup.

Plutarch reporteth in his Morals, that the Mylesian Virgines were ouercome with a wonderfull folly; for, without any respect, teares, entreaties, and perswasions of Parents and Friends, they would suddenly strangle and hang themselues, neither could any remedy bee found to preuent them. At length, the Mylesians being assembled in the Senate house, to deliberate on this strange inconuenience: one among them (being a very graue and wise man) aduised them to make a Law, that if any more of them should so destroy themselues, of what condition soeuer she were, she should be stript starke naked, and so bee laid in the midst of the Market-place, to be shamefully seene of all the world, and haue no other buriall allowed her. This councell being generally approoued, and published by Edict: the Virgines were thereby stricken with such feare and terrour, that the humour which made them dreadlesse of death, immediatly ceased. As being more fearefull and respectiue of dishonour and infamy, then of paine or death: because they could by no meanes endure, that their naked bodies should be seene, either aliue or dead, and shame (after death) they reputed to bee a Virgines highest dishonour.

Plutarch in Moral. Cap. 9. A strange folly in virgines to destroy themselues.

Shame after death more respected and feared, then death it selfe.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of diuers Men and Weomen that haue voluntarilie slaine and destroyed themselues.

IN the first Ages, there were many, that voluntarily shortned their owne liues, among whom, Ælianus recordeth Hippona, a Grecian Lady, who being taken by Pyrates, and hearing a determination among them, that they purposed to make spoile of her virginity: she so choisely prized the honour of her chastity, that, seeing no other waie left to preserue it, she leapt into the Sea, & so (by drowning) saued hir Virgine vertue. Calanus the Indian Philosopher, one of the learned and wise Brachmanes, hauing bidden farewel to Alexander the Great and his Macedonians, at such time as he desired to leaue this life: caused a pile of Wood to bee prepared ready, which was dry, sweet, and odoriferous (to wit, of Cedar, Cypres, Myrrhe, and Laurell) in a Towne of Babylon. And making a wreath of Reede Leaues; hee crowned his head there-with, then mounted, and laid himselfe along vpon the pile, honouring the Sunne. So, couering his face, the Macedonians gaue fire to the pile, and he neuer stirred a iot, when the fire flamed fiercely about him; but lay still constantly, without mooning eyther hand or foot, and in this sacrifice yeildeth vp his Soule. Hereupon one saith, that Alexander wondering at this constancy

Aelianus in lib. 5. Cap. 7.

Hyppona a Lady of Greece.

Strabo in Lib. 15. Calanus, one of the Brachmanes.

Valerius Maximus in lib. 1. Cap. 8.

The words of Alexander concerning Calanus.

ſtancy, inſtantly ſaid. Calanus hath conquered more potent Enemies, then euer I could doe. For I haue but fought againſt Porus, Taxiles, and Darius onely: but Calanus hath fought both againſt labour and Death. Cicero writeth, that when Calanus went to death, and mounted vpon the pile of Wood, he ſaid. O faire departure from life, ſeeing (as it happened to Hercules) after that this Mortall bodie is burned, the Spirit then goeth into light.

Cicero in lib. 1. de diuinat.

Cicero in lib. 1. de Tuſculan.

Cleombrotus of Ambracia, hauing read Platoes Booke of the Immortality of the Soule: threw himſelfe from an high Wall, head-long into the Sea. Cato Vtican, hauing read alſo the ſame Booke; pierced his owne body with a Dagger. Ariſtarchus the Alexandrian Grammarian, Schoole-maiſter to the Sonne of Ptolomie Philomator, being ſicke of the Dropſie; ſuffered himſelfe to dye thorow want of eating. The like did Eratoſthenes the Cyrenean, Scholler to the Poet Callimachus, & keeper of the Library to Ptolomy Philadelphus. Charondas the Thebane, made a law, that no man ſhold come armed into the Councell Conſiſtorie: was once found himſelfe there armed (not thinking thereon) as hee came newly out of the field. And after that hee which ſate next him, had put him in mind of the ſaid Law: hee ſtabd his Ponyard into his owne breaſt, albeit he might well haue diſſembled, or defended his fault. Hannibal being vanquiſhed by Sciopio, fled to Pruſias, King of Bythinia, for ſafety: but being doubtfull of his fidelitie, becauſe he beheld Flaminius ſent thither, as Ambaſſadour from the Romaines; hee poyſoned himſelfe, of his owne meere motion therevnto.

Valerius Maximus, in tit. de Iuſt.

Plutar. in vit. de Hannib.

Mithridates the younger, hauing maintained Warre for the ſpace of ſixe and fifty yeares againſt the Romaines; ſeized Aſia; impriſoned the chiefe commaunders of the * Opie, and of Aquilia; beſiedged Rhodes; and wonne Athens by Archelaus his Lieutenant. After all theſe great fortunes, he being firſt conquered by Lucullus, next by Pompey, and afterward by Pharnax, his owne moſt ingratefull Sonne, who forſooke his Father, and tooke part with Pompey: drunke a poyſon, whereof being not able to die (in regard of an Antidote and counter-poyſon, which he was compelled to take) ſlew himſelfe, by the helpe of a French Souldionr, named Vitigius. Monyma the Myleſian Lady, and Veronica, borne in Chios, both Wiues to the fore-named Mithridates, after they vnderſtood (by the Eunuch Bacchides) the miſerable fortune of their Husband; they would liue no longer in further diſaſter. Monyma hung or ſtrangled her ſelfe, and becauſe the Cord brake, by weight of her body; ſhee compelled Bacchides to cut her throat. And Veronica kneeling mournfully by her, dranke vp a full Cup of poyſon. Statira and Roxana, Siſters alſo to the ſame Mithridates, who had kept their virginity the ſpace of forty yeares: bare company with their Brother in death, by drinking each a draught of poyſon.

People by the Riuer Indus.

Valer. Maxim. in lib. 2. cap. 7.

Monyma and Veronica, the wiues to Mithridates.

Statira and Roxana, ſiſters to Mithridates.

Decebalus, King of the Dacians (as Dion Caſſianus reporteth) beeing vanquiſhed by Traiane: ſlew himſelfe with his owne hand, becauſe he would not fall into the Romaines power, and yet not withſtanding, his head was afterward carried to Rome. Sardanapalus threw himſelfe into a flaming fire. Lucretia, a worthy Romaine Ladie, and the bright Lampe of Chaſtitie, hauing her honor violated by the infamous Tyrant Tarquine, Sonne to proud Tarquine: publikely ſlew her ſelfe, by ſtabbing a Dagger in her faire breaſt, to the end, that the people might reuenge her iniurie and ſhame, and aboliſh the Dominion of the Kings in Rome.

Dion. Caſſianus in lib. 4.

Titus Liuius in lib. 1. Dec. 1.

Portia, Daughter to Cato, hearing tydings of her Husband Brutus, that he was conquered, and ſlaine in the fieldes before Philippi: when ſhe could come by no Weapon to deſtroy her ſelfe, ſhee deuoured burning Coales, and ſo purſued her Husband in death. Cleopatra, Queene of Ægypt, after the death of Marke Anthony, ſhe remaining Captiue in the power of Auguſtus: compaſſed her death by the byting of a Serpent, as Cæſar himſelfe made repreſentation of the manner, in an Image which he brought with him in triumph to Rome, as one of his Trophees of that victory. Næera, and Charmione, wayting Maides on Queene Cleopatra, followed her preſently alſo by voluntary death.

Portia the Daughter to graue and wiſe Cato.

Cleopatra Q. of Egypt.

Many other great perſons haue periſhed, in the like diſaſtrous and miſerable manner, whoſe Hiſtories would aske ouer

The names of many that yeilded themselues to voluntary death

ouer long time in repetition, and therefore I will but set downe their names onely. As Dolabella, Licinius Macer, L. Syllanus, C. Marius the younger, and Fannius Cepio. Nero, Otho, Galerius, Adrian, Florian, Iulian, and Diocleſian, Emperors. Gordianus the elder, Labeo Marſes, and Papyrius the Romaine. M. Lollius, Proculeius, Magnentius, Argobaſtus, Gunimilda, wife to Aſmund, King of the Danes. Hadingo, Ro'nond, and Starcaterus, Kings of the Danes. Pedro des Vignes, the Lawyer of Capua, in the time of Ferdinand the ſecond Emperor, Eccelinus the Tyrant, and Galeacenius Mantuanus, who more voluntarily & fooliſhly (then any of the other before named) ranne vpon his owne death; as Iouianus Pontanus hath recorded. For he wintering at Pauia, became very extreamelie enamoured of a beautifull young Damoſell, and would oftentimes tell her: that he could endure a thouſand harms (if ſo many were poſſible to be ſuffered) for her ſake, if ſhe but pleaſed to commaund him. Whereupon, ſhe commanded him (in ieſt) to leap into the Riuer: which he preſently did, and was there drowned, before he could be relieued.

Iouianus Pontanus, concerning the death of Galeas of Mantua.

Baiazeth Prince and Emperour of the Turkes.

Baiazeth, Prince and Emperor of the Turkes, being taken on the Confines of Armenia, in a great conflict and battaile betweene him and Great Tamberlaine: was brought before the Scythian King, who cauſed him to be put vp in a Cage of Iron, and led along with him whereſoeuer he went; letting him liue by no other meates, but what fell (as ſcraps) from his Table, and pieces of bread caſt to him, euen as contemptuouſly as men do to Dogs. At all times likewiſe, when he would mount vp on horſebacke, or into his chariot: Baiazeth muſt be taken forth out of his Cage, and brought before him, faſt bound in mighty and maſſie Chaines of Gold, and he would ſet his feet on his back, ſo to get vp into his Chariot, or on horſeback. This ſhould ſerue as a mirror to miſerable men, neuer to repoſe any confidence in greatneſſe, or vaine wealth of this World: conſidering, that he who had conquered ſo many people, and won ſo many Cities; was taken, and made Slaue to him, that had bin but a ſilly heardſman, and ended his daies miſerably in a Cage of Iron. When Tamberlaine was returned home into Scythia, he made a magnificent triumph, for his victory obtained againſt this Baiazeth. And hauing prepared an vnualuable Feaſt, with all ſumptuous furniſhment thereto appertaining, for all his principall Lords and Commaunders in Scythia: he cauſed the Cage to be brought before thē, wherein was Baiazeth, his Empreſſe and wife alſo (who was taken with him) attending thereon. With whom this barbarous man dealt ſo inhumainly, that her garments were cut off iuſt at hir Nauil, whereby her parts of ſhame and ſecrecy were nakedly diſcerned; and thus did ſhe waite there before his gueſts. The miſerable Prince of Turks, ſeeing his Queen thus deſpightfully entreated; grieued beyond meaſure, and deuiſed how hee might beſt end his wearieſome life. But being deſtitute of all meanes, or any Inſtrument for the ſpeedier execution: he did beat his head ſo often and violentlie againſt the bars of Iron; that his brains ſtarting forth, hee there concluded his wretched and infortunate life.

Tamberlaine his vnmanlie vſage to Bazazeths Q.

CHAP. XXVIII.

How good and profitable it is, for a Man to liue ſoberly. And that all ſuch as were Enemies thereto; haue likewiſe bin hatefull to Honor and Vertue.

Greatneſſe, Riches, and all this worlds pompe is but meere vanity.

IT is no way to be doubted, but that Nature can content & ſuffice her ſelfe with little; and feeding out of order and exceſſiuely, hath bin the occaſion of many diſeaſes. To approue the truth hereof, let the vnbeleeuer read the ancient Bookes of Phiſick, wherein he ſhall find, that our betters and predeceſſors, were ſuch friends to ſobrietie: that they would eate but a piece of Bread in the morning onelie, and feed on a little fleſh at ſupper, without any other diuerſitie of Viands, ſuch as are vſed in theſe daies of ours, with numberleſſe Sauces, and meates vpon meats, and then a ſecond courſe afterward. During all which ſeruices, Abono ad mala, a man is forced to ſit at the Table two or three hours at the leaſt. And this

The leaſt allowance contenteth nature.

The healthful diet of our fore-fathers, was the onely reaſon of their long life and this is the reason, why those of elder times (who knew no such superfluities) liued so long, and free from so many monstrous diseases. In regard heereof also, the Romaines, Arcadians, and Lusitanians, or Portugalles, remained so long a time without Phisitions, and sobriety of life (onely) defended them from all infirmities.

The Spartanes choysest delicates.

The very greatest delicates, which the Spartanes vsed in their dyet, was a certaine kind of blacke Broath or Pottage, much like to melted Pitch; the cost whereof, did not amount to aboue three Solz, tenne whereof doe make an English Penny.

The Persians dyet.

The Persians, Men so exceedingly disciplined, did neuer eate any other Meate with their Bread, but a few Water-Carres, or Cresses.

K. Artaxerxes his food.

Artaxerxes, Brother to Cyrus, beeing put to flight by his Enemies: fed on dryed Figs and Barly Bread, and greatly complained, that he had liued so long, without experimenting so sweete and sauoury a kind of food.

Pompey his fare in Egypt, in a poore Countrey mans house.

Pompey, trauayling thorough Ægypt, where his people could hardlie follow him, he beeing verie hungry, with-drew himselfe to the small Cottage of a poore Countrey Husbandman, who gaue him a piece of Rie-bread to feed on. And this great King swore, that (in all his life time) hee did neuer tast better foode; and euer afterward, he held all costly and precious kindes of Bread in scorne, which hee had formerly vsed.

The Lord Antonio d'Ona a Spanyard.

The Lord Antonio d'Ona, a Spaniard, hauing entertained an old man (aged aboue an hundred yeares) to dine with him, and setting excessiue fare before him, as hee vsed to all others that came to his Table; the good olde man said vnto him. My Lord, if I had bin dieted (in my youth) at such Tables as yours; you must think, I had neuer attained to these yeares: but by liuing soberly, you see how God hath blessed me. We need then make no doubt; but that sobriety of life, is the occasion of our long continuance in this world, & our preseruation in soundnesse of health.

Sobriety is the occasion of long life.

All such as haue beene contemners therof, their liues haue had no length, and they were vtter enemies to honor and vertue. Such was Caligula, Claudius, Heliogabalus, Vitellius, Verus, Tiberius, Maximinus, and infinite others.

The enemies to Honor and Vertue.

On the contrary side, it hath beene obserued, that the affecters of sober life, (men, as it were, euén made of Diuinity, such as Augustus, Alexander Seuerus, Paulus Æmilius, Epaminondas, &c.) witnessed their loue to Honour and Vertue, and dyed in all the fulnesse of their daies.

The Louers of Sobriety.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Rodericke, the last King of the race Royall of the Gothes: And how (thorow his owne incontinency) he lost not onely his Kingdome, but his life also.

IN the yeare of our saluation, 747. Rodericke raigned King in Spaine, who being pierced to the quicke, with the little God and blinde Archers Arrowes: became exceedingly passionate, for the loue of the daughter to Count Iulian of Cantabria. And coueting (in ouer-burning desires) to gather the fruites of his hot affections: he essaied all meanes possible to compasse his pleasure. But in regard that the honest and sober countenance of the Virgine, as also the presence of her Father, were maine opposites to him in reaching the height of his appetite; hee therfore sent Count Iulian Ambassador into France, and in the meane while, made a rape of his Daughters chastitie.

Rodericke affecteth the Daughter to Iulian, Count of Cãtabria, & in the absence of her father, rauisheth her.

Iulian, at his returning into Spain, heard (far enough off) the shame & violence committed on his daughter. And when he vnderstood it also by her owne complaint, both the meanes, manner, and euerie circumstance: hee dissembled it cunningly in the Kinges presence, as if he knew not of such sinne committed; but champed on the bit for diuers daies together, still pondering on the aptest occasions, whereby he might compasse to be reuenged.

Count Iulian concealeth the knowledg of his Daughters wrongs.

After he had considered sufficientlie on his wrong, hee with-drew himselfe into Affrica, to the City of * Leptis, where resorting to Muzza, Gouernour of Affrica: he declared vnto him, point by point, the iniury which King Rodericke had done him. Whereto he added,

* Leptis Sarrana the Citty Mahumeta in Affrica, between the two Sirtes ded, that for reparation of this wrong, he was thus come to implore his assistance: in recompence whereof he offered him a verie rich and goodly Empire, which he would reduce vnder his obedience. For he told him, that the time was now come, when hee might reuenge those Arabes, which had beene slaine in the precedent yeares, by the Armies of King Bamba. Hee further assured him, that he was so much fauored by the very greatest Lords in Spain, beside his owne Friendes and Kinred; who (in meere pittie of his disgrace) would all be in readinesse to helpe this enterprise. For the King was mortally hated of them all, in regard of his rapes, cruelties, and extortions, which continually he imposed vpon his people.

Muzza hauing heard the Countes speeches, sent him to King Vlit, residing them in Arabia, and he hauing likewise deliberated on Count Iulians iust complaint: returned him backe againe with his Letters to Muzza, commaunding him to lend him ayde, and what fauour else hee could affoord in so vrgent a case. After that Muzza had receiued this aduise from his King, hee gaue him an hundred Horse, and foure hundred foote Souldiers: vnder the charge and conduct of a valiant Captaine, named Tariffa, who crossing the Seas, came into Spaine with his troups. And that he might giue the more assured pain and molestation to the enemy; his people builded a Citty, which (after their Captaines name) they called Tariffa. Iulian hauing made knowne to his Friends and Confederates in Spaine; the occasion of his thus returning, and the desire he had (in Iustice and reason) to reuenge the outrage doone by the King: many of them (vnder-taking his cause) ioyned themselues with the Arabes, ouer-running and rauaging all the Country of Algazara, where the saide Count Iulian had before bin Gouernor for the said King.

Muzza sent Count Iulian to King Vlit in Arabia, who commaunded assistance in the wronged Counts behalfe.

Count Iulian acquainted his Friends in Spain with his returne.

The Arabes of Affrica, perceiuing the successefull progresse of the Count, in sollemne earnest, and without deceipt: they sent him twelue thousand Horse more, and a great number of the Infanterie, youthfull, gallant, & braue resolued Spirits. Vpon this occasion, King Rodericke expedited a great Army against them, vnder the conduct of his Cozin Don Inigo: who fighting many times with the Moores (but still with bad successe) not onely lost his life; but all the rest were likewise hewen in pieces. The Moores proceeding on still without impeachment, ouer-ran and spoyled a great part of Spaine; by meanes whereof, Rodericke raised a much greater Army then the former, and came himselfe hand to hand with the Moores: so that a dreadfull and terrible battaile happened betweene them, which continued eight whole daies together, for in the night time, they retired into their Rampires. But the two Sonnes to the late King Vitizzo (whom the Brother to Rodericke had slaine, and vsurped the Kingdome) reuolting from him: were the cause of the Moores becomming Conquerors. And Rodericke, though he carried himselfe so valiantly, and performed (in his owne person) incredible seruices: yet was he (neuertheless) vanquished and slaine, and all his pertakers forces broken and foyled. This battaile was begun on Sunday, beeing the fift day of Iuly, betweene the breake of day and Sun-rising, in the yeare of our Redemption 750. neere to Xeres, and by the Riuer Bedalack. This History may serue as an enstruction to Princes, that before they offer shame or outrage to any one; they would well aduise and consider with themselues, what may be the end of such bad attempts.

Rodericke sent his Cozin Don Inigo with a power against the Moores.

A Battaile lasting eight whole dayes together.

King Rodericke foyled and slaine.

The supply sent to the Count by the Arabes of Affrica.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Sarqua, who craftily deceiued Stirades, a most Noble young Gentleman, and put him cruelly to death.

AMong the Ladies that attended on Queene Valasca, there was one, named Sarqua, endued with goodlie feature, both of face & body: but prouided of as bad a mind, malliciously enclined to all wickednes. She bethinkinking her selfe, how to be reuenged on a young Bohemian Knight, called Stirades, a very Noble Youth, Read Aeneas Syluius, in his History of Bohemia, the 8. Chapter.

The treason plotted against young Stirades.

that sharply pursued Valasca and all her traine, so that she had no greater an Enemy thē he: concluded to betray him, and in such manner as shall be declared. She calling some of the other Ladies to hir, caused them to binde her fast by the hands and feete, to the body of a Tree in a very thick forrest: leauing a Huntsmans Horne by her, and a Bottle full of liquor, called Medon. Being thus fast bound, the rest of the warlike Ladyes, ambushed themselues in the Wood, somewhat out of the way, but not far from the place of her abiding.

Stirades vsed often to hunt in this Forrest, and comming thither this day, (as he did at other times) with his Men and Hounds, riding on in the wood; he espyed the Lady fastned to the Tree. And being mooued with compassion, stayed his Horse, demaunding, how, and for what cause she was thus brought thither? Whereunto Sarqua thus replyed. It cannot be (good Gentleman) but you are very well acquainted with the disorders committed by Valasca in this Countrey, while shee attributeth the Kingdomes authority to her selfe. I (too much vnaduised) haue beene of her faction, and delighted (for a while) to follow her follies, wherein I failed (I confesse) and repenting at length so foule a transgression: I resolued to forsake so bad a Mistresse. Seeking to haue a companion in my flight and escape; I was betrayed, discouered, surprized, and brought hither, where the murdereresse purposed to behold my punnishment. But as she and her company were all about me, and had bound me in this manner as you see: they heard the opening of your Hounds, and neighing of your Horses, which made them take their flight, and leaue mee in the case you found me. Seeing then that Fortune hath conducted you to this place, and in such a needfull season for mee: I beseech ye (valiant Sir) euen by your true Noblenes, that you would be pleased to pitty a miserable Creature. Vnbind me (I intreat ye) and guid me some where else; if the guiltinesse of my sin be no hindrance, for obtaining such an especiall blessing from ye. Otherwise, draw forth your Sword, and pierce me there-with to the hart, rather then permit me to liue in this torment. For you shall be no sooner departed hence; but all those cruell women will come again, and then they will fall vpon mee like so many Serpents, to teare my body, and make me liue in multiplicity of tormēts.

Stirades tooke pitty on his subtile betrayer.

Stirades, being mooued to pitty, partly by the Ladies teares, which flowed in some aboundance from her eyes, and partly by some sudden apprehension of her beauty: alighted from his Horse, cut the Cords which bound her to the tree, & comforting her with gentle language, desired to know, what might be the meaning of the Horne and Bottle? Whereto (still weeping) she thus answered. Know Sir, that those murderers brought hither this Bottle, to lengthen out my life by the liquor therein, to the end that my torments might bee the greater. But blessed be God for our arriuall here in so happy an hour, to be my release, and the meanes of my drinking now in safty. This said, she set the Bottell to her mouth and dranke, and then deliuering it to Stirades, he dreading no danger, but to expresse his kindnesse & affection to the Lady, in regard he was thirstie also, drunke of the deceiuing drinke to any other then her selfe; for it was compounded of white Hony, according to a custome obserued among the Bohemians, healthful for women, but irkesome and offensiue to men. And indeed, Sarqua (being as arteficiall a Poysoner and Socereresse, as her Mistresse) had charmed the drinke with Hearbs & enchantments in such manner, that, by little and little, it tooke away all sense and vnderstanding from Stirades. Then the false woman seeing him nere to such condition as she sought to bring him in; tooke the horn, and said vnto him. This horne they intended to hang about my necke when I was dead, as a marke and ensigne to such as shold passe this way, that (in my life time) I had bin a Huntresse. But now, in meere despight of them, I will winde this Horne, to let them know, to their shame, that I am still liuing. So, winding the Horne, she blew a blast, that made all the wood to ring with the sound thereof. Instantlie rushed foorth Valasca, with a band of her Ladies all armed, who killing al that accompanied the deceiued Gentleman: seazed on him, and binding him fast, led him along with them, till they came before

The deceitful speeches vsed by Sarqua to Stirades.

A deceitfull drink, healthful to women, but hurtful to men.

Valasca & her band of armed Ladies killed the followers of Stirades, and afterward tormented him vpon the wheele to death.

The wonderfull trecherie in a woman.

before the Caſtle of Viſſagrada, where, in the ſight of Primiſlaus, King of the Bohemians, and all the people that were on the Walles: they did put him to death by the torment of the Wheele, a death which the Bohemians did repute, to be the moſt infamous of all other. Such was the end, of the gentle, valiant, young and wealthy Stirades; beguiled by the feigned teares and ſubtile perſwaſions, of cruell and diſloyall Weomen.

CHAP. XXXI.

Of three Gentle-weomen, who became all amourous of a Gentleman at one inſtant, without any ſuite or motion made vnto them; And by what meanes it happened.

Vrbine a City of great antiquity.

THe Citty of Vrbine, is reputed to bee one of the moſt ancient Citties in all Italy, as may be gathered by the Books of Pliny, and of Cornelius Tacitus. It is not now aboue ſixeſcore yeares, ſince this Cittie was ſubdued by the Countes of Ferrara, and of thoſe Countes deſcended one, named Otho, who made himſelfe Duke of Vrbine, and who ſuffered himſelfe to be ſo ouer-ſwayed by voluptuous pleaſures: that both by power and violence, he abuſed, defloured, and violated, not onely many virgins, but likewiſe maried wiues of very worthy houſes, inferiour to none in the Citty or Dukedome of Vrbine, without any reſpect, eyther of conſanguinitie, Nobilitie in blood, or age. In breefe, his abuſe was generall, and his owne will euerie where followed; being accompanied with another, as bad as himſelfe, who was called the Pregnotary of Carpa. And therefore they were both ſlaine at one time, in a popular tumult, becauſe their inſolencies were inſupportable. Alſo, their priuy members were put into their mouths, and their naked bodies laid in the open Market place: to ſerue as an example to all other, that afterward ſhould abuſe the honeſty of weomen.

An impudent and laſciuious Prince.

A iuſt and deſerued puniſhment for ſuch leud incontinency.

This wicked Father, had yet a good Son, that ſucceeded him, named Guydo, who feared God, was valiant and magnanimous, and was ſo fortunate in his marriage, that his wife deſcended of the houſe of the Colonnes. And this Dutches (for her great vertues) was held to be the chiefeſt, both for good grace and modeſty, that liued in thoſe times. And therefore many Noble and worthy perſons, as well Men as Women, had a deſire to the houſe of this Duke of Vrbine, and to be of his Court. Among others, was the Lord Gaſpar Paluoiſine, one of the moſt valiant Gentlemen in all Lombardie. Caſar Gonzagua, Robert de Barry, Frederick Fregoſa, who was Archbiſhop of Salerne. Count Lodowicke, who was Byſhop of Bayeux. The Lord Octauian, who was Duke of Gennes. Bernardo Bibierna, who was Cardinall de Saint Marie aux Portiques. The Magnifico, who was Duke de Nemours; and Great Maiſter of Frances. France Maria Rouero, who was Preſect or Bayliffe of Rome, and many other, not forgetting Pietro Bembo, who was Secretarie to Pope Leo.

Guydo a good Prince, & the dignity of his Court in Noble attendants.

As for Ladies and Gentle-women, it ſhall be needleſſe to name them: onelie I am to ſpeake of three, who were then in his Court, and who became all amourous (at one time) of one Gentleman, without any ſuite or ſollicitation made vnto them. By which diſcourſe, wee may perceiue the great power of Loue, and learne, not to mock or ſcorne at ſuch, as fall into the like accidents: becauſe, that all Men and Women are ſubiect thereunto, at leaſt, very few, that can tearm themſelues to be free or exempted. Becauſe I will hold the Reader no longer in ſuſpence, we will proceede to the Hiſtory.

Three Gentlewomen of the Court.

The Soueraigne power and prerogatiue of loue.

It happened on a day, that a faire and honeſt Gentlewoman, attending on the fore-ſaid Dutcheſſe of Vrbine; reputed to be vertuous and well aduiſed (being of the houſe of the Vipades of Florence, Gentlemen of great Antiquity) did vſe amity towards a Gentleman of Sienna, attending alſo in the Duke of Vrbines Court. Day by day affection encreaſed, and the young Gentleman declared like correſpondency; but the meanes wanted of ſight, and conferring together. Becauſe, as euerie one verie well knoweth, that the Weomen and Maidens of Italie, haue (from all times of Antiquitie) beene held in great subiection.

The Vipades of Florence, a houſe of great antiquity.

Women and Maids of Italy kept in continual ſubiection.

The Gentle-woman, incited by extreamitie of passion; discouered her minde to another Woman, by whose meanes she hoped to finde some conuenient remedy. This other Gentlewoman, neither in Nobility, or in beauty, was any iot inferior to the first. Whervpon it happened, that she hearing the other speake so affectionately of the Gentleman, whom she had neuer seen, and knowing withall, that the Gentlewoman (reputed very discreete, and of good iudgement) did affect him in all extreamity: she began to imagine immediatly; that he was the very goodliest, wisest, most discreete, and absolute Gentleman, and best worthy to be beloued, before any other man in the World. And so, without hauing euer seene him likewise, she grew so strongly enamoured of him: that shee began (soone after) not for her friend; but for her selfe, to acquire and purchase his equall correspondency in loue to her. Which to do, it had beene no Herculean labour for her: because in very deed, she was more worthy to be sued vnto, then in her selfe to sue to any other.

The diuers & sundry effects of Loue.

Loue is iustly tearmed to be a blind guide.

But now we must lend attention to another matter, much more worthy of admiration. Within some short while after, it came to passe, that a Letter, (written by this latter Gentlewoman to her Louer) happened to the hands of a third very Noble and vertuous Ladie. Who being (as the most part of Women are) curious, and inquisitiue in the knowledge of secrets, especially of other Weomen: opened the Letter, and as she read it, she well perceiued, that it was written by one, who was ouer head and eares (as we vse to say) in extreamity of affection. For the words were set downe so graciously, and carryed such a sprightly heate in reading: that, first of all, they vrged her to compassionate the Gentle-woman, because she well knew, from whom the missiue came, and to whom it was directed. Next, they were of such force and efficacy, that laying them to her owne heart, and considering withall, what kind of man he must needes bee, that could induce this Gentle-woman to Ouer-much curiosity and enquiry, doth great harme oftentimes.

The wonder full power & efficacy of a Letter.

to such feruent affection: presently likewise she grew amourous of him, and the power of the Letter was as preuailing with her, euen as if it had bin sent from her selfe to the Gentleman. And, as many times it comes to passe, that poison prepared in meat for some great Lord, killeth the first that tasteth of it: so fared it with this poore Lady, who being ouer greedy, swallowed downe the amourous venome, which was prepared for another body.

An apt similitude or comparison.

What should I neede to write any more? The effect sufficiently declared it selfe. And it often falleth out, that many Ladies and Gentle-women (beside these of whom wee speake) partly to worke despight to others, and partlie to do as others do: they labour with all paine and industry, to preuent or forestall one another in their loues, sporting with their owne affections, as children doe with Cherries; til they fall into the like opinion conceiued by these Gentle-women, each of them prouing the Spurre, to the others amourous incitation.

Valentinus Barruchius, a Spaniard writeth, that a Dutchesse of Sauoy, became extreamely amourous of a Spanish Knight, of the Family of the Mendozaes; albeit shee had neuer seene him. But only heard a Sister of the said Mendoza (named Isabella) say, that in going to Rome on Pilgrimage for deuotion, shemet the said Dutchesse (beeing an English-woman by Nation) on the way, taking the ayre for her recreation, by the Riuer of Pau, and seeing her, saide aloud. O would it pleased GOD, that this Princesse and my Brother were maried together: one might then safely say, they were the most excellent couple (for beauty and perfection) that all Europe afforded. Vpon these very words, the Dutches grew so exceedingly passionate in loue, to the Knight whom she had neuer seene: that shee feigned a sickenesse, euen to the death, making a vow, whereby she promised, that if she escaped, she would goe on foote to Saint Iames de Compostella in Spaine, onelie to winne occasion and meanes, whereby to see her beloued Mendoza, and so shee did. But this hypocrisie and counterfeit deuotion, had almost valued her life and honor; yea, and Mendozaes also. Nevertheless, theleſſe, God preſerued them both in the greateſt danger, and ſuffered them to be married together, ſome few years after. But becauſe the Hiſtory is written at large in ſo many Languages; I forbeare any further relation thereof.

The Dutches of Sauoy became amourous of Don Mendoza, a Spaniard, hauing neuer seene him.

Loue can enforce a feigned Religion, and vowes.

To conclude, it appeareth by theſe, and many other Hiſtories, that among all the moſt grieuous paſſions, which ordinarily doe beſiedge the mindes of Men and Women; Loue hath almoſt daily held the chiefeſt place. For, after he hath once faſtned hold vpon ſome generous Subiect, he purſueth the Nature of the corrupting humor, as in ſuch as haue a Feauer: which taketh his originall at the hart, and then walketh (incurably) through all the ſenſible partes of a mans body. Whereof our forerecited Hiſtories, do make ample proofe, being no leſſe admirable, then true and certaine.

Loue is the chiefeſt of all other paſſions

CHAP. XXXII.

That the change of Habits and Apparrell, taken by one people from another; hath oftentimes proued a certaine ſigne, of being ſpoyled, rauaged, or molleſted by that Nation, whom they effected to imitate in their Garments.

Monſier de la Noue, in his French diſcourſes.

THe Lord de la Noue, alleageth in his learned diſcourſes, many ſignes or ſhewes, when any Eſtate tendeth to his owne ruine: drawne both from naturall thinges in Diuinitie, and ſententious ſayings, of auncient prophane Authors. Neuertheleſſe, he hath forgotten one thing, to wit; change or alteration of our wearing Garments: which hath beene heedefully obſerued, not onely in our daies, but likewiſe in all former antiquity. For, when a people tooke a fantaſticke pleaſure, to attire and cloath themſelues, after the faſhions of ſome ſtrange Nation: it fell out very often, that they were molleſted, warred vpon, yea, and ſubiected by the Nation, whom they apiſhlie imitated in their idle faſhions of Habits. We will beginne then with ſuch matters, as haue beene knowne to happen in our times.

Prognoſticke euents by wearing of other country garments.

The greater part of the Grecians, which dwelled in Cities, and followed the Warres, about the yeare 420. before they were made Slaues vnto the Turkes, they cloathed and apparrelled themſelues after the Turkiſh manner. And that which is more, they that were were wont to weare long beards; which well became them, and gaue them faire Ornaments; they would ſhaue them cleane away, except the long Muſtachioes onely, and practiſe how elſe to follow them in all their actions. As was too well noted in them of Chalcondila, who likewiſe (very ſoone after) fel into their ſeruile ſubiection.

Grecians that imitated the Turkes in their fantaſticke Garments.

The Portugalles, a little before they loſt their King, named Don Sebaſtian, who was ſlaine in Affrica, in a battaile giuen againſt the King of Fez: attired themſelues after the Caſtillian manner, and all the Nobleſt perſons and Courtiers, practiſed nothing more then to ſpeake Caſtillian; forſaking their owne natural language, which is the moſt ornate and eloquent tongue, that euer was ſpoken in all the Spaines. It came to paſſe, that the ſaide King Sebaſtian, hauing left no Succeſſour behinde him in Portugall: King Phillip of Caſtille, King of all the other Realmes of the Spaines, found himſelfe to be the neereſt in ſucceſſion, and made himſelfe King, partly by right; and partly by terrour, as beeing a moſt potent Monarcke. And the Portugalles obeyed him, and (euen to this day) are vnder his commaund: notwithſtanding, the deadlie hatred borne them by the Portugals, for foure hundred years hitherto, or thereabout; albeit, that the Kingdome of Portugall was Feudatorie to the King of Caſtille.

The Portugals clothed themſelues like to Caſtillians.

The * Liuonians, a Northerne people. inhabiting not farre off from Ruſſia (ouer whom the Brothers, called Porte-glaines, other-wiſe tearmed Knightes Teutones commaunded) ſome yeares before they were ſubiected by the Duke of Moſcouia; thoſe Knights went in Habite verie like to the Moſcouites, greatly following them in their manners, and barbarous behauiour of life. For they became Deceiuers, Exacters; Drunkards, went cloathed in long Gownes, making reuerence after the order of our Cowled religious Monkes, as the Moscouites vse to doe, in bowing or ducking their heades forward. Also, when they drinke and Baechanallize, they say, they doe it like the Moscouites. In breefe, it was such an ill presage for them, that within a small while afterward (which was in the year 1502.) they were ouercome in warre by the cruell Moscouite, and the said Knights, hauing lost such a goodly estate; were all slaine, or kept as Captiues.

* A people in a part of Sarmatia, very far North, beyond Liuonia. Knights Teutones, or Porte-craigne Knights.

The fantasticke behauiour of the Gauls in their apparrell.

The Gaules (saith Iulius Cæsar) when they were deuided among themselues; some wore Garments after the Romaine fashion; others, like the Allemaignes, and left the vse of their owne short habites, and long close Breeches: which prooued an indiction, that the Gaules were soone after reduced into a Prouince, & made subiect to the Romains. Then, re-conquered againe afterward (two hundred yeares, or there-about) from the Romaines, by the Franconians, a people of Germany.

The Iewes changing their names & garments.

The Iewes, thirty yeares before that their Countrey was whollie ruined, and they made Slaues to the Romaines, vnder the Emperours, Titus and Vespasian: imposed no other Names on their Children, but such as were Romaine, neither would they weare any Garments, but after the Romaine guise. Their Armes for Warre, and Souldiours Cassockes, were (in all respectes) like vnto theirs; yea, they stroue to imitate their fashions and actions very intirely: whereby they fell afterward into large expence of blood, euen throughout their whole Dominions, and neuer since could regaine their libertie.

French men apparrelled like Spaniards, Rutters, and Suitzers.

What may we prognosticate, by the vnhappy humours of our French-men, and which haue kept them company for these last forty yeares? Some going in habite like to Spaniards; Others after the manner of Reistres; And others like Suitzers. For well neere all our Courtiers, since the yeare 1557. as also the Youthes in Cities, Noble-men, and Souldiours for the Warres, must haue their Hats and habits for the body, meerely Spanish; Their Cloakes and Hose, like the Reistres, and their Haire also; Saddles for Horses, Boots, Spurs, and Armes, all made Rutter-fashion. Hath not this beene a prefage, of plots, practises, and intelligences, betweene Spaniards and seditious Frenchmen, contriued against the Kingdome of France? Haue they not made vse of the best places in Brittaigne, Champaigne, Piccardie, with Amiens, Dorlan, Calays, and other? They teamed Paris their good Cittie; there they had Garrison of Hispaniolized French; there they made commotion of the Estates, beside many other mollestations, which they brought to the Kingdome. The chiefest French of their faction, went all in Spanish Garments, to testifie the good affection which they bare to that Nation. And the fashions of Cloaks, Doublets, hose, and other garnishments, worne by the Suitzers, Reistres, Lansquenets, and other Allemaignes, fell out to be apparant predictions, that the Kingdome should be pilled, pouled, and rauaged by them. Hath not all the Money in the Realmes Coffers been exhausted, to pay for this fond pride? I appeale to both sides, during the deuision. Nay, is it not so daily seene? I am sure it was so, within these three dates.

Affection which France very dearely paid for.

Strange disguises worne among the Italians.

Count Baltazar held opinion, that the first fashion of Garments vsed by the Italians, was a signe of libertie and freedome, as the nouell habites were a presage of seruitude, which we haue beheld to fall out verie truelie. And as one writeth, that Darius King of all the East, hauing the yeare before hee fought against Alexander, caused the Sword that he wore by his owne side, (which was a Persian blade) to be made after the manner of those of Macedon: It was interpreted by his Diuiners or Soothsayers, to signifie, that they (according to whose fashion, Darius had altred the forme of his Persian Sword) should come to Domineere, and be Superiours, or Lordes of Persia. Euen so (saith he) in hauing changed our Italian Habits, into those of Strangers; it seemeth to me, that it should signifie, that they into whose habilliments wee haue altred ours, should come to ouer-awe vs. Which was found to be most true, for King Darius his alteration of his Sword.

to

to this day, there is scantly any Nation in the world, to whom Italie hath not been a prey.

It was no matter of meruall, if Vegetius cried out against the Souldiers of his time, who had lefte the waighty, yet actiue Armor of the ancient Romains, and went naked (as it were) to warre, which was the verie cause, that ledde them the way vnto the losse of many foughten battailes. For, those Soldiers came at length to weare, a verie barbarous and Gothish kinde of furniture, far differing from the Legionaries order, that flourished vnder the good Emperors, such as were Traian, Adrian, Antoninus Pius, & Marcus Aurelius, vnder whom, the men of warre, as well for foote as horse, were in their strength and vigour, and Armes, and Military Discipline, in most high reputation. For, in stead of Corslets and Cuirasses of Iron or Steel, our nouelists would weare Coats of Wool, and counter-pointed cottons, imposing an vnusuall name on this Armor, as Thorocomachi or Iackes; and euen to this day, those habits doe retaine that name, which signifieth nothing else, but a Thorax or Cuirasse for warre, vsed in stead of the Militarie Corslet, which our Elders most esteemed.

Vegetius complaint on Roman Soldiers for leauing their ancient Armour.

Newe names imposed on new martiall Garments.

Those chaunges of Warlicke habiliments, which the latter Romaine Soldiers made, besides the losses which they had brought with them, signified also the perdition of the Easterne Empire, which the Gothes inuaded; for they made themselues Lords of Italy, Spaine, and of other great Prouinces. Wherefore, I conclude (because that which hath been noted by experience, standeth in no neede of any other demonstration) that the often chaunges and habits of a Nation, can declare nothing else, but some future domination, or ruine to be receyued from those people, of whom they borrow the fashion of Garments, as hath beene proued in this chapter, by sundry examples.

The reason of loosing the Eastern Empire.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Discourse on the vocation and life of S. Luke, Physition, Euangelist, & Scholler of the Apostles, which may serue as an Apologie for Physitions, falsly calumniated.

THE reason that moued me to write a Discourse on the life of Saint Luke, Phisition, Euangelist, and Scholler to the Apostles: was, in regard that a great number of people, (yea, and some of the Learneder sort, reputed of the best aduised) haue beleeued and affirmed, by a certaine kinde of brute, receyued of long time from Father to the son, that Physitions giue no credit vnto God, but to Nature only. Or else, if they doo beleeue in him, then they think ill on the Catholick faith. I haue been many times very much amazed, from whence this so strange an opinion should arise, considering, that I haue frequented diuers Philosophers and Physitians, & could neuer tast in them any of those erronious imaginations.

The Authors reason for writing this Chapter.

I thinke that this may seem to receiue Originall from Aristotle, by some that did not well vnderstand his writing: and therefore haue not spared to publish, that he did not acknowledge any god, neither any prouidence of his, but that al things went by a naturall brandling, and the world to be either without beginning or ending. Hence is conceiued, that Physitions, as taking the beginning of their Art from his Bookes: do in these thinges wholly follow his opinions. I say that it may well bee, that in some places of his workes, such things do seem to be spoken by him: but let vs see the Catastrophe of his intention. Marke what he saith in his Booke of the world. God is the engenderer and the conseruer of al that is in this world, in what fashion soeuer it bee. And in his Metaphisicks also, after he hath reiected the opinion of diuers, concerning the principles. That man (saith hee) who hath saide that God, or the Vnderstanding, is cause and Author, not only of the creatures,

Aristotle presupposed to be the Original of this error.

Arist. in lib. de Mund.

Aristotle defended fro slander & calumny.

Ari. in Metaph.

but of Nature it selfe, and of the world, & of all the order therein contained: seemeth to speake aduisedly, and as well awaked; but all other, rashly, and inconsiderately. And they which do thinke so, haue very wel placed that cause, to bee the beginning of all whatsoeuer: euen such a beginning or principle, as gaue motion to all things. And in his Booke of meruailous things, he speaketh more clearly. That Naturally the Sea would couer the earth, as beeing more high then it: but God hath kept it backe, to the end, that the earth might bee discouered, both for the vse of man, and all the Creatures.

Arist. in Lib. de Reb. Mirac.

Thus we see plainly, that Aristotle beleeued there was a God aboue Nature: And that the worlde had beene created, and was not eternall; and that there was a Paradise. In his Booke also of Heauen and in the ninth Chapter, he saith: Aboue the Heauens, there is neither euacuation, or time; That which abideth or dwelleth there, is subiect neither to place, to motion, to mutation, nor yet to any effection: but that there is in this vniuersall eternity, a most happy and contented life. In like manner, Aristotle had beene Scholler to Plato, who had taught and instructed him in these things.

Arist. in lib. de Coel. cap. 9.

Hippocrates beleeued that there was a God.

To alledge, that Hippocrates might be the cause of this conceite, there doth not appeare any likely reason: because al that he re commendeth to his Disciples, is to call vpon God, and to exercise Charitie towards the sicke. As may be seene in his Booke, Of Conuenable, decent, and honest comportement in a Physition. And in the protestation and Oath which he maketh that day, when hee goeth to exercise his Art, which was performed before an infinite number of men, within the temple of Apollo, and in a solemn Sacrifice. This he caused his Schollers to do, so long as he liued: which I am the more willing to set downe, word by word, according as it is set downe by himselfe, at the beginning of his Workes, in this manner:

The Protestation and oath made by Hippocrates & his Schollers.

I sweare by Apollo, Physition, Æsculapius, Hygea, Panacea, and by al the other Goddes: and I cal all the Goddesses to witnesse, that with al my power, and so long as I shal liue, I wil keepe this protestation and Oath which I make, deliuering it in writing presently, sincerely, and as becommeth an honest man, to wit: that he who hath taught me the Art of Physicke, I wil respect & honor him as my Father; and that I will lay downe my life for him, and assist him with al my meanes in his necessities. I wil keep and regard his Children as mine owne: and if they bee willing to bee instructed in this Art, I wil do it in meere gratuity. In like manner, I wil not hide any iot of all that I know, from such Schollers as I shal stand obliged to teach. Ouer and aboue what hath beene saide, I make thereto this Addition more.

A further addition to the Oath & Protestation.

Concerning due respect, of gouerning & healing the diseased by diet or otherwise, I will appoint such vnto them, as I shal deeme necessarie for their health, hindering by all my vtmost, that they shal not fal into inconuenience by them. I wil neuer suffer my self to be perswaded, by the procurement of whosoeuer, to impayson any one by anie meanes, much lesse, giue any aduise whereby it may be done. Likewise, I will neuer giue any Pessary, Suppositorie, or other medicament, to cause abortiueneese in any woman: but wil liue heerin holily, and exercising my Art vertuously. I wil neuer make any essay, to fetch stones out of the bladder: but leaue that worke to be done, by such as are experienced in that Arte. Al houses that I shall enter into, or be called for my helpe, I will not go, except it may be for their profit, keeping alwayes my will and body chast, using secrecie and silence in al things that are not honest, or fit to be vttered. Graunt then O you Goddes, that so long as I shal keep this Oath and Protestation, I may happily (and with your blessing) prosper in mine Art towards all men. And doing the contrary, that I may be iustlie punnished.

The Prayer or imprecation vnto the Goddes.

This was the manner of his protestation: Nay, he did very well beside; for, in the first Booke of his Prognostickes, he giueth especiall aduertisement to a Physition, to bee verie carefull, that the sickenesse do not sauor of any Diuine cause: that is to say, some extraordinary matter sent from God, to punish men for their sinnes; or whether it followeth the common course of Nature. I am of the mind, that whosoeuer readeth these thinges, will neuer tearme Hippocrates to be an Atheist, much lesse, a wicked man. And therefore, such men as shall read his Books, can learn nothing in them, but how to liue as becommeth good people, and faithfully to exercise the Art of Physicke.

Hip. in lib. 1 de Prog. Cap. 5.

That they should learne Atheisme of Galen, is altogether false: for he beleeued

in

Gal. in lib. 3 de vſu part. Hom.

in one God, and rendereth thankes vnto him for his admirable works, in the third Booke of the vſe of the partes of our humain bodies; & theſe are his very words. Heere will I compoſe a true Song, in the honor of our Creator: for, I doe perſwade my ſelfe, that it is truly ſuch ſeruice as he requireth. Not that I ſhould Sacrifice Buls vnto him by hundreds, or burne Incenſe on heaps before him: but that I ſhould knowe, and make knowne to others; what, and howe great is his wiſedome, power, and goodneſſe. I hola, that this is a demonſtration of a perfect goodneſſe; & therefore ought his goodneſſe to bee celebrated for euer, for hauing found the maner how things becam ſo richly embelliſhed. This ſheweth a ſoueraign wiſedome, in accompliſhing and perfecting all things, which he had formerly deſtinied & ordained. And a might and power that cannot any way be ſurmounted.

Galen Sung a Song to the glory and honor of God.

Gal. in lib. ſupra dict. Cap. 17.

In the ſeuenteenth chapter of the ſaid Booke. Whoſoeuer (ſaith he) ſhall conſider, the ſtructure and compoſition of euery creature, will finde, that therein is contained a proofe of the Creators wiſedome. Seeing then, that in the middeſt of this receptacle of humours, a ſoule dwelleth in euerie one, which hath ſo many vertues: by much greater reaſon, let him admire the woorth and excellency of that Vnderſtanding which abideth in Heauen. In the fifteenth Chapter alſo. I confeſſe (ſaith he) that I do not know what the Soule is, although I haue ſearched very diligently for it. Neither know I which way to yeelde a reaſon how an Infant is foruſed. But I verie wel perceiue, that in this verie cauſe, there is great Art and wonderful wiſedome. And therefore, I am of the minde, that no man ſhoulde meddle in the ſearch thereof; but let it ſuffice vs, that our Creator pleaſed, thinges ſhould bee in that manner. For in ſuch caſes, which (but by Anatomie) wee neuer knew to be made, ſhal we dare to conteſt, and ſeek by what reaſon they haue beene made? That is, as if hee would haue ſaide, Nature whom we doe admire ſo much, is nothing els, but what it hath pleaſed God to command. Theſe words alſo, do not relliſh of an Atheiſt; but of him that beleeued in one onelie God, and honoured and admired him in his workes.

An excellent and woorthy reſolution in Galen.

What nature is.

Obiection.

I make no doubt, of any Obiection to be made, in reproouing Moyſes and the Chriſtians, in ſaying; that God is omnipotent or Almighty: and that if he pleaſed, he could ſuddenly of a ſtone, make a man, or of aſhes, a horſe. Himſelfe anſwereth: Nature is not wont to make anie ſuch things; and God maketh nothing, but by the common order of Nature which hee hath inſtituted. And ſuch was the opinion of Plato, cõcording with his. This ought to bee taken, as comming from a Philoſopher that beleeued in God: Neuertheleſſe, not as yet inſtructed in the Law, as well of the Olde as New Teſtaments. And it is not to be doubted, but that all the Grecian Phyſitions (before and after Hippocrates and Galen) did ſcarſely know, reuerence, and worſhip God according as he is deſcribed in the holy Scriptures. Notwithſtanding, ſince Galen, who liued in the yeare of Ieſus Chriſt, one hundred thirtie eight: all the Grecian Phyſitions haue beene Chriſtians: as Paulus Egmetus, Alexander, Trallianus, Actuarius, Nicholaus Myrepſicus, and othe s. Now becauſe there were two Sectes of principall Phyſitions, to wit; Greeks & Arabes, we hauing alredy proued the Grecians to be men of honeſty, and to haue in them both the knowledge and feare of GOD. Let vs now ſee, if the Arabes (all ſaide to be of the Sarazin and Mahomet Religion) did not beleeue in God. And we will begin with Meſuus, who liued about the yeare, 1045. at ſuch time as Godfrey of Buillon, was King of Ieruſalem. He compoſed three Bookes of Phyſicke; and in his Preface before them, hee beginneth thus, in theſe verie words.

Galen in lib. 11 de vſu part.

A[illegible]id not know God aright.

Phyſitions among the Grecians that wer Chriſtians.

In the name of the merciſull God (by the grace of whom, theſe Words & writings receiue Grace, and their Doctrine perfection) theſe workes and writings are begunne by Iohn, the Sonne of Meſuus, the Sonne of Hameeh, the Sonne of Hely, the Sonne of Abdela, King of Damas. And Auicenne, who liued in the time of Almerick, Brother to Baldwine King of Ieruſalem, & of Frederick Barbaroſſa, Emperor in the VVeſt; and of Emanuell Emperor in the Eaſt, in the yeare, 1165. Before all things (ſaith he) I would render praiſe and thankes to God, according as the Greatneſſe of his Maieſtie, and the merit of his benefits requireth: the mercie of whome, exceedeth that of all the Prophets. Then in the end of the chapter, he further ſaith: May it pleaſe God, to grant mee life and time, for the finiſhing of this Booke, I wil take paines to compoſe others. The like hath been done by diuers other Meſuus in Præ.

Phyſitions among the Arabians that beleeued in God.

Meſuus in fin. Præfat. Practic.

Phyſi

Physityons; as Hamech, Novius, Almansor, Zachary, Rasis, and others. I am sure they will not obiect Auerroes vnto mee, who approued not the Mahumetists Law (as being full of groseneſſe and vices, viz: Whoredomes, Theftes, and ſuch like) neither that of the Chriſtians: but was altogether Ariſtotelian, as may be noted in his third Booke of the ſoule, which hee wrote vppon Ariſtotle. And thereby may be gathered, that he knew one God, and him to be the Creator of all things.

Auerroes in lib. 3. de Anim.

Well then, concerning the other detection, that if they are not Atheiſts; yet they are not found in faith, which ſhould ſeeme to enſue: becauſe they are not ſuperſtitious, neither do giue credite to ſo many fooliſh ſuperſtitions, wherein the people repoſe too much beleefe. As for example; to gueſſe how great the ſole of the left foot is, of him that hath the oppilation of the Spleen, or the Feauer Quartaine; the rinde of a Walnut gathered before day, wil help him. Alſo, to write the word Ioannes vpon a Bay-leafe, and then lay it vppon the fore-head of him or her whoſoeuer, that hath the Head-ache, and it is a preſent helpe.

That Physitions are not found in faith

Superſtitious belief in ſome people.

The ancient Græcians, inſtead of Ioannes, vſed to write Atenea, ſo ſaith Pliny. Antiquitie alſo beleeued, that a man (offended with the palſy) holding a green Frogge in his healthfull hand, and ſpeaking the word Apollo three ſeuerall times, it would reſtore him. Some haue written that by writing in a little Paper, theſe two barbarous words, Abra, Cadabra, and to ſpeake them backeward, beginning with the latter Letters, and ſo going on, it is an infallible helpe for the Quartaine Ague. Phyſitions, becauſe they would not credit ſuch fables, were reputed but badlie addicted to the faith of thoſe times. And ſome Phyſitions, not to incurre ſo vile reputation, either of the times paſſed before, or preſent: haue beene conſtrained to auouch ſuch ſuperſtitions, as Alexander Trallianus, who writeth; that if a man did beare about him this verſe of Homer, Orbis terreque tremor, it would cure him of all Gouts.

Plin. in lib. 22. cap. 14.

Idle and vain opinions, for curing ſome diſeaſes.

Cardanus, a great Phyloſopher and Phiſition, recounteth things much more abſurd, only becauſe hee would not bee thought incredulous. All theſe thinges, and others of like Nature, haue not only bin reproued by learned Phyſitions; but likewiſe by catholick Diuines, euer ſince the Primitiue Church.

Cardanus, a moſt learned Phiſition.

Now, for as much as Religion is one of the cheefeſt Vertues, which conſiſteth in the middeſt of two extreame vices, to wit; Atheiſme and Superſtition; and in regard that Phyſitions are neither Atheiſtes, nor ſuperſtitious, as euery one well knoweth, and as I haue already proued: it followeth then, that they are Religious, and full of piety.

The Authors argument, which he alloweth for good

There was ſomtime a Phiſition (whoſe name I could not eaſily attain vnto) that builded a goodly Temple, in honour of the Virgin Mary, in the ſame place wher Babylon ſtood in Egypt; and not farre off from where the Graund Caire ſtandeth at this preſent, there being now but a verie ſmall Village. Vnder this Temple, there is a Vault, wherein (as ſome haue thought) ſhee hid her Sonne Ieſus, when he was ſought for by Herod to be murdered.

Bel. in l. 2. ca. 38

Euſebius, in his Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorie, writeth; that a Phyſition, named Alexander, a Natiue in Friſia, highly beloued and eſteemed of euerie one, for beeing Religious, prudent, vertuous, and inriched with all good manners, in the perſecution vnder the Emperor Seuerus, as they were leading Chriſtian priſoners before the Iudges Tribunall at Lyons, to vnderſtand whether they would perſiſt, or denie their Chriſtianity; ſhee made a ſigne to them with his head ſecretly (in the beſt maner he could deuiſe) that they ſhould continue conſtant in their Faith. The Guards and people ſtanding by, hauing perceiued it, accuſed him immediately; whereupon, he was martyred, and indured the torments long and conſtantly, euen to his lateſt gaſpe of life. If I would, I could alledge many others: but I am forced to leaue them, for feare of being too prolixe. Yet let me remember Porphyrius, who liued in the yeare, 224. a cruell enemy vnto the Chriſtians (yet eſteemed the moſt Learned Phyloſopher of thoſe times. Hee ſcorned and mocked many Phyſitions then with him, becauſe they had left Paganiſme, and embraced Chriſtianity: but Origen aunſwered him ſo well, that he ſtopt his mouth from further deprauing.

Euſ. in Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 5. ca. 3.

Alexander, a worthy Phiſition & Martyr.

Porphyrius the Apoſtata.

Meſsire Angelo Cattho, who was firſt in ſeruice with Charls Duke of Bourgogne; and after that, entertained by Lewes, eleuenth

M. Angelo Cattho, a Prophetical Phiſition uenth of that Name, King of France, being a Physition well learned in the Mathematickes, becam afterward (in regard of his good life & great deuotion) Arch-Byshop of Vienna Gauloise. Ouer and beside his deepe knowledge, hee hadde the guift of Prophesie: for hee foretolde the saide Duke, of the battailes which he lost against the Suisses, and in the end, the manner of his death, according as it hapned afterward; which was the cause that he left the saide Dukes Court. For on a day, as Masse was celebrating before K. Lewes, in the Church of Saint Martin at Tours (distant from the Towne of Nancy ten good dayes iourney at the lest, which Towne the Duke had then besieged) hee offering the King the Pax to kisse, because he serued that day as Almoner, hee vttered these wordes: The Lord God hath giuen you peace and repose, & you may haue it if you will. For, your enemie the Duke of Bourgogne, is a dead man: hee commeth to be slaine, and his Army discomfited. The day and instant was iustly obserued, the King sent, and it was found to bee verie true.

A prediction concerning the death of the Duke of Bourgogne.

He foretold likewise many other things to diuers great and honourable personages, which accordingly came to passe. And ordinarily, Physitions do gather by obseruation, some presaging of the day and houre, of the health or death of the sicke patient; which ensueth not so much by their Art, as the speciall grace of God giuen them, in regard of their pietie and firm faith in him, hauing continually the admirable prouidence of GOD before their eyes, being mainly thereto incited by their Art.

Physitions skill in life or death of their Pacients.

Marcilius Phicinus the Florentine, a Phylosopher, and reputed to bee one of the most learned men, that liued after Aristotle and Galen. He was a Priest full of sanctity, and published manie Bookes, which serue for the benefite of health. Also, he Commented vpon Plato, whom he made to speake Christianly: he liued in the yeare, 1475. Petrus Belonius, a Frenchman, and Physition in the Cittie of Mans, in meere deuotion made a voyage to Ierusalem, which was troublesom, long, and full of many difficulties. But it may be obiected to me, that many Physions of our time, haue withdrawn themselues from the Catholicke Romaine Church.

Marcilius Phicinus, a lerned Florentine.

Petrus Belonius a deuoute Physition.

I answere, some haue done, but very few: and a great part of people, of Germany, Flanders, England, Fraunce, of the Suisses, & diuers Prelates also, yea, Kings, Queenes, and Princesses, haue done as much, as seeking for their soules saluation; and perswading themselues to doo well therein; in which case, we must referre them to God, the onely searcher of the heart and Reines, and that disposeth of all things, as seemeth best to his diuine wisedome. But that this hath beene perticuler to Physitions, more then to anie other, I flatly deny.

Of leauing the Romaine Church.

Some will alledge Rabelais vnto mee, an excellent Physition, who is thought one while to speake like an Atheist; another while like a Lutherian. I answere, that it is a difficult matter to iudg in such cases, and to comprehend a mans intention: especially, in such people as haue no knowledge, neither any solide iudgement. But they that looke vppon him a little neerer, shall find, that he is a Democritus, laughing at all our humaine actions. Or a Lucian, who maketh a mockery of such abuses, as daily are committed among men: but he medleth not with any thing, which toucheth the Apostolicall Church. Neuertheless, I am of opinion, that, for the better orders sake; and in regarde of such obscuritie in conceiuing his intention, that he should bee neither read, nor receiued; for so he was censured by the Counsell of Trent. But as for the last Booke that is added among his woorkes, which is entitled L'Isle Sonnante; and seemeth (indeede) to blame and mocke at men, bearing office in the Church: I protest, that he neuer composed it, for it was made a long while after his death. I my selfe was at Paris when it was done, and I knew very well the Author thereof, who neuer was any Physition.

Diuers opinions, concerning the book of Rabelais.

The Book of the founding Island.

Let vs nowe come to Saint Luke, the Physition and Euangelist: God pleased to make vse of his seruice, in writing the life and actions of our Lord Iesus Christ, according as he heard them declared by the Apostles & Disciples, who had seene him and them; as also the things hapning after his resurrection, by hauing seene them, which none of the other Euangelists had done. For, but by him, the Ascension had beene vnknowne to vs; the descent of the Holy-Ghost, vpon the Apostles poſtles and Diſciples; the variety of tongues which they ſpake; their eloquence and great knowledge. The teſtimonie of the Reſurrection and Aſcenſion of Ieſus which they preached before euerie one, without any feare. Their impriſonments, their myraculous deliuerances The conuerſion of S. Paule, his actions, his myracles, and of ſome other of the Apoſtles. His Voyages and ſufferinges, euen vntill he was brought to Rome, there to bee put to death, which he neuer gainſayed. Som do hold that Luke was conuerted by him, hauing conferred with him; and hauing obſerued in his myracles, the great Vertue of God. And it ſeemeth, that he was the rather made choiſe of, to be Notarie and Secretary of the New-Teſtament, as being more apt to that vocation, then any other, to the end, that his Writinges might be the better receyued and credited.

Concerning S. Luke, Physition, & Euangelist.

S. Luke wrote more then all the other Euangeliſts.

S. Luke elected to bee the Secretarie of the New-Teſtament.

There is great modeſty acknowledged in him, becauſe (doubtleſſe) he did performe ſome miracles, as well as the other; and yet he neuer ſpeaketh of them. He diſputed at Athens againſt the Phyloſophers, with S. Paul where many were conuerted; and among other, S. Dioniſius Areopagita, &c. He wrote in the Greek tongue, which he ſeemed rather to haue by the guift of the bleſſed Spirit, then by his ſtudies: for his mother tongue was in Syraque, as being borne and brought vp in Antiochie. He was briefe, but very intelligible in his writings. In ſumme the whole Church oweth him much obligation, in regard of his woorkes: for, they haue ſerued, and ſhall do, to confirm many in the Chriſtian faith. S. Hierom ranketh him in number of Virgins; and that he liued foureſcore and foure yeares, dying in Bythinia, Titus being Emperour. I wold gladly giue aduiſe by this diſcourſe, that heereafter none ſhould exprobrate againſt the Phyſitions, that either they are Religion leſſe, or conceite ill of our faith, which we haue approued to be falſe by our former relation.

The great modeſtie in S. Luke.

Acts 17, 34.

Coloſ. 4, 14. 2 Tim. 4, 11.

The Authors aduiſe in concluſion.

CHAP. XXXIIII.

Of the great Prouince of Moſcouia. As alſo the Manners, Religion, and power of the Prince, ruling ouer that people.

IT was the more willingly induced, to make a perticuler Chapter, for deſcription of the country of Moſcouia, the peoples Manners, Religion, and power of their Prince: becauſe very manie, inhabiting in our neerer regions, are ignoraunt thereof, the men of thoſe parts hauing ſo ſmall frequentation with vs. Neuertheleſſe, it is the terror of Poland, yea, to all Germany, as much or rather more, then the Turke; as Laurentius Surius the Germaine giueth aſſurance: for within few yeares, they haue Conquered all Liuonia, and other great Prouinces.

The Moſcouits are a dreadful Nation.

Moſcouia, is a verie large Northerlie Region, containing very neere fiue hundered leagues in length. The principall Cittie therof being called Moſca, or Moſcuua, greater then the Cittie Paris in France, and ſeated on the Riuer of Moſqua. There was wont to be a large squared ſtone, in the middeſt of the Market place belonging to the Cittie; whereon whoſoeuer could firſt mount himſelfe (in vacancie of the Crowne) without beating down, he was held as Prince of the country, and obtained the principality. The Inhabitants haue had great fightes and combates, each againſt other, about the prioritie of mounting on that ſtone. He that comes to be Prince of the country, cannot call himſelfe King, but Duke; being contented with that popular Name, and differeth not in his Garmentes from other Noblemen of the Land; ſaue onlie that he weareth a higher Bonnet on his head.

The greatnes of Moſcouia.

A ſtrange election of the D. of Moſcouia

It is a Countrey rich in Siluer, and ſo ſtrongly guarded thoroughout, that not onely their owne people, but ſtranngers likewiſe, can paſſe away without the Princes Letters. The Countrey is flat and Concerning the Country, flat, Plainy, & not mountainie.

and plaine, without any Mountaines: therefore, that which is saide of the Typhæan Mountaines, and that they are in this Countrey, are meerely fabulous, for there is no such Hill at all. There are great store of Forrests, abounding with wilde Beasts, which are daily chased: and great profit is made (by Traffick) for the skinnes of those Beastes; as of Hartes, Wolues, Ermines, Martines, Zubelines, Fouoynes, and diuers other of great value and worth.

Store of beasts skinnes.

This Prouince, confineth Liuonia on the one side, Tartaria on the other; and on the thirde quarter it hath the Euxine Sea. It containeth many Prouinces in it, so that the Prince can (in very fewe dayes) leaue four hundred thousand men on foote, to beginne warre withall. They drinke nothing but a kinde of Beere; and yet none but the rich may drinke thereof: for they haue no Wine, but what is brought from other Countreyes. They be subiect vnto drunkennesse, as al Northerly people are: and Winter is there so sharpe, long, and extreame, that if water be but sprinkled or cast vppe into the Ayre, it freezeth before it can fall to the earth.

The countries confines

Men readie for the warre.

Long & sharp Winter.

Their Drink and Corne.

Their Corne neuer perfectly ripens, but when they haue reaped it, they dry it in their Stoues or Hotte-houses. The Spring is verie cold with them, and their Summer, which lasteth but two months onely, is extreamly hot. They haue not any vse of monies; but in stead thereof, they haue Plates of Gold or Siluer, squared, without any marke or stampe thereon, which are taken in Merchandize, forasmuch as they waigh. As for their Garments, they go cloathed like Turkes, in long Gownes or Robes, hauing narrow sleeues, and guirded about the middle. Their buildings and manner of life, doo differ verie little from theirs of Poland & Bohemia. They are Christians like vnto the Greeks, receiuing order of Priesthood, from the Patriarche of Constantinople, saying seruice (in their Temples) in their vulgar tongue, which is the Sclauonian Language, and their Carracters are Greeke.

Their Spring & Summer.

Their money.

Their Garments.

Their buildings, life, and Religion.

The abyding of the Prince, is in a goodly great Pallace, in the City of Moscua, built after the Italian manner; being so strong and spacious, as (in our times) the like hath not beene seene. There are in the fore named Citie, as also in diuers other places, men verie learned and wise, whose retirement is where the Schooles are kept.

The Court or abiding of the Prince.

The Moscouite is Tributary vnto the King of Tartaria, who ouercame them in the yeare of the world, 6745. according as their Annals doe testifie. For, their Chronicles are not after our obseruation, in accounting by the yeares of Iesus Christ. When the Tartarian Ambassadors are sent to the Moscouite Princes he standeth vp on his feet, and bare-headed before them, and they sit couered. Hee hath (wel-neere) daily warres against the Polonians and Scythians, who albeit they are subiects to other Kings, yet doth hee much inlarge his dominions ouer them.

The Moscouite tributary to the Tartar.

The Country is very plentiful in Fish, by the goodly and great Riuers which runne along thorough it, wherein they haue their breeding: As Oxos, Drunus, and Borysthenes, which is also called Depnerus. There is great store of Pasture grounds; all kinde of Oxen, Kine, and such like Beasts, as also Horses & Mares; but of slender corpulenee and lean. They haue not any sweete fruites growing among them, except it be Cherries: neyther is there any fruits to make Oyle of, as of Oliues, Walnuts, Filbeardes, Almonds, and such like. But all kindes of Pulse are there in abundance, and Corne that they make bread of. The verie best haruest which they haue or gather, consisteth in waxe and Honie, by meanes of their Bees, which do not make their abiding in Hiues, but in hollow Trees in the Forrestes, in wonderfull great plentifulnesse.

Plenty of fish in Riuers.

Pasture ground, and Cattle.

Fruits, Pulse, and Corne.

Wax & Hony in great plentie.

The Prince in all such Countries as he conquereth from the Scythians, compelleth them to become Christians; so that the last Prince Iohn (within the space of threescore yeares) won many Countreyes from them: as Perne, Corela, Perusca, Iura, Cetiremisa, Baacquid, and many other Idolaterous people, whom hee constrained to receiue Baptism. He gaue them also a Byshoppe, named Stephen, whom those barbarous wretches flayed aliue, after the saide Prince was gone forth of their Countrey. But when he hard tydings thereof, he returned againe vpon them; and causing them to feel the rigour of his warre, they were gladde to continue Christians. They haue Poasts Countreyes won to Christianity.

Stephen a Byshop martired

Swift Poastes.

or swift Curtiers in Moscouia, which rid more way, and in shorter time then is doone amongst vs: although their Horses are verie badly bredde, and small of bodie.

These Princes, in former times, contented themselus with the name of Duke only, vntill the dayes of his Father nowe raigning, who vsurped the name of King, giuing himself great Titles in his patents, which continued to his Son succeeding him in manner following. The Great Lord Basilius, Great Duke of Volodimeria, Moscouia, Nouogardia, Plescouia, Sureluchia, Tuneria, Iugaria, Permia, Vraquia, Bulgaria; Great Lorde and Duke of the Lands in Nouagardia the lower, of Geruigonia, Rezania, Volotia, Riscouia, Belleya, Iaroslania, Bieroselta, Vdoria, Obdoria, Condidia, &c. By which large pluralitie of Names, and of so manie Seigneuries, it appeareth, that he is farre more potent, then some haue imagined him to be. But concerning his keeping himselfe in vassalage to the Great King of Tartaria, hee should hold it no dishonor to him, for he hath this end in it. While hee keepeth peace with him, he reduceth much more easily vnder his obedience, all the neere neighbouring people and territories: & with the power of the Great Tartarre, he is ten times stronger then of himself. For the mightie Tartarre, bringeth ordinarily, a million of men with him to the field, all well appointed for warre, with two or three hundered pieces of Cannon, and 300000. Horse.

He hath beene Tributary, euer since the yeare, one thousand two hundered, when Baty King of the Tartarres, an Idolater in Religion, subdued, wasted, and pilled a great part of Christian Europe, with an Army of a Million of men. Euen then, when Pope Innocent, fourth of that name, sent verie Learned and Religious men towardes Baty; with entreatance, to deport himselfe from any further mollestation of the Christians; and that himselfe would become a Christian. Shewing him withall, that the Sunne and the Moone which he adored, were onely but Creatures of God, subiect to mutation, and must haue an ending. He gaue consent to truce for fiue yeares, promising; That thenceforward, he would do no more displeasure vnto Christians; and that hee had a desire to bee enstructed in Christian Religion.

The Popes Ambassadors, being verie ioyfull of this successe, made hast homeward, in hope to returne againe speedily. But they were no sooner departed, but others were sent thither from the Sultan of Egypt, Mahometanes, who disswaded the well-minded Prince, not to lend any eare to Christians, but much lesse to imbrace their Religion, full of many superstitions. For, they told him, it contained prohibition, from vsing certaine meates at certaine times, and commaunded Fasting, Chastitie, continency, and other laborious matters. It rather fitted him, to accept and receiue into his countries, the Mahumetist Religion, full of al pleasures and contentments. Whereby it was lawfull for him, to admit as manie Weomen as men to his bed, as himselfe best liked; and euerie one was allowed, (without any diffrence) to vse such meats as his appetite required.

In the end, Baty suffering himselfe to be swallowed vppe in the Gulphe of all Libertie and Voluptuous desires, receyued immediately the Mahometane Law. So did the most part of his Subiects, by his example; and which they did and do keepe it to this present day. I am sorry to write, what I heare from such, as haue & do frequent those Countreyes, to witte: that the King or Precop at this time, accommodateth himselfe to al kinds of Religion. For, with Christians he wil Christianize; with Iewes, he will Iudaize; and with Idolaters, carrie himselfe in like maner: but commonly, hee is more Mahometan then any other, louing euery one with his Religion.

This Baty, the Tartarian King, hauing dealt like Paris the Troyan, who loued carnall delights, better then all Heauenly wisedom, died within a short while after, hauing then great store of Ciuill Warres in his Kingdome. During which time, the Tartarres (who were distributed among the Prouinces in Garrisons) retired themselues, as willing to take part in those Ciuill Warres, and so were called from one place to another, still to yeeld their assistance. By which meanes, diuers of the Prouinces, seeing themselues free without Gouernours, and cleare from Garrisons of their enemies, returned againe to their former libertie; and (aboue all other) of the Moscouites.

But

The King of Moscouias Titles.

The policy of the Moscouite, in being Tributarie to the Tartar.

Howe long since hee becam tributary

A humain answer of the K. of Tartaria.

Good intentions do often meete with bad preuentions.

The Tartarian King yeldeth to become a Mahumetists.

The Tartares vse all Religions.

The death of Baty King of Tartaria.

Liberty is the onely ground of disobedience.

But within some yeares afterward, perceiuing the Tartarian Ciuill VVarres to be ended, and no more Kings commanding but one, as before had doone: fearing to be reuisited again by the Tartars, they yeelded themselues backe againe as their Tributaries; but yet with condition, that they should obserue Christian Religion.

No Metals in Moscouia.

There groweth not any Mettall in Moscouia, how vile or base soeuer it be; no not so much as Iron, or Quarries of stone: whatsoeuer Mettalles, Iewelles, or Stones they haue, is brought thither from straunge Countreyes, wherewith the VVeomen decke themselues, and make pendants of them to hang in their eares.

Wholesome Ayre free frō Pestilence.

The Ayre is verie healthfull, neuer engendering any Pest, or contagious diseases. Thus you may discerne in these few words, what I could collect concerning this Countrey, which is no vnusual distance from vs: but may well serue to acquaint the Reader, (that is not versed or seene in Cosmography, neyther hath trauailed) both what the Country is, and the people.

CHAP. XXXV.

¶ Concerning those clauses, inserted by the Romaine Emperors in their Edicts, to wit; Such is Our pleasure; And, Of Our Owne meere motion.

Many Emperors haue bin Tyrants.

WEe finde it recorded, that manie tirant Emperors, made diuers vnaduised Edictes, which redounded to great detriment of the Common-wealth. And becausse they woulde not haue them passe by the Senate, they make addtions of these words or Clauses: Such is Our pleasure: Or, Being done by Our meere motion. A thing contrary to their Oath: howbeit, that those inserted words, are the true markes of a Soueraigne Prince.

Mark Anthony tearming himselfe Emperour of the East, sent by expresse wordes, and without delay, that a like imposition should be leauied, as hee had caused to bee done the same yeare before, which was insupportable. And albeit the Prouinces and Cities sent vnto him, to shew him the indigence and pouertie of the Country, as well thorow barrennesse of the grounds, as in regard of the wars, which had preceeded in the passed years. And that if it so fell out, that hee would needes impose such a tax vpon the people, yet to let it be done in such manner, as they might haue two Harnestes, and two Vintages: Neuertheless, in this matter, hee would haue no other aduise but his owne, and saide; It was His Will, that it should be raised vpon the people, for such was His pleasure. This Patent was the cause of the perdition of his estate, and of his life also.

Plutarch. in vit Mar. Ant.

M. Anthonie by his Edicts lost both his State & life.

Theodosius, a Christian Emperor, commaunded by Edict, that so manie of the Thessalians as could be found, should bee slaine and massacred; and sent Men of warre, to execute the same in Thessalie, whereuppon (in two or three dayes) seauen or eight thousand was put to death. And these were the words in the patents; Such is My Will, and of Mine owne proper motion. Nay, a much greater murthering had beene committed, if Saint Ambrose (who liued then) by holy and learned documents had not stayed it. But afterward he made another Edict, whereby he willed, that if he sent to command the death of any one, the matter should rest vppon intermission, for the spaee of thirty daies before execution, and heartily repented him for the former offence. I could easily alledge many other Histories, which are full of such Edicts proceeding from the meere motion of Princes, & contrary to the lawes of Nature; but they wold require too long a space, being irkesome also to the Reader, when he perceyueth, what discommoditie they haue brought to Kingdomes, causing their total ruine, and the Princes also.

Theodosius made an Edict against Nature.

Repentance & reuocation of vniust Edicts.

The Kings of France, greater Soueraigns then the Emperors.

The Kings of France, hauing more power ouer their people, then euer the Emperors in those times had, wold yet insert this clause, Neuertheless, it was neuer known, that they made any edicts against nature, albeit, against ciuil lawes and customs of the kingdom, thorow il counsel, and not of their owne proper motion. King Lewes the eleauenth (dissembling vnto the vtterm ost) made some Edictes which were vniust, and contrarie to the ancient Lawes of the Realme of France. The Court of Parliament at Paris, refused the publication of them; althogh they had receyued expresse command (twice or thrice) from his Maiesty, euen so farre as menaces to the losse of their liues. The President Lauacrie, accompanied with a number of the Counsell (attired in their Parliament Robes) went to attend the King, shewing him the iniquity of his Edicts, and what threatnings he had sent to the Court. He beholding the Port, grauitie and dignitie of the men, who would forgo their honours, their seuerall charges, yea, and loose their liues rather then verifye such Edicts as he hadde sent them, was not a little amazed. But redoubling the authoritie of Parliament, he tore the Edicts in pieces before their faces, entreating them, to continue on stil in doing Iustice; and sware vnto them beside, that he would neuer more vrge any Edict, which should not be both iust and reasonable.

Lewes the 11. reuoked his Edicts, & vpon what reason.

This was an acte of very great importance, to maintaine the King in obedience of reason, who had alwaies before, vsed absolute power. And at the time when he was but Dauphine of France, he sent for the Presidents of the Court, and saide vnto them: that they shoulde blot out the clause of expresse commaunde) which the Court had set downe, as verification of the priuiledges graunted vnto the Count du Mayne. Otherwise, that he would not depart out of Paris, except it were done; and that they shoulde leaue the Commission which the King had giuen them.

Lewes the 11. somwhat opinitiue and headstrong

The Court ordained, that the wordes should be defaced. But because it might be seene, what was rased, they appointed; that the Register should be kept; and the same is yet to bee seene, in what order it was ordained, in the date of the twentie eight of Iuly, one thousand four hundred forty three.

According to the example of that good President, and the Counsellers assisting him; all other Magistrates ought to do the like vppon new Edicts, which tend to nothing else, but to the grinding of the people and the Common-wealth.

The dutie of good & faithful Magistrats

But not to alter auncient Lawes or Customes, long before enacted and published, because a Magistrate that is allowed, taketh Oath, strictly to obserue the ordinances already confirmed. But in the case of Nouelties, that appeare vnworthy of any embracing, he should vse remonstrances to the Prince and importune him so much as possibly he may vntill he bee reduced to reason. Which was well put in practise, by the Chancellor to the Duke of Bourgogne, who wold not passe or seale any vniust commaund: but declaring the matter to the Duke, offered resignation of the Seale, rather then he would bee forsworne in his Office.

The Chancellor to Philip Duke of Bourgogne.

The Duke beholding the constancie of his Chancellour, reuoked the Edict. And oftentimes, this firmenesse & constancie in a Magistrate, preserueth the honor of the Prince, & maintaineth the Commonwealth in her greatnesse, when she standeth supported vpright by Naturall equity.

The Ptolomeyes, successour vnto him that was Kinsman to Alexander the great (I meane not heere to speake of the Pharaohs) caused their Magistrats to sweare, neuer to obey any of their Mandates, if they gaue commaund to iudge vniustlie, as we read in the sentences of the Kinges of Ægypt, deliuered and spoken of by Plutarch.

Example of the Egyptian Magistrates.

For Conclusion, all good and Vertuous Soueraigne Princes, although they may sette downe the sayde Words (Such is Our Pleasure, and, Of Our meere motion) yet they should frame all theyr Edictes and Mandations, by good Councell and aduise; that they bring not anie dammage (how little or great soeuer) to their Subiectes. But rather, to vse such clauses as auncient Princes were woont to doe, to wit; Si qua mihi causa iusti videter, which was interpreted after this manner: If it appeare to me to bee iust and equall.

Clauses obserued by good and ancient Princes.

And, for the inferiour Magistrate to the Soueraigne Prince, if hee giue commaund to publish an vniust Edict (prouided, that it bee not against Gods Honour, and the Naturall Lawes) hauing diuers and sundrie times, shewne the Prince, the inquitie of the charge on him imposed, hee then ought for to lette it passe, & cause it to be published, for it is com-

The carriage of Magistrats in reuell Edicts.

commanded by God, that we should bee obedient to Soueraigne Princes. Or els, to delay the publication, and detain it in sufferance so much as he may: for manie times it commeth to passe, that Princes (euen of themselues) reuoke what they haue done either by the lapse of time, or by the death of some bad Counseller, the cause thereof, or by the death of the Prince himselfe.

The iustice & equitie in Petronius a worthy Romaine Captaine.

As it happened to Caligula the Roman Emperor, who made an Edict, whereby he commanded, that his Statues shoulde be set vp, and honoured in all the Temples of his Empire; whereunto the Iewes made refusall of obeying. Petronius, who had the charge of executing this Edicte, perceiuing the matter to be so detestable and repugnant (oppositiuely) to the honor of God, and the Lawes of the Iewes, deferred the execution, and sent vnto the Emperour shewing him the great difficultie he had, to execute the Edict. In the end, vpon this temporizing, Caligula was slaine, and the Iewes were deliuered.

Generall Assessors, verie good officers.

It hath beene many times obserued, that the Generall Assessors of subsidies in France, did not so promptly impose all those monies on the people, as they were commanded to impose and set downe by Royall Patents, and namely: when they were extraordinarie. But haue made som deferrance, sending back to his Maiesty, shewing him the pouertie of the people. Whereupon, the King hath sometimes made reuocation, or (in Grace) remitted the moity, or some part; or deferred the paiment to some other season, whereby the people might bee so much the more eased.

Obedience must be performed vnto Princes.

Now, whither a Magistrate ought, or may denie, if the Prince constraine him to publish an vniust Edict. I answere, that he neither may, or ought. Otherwise, the title of Maiestie should bee but illusorie; and people might thereby be ouer apt to reuoltes, and all things might then runne to ruine in the Common-wealth. But then it is to bee noted withall, that the right of Emperours cannot warrant these wordes; Such is Our Will or pleasure. For they do protest at their election, to acknowledge the Senate aboue them, in controlling or verifying their Edicts, and to enterprise nothing without their knowledge and consent: for Emperour is but a Title of Office. But the Royaltie of France is an estate Soueraigne, that hath no Senate for superiour or Companion.

The Senate superiour to Emperors.

CHAP. XXXVI.

That Orateurs, Pleaders, and others; that make profession of wel or eloquent speaking; are dangerous men, and may easily ouerthrowe the estate of any Common-wealth.

Cicero his definition of an Orator,

Cicero giueth the definition of an Orator, saying; He should be an honest man, speaking well, and elegantly. I finde this definition to be probable, but it appeareth then in very few Orators, because among an hundred of them which we finde in Histories, as well Greeke as Latine, Germaine, French, Italian, or of what Nation else soeuer, hardly there is to be found one honest man. For, the greater number of them, preach according as they haue practised amongst the seditious: Eloquence hath so much power, as it can ouerthrowe the Estates of Princes, and of whole Common-Weales.

How our Ancients in elder times figured Eloquence.

Our ancient predecessours, in their Medalles and Paintings, to represent the power of Eloquence, faigned a Ceticke Hercules, in shape of an olde man, drawing the people after him, chained and fastened vnto him with Chaines, hanging downe from his mouth, and tyed to their eares. Declaring thereby, that the Armes and power of Princes and Monarches, are not so strong as the heat and vehemencie of an eloquent man, which exciteth and inflameth the baseft coward to ouercome and vanquish the most valiant person.

The great power of Eloquence.

It droppes downe Weapons out of the most fiercest hand: It turneth crueltie into wonderfull mildenesse; Barbarisme into humanity. It altereth Commonweales; and playeth with people at his owne pleasure. Nor do I speake this, as in praise of eloquence, but to shew what might it hath; and which many times is imployed rather to euill then goodnesse. For seeing it is nothing else, but a disguising of trueth, an Arteficiall cunning to make euill appeare good, wrong right; yea, to make a great matter of nothing; of an Ant to raise an Elephant, or (in plaine tearmes) to lye ingenuously. It is not to be doubted, but that for one man, who vseth this Art honestly, an hundred may be found that do abuse it. And as hard is it, among an hundered Orators, to picke out one honest man: for, it is a thing contrary to that profession, to pursue any matters of truth; because trueth (being naked) is euen then in her best and richest Ornament.

What eloquence is.

The greater part of eloquent Orators, scarse honest men.

Let but a perusall be made, of al them that haue had fame to bee worthy speakers and Orators, and we shall finde; that they haue moued the people to seditions; yea, many haue chaunged Lawes, Customes, Religion, Common-weals, euen to the vtter ruine of them, & they themselues, haue (wel-neere all of them) had violent deaths.

A view of som Orators & eloquent men.

Marke Anthonie, who contended for the Romaine Empire, against Augustus; thought hee could neuer come to it, so long as Cicero the Orator liued: & therefore, he procured his death. And Antipater the successor to Alexander, perswaded himselfe, that so long as Demosthenes the Athenian Orator liued, he should neuer be intire King of all Greece: & therefore, he gaue order for his death. And indeede it was true, for that his eloquent toong did him more hurt, then al the armies of the Athenians could do, or all other among the Græcians. We may well perceiue then, by the ends of these two famous Orators, what power their eloquence had, in hindering two so great Princes, from attaining to domination in their Common-wealths: and yet notwithstanding, they were reputed to bee men of honest conuersation.

Cicero & Demosthenes both Orators, were slain for their eloquent tongues.

But leauing these Greeke and Romaine Orators, let vs come to them of our age, who employed their paines so well; that all the Empire of Affrica, and of the East, may make report thereof, and are yet vp in Armes. Nay, it is found recorded, that by their eloquence, Kings haue been expulsed, and their estates seized on. As it happened to the Kings of Marocco, who were of the house of Ioseph: from whom a Preacher, vnder the Vaile of Mahometane Religion, tooke both Scepter and Crowne.

The King of Marocco expeld by meanes of a pleasing speaker.

Now, albeit he was called The Knight of the Asse, yet he could speake so wel and pleasingly, that he assembled an Armie together, of aboue sixe score thousande men. In like manner, he that was called the first Sophie, seized on the kingdom of Persia: and no long time since, hauing expelled the legittimate Children of K. Vsancassanus, vnder the same pretext of Mahometan religion.

The Knight of the Asse.

The first Persian Sophie.

In Germany, a reuolted Priest, named Thomas Muncerus; and Phiserus an Apostate Monke, both conceiuing ill of the Catholicke faith, preuailed so much by their eloquent tongues, that they caused aboue an hundered thousand Countrey Peazants (poore ouer-credulous people) to vndertake Armes against the Clergie, Nobility, and Officers that executed Iustice.

Seditious speakers and Oratours amongst the Germaines.

In the same yeare, the Rustickes and Countrey Boores met together in many places, desirous to vndergo some nouell kind of liberty: so that they committed a thousand outrages, and incredible indignities. They quickely massacred Lewes, Counte d'Helueston, who hadde espoused the Naturall Daughter to the Emperor Maximillian, and burned more then two hundered Monasteries and Castelles, in the sole Countrey of Franconia.

Lewes, Counte d'Helueston, son in Law to the Emp. Maximillian.

It is also a matter verie manifest, and well knowne vnto euery one, that this tumult had ruined all Germanie; yea, and laide it on a heape, with all the Neighboring Prouinces, if the Lords hadde not speedily entered into Armes, and foyled them in diuers battailes. But in the end, the two Apostataes were taken, and grieuously punished.

Nestorius the Hereticke, in all his Sermons preached before the Emperours Theodosius and Valentinian, at Constantinople, would speake out alowd, and verie elegantly; Giue mee the Land emptied of Heretickes (for so he termed Catholicks) and I will giue thee Heauen. Ingulph and swallow me vp with the Heretickes, and I will therewith ruinate the power of the Persians. Heereupon, he was called a Bonfeu, for if the Emperour had beleeued him, Nestorius the Hereticke, a Bonfeu or fire brand of sedition.

him; he had put to death the more part, and almoſt all his Subiects, and Neſtorius the chiefe.

An apt comparison.

Like as a Knife is very dangerous, in the hand of a furious or mad man: euen ſo is eloquence or well adorned ſpeech, in the mouth of a mutinous Oratour. And yet notwithſtanding, it is the meanes (in ſuch as can well vſe it) to reduce people from barbarouſneſſe, to humanitie. It is the Inſtrument for correcting of manners, reformation of Lawes, chaſtiſing of Tyrants, banniſhment of Vices, and maintenance of Vertues. And like as men vſe to charme Aſpicks, Vipers, and other Serpents, with certaine words: euen ſo can Oratours charme the moſt ſauage and cruell men, by the meere ſweetneſſe of eloquence, ſo ſaith Plato. He further addeth, that there is no better meanes, to appeaſe ſeditions, and contain ſubiects in their Princes obedience: then to haue a wiſe and vertuous ſpeaker. For by his pleaſing words, he can bow and bend ſweetly, the harts of the ſtubborn and moſt rebellious. And there is not any thing, that is more dreadfull to a Tyrant; then an Oratours Eloquence: for it begetteth the peoples full voyce, eſpecially if he be in neuer ſo little hatred.

What an Orator may doe, being an honeſt man.

Plato in his Timeus.

Tyrants doe ſtand in feare of Orators.

CHAP. XXXVII.

A Contradiction of the common Prouerbe, (approuing it not very likely to be true) when we vſe to ſay: That the Viper neuer ſeeth his Mother aliue, nor the Wolfe his liuing Syre.

The opinion of Ariſtotle, Pliny, Ælianus, &c concerning the Viper.

I Doe not know, frō whence Ariſtotle, Pliny, Ælianus, and the common people haue conceiued; that the viper neuer beholdeth his Damme or Breeder aliue. Becauſe they hold it, as a matter moſt certaine, that when the Female produceth her brood of Vipers: they bite her entrails in ſunder, to get their iſſuing foorth, whereof ſhe dyeth. And that it is done, as by Diuine vengeance, in regard, that ſhe her ſelfe ſlew her begetter, at the coniunction: by graſhing or byting off his head, thorow the extreame delight ſhe conceiued in her copulation. And thus, as being but badly informed in the Nature of Creatures; they adde lie vpon lye. But in matters that haue had occularie teſtimony: there ſhall be no neede of any other demonſtration. Becauſe in theſe daies, there are Vipers (of both Sexes) kept and nouriſhed in Cages, that haue beene ſeene to produce their young ones. Which (to ſpeake truely) are not brought into the World, after the manner of other Serpents, that firſt of all (after the Seede) are engendred of Egges, then ſitten on, and hatched: But young Vipers are enclоſed within the membranes, or vpper moſt skinne, as are all fore-footed creatures on the Earth, and men in the Matrixe of their Mothers, which they open and vnlace, the birth time beeing come, determined by nature. And thoſe leaſings of Antiquitie, haue receiued ſound root; onely thorow want of better obſeruation.

How the Viper is engendred, & commeth into the World.

As concerning that which is ſpoken of Wolues, that they alſo neuer ſee their Syres or Begetters: this is likewiſe well neere as falſe, as the precedent report. And they alleadge this reaſon, to wit; the Wolues coupling together like Dogges and Bitches; are likewiſe faſt tyed by the Members, while the Female is retaining the Males anoyding. Then other Male Wolues, hauing purſued this Female or Bitch-Wolfe, being in extreamity of heate, and finding them thus conioyned together: they doe kill that Male Wolfe, whereby ſhee hath conceiued, and ſo the young Whelpes which are to proceede of this copulation, doe neuer behold their Syres aliue.

The Fable of the He and She Wolues copulation.

I wonder, and am much amazed alſo, from whence this ſecond Fable ſhould proceede: for it is much more eaſie to behold the natural behauior of wolues, then of Vipers. And I am very certaine, that during the laſt peſtilence (which was in the Towne of Vſerche, where my dwelling is) walking abroad one day into the Fieldes, to take the Ayre, being accompanied with a Countrey Swaine,

The Authour maketh mention hereof, as being an eye-witneſſe.

Eight Male Wolues followed one Female.

swaine, of good and bold Spirit: as I returned homeward to my House, after Sunne setting, in the month of February, we perceiued eight Wolues, that followed a She-Wolfe in her heate of pride, their eyes glaring as brightly, as if they had beene so many Candles. We hauing no Weapons of defence, climbed vp suddenly into a Tree, for our owne safetie, where we were forced to stay aboue three houres. In which time, we could discerne plainely, that that this company of Wolues followed but this one She-Wolfe, as hath be ne said, and hee that made himselfe strongest against the other, by k eping them off, and often wounding them with his teeth: became at last fastned to the Female, none of the rest then stirring at him, neither killing or byting him. And this verily I think to be their customary vse, as I haue also heard credibly the like reported, by Collyers and Wood-fellers, who dwell ordinarily in Forrests, and hath assured me thereof.

Another proofe concerning the She-wolfe.

It hath (neuertheleſſe) beene also affirmed, that the She-Wolfe, being salt or proud (as we tearm it) and followed by many Wolues; could not be couered or lined, because they still hindred one another, by their byting and hurting. And hauing thus pursued her ten or twelue daies together, they being al wearied with trauaile, hauing eaten nothing, and gone such an extreame compasse of ground: haue couched themselues downe by her, and falne fast asleepe, which when shee her selfe hath espyed, she hath risen secretly and softly, gone and awaked the most Truant, scurny, itchy, and misshapen Curre in all the troupe, to make him possesse her. And then the other Wolues (awaking with their noyse) finding them coupled, haue taken and torne him with their teeth. And thus you may see, from whence came the Prouerbe, vsed by old, in-discreete and lasciuious Women, that make the like measure of their owne brutall Nature; affecting (more commonly) an euill fauoured and lothsome man, then one of comely feature, sweete, gentle, and honest disposition.

A vile & base nature noted in many Women

Also, it is commonly seene, that in a Country, where there is but one Male, and another Female Wolfe, who coupling together, and no other Wolues there to impeach them; the Sire of the young ones, cannot be slaine, and therfore such Whelpes as come of him by that coniunction, must needes see their Syre. We may then gather by this discourse, how farre these Prouerbes are from truth, and that this case deserued some consideration; to take away the error of such people, as assuredlie credited these idle vanities.

Another proofe concerning wolues.

The Sires of Wolues, and the Whelpes engendred by them, are of contrary Natures, for the young ones, when they are but a yeare old, and addict themselues to prey and purchase: although they haue not seen their Sire and Damme in two or three moneths, yet when they meet, they will do them reuerence, and vse a thousand flatteries to them.

Of Wolues & their young ones, & how vnnatural the Sire is to his owne whelps.

Contrariwise, the Sire-Wolfe, giueth no helpe (at most, very little) in nourishing them. For, when the yong ones sucke no more, but grow to some bigneſſe: then the Dam bringeth them food, which he taketh and feedeth on, not suffering the Whelps to eate a iot, vntill he haue filed his owne belly. But if she returne home, and bring no food with her; then doth the Male beate her outragiously. But then the Female hath this subtilie, not to bring home any food, so long as he keepeth in the Kennell: but hydeth it secretly, till he bee wandred abroad for purchase; whereby we may discerne their different Natures. All these thinges are written by the Lord of Clanourgan, and Olaus Magnus, Arch-bishop of Westphalia, which doe nothing approoue the common saying; That the Wolfe neuer seeth his Sire.

Different vertues in the Male and Female.

Seeing we haue formerly spoken of Vipers, I now call to minde some Serpents, which are oftentimes found, to breede in the blaines and botches of old Wolues, neere the backe bone, containing the length of a foote, and some as long as a mans Finger, and others lesse. These leane Serpents, by succeſſe of time, doe cause the Wolues death, and continuing in their rotten putrifaction, conuert themselues to Vipers, and Serpents very venomous. It may then well be said, in such a case as this, that these kinde of Vipers doe neuer see (such as engende-engendered them) aliue. But this concerneth not any of the other kinde, which are so much sought for by the Compounders of Treacle: whereunto so many vertues are attributed, against all poysons, infections of the Ayre, and many diseases, appertaining to the field Vipers.

Serpents and Vipers, which are often found in the raines of Wolues.

White wolues engendred between a Hind and a Wolfe.

There are diuers diffetences of Wolues, for some are called White-Wolues, who being at their prey, and feeding on it: if they perceiue any thing which is more proper for them; they leaue the first purchase, and quite forgetting it, follow after the other. There is another kinde (although it should not be differing from the other) which is called the Man-kinde Wolfe, and liueth only by humaine Flesh. The reason whereof is, that when they haue once tasted of mans Flesh, by following Armies, and seeking such places where battails are fought; or when they haue eaten dead carkases saln from Gibbers. From that time forward, though they should perish and starue with hunger; yet will they not feede on any thing elie, especially if they be old. Heereupon they ranne at Children, and Sheepheards keeping their flockes; yea, they wil enter Townes and Villages, and cary Children out of their Cradles, or any they can meete within the streetes, hazarding Mens and Weomens liues, except they do the better defend themselues. And let them passe by whole Heards of Cattle, Sheepe, or other: yet will they not touch one of them, but Mans Flesh onelie, and chiefelie, where they haue been well resisted and beaten.

The mankind Wolfe, feeding on mans Flesh.

The bloody nature of the Man-kind Wolfe.

Some hold opinion, that a full-fed or glutted Wolfe, neuer doth any harme, or if any food remaine to him, which he hath hidden in the ground, and doe not feele himselfe hungry. They say beside, that many times he will play with his prey, as a Lambe, Sheep, Kid, Goat, Hare, or such like, euen as a Cat playeth with a Rat, before she eates it. But seeing we are entred into the play or sport of Wolues, I will describe an History, which was reported (my selfe being present) by Monsieur de Humiere, vpon Saint Andrewes day, 1563. before Monsieur, Brother to King Charles, who afterward was Henry the third, King of France. In Piccardie, in the Forrests of Ardenne, certain Gentlemen and Countrey Yeomen (belonging to diuers Parishes) assembled themselues together, to vndertake a hunting of Wolues, which had done them many harms and mischances. And as they had giuen chase to about a dozen of them: some were taken in Snares and Nets; others kild with Caliuers, and (among the rest) they slew a She-Wolfe, that was followed by a young Infant starke naked, aged about seauen yeares, of strange complexion, with faire curled Hayre, that (seeing the Wolfe dead) ran fiercely at them which had slaine it. But he was beset with so many men, that they tooke him, and found the Nailes (both on his hands and feete) bowed inward: and nothing he spake, but gaue forth an inarticulate voyce, like to a Calfe. They brought him thence to a Gentlemans House (a Man of good account, and well knowne) in a great Village not far off, where (not without much difficulty) they put Iron Manacles on his hands and feete. In the end, by hauing long fasted, he became more mild and tame, and, within the space of seuen months, they had taught him to speake. Then they walked abroad with him, to Cities, Townes, Villages, Noble-mens Houses, and Castles, & they that were his Guardians, got great store of Mony by him.

A strange History of a young Infant taken by a Wolfe.

The manner of finding the Childe in the Forrest.

Now, to hold the Reader in no longer delay, concerning how this Infant should come into the company of Wolues; you must vnderstand, that about the Feast of All-Saints (commonly called All-hallontide) the weather then beeing very cold, young Boyes, Girles, and poore Weomen of a Village (the name whereof I doe not well remember) went into the neerest Forrest Royall, to cut downe and gather sticks of Trees. It was at the euening time, the sky cold, dimme, and cloudy, which caused them to make hast, binding vp their burdens like little Fagots, and so intended to beare them thence: but the Guardes and Forresters comming vpon them, and they being fearefull, both of imprisonment and other hard vsage, fled, some one way, some another, leauing their Hatchets and burdens behind them. Among the rest, one

How the child came into the Forrest among the Wolues.

The Wolfe being glutted or full-fed, will doe no harme.

A poore Woman that cam to gather sticks, mother to the Childe.

one of the poore women, had brought her Childe in her Armes thither, being not aboue nine months old, not hauing any body in her House, to tend it when she was absent: for her Husband was a daily labouring man, that came not home to his house, but on Sundaies or Feast daies. Hauing set downe her Childe, and being frighted, as before is said; she made escape into the Forrest, as thinking their pursuite seuerely followed her. But perceiuing that safety friended her, and the watches of her eies descried no perill (for indeede, the Forresters were gone, and darke night drew swiftly on) she came againe to the place where she left her burden, which the Guards had caried away with them. Finding neither her Child nor Wood, Sorrow perswadeth it selfe on any likely occasion.

yet seeking still about with teares and complaints; at length, throwing off both greefe and feare, her hopes gathered this perswasion: that the Forresters had seazed her Child for her other offence, and now it stood her on, notwithstanding, whatsoeuer amends or satisfaction they should demaund, to them she must goe, and re-obtaine her Childe.

The poor womans enquiry after hir child

Vpon this perswasion, she returned home to her dwelling, and enquired of all those that went to the Forrest with her, if they could tell her any tydings of her Infant. Hauing no comfort of them, she ran to the Village, where the Forresters made their vsual retreat, and found them in a Tauerne drinking Wine, the bundles of wood, Hatchets and other furniture (which they had brought with them from the Forrest) lying by them, and in teares she required her Childe of them. But they, reprouing and threatning her for her offence, by sollemne oathes and protestations; assured her, that they saw no such Childe. On the morrow morning, poore Soule, she went to the Forrest againe, and made another search, but all in vaine. And her Husband beeing returned from his labour, by reason of the Feastiuall daie, hearing the wofull losse of his Childe, and what informations the Harpyes of Iustice made against them (because it was alleaged, that thorow their default, the Babe was exposed to sauage beastes) after a long and boot lesse perquisition in the Forrests, the Father and Mother of the Childe, dreading least Law would punish them for the Childe, because they could yeild no better reckoning of it, forsooke the Countrey, and neuer any tydings was heard afterward of their being.

The Father & Mother of the Child, banish themselues.

Now, it may well bee presupposed, that the fore-remembred She-Wolfe, searching some prey to beare vnto her Whelps; found the Childe so forsaken of the Mother, as before hath beene saide, and carried it away with her. And (indeede) it is very likely, for a Wolfe will carry a Sheepe in her mouth, or a young Beast (how big or weighty soeuer it be) without any offence, halfe a mile and more, yet neuer resting her selfe, euen as a Grey-hound dooth a Hare. It is well knowne, that if she find a Horsse or a Cow dead, in any hollow or Dith: she will easily dragge it forth to feed on, which a Horse (well harnessed thereto) can hardly doe. And hauing brought this Infant to her young ones (as the She-Wolfe doth al young Beastes that shee can seaze on, to teach them how to looke their liuing:) the Whelpes, perchance beeing suffised, would play with the Child before they fed on it. The Damme being laid among her Whelps, the Childe finding the teates of the Wolfe, tooke one of them in his mouth, and suckt it, as weening it had beene the Dugge of his true Mother, which caused the Wolfe, (thence forward) to loue it as her own. For She-Wolues doe take delight and pleasing, when their teates are tickled, suckt, or plaid withall, and all Female beasts haue the like naturall inclination. For, if the teat or dugge be giuen to a Creature, although it be of a different and very contrary kind, yet it will loue the Giuer: As we haue noted in Bitches, that haue nourished Cats; Goats that haue fostred young VVhelpes; Kine, Serpents, and Lambs, Hennes, that haue loued them all their life time.

The Authors imagination in this case.

The ability of a Wolues carriage.

A supposition concerning the norishing of the Childe by the wolfe.

And so it may be, that thus it fell out with this She-wolfe, her VVhelps, and this younge Infant. And beside, albeit the whelps grew to foure or fiue yeares age: yet, in regard of the long continuance, and finding the Infant neuer to wander, but still their owne Dam was in his company; they would bee the more

The iudgement and knowledge of Wolues wher they affect.

more familiar, gambauld, friskt, and leap vpon him, after the maner of playing Puppies, and all other Wolues of that Countrey would neuer hurt him. I think also, that the matter which best preserued the Childe, was: that not only the She-wolfe, but her young ones likewise, tooke great delight in the Childes Excrements; for he should no sooner performe the office of Nature, but both she and her VVhelpes would runne in hast to him, to deuour his deiections; yea, they would eate the verie Earth whereon his Vrine ranne along, and so, while she kept society with him, shee made this the best and contentedst part of her prey.

The child was fed with raw flesh sixe yeares.

This Childe liued on raw flesh, about the space of sixe yeares, by that which himselfe declared afterward, as hauing good memory of all things happening vnto him. And hauing attained to the age of foure yeares, guided on still by Nature, hee kept no other course; so that they had much labour, to bring him to feed on other prepared meates, but rather affected still his former nourishment. He told them moreouer, that euery yeare the VVolfe had a Litter of VVhelpes, and he had the charge of keeping them, when she went abroad in quest of her prey. Also, that she would snarle, snappe, and bite the Male wolfe, when he came to look on them: by which meanes, both he, or any other Males, in that time resorted very sildome thither.

What hapned to the Childe after his taking, and how he came to be knowne.

After his taking, as before you haue heard; his naked body being brought to the wearing of Garments, himselfe enstructed how to speake, and made domesticall, hauing changed his brutish, to a more ciuill kind of life, appearing like to other Children in behauiour: by an especiall marke or note, to wit, sixe Fingers on either hand, he was knowne to be the Sonne of the fore-mentioned poore woman, and the age which hee then was of, agreed with the iust time of his losse. Hee was made a Heardsman of Sheepe, and other Beastes, for the space of other seauen yeares, in al which time, VVolues neuer made any attempt on the troupes committed to his charge: albeit he kept great store of Cattle, as Oxen, Kine, Calues, Horses, Mares, and Poultry. This was very well obserued, by the Inhabitants of the Village where he had dwelling, and therefore, that other Heardes might participate in this benefit or priuiledge: the Husbandmen of other Villages, & their Sheepheards, would driue and bring their flocks where he kept his, and desire him but to stroke his hands vpon them; which he would doe, with some of his Phlegme or spittle on them. After which done (let others coniecture as best shal please them) for the space of fifteene dayes; Dogges of the greatest fury, nor any VVolues, would by any vrgency touch them. By this meanes he got a great deale of Mony; for hee would haue a* Double Trurnois, for euery beast that he so laid his hand on, or stroaked their eares.

* The value of two pence in that Countrey.

But as all thinges haue a certaine period, so this Childe, hauing attained to the age of aboue foureteen yeares: the vertue which he had, to hinder wolues from doing harme to his Heardes of Beasts, or those that he stroaked on the backe, or handled their eares; was lost, and left him. I guesse that this happened, because he had changed his natural complexion and temperature at that age; and by hauing fed so long a time on other nourishment, then his former wolfish dyet. And this was wel obserued by himselfe, by reason, that wolues would not come so neere him, as they were wont to doe; but kept aloofe off, as being feareful of him. The former propertie fayling him, hee gained no more then the meanest Shepheard did, whereat he tooke such dislike: that hee forsooke his Pastorall life, and went abroad in the fields, to seeke his fortune. At length, he heard where warres were in hand, and there he became a Boy to attend on a Souldiour: afterward, hee prooued himselfe to bee a Souldiour, braue, bold, and verie valiant; but fell in the end to be a Theefe, excelling all other in craft and subtilty. Hee was slaine in the yeare 1572. by the followers to the Duke of Alba, being among the companies of Genlis, which he conducted in Flanders, against the King of Spaine, who made war on the States of the Low Countries: where he behaued himselfe manfully, and sold his life at a deare rate.

The alteration of the Childs natural vertue.

He became a Souldiours Boy, and then a Souldiour himselfe.

In what manner he was slaine in the Low Countries.

An admirable property, naturally infused into the Child.

Hauing ended the Historie of this Child,

One mans good fortune is no warrant to others in the like ſucceſſe.

Childe, ſo borne away, and nouriſhed by the Wolfe; I am of the mind, that notwithſtanding all the kindneſſe he receiued from her, as being a matter rare and extraordinary: yet, in regard of the detriments and annoyances, which they bring to all ſortes of Men, and in all Countries, except in the Kingdomes of England and Scotland; that both Princes and Noble-men, as well as Countrey Yeomen and meaner perſons, ſhould ſtriue to exterminate the race of ſuch pernitious Creatures, which by their breath and ſight, not onely doe make men hoarſe and wheeze, if they meete them, but alſo doe bereaue them of all power to ſpeake or cry out. Great men then ought to be the firſt beginners, to haue the larger intereſt in honour: and ſo much the rather, becauſe it is the faireſt and moſt beneficiall kind of hunting, beyond all other. For Princes, great Lordes, and others, exerciſing themſelues in this paſtime: ſhall be the more hardy, valiant, and apt to Armes. In like manner, by this kind of hunting, they ſhall deliuer the Countrey from wicked and pernicious Beaſts, that (among a thouſand other diſcommodities) doe rob Kings and Princes of their young Fawnes, Hindes, and Fallow-Deere; yea, Husbandmen looſe al their young breeds about their Houſes, and in their Fieldes, which were determined and hoped for future profit, and enlargement of ſtore. And, a matter much more to be pitied, many times they ſet vpon young Children, Women great with Childe, and ſometimes on people of more ſtrength and ability.

The honor & benefit of hunting the wolf, in regard of his harmes & annoyances.

Good ſtrong Dogges, are fitteſt againſt them, or the Iriſh Grey-hound, or Grinnes, Snares, or pits, all aduantages are faire and commendable, the Beaſt is ſo much deſpighted. Hee is worth nothing, but vnprofitable to all Men. He is neuer tamed, but he will then doe (daily) a thouſand miſchiefes: for ſuch is his Nature, ſo long as he enioyeth life. But being dead, there may then ſome commodity be deriued from him. For his skinne, being prepared by a Leather dreſſer, is very good for Cloakes, the Furre (in cold weather) worne inwardlie, giueth great warmth to the body: and the hairy-ſide worne outwardly when it raineth, will neuer

All aduantages againſt a Wolfe, are tollerable.

A Wolfes skin may be good vſe made of.

be pierced thorow with any moyſture, how long ſoeuer it laſteth. A couerlet made of Wolues skinnes, and laid on any Bed whatſoeuer; it ſhall continually be free from Fleas, Bed-Punies, or any other Vermine. The moſt inconuenience is, that Dogs will euer be piſſing againſt it.

The Greaſe or Fat of a Wolfe.

The Fat or Greaſe of a Wolfe, is ſingularly good againſt all Aches of Gouts, Palſies, Luxations, Fractures, or verolicke anguiſhes. His Liuer, which is made like the Naile in a Horſe hoofe, being dried in an Ouen, and beaten into powder, and then drunke with Succory Water: recouereth the Liuer of a man, how altered or corrupted ſoeuer it be. Galen ſaith, that a Phiſition of his time, cured as many people ſubiect to the Collick, as could be brought vnto him, without refuſing any one: onely by cauſing them to drinke the Dung of a Wolfe. And ſuch as would not, or could not take it; did weare it hanging vpon their bellie, and there it expreſſed the ſame operation. There are alſo certaine little bones found in his Excrements, which being waſhed, and held vpon the tooth that is pained, and it appeaſeth the anguiſh immediatlie.

The Wolfes Liuer.

Wolues dung

An old woues head.

A Wolues great teeth.

The head of an old Wolfe, faſtned on the doore of a mans houſe, impeacheth all Charmes or Sorceries from entring therein. Alſo, the great teeth of a wolfe, are good for all diſeaſes in the throat, mouth, or teeth, if they bee but held therein a while.

The fleſh of a Wolfe.

It is a matter very certaine, and hath beene experimented, that if a Woman be in trauaile of Childe-bearing, how difficult or doubtfull ſoeuer it bee: let but a little Fleſh of a Wolfe bee giuen her to eate, and ſhe ſhall ſuddenlie bee deliuered, both of the Fruite and after burden; or if a Man that hath eaten any, ſtand hood-winckt by, it auaileth.

A wolfes right foote before.

A Wolfes right foote before, is verie Soueraigne Phiſicke for all paines in womens breaſts, and for the ſwellings of the Swine-poxe.

Vile diſcommodities enſuing by the Wolfe.

The Wolfe is of ſo wicked and peruerſe Nature, that if he come among a Heard, be it of Swine, Pigges, Sheepe, or Lambes: the whole troupe is ſure to dye, if he haue the opportunitie. And if it happen, that a Horſe doe ſet his foote where a wolfe hath trod: he will after-afterward become heauy, dull, & sloth-full. Moreouer, if a man make any Gowne or other Garment, of a Beasts Wooll that hath been kild by a Wolfe, or if the Wooll of the Beast slaine by the Wolfe, be but mingled among any other Wooll, whereof the Gowne or Garment is made: it wil continually be lousie, or infected with Vermine.

The Conclusion of this Chapter.

Thus you see, what I haue learned and collected, concerning the seuerall Natures of the Viper and the Wolfe, as well by good experience which I my selfe haue made, as read in sound and approued Authors. As for the History of the Infant so carried away, and nourished by the Female Wolfe, beside the Princes presence, before whom it was reported verie faithfully: I haue enquired (since then) of many more, beside mine own vnderstanding it by the Lord of Humiere; As of M. Iohn Kuffell, Abbat of Vigoeas in Lymosine, a Piccard by Nation, and borne in the same place. De la Vaquerie, who assured me, that the History was very true, and that he himselfe saw the Childe, after it was taken from the Wolfe, and educated, as you haue heard. As much did the Lord of Valon tell me, a Gentleman of great honour, and who is yet liuing. For when this strange case happened, he had some imployment and commandat Rocroy, a frontire Towne of Piccardie, neere to the Forrests of Ardenne. He was then present at the killing of the wolues, and taking of the naked Childe. At this instant, he dwelleth in Lymosine, as ouerseer for the Lands and Seigneuries of Monsieur de la Guiche, sometime Great Maister of the Artillery of France; and at this present, he is Lieutenant to the King, and Gouernor of the Countries of Lyonnois, Forests, and Beaujolois, &c. And since this accident was within compasse of mine owne knowledge; I do not hold that rare or strange, recorded by Titus Liuius, beside other Roman Historians: that the first Founders of Rome, young and newly borne, to wit; Remus and Romulus, being exposed to disastrous fortune, were preserued and nourished by a She-Wolfe.

Eye witnesses approuing the truth of the History of the Infant & the Wolfe.

Titus Liuius concerning Remus and Romulus

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Whether Lucius Apuleius, Sir-named Platonicus, were transformed into an Asse, or no: And whether he were a Sorcerer or Magitian.

THere needeth no further question or doubt, whether Lucius Apuleius Platonicus, were a Sorcerer, and likewise transformed into an Asse: because he was dealt with all in Iustice, before the Pro-consull of Affrica, in the time of the Emperour Antoninus the first, sir-named the Pittifull, and in the yeare of Iesus Christ, 150. As Apollonius Thyaneus (long time before him) vnder Diocletian, An. 60. was impleaded for the same fact. And more then three hundred yeares after, this fame still continued, euen to the time of S. Augustine, who was an Affricane; he also wrote and confirmed the same: auouching likewise, that in his time, the Father of one Prestantius was transformed into a Horse, and this is also affirmed by Saint Augustine.

Lucius Apuleius tried by Iustice before the Proconsull.

The testimony of Saint Augustine.

This Lucius (the Theame of our instant discourse) was learned, for, in his younger yeares, he studied at Carthage, where the Romaines had founded diuers good Schooles. Afterward, hauing passed his youth-hood, his Father sent him to Athens: where he learned the doctrin of Plato, and profited so well, that hee was sir-named a Platonist. Then his desires drew him to study Magick, and for his better proceeding therein, he transported himselfe into Thessalie; because, in that Countrey, there were Men and Women, that made profession of such enstruction; but yet very secretly, in regard, that (by the Romain lawes) all such were punished, as addicted themselues thereto. In briefe, hauing taried there so long time (as valued his succeeding trasformation, to learne those deuilish sciences) he returned home to his Fathers

Lucius Apuleius a Student at Carthage and Athens.

His passage into Thessalie, where he learned Magicke.

His going to Rome.

House: who thought he had lost him, and therefore sent him to Rome, for sound apprehension of the Latine tongue, to the end he might be prouided of some estate in his Countrey, by the Romaines. He was of so excellent a spirit; that (with smal paines, & in short time) he became so ingenious a Latinist: as he was reputed for one of the chiefest Aduocates, and most eloquent in pleading before the Senate; as is yet to bee seene by his famous Orations, remaining extant in our eyes.

His returne home into his own country, from Rome.

From Rome he returned to Malaura, a Cittie of Numidia, his owne Country, and a Colonie of the Romaines: his Father being yet liuing, named Theseus, who had exercised (in that Countrey) the estate of an Ædilis, with some other Offices for many yeares, and was verie wealthy. His Mothers name was Salvia, being of the linage to Plutarch, and the learned Philosopher Sextus his nephew, vnto whom, Marcus Aurelius the Emperor, had sometime bin Scholler and Auditor. Being there arriued, all the Orators of Malaura, and the neighbouring Citties, made a prize, which should be giuen to him, that could declame most elegantly. Easily did he win the honour from them all, in regard whereof: beside the prize, two Statues were erected to him, one at * Oea, and the other at Carthage.

The great eloquence of Lucius Apuleius

* One of the three Citties of the Country Tripolis in Affrica.

His Father beeing dead, in a small while he wasted the greater part of his goods, about his Magicall Artes, and to preuent pouertie; he compassed to marry with Pudentilla, a verie rich widdow (for long time) in Oea. With her he continued till she died, and soon after, her onely Son and Heire, whom she had by her other Husband. Matters passing on in this manner, made some to coniecture, that by magick art he had seduced Pudentilla; whom many worthy men laboured to possesse in marriage, onely in hope of her Sons great riches. It was reported also, that he had a Dæmon or familiar Deuill, because by such great and profound knowledge, he ordinarily resolued strange and difficult questions, exceeding the common capacity of other men. Moreouer, he had beene noted to doe many admirable things; as to go inuisible; other whiles to transforme himselfe into the shape of a Horse, or of a Bird; to pierce himselfe through the body with a Sword, yet without wounding, and diuers such like thinges. Which caused the Ethnickes of those times, to esteeme slenderly of the miracles, which the Disciples of the Primitiue Church performed, being of the second time; yea, or those of Iesus Christ: but they admired them of Apuleius, of Thyaneus, and others of the same stampe. In the end, he was accused by one Sicilius Æmilianus, the Censor, before Claudius Maximus, Pro-consull of Affrica, who was said to bee a Christian; but no condemnation was found or approued against him.

Imputations concerning Lucius in his marriage and otherwise.

Wonders performed by Apuleius.

Lucius accused before the Proconsull, and quitted.

Now, notwithstanding his learned defensiue Orations, the fame continued of him (to be a Sorcerer vndoubtedlie) yea, euen to the time of Saint Augustine, who liued about three hundered yeares after. And that which brought him in more suspicion among the Christians to bee such a one: was, that hee vsed the sacrificing, and the same manner of Priest-hood among the Paganes, in his Countrey of Affrica, whereof Saint Augustine giueth assurance. For the Priests of the Paganes at that time, were (well-neere) all Sorcerers: onely to make the people (by their false Miracles) to beleeue, that their Religion was true, and not dissembled. To approue the truth hereof, in the time of the said Apuleius, there was a certaine Image of Iupiter made, called Phyleus, that is to say; Amiable, composed by Art Magicke in such manner: that it wrought wonders, and gaue many aunsweres, and among others, this. Hence-forward, let not the Christians bee suffered to dwell in Cities, nor any where neere about them: but let them bee driuen the furthest off that may be.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei lib. 7. cap. 18.

A strange Idoll made of Iupiter.

Rufinus in lib. 10. Cap. 33.

He wrote a Booke, which he entitled, The God of Socrates; wherein hee sheweth, that there was not any God, but a Dæmon, and of what kind, and after the maner of Socrates, he made himselfe familiar, by whom he was still aduertised, concerning things to come, or absent. And because his Booke should bring no scandall to the Reader; he rather chose to entitle it the God, then the Dæmon, or Deuill of Socrates: by which Booke, he gaue sufficient testimony,

His Booke of the Dæmon of Socrates.

mony, that he was skilfull in Magicke.

For his transformation into an Asse, Saint Augustine holdeth it very certainly, hauing read it in diuers good Authors, and well deseruing beleefe, beside his owne being of the same Country. And this transformation happened vnto him in Thessalie (before hee had knowledge in Magicke) by a Sorcerer, that so sold him: and yet recouered him again, after he had done the drudgery of an Asse for some years, hauing the same strength, and behauiour in eating and braying, as other Asses had; yet his reasonable Soule (neuertheleſſe) remained sound and intire, as himselfe auoucheth. Now, because, this fact might bee couered, by reason of the rumour then bruited abroad to be so, and very likely: he composed a Booke, which he called The Golden Asse, intermedled with Fables and discourses, to demonstrate the vices of men in those times, which hee had heard spoken, or seene done, during his transformation; beside many paines and trauailes, which hee suffered in his transformation.

Aug de Ciuit. Dei. Lib. 7. Cap. 18.

His transformation into an Asse.

His Booke of the golden Asse.

That it might be so, the said S. Augustine, in his Booke of the Citty of God, declareth, that (in his time) there were certaine women witches, or Sorcerers on the Alpes, which would giue a kinde of Cheese to Passengers, whereby they were suddenly transformed into Asses, or some other Beasts of burden. And they would make them carry their luggage, to such places as themselues pleased; which being performed, they restored them to their former condition againe.

Aug. De Ciuit. Dei Lib. 18. Cap. 17, 18.

The Bishop of Tyre, the Historian, writeth, that in his time, which seemeth to be, about 1220. there were certaine English-men, whom their King had sent to assist the Christians, then warring in the Holy Land: who being arriued in the Hauen of Cyprus, a woman Sorcerer transformed a young English Souldior into an Asse. And he, being willing to returne to his companions in the Ship, was beaten back with Stones and Staues. Being thus returned to the Witch, he continued in this estate, vntill at length it was perceiued, that the Asse entred into a Church, and there fell on his knees, expressing such signes and actions, as could not but proceed from a reasonable creature. Vpon this speaking suspition, the witch (whom he serued) beeing apprehended by the authority of Iustice: restored him to his humaine shape againe, three yeares after his transformation, and shee in the open field was executed to death.

An English-man transformed into an Asse, in the Isle of Cyprus.

We read, that Ammonius, the Peripatetick Philosopher, at such times as he ordinarilie read and taught in the Schoole, had an Asse still present by: which was in the time of Lucius Septimius Seuerus, Emperour, and in the yeare of our Lord Iesus Christ, 196. Some said, that he had been first the Schoolemaister of Origen, and a Christian: but did not persеuere, fearing martirdome, as Porphyrius saith. I am of the mind also, that this Asse had formerly beene a Man, and could well comprehend what Ammonius did teach: for in such persons as are transformed, their reason still remaineth with them, as Saint Augustine maintaineth, and many other Authors.

An Asse that came to Lectures, read in the school.

Fulgosus writeth, that in the time of Pope Leo, who liued in the yeare 930. that there were two Witches in Germany, Hostesses of Innes, who made a practise or custome, of changing their Guests into Beasts. Vpon a time, they Metamorphosed a young Lad (who was a Mountebancke or Iugler) into an Asse, causing him to shew a thousand trickes and gambaulds before al Passengers, yet retaining still his naturall reason. One of their neighbours bought this Asse at a deare price, but they forewarned the Buyer, that they could not make any warrant of the Beast: onelie they feared, that if the Asse went into any Riuer or Water, they would be in danger of looſing him. On a day, the Asse escaping from his guide, ranne into the neereſt Lake, and plunging himselfe well in the Water; he recouered againe his former shape. And Apuleius telleth vs, that he regained his shape of Man, by hauing fed on Roses.

Baptist. Fulgosa in lib. 8. cap. 2.

A young Iugler turned into an Asse.

It is yet (at this day) to bee seene in Ægipt, that some will bring Asses into a publike place, where they will make them shew diuers feates of agility, and Apish-like trickes. Vnderstanding all that is commaunded them, and executing the same. As, to reueale the Asses in Egypt that appeare to haue vnderstanding faireſt Woman in the company, which they doe, and many other thinges (hard to be credited) which they perform, according as Belonius declareth, in ſuch obſeruations as he hath noted, and diuers other beſide, who haue bin there, and auouched euery thing to me. Thus then you ſee my concluſion, which is (concerning the Metamorphoſis of Lucius Apuleius) that he was changed into an Aſſe, and exerciſed Magicall Artes: albeit he was one of the learnedſt Men of his time, and neuer was prouided of any honourable eſtate, as (willingly) no Sorcerers will be. For they are but abiect & Wretches, and keepe themſelues concealed among the people, according as Saint Auguſtine ſaith.

Sorcerers are euer wicked wretches.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of a Taylor, named Iohn Leyden, a Hollander, who by his ſmooth tongue, was elected King of Munſter, in the Countrey of Germany.

THe reaſon that moued me to remember Iohn Leyden, who made himſelfe a King, though hee was no more then a miſerable poore Tailor: was, in regard of a former Chapter, where I diſcourſed of ſuch, as abuſed the eloquence which Nature beſtowed on them, and (many times) came to violent deaths, according as this man did, of whom I will deſcribe the true Hiſtory, recorded by Sleydan, Surius, and others, that were in Germany at the very ſame time.

Authors being eye-witneſſes.

We muſt firſt vnderſtand, that in Weſtphalia (a Countrey of Germanie, ſubiect partly to the Arch-byſhop of Cologne, and partly to the Dukes of Saxonie) there is a faire, great, and opulent Cittie, named Munſter, ſeated vpon a goodlie Riuer. In which Cittie, in the yeare 1534. were abyding ſo many Anabaptiſts, as durſt boldly enterpriſe to make themſelues Maiſters of the Cittie: expulſing the Arch-byſhop, and all other of the Inhabitants, that would not take part with them, not ſuffering them to cary any thing away with them. They depoſed the Magiſtrates, creating others according to their owne pleaſures, which beeing thus done, people of many neighbouring partes reſorted thither, being infected with the ſame errour: and (among others) a Taylor, that was an Hollander, expert and eloquent, who would needs mingle preaching among theſe mutinies. So well he preuailed by his ſmooth ſpeaking, that he perſwaded them: That GOD had appointed him to be King of Iſraell; and of Iuſtice, as Dauid was; and that he ſhould extend Gods Dominion and Rights ouer the whole Earth. But in the accompliſhing hereof, he muſt put all them to death, that would refuſe to embrace the Faith, and be ſubiect to righteouſneſſe.

The bold and impudent Anabaptiſts of Munſter.

A poore Taylor would needes make himſelfe a King.

This Taylor beeing eſtabliſhed a King, omitted no occaſion whatſoeuer, to make himſelfe ſtarke drunke in all voluptuouſneſſe, which poſſibly hee could dreame of. According to the manner of the Mahumetiſts, hee married many Wiues; hee inſtituted his Court and Officers, euery one hauing charge and Office in his Houſe, and all cloathed in Gownes tiſſued with Gold and Siluer, euen as himſelfe was, and all came of thoſe goods which he had robd from the Churches.

The creation of his Court and Officers, in their pomp and magnificence.

He wore vpon his Head a Diadem of three Crownes, made of the beſt Gold that could be gotten, and then hee had a Chaine of Gold, enriched with precious Stones, and a Pommander of Gold hanging at it, whereon was engrauen a little Croſſe, with this Inſcription; The King of Iuſtice vpon the Earth. In briefe, his Sword was of ineſtimable price, and nothing wanting to adorne him moſt richlie: but it would require too long a time, to ſet down all the rablement of this Royalty ſo much admired, and then to be noted in that diſtracted Citty.

The King of Iuſtice on earth.

For the maintenance of his eſtate, when he had made attribution to himſelfe of all their goods and mooueables that were vnder his obedience, as well Eccleſiaſticall as Lay-men: hee ſent forth ſtrong bands of Souldiours (for he had both Horſe and Foote, at the leaſt least fiue or sixe thousand) which were partly of Munster, partly of Holland, Saxonie, and other neere neighbouring places, all of the Anabaptists Religion, who ouer-ranne and spoyled the plaine Countrey, making all such their Prisoners, as they could entrap or seaze on, of what Age or Sexe soeuer they were. And this Taylor King, tooke the third part of the Monies, which ensued by their ransomes and other thefts: the rest was distributed among the Souldiours, who left neyther Horses, Mules, Mares, Colres, or any other kinde of labouring Beast whatsoeuer, (beside Sheepe, Kine, or other Cattle) within tenne miles compasse round about. They left not a handfull of Graine in any Towne or Village: prouiding themselues of all kind of Weapons, fortefying the Bulwarkes, Casemates, Spurs, Trenches, and Ditches, not omitting any artefice or defence of the Cittie.

The defence and maintenance of his authority.

Their thefts and spoyles.

The fortefication of Munster, and their courses.

To the end also, that their Heresie might spread it selfe in length and largenesse, the King commanded; that some should be sent vnto the neighbouring Townes, and this commaund was as speedily effected. Whereupon, one of his Prophets made a conuocation (by sound of Trumpet) of all the people, in the great Shippe of the great Church, so that there came about four thousand Men, and found there their Supper ready prepared, with no meane aboundance of all kind of meats, and being all set, they were serued by the King and Queene. At the ending of Supper, the King presented to euery one, a piece of Bread, speaking these words: Take, eate, and declare the death of the Lord. The Queene likewise presented them the Cup, saying; Drink, and declare the death of the Lord. When this company had supped, there were about a thousand more, who had stood as Guards all this while; and they sate downe to Supper, euen as the other had done. The whole Supper being finished, the fore-named Royall Taylor and Prophet, sitting on an high seate, demanded; if they would bee all obedient to the word of God? whereto they answered, yea. Then he added, that it was the wil of the Father, that certaine men should be sent from the cittie, to sowe the Doctrine abroad which they had embraced.

Fiue thousand men bidden to supper in a Church.

A very strãge kind of communion.

In a Roule brought before the King, the names of eight and twenty Men were rehearsed, of which number, eight were sent to Suaburg, and as many to Coffeld: eight more were commaunded to goe to Susac; and the other eight to Vuaremdorp. All these beeing good Townes of that Countrey, and had entertained Garrisons, to defend themselues from the surprises and inuasions of the Munsterians and Anabaptists. This being done, the King & the Queen with all their Seruants and delegate Apostles, went and supped againe at their owne liking. And as the King sate at the Table, hee rose, and gaue a lofty leape, saying: That the Father had commaunded him some thing to be done. And forthwith, hee imposed vpon a Souldiour, that he was a Traytour, and instantlie did cut off his head. Then returning to the Table againe, he did nothing but maintaine talke, of the bloody and horrible deed done by himselfe, which made the Supper much more execrable.

The sending abroad of his counterfeit Apostles.

The King at his supper performeth the act of a Hang-man.

Afterward, hee dispatched away his worthy Apostles, and the King gaue a crown to euery one of them (beside the Mony they had of their owne) to buy al necessary thinges: because they should leaue those places (where their doctrin would not be receiued) in testimony of their perdition. These things were full of admiration and folly, hardly to bee credited by posterity: but there is not any matter whatsoeuer, which such men wil not voluntarily execute, that are depriued of the light of truth, and their owne best sences, beeing made drunke with the dregs of the Deuill.

The Kings liberality to his Apostles.

On went those fond headed fellowes, according as he had commanded them, and cryed out horribly at their assigned places: admonishing the people to bee repentant, or else they should perish very soone. They would presume so farre as the iudgement Bars, and there spread a Gowne on the ground before the Magistrate, casting also downe the forementioned Crown: giuing assurance, that they were sent thither by the Father, to proclaim peace. Which if they receiued, they must then make all their goods in common: but if they refused so to do, they testified by that Crowne,

The behauior and doctrine of these idle-headed Apostles.

that they had diuorced peace, when she was presented to them. For they saide, the time (fore-tolde by the Prophets) was now come, wherin Gods pleasure was, that Iustice should bee exercised on earth. And when as the King (doing his office) had sowen and dispersed Iustice throughout the world: that then, Iesus Christ would resigne the Kingdome to his Father.

Horrible and blasphemous pretences.

These Apostles were taken, and first of all, examined without any punnishment, afterward, tortures were thought conuenient, to vnderstand their Faith and beleefe, and concerning the surprizall and fortifying of the Citty, with such like matters, as were very necessary to be enquired. Among other things, their answere was, that they onely had the true doctrine, neither more or lesse then other Christians. In breefe, none of these warlike Apostles, willing to be dismounted from their high horsed frenzies; were conducted to death, only one escaped.

The apprehension of the Apostles.

The false Apostles put to death.

Soone after the Citty was besiedged, by means of the Byshop, assisted by many Princes of Germany, as well Catholikes as Protestants, and especiallie the Arch-bishop of Cologne. The siedge continued before Munster (very neere) ten months, and was so strictly shut vp on all sides: as they imagined to tast of daintie delicates, when they could feed on Rats and Mice; yea, to eate dryed parched skinnes in stead of Bread; all which notwithstanding, the King felt no want of any thing. It happened, that as many dyed with famine, one of the Wiues to the King (moued with pitty towards the poore men) saide to some other; that the calamitie of these miserable Soules, appeared to her, not pleasing God. Which being vnderstood by the King: he brought her (with his other Wiues) to the place appointed, & there saw her head cut off. Whereat the other began to sing, and rendred thankes to the heauenly Father: so that the King himselfe began to dance, and perswaded his people to do the like, although they had no food to whet their teeth on.

The Citty of Munster besiged.

The Kinges Hangman beheaded one of his Queenes.

He had established by his lawes, the repudiation of wiues, and marrying of as many as a man would: in which case, he had more then two hundred causes in his Court of Audience, and onelie brought before himselfe. The dearth of all things grew so extreame (during this siedge) in the Citty: that two Men escaped out to the Byshop, of whom he learned, which side of the Cittie was most compelable. And heereupon, the Byshop exhorted the besiedged, to yeild themselues, because pardon should be granted to the poore abused people, and the more part of them would gladly haue gone forth: for the Byshop had appointed twelue expert Captaines, who gaue so diligent guard and attendance, that they who were within, could not scape any way. The Inhabitants of the Citty, in the presence of their King, made answere by Bertrand Rotman, that they would neuer forsake their first apprehension. Vpon this refusall, fifteene hundred men (conducted by the two Fugitiues) won one of the Bastions of the Citty, where they slew all them that were the Guards, and suddenly entred into the citty, where fighting awhile against the Cittizens, they opened the Gates to the rest of the Army. Then all the rest entred crowding in, and put all to the Sword; yet notwithstanding, pardon was graunted to some, that required mercy. The King, and Knipperdolling were taken, and the wretched beggarly Bertrand Rotman, who was (well neere) the sole cause of all the tragicall action: but breaking away very desperately, to thwart his resisters; he was massacred among them, and his Soule sent to the highest Disposer.

Pardon offered to the people.

The Cittie answere.

The Citty of Munster taken by the Bishops forces, and the King and his Conncellers.

After this, the King, his Councellers, Knipperdolling, and Crechring, hauing beene in Prison some moneths: to the mockery of the whole world, they were punnished, in the yeare one thousand, fiue hundred, thirtie sixe, with such a punishment as they had well deserued. For, being bound to the Trunkes of diuers Trees, they were nayled thereto all along, and then the Sword passing thorough their bodies, their liues were ended. Then were they enclosed in Cages of Iron, and so hanged on the top of the highest Tower in the Citty: the Kings body hanging in the midst, and higher then all the rest. Such was the conclusion of these wretched men, who (questionlesse) had brought the Land

The Taylor King and his companions put to death, and in such manner as they had iustly deserued.

Diuorce of Wiues allowed by his laws

Land to ruine and confusion, as hee retofore the Gothes and Vandales did: if the diuine prouidence, which euermore is assistaunt in our humaine actions, had not broken & dissipated their desseigns.

CHAP. XL.

Of the Order and manner, which ought to be obserued in laughter, and prouocation thereto. Of the cause of Laughter, with manie discourses tending thereunto.

It is both ciuill to laugh, & to procure laughter with modesty.

ALbeit, that it is the propertie of man (as all the Philosophers, and men of greatest knowledge haue written) to Laugh, or else, speaking in another manner, that man is a laughing creature: yet may not wee thereby inferre, that he ought to Laugh without reason, to no purpose, or out of measure; neither to prouoke others to laughter, but in good sort and ciuillie. For, such is the quality of people, without vnderstanding, Bouffons and dissolute persons, who by their Lyes, Tales, and villanous Ribaldries, doe scandalize honest Natures, & raise laughter in such as are as bad as themselues. For all things which incite laughing, and gladdeth the spirit, by yeelding pleasure thereto: doth not yet permit, that in this point, men should bee vnmindfull of greeuaunces, which are as naturall attendants vppon life. Therefore, we may well say, that Laughter is verie agreeable to men, and commendable also in the procurer, so it bee done in good sort, and at apt seasons.

To be merrie with a mixture of sorrow.

Occasions which haue bin deuised for laughter.

In regard whereof, we beholde many things, which men haue deuised to this effect, as Feasts, and diuers kinds of pleasing spectacles. And because wee affect such, as are the cause of those recreations wherein we take delight, the Kings in ancient times, the Romaines, the Athenians, and many more beside, to purchase the good liking of their people, & to feed their eies and minds in whole multitudes together; had a custome, to make great Theaters, and other publicke buildinges, where new Playes might bee exhibited, courses of Horses and Chariots, Combates of strange Beasts, Comedies, Tragedies, and Morisco Daunces. And yet these spectacles were not so disordered, but seuere Phylosophers would bee present at them; where manie times, by such delectations, or representations of that kinde, or else at Banquets; they founde a relaxation of their spirits, being formerly busied & wearied with high discourse, and Diuine thoughtes. As all manner of men, euen in these daies can affoord the like. For, not onely Labourers, and all such as take the greatest paines and trauell of body: but likewise religious holie men, yea, and prisoners, that awaite the stroake of death from houre to houre, would neuertheless, seeke some Medicine and remedie for theyr Recreation.

Senere Phylosophers present at pleasing shewes.

Euerie one desirous of merriment.

The causes of Laughter, are a certain kinde of deformity, in regarde, that wee laugh at such things, which do not concord in themselues, but seeme vnsightly, albeit they are not; I know not howe to expresse them otherwise. But whosoeuer considereth wel with himself in this case, will finde; that euen daily (as it were) the matter which is laughed at, is a thing that hath no conueniency, and yet notwithstanding it is not ill beseeming. I will shew ye, what means a discreet person ought to vse, for the mouing of laughter, and euen vpon what tearmes: because it is not alwayes conuenable, that he should vrge it, neither in such maner, as is vsed by Fooles, Drunkards, Sottes, Iesters, and namely Bouffones. And albeit such manner of people are fauoured in Courts, yet howsoeuer, they deserue not to be called wise or discreet, but euerie one by his name, and to be esteemed as he is. For this cause was it, that Marcus Aurelius dismissed one of his Sonnes Schoole-maisters (although he was learned) for Laughing out of measure in a Theater. And the Sonne to Phillip the Emperor, looked on his Father with an vnfriendly countenance, because he had likewise Laughed in the Theater disorderly.

A definition of the causes of laughter.

The manner and means to moue Laughter.

Examples alleged in this case.

It is fit likewise to be well considered, what limit and measure should be obserued in pointing, girding, or taunting. & who it is that is thus dealt withal, because he cannot induce or procure Laughter, by

No scorne or mockery is to be made of poore infortunat persons by mocking or deriding a poore, wretched, or vnfortunate man, neither at any wicked, notorious, or publick badde bodie. For, in mine opinion, such people of the first degree, deserue rather to bee pitied and relieued, and the other to be seuearely punnished, then Laughed or mocked at. And manly Spirites, cannot easilie encline themselues, to Laugh at miserie or pouertie, except it bee in this lowe and down-cast condition, presumption, Pride, or Arrogancie bee too palpable, Laughing & mocking very dangerous, & therefore to be wel regarded.

Care is to bee had also, of such as are rich, beloued, and respected of euerie one, because in Laughing at such, a man may beget very dangerous enimies. And therefore, it is fittest to Laugh and smile at such vices, as flowe from men that are not so miserable, as may moue compassion, neither so wicked and vnhappie, as death were more fitting for them; nor yet so great, as their smallest spight and enuy, may incurre too much daunger.

How a man may deriue honest cause of Laughter.

Heerewith we are to know, that in places where words do prouoke Laughter, they may list also to graue sentences, both of praise and dispraise, sometimes expressed in one and the same words. As, in commending a liberal man, saying; he makes his wealth common, at the command of his friends: the very same may be spoken to his disgrace, if hee haue gotten it by Theste, or any other euill purchase, because it is neither his to vse, nor theirs. Of a Ladie of honor, or voluptuous carriage, in condemning or commending, no more neede be saide, but that, She is a Lady of much.

Concerning newes and iests.

Report of Nouelties, and prety ieasts may bee vsed, with some immitation of them whome they concerne, reseruing alwayes the dignity of a discreete person, without dishoneste speeches, or actions of lesse qualitie. Not scruing the Countenance, nor writhing the bodie, but carried with such demeanor, and mooued in such manner, that he who vnderstandeth and beholdeth our motion, gesture, and words, may immagine much more then he seeth, or readily vnderstandeth; and thereby be the better induced to Laughter. As in a Nouell, which was related before the Duke d'Aumale, one made his complaint to the Maire d'Auxonne, the Capitall Town in the Vicounty of Bourgogne, because one had robd him of his Asse, saying; My Lord, if you had but seen mine Asse, you would know what great occasion I haue to complaine, and much more then (as yet) you haue heard by mee. For, when he had his pannel on his backe, he looked verily like Marten. And Marten then was the Maiors name. And another, that was rehearsed before King Henry the 3. of one, who meeting with a Hearde of Goats, made his stay, and (with a verie straunge countenance, because the foremost was a great Male Goat, leading the way, and hauing a long Beard) saide: Behold this goodly Goate, doth he not look like Plato? And an infinite other of like Nature, which can offend no man.

Report of a Nouell, that may yeeld no offence.

Laughing & weeping at one and the same things.

Some haue been noted oftentimes, to Laughe and weepe at one and the same thing. As a man is seen to be very ioyfull to succeed in the goodes of some deceased person: and neuertheless mourneth, after his reioycing with his friendes, both which do well agree with that which the Poet saith:

Hæredis fletus sub persona risus est.

Which is as much to say, as: The teares of an heire, are nothing but smiles & ioyes.

Anew maried Wife in the Country of Lymosine.

As a yong Maiden in the County of Limosine, shewing her self iocond & laughing on her wedding day: but when shee should be had out of her Fathers house, she hung about her Mothers necke, bitterly weeping; and held her so stronglie, as very hardly could her Armes bee loosed, only for beeing to depart out of her paternall dwelling. The like may be saide of Iulius Cæsar, for when hee was presented with the head of Pompey, Historians say, hee turned his lookes aside, weeping at so harsh and vnpleasing a spectacle, & said; Hath there been betweene vs so long intelligence, for managing of the publick affaires? Such Community of fortunes? So many reciprocall Offices and Alliances? And yet could it bee immagined, that this Face would proue false and counterfet? But breaking off this discourse, he was verie ioyfull, and laughed heartily, to see himselfe without a Competitor in the Empire of the world.

Iulius Cæsar hauing Pompeyes head presented him.

Many illustrious and great men, haue laughed in their chiefe aduersities, as Alexander the Great (according as Plinie testifyeth) who beeing on the very point and instant to giue the battel against Darius, the Disputing then betweene them, was for the whole Empire of the East, he Alexander the Great laughed in his chiefest mishaps.

The laughter of Hannibal.

he laughed and reioyced with his frends. Titus Liuius hath left in writing, that whē the Carthaginians were reduced to such estate, as to pay tribute to the Romaines, all of them wept, except Hannibal, who had foreseene that fortune, because they of the Barchan faction wer his hindrance, that no succour could be sent him, he being in Italy. Brutus, by his continuall Laughing, faigned himselfe to be a fool, albeit he was extraordinarily wise. Mark Anthonie, in all the losses of his battels & estates, yea, during his very flights, would laugh continually.

Brutus & Marcus Antonius.

To speake now my iudgment, which of the conditions was more tollerable in the two Phylosophers, to wit; Democritus that Laughed ordinarily; or, Heraclitus, who wept in the like extreamitie? Surely I should say (yet submitting vnto more solid opinion) that that of Democritus was the most allowable: because hee found humaine condition to be vain and ridiculous; and therefore, was neuer seene in publicke, but with a smiling and mocking countenance.

Laughing is more allowable in a man, then weeping

Heraclitus, taking pittie and compassion on the same wretched estate, carried a sad face continually, and his eyes ouerflowing with teares. I affect rather the first humor (not that I take more delight in Laughing then weeping) but because it is more disdainfull, and accuseth vs far beyond the other: and me thinkes, euen but according to our owne merites, we neuer can bee sufficiently contemned. Plaints and Commisseration, are mingled with some esteem of the thing which wee mourne for.

Democritus preferred before Heraclitus.

Teares and smiles compared in our own condition.

Those things which we mocke at, are of vaine account, and without anie Value: and I cannot thinke, that there is so much infelicity in vs, as there is vanitie; neither so much maliciousnesse, as there is folly; for wee are not so miserable, as we are vaine. Diogenes, who trifled the time alone by himselfe, rolling his Tub, and nodding his head at Great Alexander, thought him & vs all, to be no better then Butter-flies, or as bladders blowne vp with winde.

What maner of thing Laughter is.

Now, albeit that no Naturlist, hath as yet expressed, what Laughter is, and whence it proceedeth: yet to content the curious Reader, I will deliuer my opinion thereof. To speak no more then truth, it is a matter of much amazement (as at any turbulent commotion) to behold so strange effects. As when a man seemes extraordinarily chearefull, yet his eyes to ouer-abound with teares, that the voyce, face, Lunges, and all the breast, shake, moone, and are blowne vp thereby, euen without any possibility (in many bodies) to maister such an assault: without a respect either of persons, place, or time, presented then before their eyes. No man could euer (as yet) satisfie me heerein; and I know not whither I shal satisfie you, or no, with such breuitie as I am bound vnto.

The Au hors Propolition, from what part laughing commeth.

This cause of so little apparance, consisteth (in mine opinion) in a tickling of the blood, which is in some more sensible then in others, according as they contain most of the biblious or sanguine Complexion: for other men can verie hardlie Laugh, that haue their bloud colde and fast setled as it were. Now, al that which maketh an ouuerture or opening in our apprehension, pricking sweetly, softly, & as it were, by stealth, is the propper subiect of Laughter, such as are wordes and fashions of making it, either by some folly, or at a sudden and industrious Nouelty. For that which contrarywise, is familiar to vs, and wee haue often tasted or knowne, looseth all power of motion in vs, and mooving is the chiefest thing of all. As it happeneth with our Comedians or Stage-Players, in double repetition of one and the same thing: or Mirthmakers, that are not skilled in diuersifying their Iests and merriments. For in verie deede, nothing but variety robbes vs of a former glutting, and begets a newe birth of liuely conceit; and such frequencie procureth the oftner motion, euen of it selfe.

The sanguine and Chollerick, & matter of nouelty

Variety is the best for prouoking laughter.

The blood then, which (as one sayth) is the Father, Nurse, and Hoast of all pleasure, is that which first of all, receyueth such an effect within vs; and then giueth encrease to his Laughing impression, as it taketh hold of our immagination, and disperseth it selfe lightly thorough the Veines, Arteries, and braine, euen to the puffing vp, or pressing downe of the body, yea, to start or gush teares out at the eyes, causing many prouokings in some, of those things that are pleasing to them, and engendering the like in others. Much like vnto a stone cast into the Water, which of one circkle maketh manie, and mul-

The Blood is the Father, Nurse, & entertainer of all pleasure.

Apt Similitudes to this purpose.

multiply ſo faſt, that the firſt looſing it ſelfe, re-deliuereth to this Element, his equality and ſmoothneſſe. And as a quaking or ſhiuering, which from one certaine place, runneth ſuddenly ouer al the body, when a man is vncloathed, vntill heate bee regained, and chaſeth it away. Thus is it eaſie to know, how Laughter beginneth, continueth, and redoubleth of it ſelfe.

Laughter enſuing by tickling.

It is not in all men alike, to Laugh on conſtraint, to wit; hee that is tickled vnder the Arme-pits, it is then attributed to a trauerſing of the breaſt or Diaphragma; the harme or offence whereof, produceth an itching, which (according to the authority of ſome Bookes) maketh men to dye with Laughter. It is not then to bee doubted, that theſe two kindes of Laughter, Naturall, and conſtrained, haue one and the ſame Original, neither doe ariſe of a ſuddenneſſe, ſurprize, or a tickling, not awaited or expected, or elſe by ſuch an inward maturity, that (as we vſe to ſay) ſtifleth by cuſtome, befor e-c caſion be giuen.

Two kinds of Laughter not alike.

Of tickling & prouoking to Laughter, in ſome that can endure it, and others not.

Which may appear to be ſo, by proof of them, who perceyuing that they muſt be tickled, or made to Laugh, by putting a mans hand to the ſole of the foot, or in the necke, do reſolue themſelues againſt it; and with a deliberate purpoſe, make a ſetling of their bloode; by this meanes, they ſhall in a manner, not be mooued a iot. On the contrary part, ſome cannot ſuffer it, when they ſtriue moſt to defend themſelues from it: aſwel, becauſe meere imagination giueth them ſuch a feeling, as by reaſon of motion, which preſſeth the Veines, & ſtill encreaſeth ſuch a tickling. So one ſaieth, that the beſt makers of witty Ieſts or conceites, are neuer the firſt Laughers; for thereby they ſhoulde beget loſſe of that perſwaſion, whichthey haue of others, that ſhall ſee or heare them. Therefore, a word to win Laughter, muſt be quickly decocted, woorking vpon ſome ſudden & vnexpected thing: whereof man only is capable, by a qualitie perticulerly giuen to him. In briefe, all that can be ſaid, concerning the cauſe of Laughter, is comprized in theſe foure Verſes:

Man only (among al creatures) capable of Laughter.

Within the Braine I breede, and to the Liuer fall,
By tickling I controule, and make all yeelde to me:
On Man I onely waite, but come before he call,
And in his face ſet ſmiles, how ſad ſo ere he be.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Nature of Common-Weales. And of their naturall mutability and inſtability, exemplified in Empires, Kingdomes, and other Eſtates.

BEfore wee enter into Diſcourſe of a Commonwelth wee muſt firſt conſider the Naturall mutabilitie and inſtability thereof; which conſiſting of men, muſt needes be ſubiect vnto the ſame mutation and corruption, whereto all men and humain things, are ſubiect by an inuiolable decree and Law of God, the Author of nature. He hath irreuocably ordained, that whatſoeuer is compounded, either Naturally of Elements, or artificially by the induſtrie of men, ſhall be diſſolued; and whatſoeuer groweth and encreaſeth, ſhall likewiſe decreaſe and periſh. Therefore we ſee, that all earthly things haue theyr beginning, their growth, and encreaſe, their ſtate and conſiſtance, their declination & decay; and finally, their diſſolution. For beſide infinite externall cauſes, by which they are ſooner or later corrupted and conſumed: euery thing breedeth in it ſelf an internall ſickeneſſe, which in the end, doth inceuitably bring it vnto corruption. The Iron and other Mettals breed a ruſt; Corne and other fruits, a Worm; Cloth, a Moath; Mens bodies, and other liuing Creatures, diſeaſes, which deſtroy them in the end. So in like manner, Commonwealth engendereth in it ſelfe, diſorders, diſcordes, and diſſentions, which ſooner or later bring it to ruine.

The naturall mutability & inſtabilitie of Commonwealths.

Euery thing hath in it ſelfe an inward ſickneſſe.

For the better explication heereof, & the Nature of Common-wealth it is further to be noted, that, as the health and integrity of euery thing, that is compoũded of different and contrarie qualities, conſiſteth in the equall temperature of the ſaide qualities: ſo by the diſtemperature and inequality thereof, groweth the corruption and diſſolution of the ſayde compound. For, where there is a continuall conflict of contrarieties (euerie one working according to his owne Nature

The Nature of Common-wealth.

A continuall conflicte of contrarieties.

ture and property) it cannot be, but that in time, one will abounde, and another decay; one weare and waſt another; and ſo in the end, one ouercome and extinguiſh the other, whereby the compoſition muſt needs, ſooner or later be diſſolued.

And this we ſee verified, not onely in all Naturall bodies, compounded of naturall humours or Elements (as in men, Beaſts Hearbes, Trees, Plants, and ſuch like) but alſo in the polliticke bodie, that is to ſay, in the Common-wealth it ſelfe, which conſiſteth in the Combination of perſons of different Sexes, Orders, Degrees, and qualities. As of men and Women, Prince and Subiect, Rich & poor, Noble and Baſe, Bound and Free, Good and Bad, and of inumerable perticuler men, differing among themſelues in profeſsion of Life, Faculties, Trades, and Occupations, in maners and affections: and yet all vnited and combined togither in the Communion of one Law and gouernment.

Wherefore, euen as mens bodyes, being compacted of contrary Elements, and affected with different and contrarie humors, are ſo much the more healthful ſound and dureable, by howe much the ſaide humors are better and more equally tempered amongſt themſelues (which neuertheleſſe, can neuer haue ſuch an exact and perfect temperature, but that in time, they will conſume one another; and conſequently, deſtroy the body with the effect.) Euen ſo, the polliticke bodie that is to ſay, the Common-wealth, is ſo much the ſounder, and flouriſheth the longer; by howe much the temperature of the diffrent Orders and degrees therein is better, and more equally compoſed. Which temperature, Plato calleth; A Harmony conſiſting in an equal and concordant diſparity, or inequalitie, wherewith the Common-wealth is (as it were with a certaine bond) knitte and vnited in it ſelfe.

But foraſmuch, as it is not poſsible, that the ſaide polliticke hermony & conſonance, can be for euer preſerued, in the continual diſcord and conflict of contrarie degrees, humors, inclinations, affections, and paſsions, it muſt needs follow, that the bond, that is to ſay, the hermony being interrupted and broken, the Commonwealth ſhall fal to diſorder, and conſequently decay. As both Ariſtotle and Plato do teach; and is alſo moſt manifeſt by the experience of all ages and times, and of all Kingdomes & Commonwealthes, either paſt or preſent. As to ſay ſomewhat briefely of both, wee ſee euidently in the ancient Kingdomes of Iuda and Iſraell, of Egypt, Macedon, Perſia, Parthia, Lacedemon, and in the Commonwealths of the Carthagenians, Athenians, Corinthians, Thebanes, and ſuch others; all of them famous in times paſt, & ſome of them no leſſe flouriſhing in all kindes of Learning and humaine VViſedome, then in Armes and militarie Diſcipline: yet now vtterly periſhed, inſomuch, that there is ſcant any monument or memory of them. And hath not alſo the like happned, to the mighty and potent Empyres of the Aſſyrians, the Medes, the Greekes, and the Romans? VVherof tne laſt which was the mightieſt aboue all the reſt, had ſo many changes in a few Ages, to witte; in ſixe hundered yeares ſpace, that it receiued all formes and kinds of gouernement.

Paſsing firſt, from Kings to Decemuiri, that is to ſay, ten Gouernors. From the Decemuiri, to Kings againe. From them to Conſuls. From Conſulles againe, to Decemuiri. From them, to the Tribunes of Soldiers. From Tribunes to Conſuls. From them, to Perpetuall Dictatours. From Dictators, to Triumuri. And from them to Emperors, vnder whome, the Empire being miſerably rent and torne with Ciuill warres, became in the end, to be a prey and ſpoyle to all barbarous Nations.

And, if wee looke to the Kingdomes and Commonwealths, which ſtande on foote at this day, as namely, our owne Countrey; and what changes and mutations there haue beene therein, ſince it was firſt Conquered by the Romaines: how many Kings it hath had at once, to wit, ſeauen? How oft it hath been conquered by ſtrangers; as by Saxons, Danes, and Normans? VVhat Ciuill warres and bloodie battels there haue been ſince the Conqueſt? Firſt, in the time of King Stephen. After, in the Barons wars. And after againe, betwixt the Houſes of Lancaſter and Yorke, for the ſpace of aboue thirtie yeares, wherein we read, that onely one King, to wit; Edward the fourth, was preſent and fought himſelfe, in eight or

Wherein, and of whome a Common wealth conſiſteth.

A Compariſon of the compoſition of mens bodies.

Plato in lib. 8. de Repub.

Of politicke Hermony & agreement.

Ariſt. in Polit. lib. 5. cap. 12. Plato in lib. de Repub. 80.

The deſolation and ruine of many auncient Kingdomes.

The often change of gouernors in the Romane Empire.

Titus Liuius.

The diuerſe mutations in Britaine, ſince the Romains conquered it. Polidor. in hiſt Angl.

The reuolutions and deuisions in the Realmes of Scotland, Fráce Flanders, and other Kingdomes adioyning.
Phil. Com. in hist de reb. gest. Lodo. cap. 10. Ioan. Las de Orig Scot. Froyard. Poplinier. Mercurius Gallo Belgicus.

or nine seuerall battails; and that, during the same time, there were slaine and banished, fourescore Princes of the bloode Royall. Againe, if we adde thereto, the depositions, expulsions, imprisonments, and murthers of Kinges, in diuers ages and times; and the frequent rebellions of subiects against their Princes, for exactions, extortions, and innouations. If we also consider in Scotland, our next neighbor, the like, or rather greater reuolutions, which caused the vntimely death of eight or nine Kings and Regents, in these two last ages. The great mutations and domesticall deuisions, which haue miserably distracted, & almost ruined France, no lesse heeretofore at diuers times, then now of late. Also the most frequent, or rather continuall commotions in Flaunders, seldom or neuer quiet in times past, and in great garboiles at this present. Againe, if we cast our eyes somewhat further, to the Countries next adioyning, as to the Empire in Germany, very potent in former times, and now much decaid. Or to Spaine, first subiect to the Romans, after to the Gothes, and then conquered by the Moores (solicited and brought in by the Spaniards themselues) then diuided into six or seuen seuerall Kingdoms & States. And now at length, after continuall ciuill war, for six or seauen hundred years togither; reduced again (not many years ago) to one Monarchy. Finally, for breuities sake (to range no further abroade then Italy, if wee waigh the innouations that haue succeeded therein, as well in this last age, by the bloody wars betwixt the French and the Spanish, for the States of Millaine and Naples, subiect somtimes to Kings and Princes of their owne, and now made Prouinces to Spaine) as also the mutation in former times, not onely in the saide States; but also in Rome it selfe, taken and sacked, or at least besiedged thirteene or fourteene seueral times, and in all other parts of Italy, miserablie distressed, spoyled, and ruined, partly by the frequent irruptions and invndations of barbarous Nations (as Goths, Vandals, Alanes, Hunnes, and Lombards) and partly by inuasions of Germaine Emperours; and lastly, by Domesticall and ciuil wars, proceeding other-whiles, of the ambitions of Tyrants in many perticuler Cities; and sometimes, by the furious factions of the Guelphes and Gibelines (which, for some yeares, filled all States, Cities, Townes, yea, and priuate houses, with cruel slaughters and murders of parents, Kinsfolkes, Friends, and all sorts of people.) Sometimes again, by popular tumults and seditions, whereby there hath bin noted in Geneway, ten notable changes of that State, in the space of thirtie yeares. Sometimes the common people preuailing against the Nobilitie; and sometimes the Nobility against the people: by which meanes, they are brought now to so low an ebbe, that wheras they were able in times past, to holde competence with the State of Venice; yea, and took the duke of Venice prisoner in a battell at Sea (wherein they had 200. Gallies of their owne) they haue not now past 25 and the same also waged and payd by the Catholicke King. If we waigh and consider al this, we may draw from thence two notable documents.

The State of Geneway chaunged ten times in 30 yeares.

Rode. Toletan. Ioan. Vasseus.

The often changes and innouations of diuers States in Italy

Blond. Sabel. Lib Simonius. Guic.

Goths, Vandals Alanes, Huns, and Lombards, ruinating Italy.

Two Documents cõcerning the mutabilitie and chaunge of States.

First, the casualty and vanity of al humaine Power, Honor, Dignity, Dominion, and Glory, seeing they do not only perish sooner or later: but also are subiect (while they last) vnto such mutation, and accompanied with infinit corrosiues and afflictions. Which consideration may iustly moue vs, to lift vp our cogitations from earthly delightes, to the contemplation and desire of heauenlie, that are ineffable, incomprehensible, and eternal. For as Seneca saith; Nothing is more contemptible, then man: if he doo not raise and eleuate himselfe aboue himselfe.

Sen. Prasat. in L. 6. c. Natural. Q.

The other Document is, that considering the Natural mobility, inconstancie, and infirmity, as wel of anie Common-wealth, as of man himselfe, and of al humaine creatures, no humaine wit or power, is more able to defend any kingdom or Common-wealth, from declination and decay, then to preserue a man from al sickness and mortality, or earthlie things from corruption.

CHAP.

CHAP. XLII.

Who was the first that vsed Circumcision: From whence it proceeded. Of the vse thereof: What people haue vsed it, and who do yet vse it.

IN this Chapter, the Christian Reader may Learne, by howe much the Christian Church is more happie, and full of holy Libertie, then the Iewes Synagogue; for therein were long Ceremonies, irkesome and tedious, Sacrifices of great cost and charge, & such commaundements, as no man was euer found, that did, or coulde accomplish that Lawe, but onely Iesus Christ, true God, and true man; and after it was fulfilled by him, the Law immediately ceased.

The Christiã Fayth much more happie then the Iewish Law.

In that Mosaicall Iewish Lawe, there were such commandements, as whosoeuer exceeded the least iot in the worlde, without hauing regard to euery true circumstance, was put to death. As hee that had kindled a little fire on the Sabaoth day, vppon some necessitie, was publickely stoned to death. That euerie infant male, that was not circumcised, at, or within eight daies after his byrthe, should perish, and neuer obtaine saluation, with many other such like commandements.

Seueritie of the Iewish Law.

This Circumcision whereof I speake in this Chapter, was practised first in Abraham, in the Lande of Charan, from whence he departed by Gods commandement, because the inhabitantes were Idolaters, and for many other ocasions, which the Reader may finde in the holye Bible, to be in that manner ordayned of God. Abraham, passing into straunge Countreyes, with his family which was great, leading a Pastorall life, abounding in Cattle, slaues, and many other moueables of great value; God inioyned him that hee should circumcise himselfe, his children, and al the males that wer in his house, as a signe that the true God was their God, in whom only they shold put their trust. This was the most auncient commaund that euer God made, before the Law was giuen, which was 292. years, or thereabout, after the Deluge. Moreouer, hee commanded, that all the male Infants of the Israelites, should bee Circumcised within the saide eight daies, vpon paine of death, vnto him that should not be.

Abraham was the first that vsed Circumcision, appointed by God, to him & his housholde.

Genes. 17, 23

The most ancient commandement of God before the Law.

The Iudaicall Circumsion was performed with a sharpe cutting stone, and not with any Knife of iron steeled, a thing which was most dolourous; and wherby the young tender infants sometimes got a Feauer, whereof they after died. Howbeit, they had enough to doo with other occasions, as the cutting and fall of the Nauell, whereby Hippocrates giueth assurance, that Children doe incurre diuers daungers.

How the Iewes Circumcision was performed.

Great dolors & dangers in Circumcision

Theuet, and manie others, who haue voyaged into the Countries where this Circumcision is vsed, doe say; that they haue seen store of yong people dy, grown to indifferent stature; and yong children of eight dayes old, onely by being Circumcised. Which may manifestly be proued by the sacred histories. The sonnes of Iacob, after they had fraudulently circumcised al the males in the City of Sichem, scituate in the land of Canaan, they tooke them the third day after their circũcision & made them passe the edg of the sword: for they well knew, that they were so sore and tormented with paine, as they could not stand vpon their owne defence.

Countreyes where Circumcision is still vsed.

Genes. 34, 26.

Next to our speaking of the originall of circumcision, and the first that suffered it to be done vpon himselfe, we come to the definition of the word. Circumcision is as much to say, as to make incision, and cut round about; and to speak more properly, it is a cutting away a part of the prepuce, and double skin, which couered the head or extreamity of Virga Virilis. Moses, the first Ecclesiasticall Historiographer of the world, hath giuẽ no other reason of this circumcision, but only that it was a certaine and assured signe, that God would be a protector & defender of the circumcised. But many holy men, learned, and of great Authoritie, haue stroue to yeelde a more pregnant answere. Amongst others, Saint Cyprian saith; That as the time of publication of the Lawe drewe neere, GOD ordayned and appointed Circumcision, and wonlde haue

The definition of circumcision.

Moses his reason for Circumcision.

S. Cyprian his reason why Circumcision was commanded.

that that part of the bodie, wherein the ſeed of voluptuouſneſſe lyeth, and the ſhape of Paillardiſe, ſhould be cut from litle infants. To the end, that they ſhould offer the firſt fruites of their blood to him, who ſhould ſhed all his, for our liues and ſaluation. And that the common Sacrifice of euerie one, ſhoulde preceede the great and ſinguler Holocauſt, which hee offered for our Redemption.

Another reaſon by S. Paul and Origen.

Another reaſon is alledged by Saint Paule, and afterward by Origen, to witte; That all the circumciſed part, declared what ought to be plainly pure, cleane, & no way taxed with pollution. And euen ſo it behoueth, that our hearts ſhould be offred vp to God, wide open, pure, and clenſed from al ſinne.

S. Iohn Chryſoſt.

S. Iohn Chryſoſtom ſaith; It was the moſt ancient of all the Commandements that God gaue, and ſerued to the Iewes (according as Saint Cyprian declareth) to wipe away Original ſinne, as Baptiſme dooth at this preſent among Chriſtians. But after the reſurrection and Aſcenſion of our Lorde Ieſus Chriſt, Circumciſion ceaſed, and was no more vſed: but onely to baptize young Infants, as well Males as females; yea, Men and VVomen of all ages, that is to ſay, to be waſhed with the water of Baptiſme; and by that meanes, be receyued into the lap of the Church holy and Catholicke, out of which there is not any ſaluation.

At what time Circumciſion was aboliſhed

The Apoſtles condemned Circumciſion

There was a Counſell held by the Apoſtles, concerning the acte of Circumciſion; and they were of the minde, that the Gentiles by no meanes ſhould vſe it. Afterward, ſome Iewes, making profeſſion of Chriſtian Faith, cauſed themſelus to bee circumciſed; not that there was any need thereof, or commanded by the Apoſtles; but to the end, that they might the more willingly be accepted of other Iewes, to inſtruct and aduance them in the Faith, & to be admitted into the Synagogues, according as Saint Paule did to Timothie. But in the end, the Iewes that were conuerted vnto the Chriſtian Faith, left Circumciſion as vnprofitable, and a matter of great molleſtation to the Chriſtians.

Chriſtians being Ethyopians, do onelie vſe Circumciſion.

Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians, called Abyſsines who liue in great Ethyopia, they are cicatrized with the hotte Iron in the forehead, as wee may perceiue by them that are ſent to Rome, who remaine all in one houſe, behinde the Tribunall of Saint Peter, to whom Pope Paule founded a reuennew for their maintenaunce. But, beſides this cicatrizing in the foreheade, and Baptiſme, they are alſo Circumciſed, which is a verie great error. It is to be preſumed, that they haue neuer ſeene the Booke of the Acts of the Apoſtles, written by Saint Luke: or els, they haue not (as yet) receiued and approued it. I haue not read or heard of any Chriſtians, that haue vſed, or do vſe Circumciſion, but only the Ethyopians. Verie wel I know, that in the primitiue church, many Iewes (who had beene conuerted) would haue circumciſion to be continued. But this matter was diſcided at Antioche, where Saint Peter preſided, as hath formerly beene ſaide. And it was not knowne, that any Chriſtian vſed it, but the Abyſsine Church only, which helde very manie great Prouinces. Al the other Chriſtians, as Maronites, Georgians, Armenians, Iacobites, Greekes, Neſtorians, and other of that Liuerie, neuer vſed it at all.

Hier. Giglo an Italian.

The Abyſsins being Chriſtians, onely vſed Circumciſion.

Yet this is not enough, for not onelie they which liue after the Abyſsine manner, tranſgreſſed the aduiſe & command of the Apoſtles; but haue added ſin vpon ſinne, and error vpon error; for they cauſe their females to bee circumciſed, whom they call Cophles. A thing, which was neuer practiſed in Moyſes Law, neyther was there euer founde any expreſſe commaundement to do it. I know not where the noſeleſſe Moores learned it, for they cut their females, although they be of Marriage eſtate, taking away a certain Apophyſis, or excreſcence of muſculous skin, that deſcendeth from the ſuperiour part of the matrix, which ſome cal Nympha or Hymenea, one growing on eyther ſide, euen ſo far as the orifice of the neck of the bladder, which ſerue the erection to coition. Many women both heere and elſewhere, haue cauſed themſelues to bee cut, as being ouer great, and exceeding Nature, but not for any matter of Religion. The Mahometans of Affrica, doo circumciſe themſelues, becauſe that a Prophet named Homar, commaunded them. And there are Weomen, that haue this Office of cutting them, but practiſe it not in the preſence of men; which act is thought well of in the women. And they go crying in the ſtreetes of Citties, Townes, and Villages, to make knowne what Women that are circumciſed.

Mooren that haue no Noſes, doo Circumciſe maides mariageable.

Weomen in Affrica, that are Circumcifers.

what they can do, carying themſelues ſo wiſely in the deed, that they cut but a little of the ſuperficies; for otherwiſe, there would follow a great flux of blood. But the Turkiſh people of Aſia, and of Europe (ſubiects to the Emperor of Turkes) do not vſe it: except it be ſuch as are vnder the Dition of the Sophye, whom they tearme to be Turkiſh Heretickes.

Turkiſh Hereticks vnder the Sophy.

Plinie writeth, that the Egyptians haue from Antiquity, vſed Circumciſion, and they of Cholcos, as wel as the Iewes, which I hardly beleeue. Well it may be, that it was vſed by ſome Iewes, who liued among them, euen as they do at this day, liuing among vs. Count Ferdinand, in his voyage of Mexico, in the firſt Iſland where he landed, named Aſcamill, found, that the people of the Iſle vſed Circumciſion, and yet they were Idolaters, vſing oftentimes to ſacrifice men, and to eate the fleſh of them. Notwithſtanding, it could neuer yet be knowne, that eyther Iew or Chriſtian had beene there before him, nor ſo much as any tract of foote of man.

Plin. l.30.c.17

Sauage people that vſed Circumciſion

Neuer was Circumciſion vſed in ſo many Countries, as it is at this day, becauſe the Iewes haue lefte no place vnſought, where they could inhabite or get dwelling for their money; except it bee in France and Spaine; where heeretofore they regented liberally, and both were & are allowed euer heereafter to enter, but Circumciſion not ſo frequent as it hath bin. In like manner, the Mahometan law, which vſeth Circumciſion, ſpreading it ſelfe both in power and Doctrine, thorow the verie greateſt parts of the earth, giueth a large paſſage thereto; for, they which entertaine it in their Empires, are the moſt potent Monarkes of the world. As the Prince of Turkes; the Sophye of Perſia; the moſt mighty King of the Tartars; Cham, and al the great Kings of the Indiaes, which dwell in the Countreyes, where the Riuers Indus and Ganges run along, and likewiſe all Affrica.

A reaſon why Circumciſion is vſed yet to this day, in ſo manie Countries.

A large compaſſe of the world.

Such as haue conuerſed with the Turkes, do ſay; that they conſtraine not their Slaues or Captiues to be circumciſed: true it is, that they haue better entertainment, if it may be called ſo. But afterward, if they come into the handes of Chriſtians, they are ſearched; and being found to be cut, they are handled by the in ſelfeſame manner as the Turkes doe.

Slaues & captiues not forced to be circumciſed amongſt the Turkes.

And nothing can they ſay, but that in their hearts they are Chriſtians, & were otherwiſe forced.

Therefore, we are to thanke our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, who hath beene ſo gracious vnto vs, as by his death and paſsion) to free vs from Circumciſion; graunting vs Baptiſme, thereby to waſh away Originall ſinne. And heerein it may bee euidently ſeene, how greatly the Ethyopian Church doeth erre, to vſe Circumciſion with Baptiſme.

CHAP. XLIII.

A Paradox, in the defence of Baſtardie: Approouing, that the Baſtard is more worthy to be eſteemed, then he that is lawfully borne, or Legittimate.

THE great Priuiledges, which I ſee are duely appertayning to Baſtards, and illegitimate Children, (whom the Italians in high contempte, do terme Mules-Foales) makes mee vndertake the boldneſſe, to preferre them before other; and to ſhew by good reaſons, that they are greatly ſuperiour to ſuch, whom we call legittimate and lawfull borne Children. Firſt of all (Gentlemen) I entreate yee to conſider, that Baſtards generally, are begot in more heat and vigour of loue, with more agreeable conformity of willes, and farre ſweeter Vnion of the ſpirites, then the moſt part of our Legittimate Children. Conſider withall, that their conception is performed by ſtolne opportunities, warie preuentions, watchfull diſcretion, and an infinite number of more ingenious deceipts, and amorous actions, then eyther needeth, or is required, in a ſetled condition of marriage, free from that fierie feare, which is the ſole ſpurre vnto a longing appetite. Such Conceptions (many times) are acted without anie gayetie of heart, without anie fauourie pleaſing of both the ſouls, or that height of affection and delight, that makes an act well done, before it be halfe doone. Which is the reaſon (as I thinke) why we ſee many ſightly and formall Fathers, to haue Children dul of ſpirite, lame of diſpoſition, and deformed in body.

Baſtards termed by the Italians Mules Foales.

The actiue, willing, and reciprocall loue in the act of Baſtardes.

How Baſtards (for the moſt part) do yeeld preſage of themſelues.

Contrarywiſe, yee ſhall not find a Baſtard (for the moſt part of them) but he is ingenious, of ſprightly iudgement, and commonly acompanied with beſeeming corpulence of bodie, and ſome other faire fore-telling rules, of good aduenture and Fortune. Beſide, it ſeemeth as a certainty, that Nature had ſome peculier reſpect of Baſtardes, in ſquaring them forth ſuch liberall allowances, as to erect and builde magnificent houſes, in places of ſolemne and publick note, yea, in moſt celebrate and ſtupendious Cities, as hauing this care, that in following times, they ſhould riſe to great requeſt and honour. And that it muſt needs be ſo, wee may euidently diſcern by al Baſtard thinges, be it but in fruits, Horſes, or anie other matter to be alledged, that they are better, feater, and fairer then any other are.

Examples deriued from Baſtard thinges.

Of Mules.

To begin with Mules or Mulets, which are Beaſts that we cannot (although wee would) in reaſon blame or deſpiſe. For, what is he, who can deny, that theſe kinds of Beaſts do not endure all paines, and al turmoiles we can deuiſe to put them to? Notwithſtanding, they eate very little, beare heauier burdens, and pace more ſmooth, and for mens eaſe, then naturall Horſes do or can. And this is the reaſon, why reuerend and Religious Prelates, men of graue and great iudgement, eſpecially Phyſitions, for the eaſe and health of their bodies, make choiſe of their dayly riding on theſe Beaſtes, rather then other.

Of Baſtarde fruits, being grafted vpon contrary ſtockes.

If we ſpeake of fruits, we ſhal find, that the daintieſt and moſt excellent of all other, are ſuch as are grafted vppon contrarie ſtockes, which are called conſtrayned, or Baſtard fruits. They commonly, are greater, fairer, ſweeter, and more ſauoury, then ſuch as come of Naturall plants: & as for inſenſible things, we ſhal finde, that the name of Baſtard hath bin giuen to weapons of warre: witneſſe the Baſtard Sword, Croſſe-bow, Musket, Culuering, Cannon, and manie more, which would bee too troubleſom to recount.

Inſenſible things.

But let vs come to men againe, & beginne with Romulus and Remus, Founders of the verie greateſt Citty in the worlde, were they not both Baſtardes? What was Iſmael, Hercules, Perſes, and Ramires, King of Arragon: a Prince (beyond all other in his time) moſt vertuous and famous? What was King Arthur, & the Emperour Alexander, who for his deeds was ſur-named Great? And, not to alledge Ingurth, let vs ſpeake of Conſtantine, Emperor of the Romaines: of Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, and others of elder time, whoſe memories are not of inferior reputation, to them that haue beene accounted legittimate. But let vs come to moderne and preſent times, and wee ſhall finde, the greateſt houſes of Princes in Fraunce, Italy, Germany, Spaine, and elſewhere, to be renowned by Baſtardes: and Hiſtories are filled with their knightly deedes and valour: Witneſſe Duke William of Normandie, who Conquered England. The Duke of Barſe; the Lorde Iohn Sforza, and many more.

Examples deduced of men famous in diuers ages of olde.

Moderne and later times.

Let vs ſee howe manie learned men, the ſtolne pleaſures and ſweete embracings of women, haue yeelded vs. And we will not ſhame to beginne with worthy Peter Lombard, who yet to this day, (for honours ſake) is called, The Maiſter of the Sentences; who likewiſe hadde two Bretheren, adorned with the ſelfe-ſame Learning and ſanctity as hee was. Such embracinges likewiſe left vs, the skilfull Iaſon du Main, who was reckoned the verie incompareable Index or Protocle, of the direct Cannon, and Ciuill Lawes. VVee had alſo, by the ſame meanes, Eraſmus Roterodamus, who though a reuerend Abbot of Flanders, was ſaide to be his Father, yet in the iudgement of the beſt Learned, he was moſt deepe in Diuinitie, and more then meanely excellent, in the Arts of Grammar and Rhetoricke.

Examples of Learned men & great Writers.

The praiſes of Eraſmus Roterodamus.

His induſtry, not only ſtirred vp good Letters in Germanie, Brabant, and England, but alſo reſtored and amended infinite good Authours, which were before mangled and depraued; yea, his excellent Learned workes, furniſhed all the Studies and Liberaries of Europe.

I will not ſpeake of the Wiſe Chriſtopher Longueil, of Malignes; whome a Good and Vertuous Byſhoppe leſte vs, as a true Cicero of our time, beſides the great great knowledge he had, in the Lawes imperiall. Shall I say any thing of Iacobus Faber, the restorer of Aristotles Phylosophy, and extirpater of the old most Barbarous Sophistry? Or of Cælius Calgaguinus, held of his time, as well for ciuility of good manners, as profound intelligences in the best Sciences and Disciplines) a most liuely splendor and Ornament, to the famous City of Ferrara?

Iacobus Faber the restorer of Aristotles Phylosophy.

Vndoubtedly, he that (borne in innocence) followeth the way of honor, and walkes in the pathes of Vertue, cannot be counted base begotten in this world. To aproue this, if a bad mā do beget such a good son, he cannot without his owne consent, imprint in his faire spirite, the blemishing spots of his own incontinency. But notwithstanding this, if he be so borne, what Bastard soeuer he bee: in a well disposed, holy, and vertuous life, he may bury the name & impudicity of his parentes, and all the remembraunce of their vnchast act. And what is he (so vnprouided of good iudgement) that had not rather be honest and ciuily manered, though he proceede of Parents touched with some shame, then be reputed a Villaine, and bad disposed wretch; yet descended of great and worthy progeny, as oftentimes we see it com to passe? As for the poore Bastard, he findeth not himselfe to be in any fault, neither hath broken holy Lawes concerning his Byrth. The error that is committed, redoundeth rather to his Parents, who (transported with ouer-much vnbrideled looseneſſe) would needs go against the ordinance of diuine Iustice. We shall finde beside, that illegittimate birth, hath beene the meanes of bringing proud minded sons, to benigne, humble, and affable cariage of themselues.

Vertue & honour are the best pathes to walke in.

The Bastarde is not in fault by reason of his birth.

So I conclude, that to bee a Bastarde, should breed no offence to any one. In regard that our blessed Sauiour (then whom, no person is to be thought more high, nor any, that euermore detested dishoneſt and hatefull thinges) was not displeased, but made choise of some poor sinners, in the ranke of his holie Genealogie, as it is reuealed by the testimonie of S. Mathew, the most faithfull and diligent Secretary to his Maiesty.

The Authors Conclusion.

CHAP. XLIIII.

Of the disastrous end, and shamefull death, of two Mahometan Caliphs.

FOr better comprehension of this chapter, which treateth of two auaricious Caliphs; I thinke it most conuenient, to let the Reader vnderstand, before I passe any further, what office it is that a Caliphe holdeth. It is a dignity or estate, which people of the Mahometan Religion, vsed to conferre vpon such a man, whom they thought to be of holy life, a great and diligent obseruer of Mahomets Law, as also well learned therein; graunting him besides, to command as wholly in royall authoritie. At the beginning of this Religion, al Caliphes, were Kings: witnesse Mahomet himselfe, inuenter thereof, who was King of Arabia. Homar his successor in a great part of the East: Hibrain the lean or meager, King of Bagadet or Babylon. One named Sophy, was King of Persia; and since then, his successors haue kepte the Empire, euen to this day. Egypt was also held by Caliphes, vntil such time as Saladine expulsed them thence, and from the Realme of Mossul in like manner.

Concerning the dignity or office of a Caliph.

Mahomet K. of Arabia.

The Prince-Turke, although he be of the Mahometan Religion, hee doth not entitle himselfe Caliphe, but most Souetaigne Emperor, or the Grand-Seigneur. For, he hath people in the landes, which are called Muphtis, who do discide these doubts, and such points as may happen about the Articles of religion: & as they determine, he standeth resolued. To bee briefe, the foresaide two Caliphes, held each of them a kingdome in the Title of Caliphat. One of them was King of Mossul, Caliph of Baldach, the Capitall City of the Kingdom, otherwise called in holy Scripture Susa. This Cittie is scituated towards the East, making the Frontier of great Armenia.

The Prince-Turke.

Mar. Paulus in Lib. 1. Cap. 16.

We are now to know, that about the

The ſcituation of the kingdome of Moſſul.

yeare of Grace, when the Emperor Fredericke Barbaroſſa, with many Chriſtians was gone into Syria againſt the Sarazins, and in the time of Pope Gregorie the 9. a great and potent Emperour came out of Tartaria, named Alland (yet cald by ſome others Haelon) with an Armie of foure hundred thouſand men on foot, & three hundred thouſand horſe, being ſvrged ſo to doo, by ſome Eaſterne Princes and Chriſtians, to refraine the audaciouſnes of the Sarazins, he being a warlick man, and endued with many Vertues. He was neyther Chriſtian nor Mahumetiſt, and yet a Pagan that worſhipped the Sunne and Moone.

Haelon king of the Tartars, ſtird to armes by the Eſtern Prince.

After he had fought againſt the people of Condares, the Paricanes, Bactrians, Bomareans, Roſanes, Dahes, and manie other puiſſant Realms of the Scytheans, he cam into Arabia, where he ſubdued alſo foure Kings; and ſo iourneying on in Armenia, paſſed neere to Baldach, the chiefe Cittie (as hath beene ſaide already) of the kingdome of Moſſul. This Citie was rich and opulent by reaſon of great traffick which the Inhabitantes made to the Indiaes, by helpe of a goodly Riuer paſsing through the middeſt thereof; and taking his Originall in the Cittie of Chiſy, by which riuer, within eighteene dayes they coulde ſaile to the Indiaes. There is made great quantity of Silke, and cloath of Gold & Siluer, with an infinite number of other faire and rich commodities.

Baldach a very welthy Citie, and trading to the Indiaes.

The Caliphe leuied forces for ſafetie of his Land.

The Caliph of Baldach, vnderſtanding that this Prince approached ſo neere his Lands, and with an army of ſuch power ſent into Arabia and Numidia, to make a leauy of Soldiers to place in Garriſons in all the tenable Townes of his Kingdom; and among others, in his capitall Cittie of Baldach. Alland, making no doubt of taking this Citty, did his beſt endeauour to get entrance: but founde it very difficult, in regard of their reſolution that defended it within. Neuertheleſſe, he made an Oath and Vow, that he woulde not budge thence, vntill he had taken the Citie. By meanes whereof, the ſiege laſted longer time then the Caliphe dreamt of: for victuals begin to faile them, although they were ſtill conueyed in ſecretly, but ſold at verie deare rates.

Alland maketh a Vow to take the City.

The Soldiers and other people, conſumed all their meanes in nouriſhing themſelues; and when they had no further ſupplies, they deſired but a quarter of ſuch things, as were not able to content thē, or but the leſt part of their wages before hand, onely to withſtande the ſtroke of extreame neceſsity. The Caliph made them anſwere, that he was naked of money; but he would impoſe a Taxation on the people; and therewith, they ſhould be paide. The inhabitants, by reaſon of the long ſiedge, were quite emptied both of victuals and money, as well as the Soldiers, who perceiued wel inough how matters went; and therefore, all of them (with one conſent) did conſpire againſt the Caliphe, that had a wonderful aboundance of Treaſure, and yet refuſed to helpe them, who had no cauſe of beeing there, but for the ſafety of his life. Wherefore, ſome ſelected perſonnes, in name of all the reſt, went forth ſecretlie to the enimy, capitulating with him, that they would ſurrender vp the Citty: conditionally, that it ſhold neither be pilled, nor burned, nor any one put to death, but only the Caliphe, and his houſe & treaſures to remaine at his diſpoſing.

A Conſpiracy againſt the Caliphe, and vpon what reaſon.

A purpoſe of ſurrendering vp the Cittie.

The Emperor of Tartaria being wiſe, and one of the diſcreeteſt Princes of his time: vnderſtanding, what they of Baldach had willingly offered, accepted their honeſt offer; and in the night time, hee ſent in thirty thouſand men, who tooke the Caliphe, ſleeping ſecurely among his mucke, and committing his body to priſon, ſaw all things ſafe looked vnto til the next morning. At which time, Alland entred the Citty; and the baſe-minded Caliph was preſented vnto him, of whoſe greedy Auarice he had been ſufficiently informed. Forthwith he cauſed him to bee brought along with him to a ſtrong Tower, where he had lockt vp his infinit treaſures, becauſe he would himſelfe be a witneſſe, whether they were anſwereable to the report, or no. After he hadde a while looked on his wealth, it mooued ſome admiration in him; becauſe hee found there 16000. Markes of Gold and in Siluer, three times as much, beſides numberleſſe precious Stones, and other Iewels of ineſtimable price. Hee tooke forth all the victuals which were there as carefully encloſed as his wealth, only for his owne bellies ſatiety; & then ſhutting vp the wretch himſelfe among his riches, would vſe no long Oration to him, but ſpake as followeth.

The Empetors acceptance of the offer, ſurprizal of the Caliph, and ſending to priſon.

The wonderfull riches of the Caliphe.

If

The speeches of Alland to the Caliphe.

If thou hadst not beene so much affected, to the preseruation of thy Riches, thou hadst the meanes of deliuering thy selfe, them, and the Citty also. Now vse thy Treasures as thou canst, which thou hast so dearelie loued, eate them, and drinke them, at thine owne pleasure. So, making fast the doors vpon him, he placed good and sufficient Gnards about the Tower, that no sustenance might any way be brought vnto him: and on the seauenth day, the poore and rich auaritious Wretch dyed. During which time, the Emperor soiourned in the Cittie, refreshing his Army, and people came from diuers Prouinces, and Kinges of neere neighbouring Confines, to conferre with him, bringing great store of prouision for his Souldiours, which he payed very truly and liberally for. I find it faithfully written, that this was one of the richest Armies, that euer was knowne to passe into Europe. Hee distributed the aboundant riches of the Caliphe, in part, among them that had yeilded the Citty, and the rest to his Army, reseruing not a iot therof for himselfe. Thus this infortunate man, was he that enioyed least of his owne Treasures, so greedily scraped together; and yet many people fared much the better by thē, after his wretched death.

The death of the Caliphe.

The distribution of the Caliphe wealth.

Fourescore yeares before, or there about, according to the Sarrazine Historie, there was another Caliphe, & King of Ægypt, who resided at Cayre (for, as I haue already said, the Caliphes did then raign in those quarters) and feared the great multitude of the Christians, which were come out of Europe, for recouery of the Holy Land. And because it was thought impossible (if they surprized Palestine) to preserue whatsoeuer was possessed in Ægipt, the power of the Christians beeing so much doubted: he called Saladine to his ayde, who was King of some part of Tartaria, a young Man, and couetous of glorie, honours, and principalities: who came with a worthy troupe of Souldiours, well invred to Warres, to helpe the Caliphe. It fell out so, that they re-conquered such places as had beene taken from him, and won one notable battel; wherein, such Christians as remained, capitulated for their passage, had promise to auoyde the Country. Saladine hauing ended the expedition for which he came, demaunded recompence; and paiment for his men of warre; who had (as yet) touched no Money, but two quarters, and so hee purposed present returne home againe.

Guiel. Anglic. Epiesf. Tyriensis

The Caliphe called Saladine to his assistance.

Saladine demandeth recompence for his paines, & men.

The vnthankfull Caliphe Priest, made him answer; that at the instant, his Cofers were emptied of Mony, by reason of his long Warres maintenance: and therefore he was voyd of all meanes, to recompence him as he had worthily deserued. But, after a small time of breathing and repose, sufficient recompence should be sent him. As for his Souldiours, he needed not to giue them any Wages, considering, they had dailie held the field, feeding on the Country, where-with they might well rest themselues contented, and the spoyles of the Enemy.

The ingratefull Caliphes answere to Saladine.

Saladine, who was aduertised, that the Caliphe had gathered vnualuable Treasures, and was somewhat impacient, that he could haue no other payment but wordes: suddenly smote him on the head with an Iron Mace, and slew him. When the Guards and others heard the death of this couetous Wretch, in stead of taking vengeance, they saluted him as their King, and exercised large liberalitie of those ill gotten goods, to al the Army, and chiefest Men of Ægypt. Whereby they made a setled assurance of their State; and after him, his Successours haue raigned peaceably in Egypt, for the space of four hundred yeares.

Saladine suddenly slue the Caliphe.

Saladine is made King of Egypt.

In like manner, it happened to a Patriarch of Constantinople, and the Chanons of Saint Sophia, who suffered the Grecian Empire to bee lost; because no assistance of treasure could be had (from them that had gripply hoarded it vp a long time) for the Emperour Constantine Paleologus, besiedged by the Turke; to pay the Hungares, Italians, French, Spanish, and other Nations which came to succour him. So that, in the end, the Turkes became full possessors thereof, and they were all made Slaues, as all the rest of Greece was dealt with beside.

The Empire of Greece lost thorow couetousnesse

You may see then, what recompence auaritious men do iustly receiue; who may well bee compared to Rats, that liue in rich Mines, and gnaw on Gold and

Couetous mē compared to Rats in Mines of Gold and and Siluer, and yet (notwithstanding) gaine no benefit thereby. But when they are taken, and vnbowelled, then their rich stuffing is found: and so they make others wealthy, though altogether against their wils. They are likewise resembled to Pipes, Channels, or Conuoyes of Waters from Fountaine heads, that disgorge their carriage for all other mens affaires, and keepe nothing for themselues. The same may we iustly say of such miserable minded men, of whose wealth no man can haue benefit, till after their death; as hath appeared by these two Mahometane Caliphes.

CHAP. XLV.

Of certaine Beastes, and other Creatures, that (by a naturall instinct) do beare enuie to Man, in some things, which they thinke may be profitable to him; yet kept or remaining in their power. And therefore doe striue (by all their vttermost meanes) to hinder him from enioying the benefit of them.

The opinion of the learned concerning Enuie.

MAny learned Diuines, Philosophers and Poets, haue left vs in their Writings, that there is not any greater torment, or passion of the Spirit, which more meagereth the body, or disfigureth the face, then Enuie. And truely, this vice is not onelie a possessor of men; but likewise of reptile creatures, Foure-footed beastes, waterie inhabitants, yea, of Dæmons. For there are many of them, that (by meere instinct of nature) do know some thinges to be abyding in themselues, which may returne som commoditie to Man, without any touch or preiudice, either to their life or health, or returning them the least discommoditie in the World, although it consisteth but in an Excrement, or some superfluitie issuing from their bodies. And yet notwithstanding, such is their mallice to man, as to frustrate him thereof: some will hide it vnder-ground; others deuour it, or in some other manner procure the losse of it.

Naturall enuy in Beastes and other creatures against man.

As an inducement to others, we wil begin with the Stellio, which almost is like vnto the Lizzards among vs; they hide themselues in Walles, and there is little difference betweene them, but onely in small spottes of their skinnes, which do resemble little Stars. But this Stellio will not looke a man in the face, as the Lizzard doth, and seemeth to take a delight therein. For he shunneth him by all meanes, except hee can hurt him, by byting, or otherwise; which is most venomous if he doe it. They are different also in their Excrements, for that of the Stellio, mingled among complexion or painting, raiseth ouglines & deformitie in them that vse it. Contrariwise, those Excrements of the Lacertes, or Lizzards, doe greatly embellish them that make vse of them among their Vnguents, such as they apply to their faces, to make them looke the more amiably. And questionlesse, if the Stellio did know, that his Dung were profitable to Man: he would take order, that it should (by no meanes) be found.

The Stellio is an euill creature.

Difference betweene the Stellio and the Lizzard.

Whereas, the Lizzard, louing men, and knowing that his ordure bringeth him som benefit: he empties it in a publike and cleanely place; as vpon stones, where it may be gathered of euery one, to make what vse he pleaseth thereof. The Stellio (indeed) doth as much, but it is to another end: for he leaueth it openly to be found, because it hath some neere resemblance with the Lizzardes, to the end, that when vse is made therof by man, it may make him more deformed and loathsome, then a confirmed Lazer.

The Excrements of the Lizzard.

The Excrements of the Stellio.

Beside what hath already beene said, he hath a propertie, which is, that euery yeare (at Spring time) he casteth his skinne, as Serpents doe: but knowing, that it serueth Man, as an assured and siguler remedie, against the wofull disease of the Falling-Sickenesse, to deprive man of the benefit, which (harmlesse to himselfe) hee might receiue thereby, so soone as he hath left or cast it off, presently he deuoureth it. And this is the reason, why they are so rare and deare, and that (for to be possessed of them) people giue such watchfull attendance in the Spring time, to get them,

An excellent propertie of the skinne of the Stellio.

In what manner the Stellio casteth his skinne.

Great difficulty in getting the skinne.

them, so soone as they are despoyled or throwne off, which is in the extreamest heat of the day, and in some remote place out of haunt, by rubbing himselfe against some stone. When he is discharged of it (as by their dilligent attendance they doe discerne) he would presently eate and swallow it, but that it requireth longer time: and therefore they seeke to entrap him, or hunt him, or else to kill him as he is feeding on it; and by these meanes they recouer it, yet not without great vigilancy and carefulnesse.

In the yeare 1586. there was a Turke at Lyons, who had to the number of a dozen of those skins, and none of them being greater then the finger of a Child of seauen yeares old, yet he sold them at ten Crownes apiece. A Gentlewoman of Auuergne, that was then at Lyons, being come thither, to be cured of the Epilepsie or Falling-Sickneſſe: an Apothecary named Vymarde, gaue her counsell in the case, and so shee bought two of the skinnes. They being beaten into powder, she was to drinke them in one and twenty daies: to wit, the weight of three graines, with an ounce and a halfe of Piony Water, euery morning fasting; after which, shee felt her selfe not touched therewith, in the least maner whatsoeuer.

A memorable History of a Gentlewomã at Lyons, knowen for a truth.

I my selfe saw three of these skinnes, which an Apothecary of Paris (a Man very excellently experienced in his Art, and curious in thinges that were rare and strange) named Peter Cuethe, shewed me. With one of them he pleasured a Knight of Malta, who was subiect also to the same infirmitie; and albeit he was a Man of threescore years old, yet it fully cured him. It may appeare to many, that these thinges which I write, are almost impossible; because they seeme to happen, against any precepts of the Phisition, and daily experience. But let such doubtfull men know, that secrets in nature are day by day discouered, which (before) were neuer dreampt or thought on, expressing rare and admirable effects, as hath beene obserued (well neere) in all ages.

A matter of truth, and knowne to the Authour.

The Hart or Stag enuious against Man.

The Hart or Stag likewise, is as enuious towardes man, as the Stellio is, because when he casteth his first Head, especially, that on the right side: he hideth it in the earth, or within some hollow Tree, or otherwise as best he may, but very subtilly, because men should derriue no benefit by it, which (indeed) is very great and excellent, if it can bee found. For I am well assured, that there is not any Antidote among the Apothecaries, nor remedy read in the Books of Phisicke, that can compare therewith, although it were the true Horne of a Vnicorne. For, if a man be distracted in his sences, or meerely mad, if he take the filing of this Horne, no more but seauen Grains thereof, in a draught of white Wine, or of Baulme-water, twenty daies together, it will perfectly restore him.

The vertue of the head or horn first cast by the Stag, as wel against all poysons, as many dangerous diseases.

Moreouer, whosoeuer taketh nine Graines of it fasting, with the Syrope of Lymons; vndoubtedly, that day he shall not be smitten with the pestilence. It preserueth from all poysons. And they that drinke of the Water, or haue it tempered with some of this Horne burned, standing steeped four & twenty houres: it both killeth and auoydeth all Wormes, in any that are offended with them. It is also very singuler, being Clysterized to dissenteriques. By approoued experience, it helpeth also the Falling-sickneſſe, if during thirtie dayes, the weight of twenty Graines be taken, either with some decoction, or soueraigne Water. But the partie must beginne to take it, the first daie, when the Sunne entreth into the signe of Aries. This Horne hath many other vertuous properties; As, to voide the stone out of the raines, and out of the bladder. The decoction thereof, not onely easeth the paine, but also intirely cureth the Gout: if wee may giue credit to the great Grecian Phisition, Alexander Trallianus. All which vertues, and many more, for breuities sake I am enforced to passe ouer: because I come next to the Mare, which beareth as much enuye to mens delights, as any of the former.

A prescription for the time of taking this medicine

When the Mare hath foaled, shee hath this bad qualitie, that with her teeth, she suddenly snatcheth or biteth from the young Foales fore-head, a little Morsell of Flesh there growing, about the bigneſſe of a small green Fig, which the Greekes vsed to call Hippomanes. And it hath so great and excellent

The malicious nature of the Mare.

Hippomanes, what it is, and wherefore it is profitable.

a property, that if either man or woman doe beare it about them, and can compasse the meanes, to conferre with him or her, on whom they dote so much in affection, as they are desirous of carnal knowledge or copulation; the weight of three Graines only, mingled among any Meates or Confections, will (in a very short while) vrge affection in him or her that receiueth the Drug; albeit they were (before) neuer so vnwilling. This Hippomanes is very difficult to bee recouered, and he must not be a dull or slothfull body, that goeth about to get it: but one that is most watchfull, and quicke of Spirit, which will appeare by his paines, if he endeuour to haue it. For, to speake vprightly, if it could bee easily come by; many notorious abuses would be committed thereby. But God who hath created all thinges to be vsed well, and for the benefit of man; taketh away all commodious meanes, from loose and voluptuous people, in easilie getting this peece of flesh, because they should not lewdly abuse themselues.

Dull or negligent persons cannot come by this Hippomanes.

This Hippomanes, doth not serue only to procure loose and veneriall loue; but likewise it causeth honest and vertuous affection: prouided, that it bee ioyned with the Stone called an Emerald, for then (by a strange & vnknown property to vs) it maketh men happie and successefull, in all their Negotiations; as also hardy, couragious, & martially disposed. A Gentleman by birth, an Angeuine, who made no meane esteeme of my friendship; often shewed mee one of these Hippomanes, which he wore about his necke, in a case of Christall, being dried, and about the bignes of a Filberd, somewhat hard, and blacke of colour. He hath bin so fortunate, that in fiue seueral combats or Duelloes, man to man: he was still the vanquisher, and himselfe little hurt. In the end, he was so louingly respected by the duke of Anion (who afterward was King of France and Poland) that when the said Lord left the Crown and Countrey of Poland, to claime his right in the Kingdome of France: passing thorough Germany, the Emperor espied this Gentleman attending on the King, but he grew so extraordinarily affected towards him, that he won both the Kings fauour and his, for abiding with him, which hee promised to recompence very royally, as afterward he did. The Emperor so dearly respected the Gentleman, that he aduanced him to a worthy mariage in Austria, where he had very rich & noble gouernments, and commaunded ouer the Emperors Armies against the Turke. The sum of all is, that all happinesse, which could accompany a man of honor, was found in him, and not only my selfe, but many more, not meanly or triuially acquainted with him, did imagine this felicity (next to Heauens fauour) to proceede from nothing else, but onely the Hippomanes, which he alwaies bore about him. One thing I am well assured of, that he was beloued of diuers worthy Ladies, from whom hee deriued many regardful fauours: which kindnes could not proceed form any beautie or handsomnesse in him, because hee was very hard-fauoured, and much crooke-backt. Himselfe told me many times, that it cost him much pain & diligence, to recouer the Hippomanes, relying vpon no mans trust, but his owne watchfull care, and awaited til the Mare was newly discharged of her Foale. He vsed such meanes, that he did cut it from the foals forehead, albeit the Mare both bit, and smote him often with her heeles: but when she found it gone, she would neither feed, nor let the Foal suck; but died within three daies after. Euery man may beleeue as best him pleaseth. I protest, that I do not set down any thing in this case, but what I heard frō him that had the thing it selfe, and shewed me the maner therof. But to come to our first purpose, the Hippomanes hath beene as well knowne to our elders, as to vs; as wee may read in Virgill. Marullus speaketh of one, that was not natural, but compounded: the composition wherof I wil not here set downe, because it is vnworthie to be declared. I hath as powerfull operation, in procuring affection, as the other: but most often, in such extreamity of louing, it maketh men mad and foolish, and therefore I refrain to set down any more. I think, that nature, the handmaid to God, produced the first Hippomanes, for a medicinable vse to such, who being ioyned in marriage, doe not loue one another or cannot enioy the benefit of marriage, by reason of natures coldnesse: in which case, it is a most soueraigne remedy, and I haue known it very successiuely practised in such a case.

Hippomanes procureth honest and vertuous affection.

The History of a Gentleman, that had an Hippomanes

This K. was named Henrie the third.

Opinion conceiued of the Gentlemans felicity, the Author himselfe being an eye-witnesse.

How the Gentleman recouered the Hippomanes.

Another Hippomanes described by Marullus.

The Authors opinion concerning the first Hippomanes.

A vse not to be discommended.

It is therefore preſuppoſed, that the Mare, by a meere naturall inſtinct; knowing what a helpe and benefit this Hippomanes would be to Man: as enuious, that he ſhould enioy ſo much goodneſſe by her, maketh as ſpeedie a deuouring thereof, as the Stellio doth of her skinne.

Rondelet. in Lib. de Piſc. 16. Cap. 17.

Now, not onely do theſe Foure-footed beaſts on earth, bear ſuch mallice to Man, but Fiſhes in the Water doe the like, as (very many) that haue frequented the Seas, haue ſeene and obſerued. Among other Fiſhes liuing in the Water, they haue noted the Sea-Hare to be touched with enuy, as much as any of the foreſaid Creatures, although ſhe ſeemeth to haue no vnderſtanding of the act. For it is a Fiſh, drouſie, ſleepy, ſnorting, lumpiſh, deformed, and vnwholſom. This foule fiſh, hath a kind of Curd within her, which ſo ſoone as ſhe ſhooteth or caſteth, ſhe preſently deuoureth it againe: onely becauſe ſhee hath a naturall vnderſtanding, that it hath many ſecret vertues, to help both Men and Women. For it is a ſinguler remedy to eaſe Women that haue the bearing downe of the Mother. And being taken inwardly, or applyed outwardlie, it is a ſoueraingne help againſt the byting of all venomous Beaſts. It prouoketh Weomens Floures, when they are verie grieuouſly ſtaied: and bringeth away a Child dead in the Mothers Wombe, with the after burthen or birth alſo. Being drunke with Vineger, it preſerueth againſt poyſon, and is ſuccourable for the Chollicke, frettings or grindings in the belly, and all clotted or congealed bloods. When it it is Clyſterized, it awaketh all Lethargies, and preuaileth againſt all benummings whatſoeuer. Receiued in drinke, it is good againſt all tremblings, ſwounings, and all griefes and defects in the Nerues. Ælianus hath recorded, that the Sea-Calfe hath oftentimes beene ſeene to ſucke her ſelfe, and draw her owne Milke: becauſe men ſhould haue no vſe thereof, in regard it is very much auayling againſt all the fore-named diſeaſes.

The Sea-hare that hath a Curd, naturally good for many cauſes.

Notes worth the obſeruation.

Aelianus in Lib. 3. Cap. 18 The Sea-Calfe.

The Vrchin or Hedge-hog well knoweth, that he is not followed by Huntſmen, by any deſire to eate his Fleſh, for it is of moſt vile digeſtion: but the purſuite is onely for his skinne, which hath many good properties. For, beeing burned, the Aſhes thereof is very helpfull for ſuch, as cannot auoide their Vrine, but drop by drop. It is alſo verie precious, for Vlcers or ſcarrified wounds, being put into them. Now, becauſe he would not affoord Man any ſuch remedy, hee ſhuts himſelfe (like a round Footeball) vp in his skinne, and ſo auoydeth his owne vrine in it; which conuerteth to venome, and killeth him in his skin. As for this beaſt, it ſeemeth that he is not much aſhamed of ſpoyling his skin; becauſe he looſeth it and his life together.

Of the vrchin or Hedg hog, and vertue of his skinne.

The Lynx likewiſe knoweth, that his Vrine is medicinable, for ſo ſoone as he yeildeth it, it conuerth into a Stone: and then he hydeth or couereth it with Earth, to the end it may not be perceiued by any man, and (indeede) it is a thing very rare, and hard to bee found. The Vrine of the Lynx, thus ſtonified; taketh away all ſpots and wrinckles. It whiteth, and maketh a faire colour in the faces, of ſuch as annoint themſelues therewith; eſpecially, beeing mingled with the Oyle of ſweet Almonds, there is nothing more aſſured, or that whiteth and taketh away all corruption of the teeth.

The Lynx, & the vertue of his vrine.

Euill Spirits doe beare mallice to Man, as well as theſe Creatures; not onely to procure his damnation, or depriuing him of the vſe of Gold and Siluer, which is found in Mines, and the bowels of the earth: but likewiſe, that (beeing in this Mortall life) he ſhould finde no remedy of bodily infirmities. For we finde, by good authority, that Spirits doe bite or nibble off the roote of a Plant, which is cald Succiſa, otherwiſe tearmed Morſus Diaboli, or Deuils bit: becauſe it hath beene iudged in all times, that the Deuill himſelfe byteth theſe rootes, and yet could neuer pluck them wholly out of the ground, whatſoeuer paines and diligence he beſtowed on them, yet ſtill they are found to be bitten, and al opinion hath held, that the Deuill is the Authour and doer thereof. It is an Heatbe ſufficientlie knowne, and frequent among vs, in the vſe of many, and ſerueth moſt conuenientlie, for the ripening of peſtilentiall ſores and Carbunckles, beingbru-

The mallice of euill Spirits to man.

Succiſa, or Morſus Diaboli and the vertues thereof, as it is to be applied to diuers grieuous diſeaſes.

ſed

ſed in a Morter, and laid thereon. The decoction of it in Wine, being drunke in the morning, it both healeth and preſerueth from the plague, ſeruing alſo moſt ſoueraignely, againſt the paines of the Mother. The powder of this roote, is good to kill all Wormes in the belly. It is likewiſe proper, for the taking away of al black ſpots, paleneſſe, & bruiſes. By theſe Hiſtories, borrowed out of Ælianus, an ancient Greeke Authour, thou mayſt (friendly Reader) obſerue the workes of God, worthy of admiration; and wherein he is to be praiſed and honoured.

Aelianus in lib. 3. cap. 18. 19. &c.

CHAP. XLVI.

The vnfortunate and ſucceſſeleſſe Loues, of Strato and Ariſtoclia: And of Achamas, the Sonne of Theſeus, with his miſerable death.

IN the Citty of Aſtarta in Boeotia, was a moſt goodly, rich, young and Noble Virgine, of whom, two gallant worthy youths became extraordinarily enamoured: to wit, Strato, the Orchomenian, and Caliſthenes Aliarnus, each of them coueting to enioy her in mariage. In the end, it was agreed, that Caliſthenes, becauſe he was of her Countrey, and a Kinſ-man, ſhould moſt conueniently enioy her. The day of Nuptials drawing neere, the Parents of Ariſtoclia (in regard of his intire kindneſſe and affection) inuited Strato alſo to the ſollemne marriage dinner. But he, whoſe fiery loue could not eaſily be quenched: had ambuſhed a troup of young Gallants by the way, in whoſe company he ſeazed on the Bride, as ſhe was going home to her Husbands houſe. And being poſſeſſed of her, he held her very ſtrictly in his Armes, purpoſing to make like rape of her, as Paris did of Helen. Caliſthenes, the new maried Bridegroom, laboured by all means to recouer her from him: but the yong Lady (being detained by Strato and his Friendes ſo violently) alſo tyred and ouer-ſpent with ſtriuing; dyed in his Armes. Strato beholding his deare affected Ariſtoclia ſouleleſſe, ſlew himſelfe vpon her body: giuing the world therby to know, how highly hee prized the life of his beloued Ariſtoclia, without whom he could not liue, and therefore requited her death with his owne.

* Orchomenus, a Towne in Boeotia, by a Riuer of the ſame name.

The violence of loue, when it exceedeth gouernment.

Achamas, the Sonne of Theſeus, after the ſacke and ſpoyle of Troy, came with certaine Shippes among the * Biſaltes, a people of Thrace, where hee was intirely beloued by Phillis, Daughter to the Lord and Gouernour of that Region: and her hee tooke to Wife, vnder condition, that (after her Fathers death he ſhould ſucceede in the Kingdome. It fortuned, that Achamas, being deſirous to viſite his owne Countrey, and to ſee ſome of his Kinred and Friends: deſired (with very earneſt inſtance) both of his Wife and Father in Law, that he might bee fauoured with ſo much liberty; promiſing to returne with all poſſible ſpeede. Hauing obtained his requeſt, Phillis bare him company a great deale on the way, and gaue him a little Casket or Coffer faſt lockt vp, entreating him; that in regard of the loue he bare to her, he ſhould neuer open it: but when he had an abſolute determination; neuer to returne to her againe. So, with many kiſſes, and mutuall embracings, they gaue a louing Adieu to each other, and parted. Achamas being arriued at Cyprus, hauing no reſpect of promiſe made to Phillis, for returning againe to her: ſet downe his reſolution, to continue there, and therefore was the more forward in deſire, to open the Casket that his Wife had giuen him. Which he had no ſooner done: but a ſudden furie ſeazed on him, inciting him to a diſtracted madneſſe, in which violent Phrenzie, falling with his bare breaſt on the point of his Rapyer; he ranne it quite thorough his body, and thereby ſuffered the puniſhment of his owne wilfull periurie.

Others do repute this Achamas to be the Sonne of Antenor.

* A free Country of Macedon, by the riuer Strymon.

The integrity of loue, teare full of obliuion.

Wilfull periury in loue, iuſtly reuenged.

The End of the Seuenth Booke.

The Eight Booke.

CHAP. I.

Of the Kings of Poland; their Lawes, Customes, administration of Iustice, and all things else deserning memorie.

Of the name, manner, and situation of Poland.

POLAND, in elder times called Sarmatia, is saide to receiue that name of the word Pole, which (in that Language) is as much to say, as plain, smooth or eeuen. And so much the rather it is to be credited; because all the Country is plaine, spacious, full of thicke Woods, and very few Hils or Mountaines in it. The Earth is cold and freezing, whereby it produceth little store of Wine or oyle: but contrariwise, it yeildeth much Graine, and diuers other kinds of Pulse. It aboundeth in Cattle, Flesh, Honny, Milke, Butter, Waxe, and Fruits of all sorts. It affoordeth perfect Lead, and Salt in great plenty. It hath Mines of Iron, Gold, and Siluer, which are found in diuers Hilles, and in certaine Riuers: but there is no search made for them, onely thorow their negligence. There are also (in some places) pits of Brimstone and Sulphure: but as concerning any Bathes, producted by nature; Poland is very barren, and scarse of them.

Such commodities as Poland affordeth.

Zechus and Lechus, or Lethus, were the first that euer gouerned in Polonia, or builded there any Cittie or Castle. They both held the Regiment for some time, but after the whole race of Lechus was extirpated: the Barons of the kingdome, beeing assembled about the Successors of Lechus; concluded to liue at libertie, and without any farther check or controule. Neuertheleſſe, that Iustice might be administred to the people, and they gouerned as necessity required: they ordained twelue Vaiuodes, or Paladines, which order hath continued in that Kingdome, euen to our daies, but not without great hurt to the whol Land. For there was no change of these Officers, but the dignity lasted their life time: although they carried themselues badly in their authority, despising their betters, and euill entreating their inferiors. Among these Vaiuodes, such as were Castillians, Commaunders of Castles, Captaines, Iudges, and such like great Magistrates, holding these offices til they died: did what themselues pleased, whereby ensued, that this Kingdome could neuer haue any great progression in Armes, being so oppressed and kept vnder by such pettie, and no potent or mightie Lords. But, in no long while after, the faction of Lechus (growing in hatred of the Vaiuodes or Paladines gouernment) would needes haue one peculiar Prince. And therfore they made choise of a worthy and valiant man, named Gracchus, who dwelt at the foot of the Samaritian Mountaines, neere vnto the Riuer Vistula.

Zechus and Lechus, the first Rulers or Gouernours in Poland.

The election of twelue Vaiuodes, otherwise cald Paladines.

Magistrates during their life time.

Gracchus chosen to be the first Prince of Poland.

He builded a citty, calling it Gracconia,

(which is now corruptly named Cracouia) a Citty greatly blessed, both in beauty and scituation, as also infinite Merchandizes, which is there Traffiqued from all Nations of the World, it beeing the Metropolis of the whole Kingdome.

The Citty rounded with the riuer Rudis.

The Citty is round engirt with the Riuer Rudis, which entering into the Land by sundry Channels, spreadeth it selfe ouer all the Market places. It hath seauen Gates, and many honorable Pallaces, belonging to great men: and a Fort also, builded in a very conuenient place, wherein there is a most excellent colledge of Students. On the other side of the Riuer Vistula, vppon the shoare banck, directly fronting Cracouia, there is a Castle, cald Casimira, after the name of King Casimirus. This citty, as we haue already said, being the only Mistresse of the whole Land, is very beautifull, rich, and best edified beyond all other. The people, vniuersally, are wise, pleasing to Strangers, delighting much in their owne Natiue drinke, for there is verie small store of wine. The earth is plentifull in all good things; and in briefe, it is a fat and beneficiall Countrey.

Concerning the Cities building and behauiour of the people.

The gouernment of Paladines aduanced againe.

The race of Gracchus failing, it returned again to the gouernment of twelue Paladines, but with much infelicities: because, in contending for Competitors, diuers factions grew among them, and (consequently) Insurrections in Armes, to withstand one another, whereby great dammage happened to the whole Land. Among these turbulent Spirits, there was a Polander, named Priaristaus, a man expert in armes, of quicke apprehension, and one that could well fish in such troubled Waters. The people reuolted all to his faction, they made him their King, and he was the fift Gouernor of that Prouince, after the first Lechus or Leschus. After his death, another Gallant young Man succeeded him, tearmed by the Polacks, Leschus the second, who proued to be a Man of singuler prudence: but, made old with time, and dying, he left it to his Son Leschus the third.

A K. created againe, named Priaristaus.

This man made his Sonne Pompilius legittimate, but deuided the Kingdome betweene twenty other, that were his Bastards, to the great detriment of the Country. But Pompilius being the lawfull King, entred againe on the gouernment, and leauing Cracouia, appointed his Seate in another Citty, called Gneza: but finding it too molestuous, hee transferred the State to another Citty, named Crusincza. In this Citty he dyed of the Stone, according as himselfe had continually fore-told, that in such manner his death would be. And the chiefe Lordes being assembled in Councell, they concluded, that no more of Pompilius his Posterity should raigne ouer them: but (with one consent) made choise of a Countrey Gentleman, named Piastus, one of no great stature, yet strong, and well sinnewed. This was the first branch of those Kings, that continued to the time of Casimirus the second, and of Lodowick: of which selfe same race also, descended the Moderne Princes of Slesia.

Poland deuided among twenty Bastards.

Cracouia forsaken by the K. and the State transferred to another Citty.

Piastus chosen king of Poland

This Piastus accepting the gouernment, would take on him but the Title of Duke only, whose succession comming at length to Boleslaus, in the yeare D.CCCC.XC. IX. he was then made King by Otho the third, Emperour. But the Kingdome comming to another Boleslaus, successor to the former; he was expulsed thence, and dyed. Whereupon, the Polonians aduanced in his place, his Brother Vladislaus, in the yeare MLXXII. by the Title of Duke. But in yeare MCCXCV. the Title of King was taken againe, by Primislaus the second, who (at first) was Duke of the greater Poland, and of Pomerania, or Pomerland, and so continued the succession, euen to Ladislaus, the first begotten Sonne of Casimirus, who (while his Father liued) was designed to bee King of Hungaria, and of Bohemia. He tooke in marriage Anne, Daughter to the King of Fraunce, by whom he had Lodowicke and Anne. Lodowick succeeded his Father in both the Kingdomes, and tooke to Wife Marie, Sister vnto Charles the Emperour. But in the yeare of Christ, MCCCCXCII. the Barons of Polonia, (at a dyet) elected after the death of Casimirus, his Son Iohn Albertus. His continuance was but a while, therefore, by the greater part of the Barons, Alexander, Great Duke of Lythuania, was elected: who going in Armes against the Tartarres, died in Vilna, aged fiue and forty yeares.

Piastus refused the name of King, calling himselfe Duke of Poland.

The order & lineal descent of the Kings of Poland and Bohemia.

Alexander great Duke of Lithuania elected King of Poland.

Sigismund

Sigismund, his younger Brother succeeded him, in the year MC. and he had the title of King, in Anno. MCVI. and made great war vpon the neighbouring Nations; especially on the Moscouites, of whom he slew thirty thousand, in the yeare MDXIIII. He deceasing, Augustus Sigismund took his place, and after him, succeeded Henry the third brother to Charls the ninth, King of France, who was chosen and made King. But his brother dying, and hee affecting his paternall Kingdome, more then the other: forsooke Poland, and went into France, to his rightfull inheritance. The Polanders beeing thus forsaken, they made choise of Maximilian the second, being Emperor, to be their King. But he, not resoluing to accept it, and the kingdom standing on some doubtfull tearmes: Stephano Battori, Prince of Transiluania (beeing a man of great valour) came into Poland with a slender power, where he was created King, and so continued.

Henry, heire to the Crown of France, K. of Poland.

Stephano Battori, Prince of Transilvania.

1 Next vnto the King are the Paladines, and next to them, the Castilians, on whom (in very deed) dependeth the whole gouernment of the Prouince. Neuertheless, there are Iudges, both criminall and ciuill: and others, that take order for occasions of warre or peace, as in all other States and Kingdomes. They can make a very great Army of Horsemen, and they are reputed sufficiently valiant. In briefe, it is they that curbe and controule the Tartarres, from presuming into those partes and limits. It is to be noted, that the Paladine of Cracouia, is the chiefe of al other in dignity, and next to him, the Castellano of Cracouia, vnder whom are (well neere) infinite Captaineships.

The Gouernours in degrees next to the King.

The Paladine of Cracouia.

2 Polonia is deuided into two parts, the one being tearmed the Lesser, and the other the greater. In the lesser Poland, which is at the head of the Riuer Vistula, is the Citty of Cracouia, a verie Noble and famous Cittie. But the greater Poland, is that which containeth in it Gnezna and Posnania, two worthie Citties, with other especiall and honoble places.

Poland deuided in two parts, the greater and lesser.

Moreouer, it hath the gouerning of Prussia, and part of Pomerania. In Poland the very greatest Dukedome, is that of Mazouia, and it is feudatary to the King.

The Archbishoppricks of the Kingdom are two: the one in the Cittie of Gnezna, a Citty of the greater Poland; and the other in Theopolis, of Russia.

Two Archbishops Sees.

CHAP. II.

Of many famous and worthy men, who, hauing left gouerning in the Common-wealth: made their retirement, to a priuate and solitary kind of life.

One of the Catoes, hauing attained to the age of eight and fifty years; gaue ouer his publique charge and trauaile, in affaires of the Romaine Common-wealth, and went to weare out the remainder of his daies, neere to Naples, in a Country village, which then was called Picenum, but now it is named Marca de Ancona. Where he maintained his faculties, and nourished himselfe, which such reuennues, as his poore Landes and Liuing affoorded him. This good and vertuous Cato, keeping a simple Cottage, one while perusing his Bookes, and otherwhiles looking to his Vines and Plants: his Neighbours had written (with a Coale) ouer his doore, these wordes. How happy a Man art thou (ô Cato) because thou onely knowest, what it is to liue in this world, among other men?

This was not the Consull, for he neuer gaue ouer meddling in the publique occasions. Neither was it he of Vtica, that slew himselfe.

Lucullus the Consull and Romaine Captaine, continued at the wars against the Parthians, sixteene yeares together: during which time, he won much honour to Rome, many Prouinces to the Common-wealth, great renowne to himselfe, and mighty Treasures for his House. This man, after his returne from Asia to Rome, found the State full of partialities and dissentions, through the quarrels betweene Marius and Sylla. He resolued to leaue Rome, which forth-with he did put in effect, causing certaine places of sumptuous workemanship, to be builded neere Naples, along by the Sea side, in a place now cald Castello di Lupo. Ther he made his soiorning Lucullus the Consull, Captaine against the Parthians.

Stabiæ, a Towne in Campania, destroyed by Sylla.

ning for the space of eighteene yeares, in quiet repose and silent pleasure; free from all the turmoyles and trauailes of State, and in this contentment he ended his daies.

The Emperor Diocletian forsaketh his Empire of Rome.

Diocletian, after he had gouerned Rome eighteene yeares, and had attained to very old age: he gaue ouer the Empire, from whence he dismissed himselfe into Nicomedia, with no other intention, but onely to returne home to his owne House, and there in peace and quiet to spend the rest of his life. So, he hauing taken his leaue and farewel from pomp and dignity, came to * Salon, which was the place of his birth, prouoked thereto (as I am perswaded) with the naturall loue, that all men do beare to their natiue Country, and there he dealt in husbandry ten yeares together. Two yeares after he had cast off the Empires Clog, the Romaines sent two worthy Ambassadors vnto him, to entreat (if he were so pleased) to returne to Rome againe. The Ambassadors being come thither, they found him in a gardē by his house, weeding his Beds of Lettice and other Hearbs: but when hee had heard their Legation, he made them this aunswere.

* A Region in Bithynia.

The answere of Diocletian to the Ambassadours of Rome.

My Friendes, do not you thinke it more honest and better, that hee who digged and planted these Lettice, should eate them peaceably and quietly in his owne house: then to forsake such wholesome fare, and returne to the tumults and rumours of Rome? I haue now made good proofe, both what it is to commaund, and what benefit ensueth, by labouring and deluing in the ground. Leaue me then to my selfe I entreat ye, in this priuate state of life: for I much rather affect, to maintaine my life by the labour of my hands, then to be troubled with the charge of the Romaine Empire. With this aunswere the Ambassadours tooke their leaue, and parted. At another time afterward, he made the like excuse, being inuited to the marriage of Constantius, by the Emperors Constantine and Licinius, alleaging his weakenesse, and infirmity of old age. But the Emperours sent againe vnto him, writing Letters full of terror and threatnings, that his excuses were not allowable in this case. Wherupon, he began to suspect, that they intended some shamefull death for him, because he had lend ayde and fauour to Maxentius and Maximinus. And therefore dranke a certaine poyson, whereof he dyed, being aged seauenty years and more.

Diocletian inuited to the marriage of Constantius, when excuses would not auaile him, poisoned himself.

Doris the Athenian, hauing gouerned the Common-wealth sixe and thirtie yeares, in vpright sincerity and Iustice; became aged, and weary with publike negotiations. Wherefore he dislodged from Athens, and went to a Countrey-House or Farme, which he had in a not far distant Village: and there, reading Bookes of husbandry in the night time, and practising the exercise of those enstructions in the day time, he wore out the space of fifteene yeares. Vpon the frontispice of his Gate, these wordes were engrauen. Fortune and Hope, Adieu toye both, seeing I haue found the true entrance to rest and contentment.

Doris the worthy Athenian, that forsooke State, and followed husbandry.

Scipio Affricanus, was one of the most deerest esteemed, and reuerenced Captaines, that euer Rome had; for, during the space of sixe and twenty yeares, being the continuance of his Warres in Spaine, in Affrica, and in Asia, hee neuer committed any dishonest action, neuer lost any battaile, nor euer failed in Iustice to any one. He subdued Affrica, ruined Carthage, conquered Hannibal, destroyed * Numantia, and re-established Rome; which Cittie, after the battell of Cannas, he (almost, or altogether) neuer vtterly forsooke. Notwithstanding, in the two and fiftith yeare of his age, parting from Rome; he retired himselfe to a small inheritance of his owne, between Pozzuolo and Capona, and neuer after would be seene againe in Rome.

The glory & honour of Rome, Scipio Affricanus.

* A Cittie of Celtiberia in Spaine, besieged foureteen yeares by the Romains, yet destroyed at last by Scipio.

All these excellent men, of whom we haue spoken, and an infinite number more, left their Kingdomes, Consulats, Dignities, Gouernments, Cities, Pallaces, Fauours, Courts; and Riches, to the end, that they might liue peacefully. And it is the more memorable, in that no slanderous tongne can auouch, that any of them forsooke their Countries, as being infamous, wretchedly poore, or banished: but onely beeing thereto moued, in pure and simple goodnesse, and on their owne liberall free will, for the more commodious order and direction of their liues, before death should tyrannize ouer them.

Vertue onely was the obiect of all these worthy mens intentions, and no enforcement by shame or villainy.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

¶ Of the impehfection of Politicall Science, with a consideration of the imbecilitie of Law-makers, &c.

In the one & forty Chapter of the last Booke.

IN a former Chapter, we haue signified, that there are such multitudes of people, such difference of degrees, qualities & conditions, such peruersity of wils, humours, and affections in euery Cowmon-wealth: that no humaine wit is able to reduce them to that perfect temperature and hermony, which is requisite for the cõseruation of ciuill vnity and amity. To the end, that all may continually concurre, in the obedience of one Law, in one kind of gouernment, and liue therin contented, each one in his vocation, in security, peace, and plenty, which euery Law-maker or Gouernour of a Common-wealth ought to procure. Which may partly be iudged by the gouernment of a Family, be it great or little, becauſe it is many times turned vpside downe, and dissolued by the peruerse humour of some one or two, being not corrigible by any counsell, or chastisement of the head or Maister. What maruaile is it then, if in whole Kingdomes and Common-weales, among so many thousands of different persons, and of different humors: there are so many exorbitant and turbulent Spirits, that no wit or power of man can bee able to tame or temper them? And do we not see many times, that the couetousnesse, or the lust, or the treason, temerity or folly, or the ambition of some one man, endangereth or ouerthroweth a whole Empire? The Kingdome of Macedon was lost through the couetousnesse of Perseus, King thereof. The treason of one Count Iulian, offended by the lust of Rodoricke, King of Spain (who defloured his daughter) was the cause that the Moores conquered Spaine, and possest it sixe or seauen hundred yeares. The temerity of Terentius Varro, when he was Consull of Rome, & gaue battell to Hanniball: causeд the great ouerthrow which the Romaines receiued at Cannæ, to the great daunger of the Common-wealth, which (in the end) was vtterly ouerthrowne by the ambition of Iulius Cæsar.

Comparison by the gouernment of a Familie.

One man oftentimes causeth the destruction of a whole Empire

Plut. in Paulo Æmilio.

Rodericus Toletan. in Lib. 5. de rcb. Hispan. Cap. 14. 15. 16. 17. 18. 19.

Titus Liuius. Dec. 3. Lib. 2. Post. in Iul. Cæsare.

But what should I speake of a King of Macedon, or a King of Spaine, a Consull of Rome, or a Iulius Cæsar; when the turbulent humor of a base fellow, or a pety Companion, such a one I meane, as a Blacke-Smith, or a Iacke-Straw, or a Iack-Cade: hath bin able to put al England in a garboile, to the great daunger of the State? Seeing then, that the fault or error of some one man, may ruine or endanger a Kingdome: how shal mans wit or pollicy bee able, sufficiently to preuent the inconueniences, which must needs grow thorow infinite faults and errors, that (in tract of time) are committed in euery Common-wealth, by so many thousands as are therein, through the folly or mallice of men?

The Garboils and tumults in England, raised by Iacke Straw and his fellowes. Stow, Haule Holinshed.

Furthermore, if we consider, what politicke science (whereby Common-wealths are instituted and gouerned) is able to performe, and how farre it may extend it selfe: we shall easily see, how little perfection and establishment any State can receiue, by the Law-maker or Gouernor thereof, be he neuer so politicke. For whereas other Sciences and Arts were (as Aristotle teacheth) inuented by some, augmented and amplified by others, and brought in time to perfection: it falleth out otherwise in the pollitick science, which is so vncertain & variable, that although the rules & precepts therof, were many hundred years ago deliuered by most famous Philosophers, and explicated & enlarged since, by infinite Authors, Ancient and Moderne; yet, both reason and experience sheweth, that it neuer arriueth, neither can reach to intire perfection. For, neyther one and the selfe-same pollicie, is fit and conuenient for all Common-wealthes, (as one Art or Science is not fit and conuenient for all kinde of Men) neither is a Common-wealth so durcable in one manner and forme of gouernment: that the selfe-same pollicy will euer serue for the same State. Seeing all Common-weales are subiect to mutation, & many times, one is How farre Politick Science may extend it selfe.

Arist. in Lib. 1. Elench. Cap. vltimo.

All common weals subiect to alteration.

engendred by the corrupting of another, euery one requiring different lawes, and a different pollicie.

And although the Common-wealth doe remaine in one forme of gouernment, as either in a Monarchy, Aristocracy, or a Populare State: yet such is the variety of times, and instability of the humors and affections of men, that new Lawes and different pollicies will be necessary thereto. And therefore, whereas the Romains had foure kinds of lawes; as Cicero testifieth: yet one was De abrogandis legibus, to abrogate and repeale lawes; by the vertue and authority whereof, many lawes (made by very wise men) were afterward (by their posterity) annulled and repealed, as vnprofitable and inconuenient. The same may be obserued in the very Lawes of God, which haue varied, according to the different state of man and times: as it is euident by the Law of Nature; the Law of Moyses; and now lastly, the law of Grace. The reason whereof, S. Augu. giueth, saying. It is not to be wondred at, that God made different Lawes, in different times: seeing that in one day, and in one house, and in one man, one thing is conuenient to amend another, and one thing to one man; and another, to another, and that the thing which is expedient now, will (an hour hence) bee vnlawfull and inconuenient. Whereby it appeareth, that time, which breedeth certainty of iudgment, and experience in men, for the perfection of other Sciences and Arts: doth so change and abolish lawes and pollicies, that it causeth in Law-makers and Gouernors, ignorance, error, and confusion. For this cause, Plato affirmeth expresly, that no man, be he neuer so excellent of wit, or neuer so prudent & practised in affairs; can be able (without the inspiration and assistance of God) to make sufficient Lawes, for the perfect establishment of a Common-wealth. And therefore, in the institution of his owne written Common-wealth, and lawes thereof: he craueth helpe of Almighty God, and otherwhere saith. As brute Beasts cannot be happily gouerned by Beasts, without the helpe of Man: so Man cannot be well and happily gouerned by man, without the helpe of God. And againe, in another place he teacheth. That as men cannot liue without lawes; so neither could men haue had sufficient Lawes from Prometheus (that is to say, from the prouidence of men) if Iupiter himselfe, the creator of all, had not sent Mercury to men with laws, to bee the Interpreter of his Diuine will. Whereby he signifieth (mistically after his manner) that without Gods especiall assistance: no wit or prouidence of man can suffice to institute, and conserue any State or Common-wealth, either by the meanes of lawes or otherwise. This also Salomon well knew and acknowledged, who therefore craued Wisedome of Almighty God, for the gouernment of his people, adding. Quis enim potest iudicare populum istum, populum tuum hunc multum? For who can, without thy help, iudge and gouerne this thy people, so many in number? And againe. Giue me (ô Lord) that wisedome vvhich assisteth thy Seat. For I am thy Seruant, a weake Man: Et minor ad intellectum iudicij & legum; And not of capacitie to vnderstand, what is Iudgement and Law. Thus said this prudent King, considering, and humbly acknowledging his own imperfection. In respect whereof, Almighty God gaue him greater wisedome, honor, and glory, then euer had any earthly Prince.

But now, for the further proofe of this matter, let vs examine some of the Lawes, of three or foure of the most famous Law-makers that euer were: that, by discouerie of their errours, the weakenesse of mans wit, in the institution and administration of a Common-wealth, may the better appeare. And whereas some haue founded and instituted many Comwon-wealths indeede, and some in writing, to serue for Patterns to others: I will here speake only of foure, of greatest fame, of either sort two; As of Solon the Athenian; Lycurgus, the Lacedemonian; Plato the Diuine; and Aristotle, Master to Alexander the Great. When the Cõmonwealth of the Athenians (hauing beene gouerned for many yeares together by the Lawes of Draco) was falne to decay, through the excessiue couetousnes and rigor of rich men, whom the poorer sort (being loaden with debts, and not able to pay the) were forced to serue as Slaues, by the sentence of the Iudges, wherupon there arose daily infinite tumults and seditions: it seemed good to them all, to recom-

Foure kindes of Lawes among the Romaines. Cicero de legib.

The lawes of God haue varied according to the different state of man, and times.

August. De Confess. lib. 3. cap. 7.

Time breedeth maturity of iudgement.

Gods inspiration necessary for the making of good Lawes.

Plato in lib. 4. De Legibus.

Idem in Minoe Idem in Protagora.

2 Chron. 2. 11
2. Cron. 3. 7.
Wisd. 9. 4. 5.

Salomans humble ackeowledgement of his weakneſſe

The lawes of foure famous Law makers, examined & reproued.

The Athenians were gouerned many yeares by Dracoes lawes.

re-commend the reformation of theyr whole ſtate to Solon, a man ſo highlie eſteemed for his wiſedome, that hee was accounted one of the wiſemen of Greece: who perſwading himſelfe, that it could not be conueniently reformed, except the poore were releeued and eaſed of their debts, imparted his minde therein, to ſome of his friends firſt; who, perceiuing his reſolution, borrowed great ſtore of money, and employed it in Lande. Whereuponit folowed, that when Solon had publiſhed his New Law, (which he cald Seyſacthia, that is to ſay, A diſcharge of Debts) they remained exceedingly inriched, their Creditors defrauded, and he much ſuſpected of deceite, as to haue ſecret intelligence with his friends, and part of their gaine.

The Reformation of the Cõmonwelth of the Athenians by Solon. Plut. in Solone.

And although it ſeemeth, that therein he had wrong (for he loſt by his own Law as ſome haue written, fifteene Talentes, which were owing him) yet he cannot be excuſed in two things. The one, in that he cauſed not his friendes to reſtore the money, which they had guilefully borrowed. And the other, that without examination of the perticuler cauſes & reaſons of euerie mans debt, hee ordained a generall abolition of all debts, good and bad; whereby, as well thoſe which were able to pay, as the vnable, were diſcharged: and all creditors (without diffrence) defrauded, contrary to all equitie and iuſtice. Which as Cicero ſaith, ſpeaking of the like caſe, Requireth aboue all thinges, that euerie man haue his owne. And that equall regard be had to the right, as wel of the rich, as of the poore. And that is no way obſerued ſaith he, Cum locupletes ſuum perdunt, & debitores lucrentur alienum, when rich men looſe their owne, and debters gaine that which belongeth vnto others. Beſides, in this caſe, the neceſsitie was not ſuch, to breake Iuſtice ſo notoriouſly, becauſe the incõueniẽce might haue beene redeemed otherwiſe, without iniury to any. As partly by the means which he himſelfe alſo practiſed, to wit; by raiſing the money: and partly, by borrowing ſome great ſummes, with the which he might (at leſt) haue made ſome compoſition with the Creditours, in behalfe of the Debtors, and haue repayed the money after in time, by penalties, confiſcations, and ſome moderate taxes, whereby the poore might haue beene for the preſent releeued, and no man wronged.

Two foule errors of Solõ, about the reformation of the Athenian Commonwealth

Cic. in lib. 2. de Offic.

Great iniuſtice committed by Solon. Cicero vbi ſup.

How Solon might haue reformed the Comonwelth without the breach of Iuſtice.

Therefore, Cicero greatly commendeth Aratus, who when the Citty called Syciona*, had beene oppreſſed 50. yeares by Tyrants, and himſelfe baniſhed with ſixe hundered others, of the verie richeſt men to bee found therein: firſt founde meanes to kill the Tyrant; and after, hauing called home all thoſe that were baniſhed: and finding difficultie, in reſtoring them to their goods & liuings (whiche were in the poſeſsion of other men, and had beene in fifty yeares ſpace, alienated by many Contracts, and bargaines of ſale, Dowries, Leaſes, and ſuch like) thought it not conuenient, either to take the ſaid liuings from thoſe that poſſeſſed them; or yet to leaue the other vnſatisfied. And therefore, he borrowed a great ſumme of mony, of Ptolomy, King of Alexandria; and examining euerie mans cauſe, and making an ineſtimate of the Lands, dealt ſo between the parties, that for ready mony, ſome of them were content to leaue their poſſeſsion; and others to ſell their right, and ſo surceaſe their claime whereby peace and concord was made. Et ſic par eſt (ſaith Cicero) cum Ciuibus agere, & non alijs ſua eripere, alijs dare aliena. So it is fit to deale with ſubiects, and not to take from ſome their owne, & to giue it to others to whom it did not belong, as Solon did, who therfore was to be blamed, not only for error, but alſo for Iniuſtice.

*Cic. vbi ſupra.

I omit other errours of Solon, which might be obſerued in the forme of Commonwealth, to come to the examination of one of his Lawes, whereby hee ordained: That whoſoeuer in any publick ſedition ſhould be newtrall, and take neyther parte, ſhou'd remaine euer after infamous. His reaſon was, becauſe hee thought it not conuenient, that any man ſhold ſo much loue his owne eaſe, as not to participate in the trouble of the Common-wealth, whereof he was a member. Which reaſon, togither with the law, Plutarch wiſely reiecteth; for that it would be an aſſured meanes, to put (as it were) Fire vnto Gun-powder. & to ſet all the Commonwealth on a flame, without hope of anie internall remedy.

An abſurde Law of Solon, forbidding newtralitie in a publicke ſedition. Plut. in Solone.

For (ſaith he) euen as in a ſicke bodie, all the hope of helpe within it ſelfe, is to bee expected from the partes that are ſound. And there-

*An old City of Peloponneſus neere Corinth. Cicero lib. 2. de Offic.

The wiſedom of Aratus, in reforming the Citie of Sicyona.

Idem in his Booke of inſtructions, for ſuch as deale in matters of State.

therefore, when the bodie is wholy corrupted, there is no helpe of remedie but from abroad: euen so, in a politick body, sicke with sedition, all the interal remedie, is to come from the whole and sounde partes thereof.

That is to say, from such as are newtrals, who may labour with the one part, and with the other, to compound the quarrell: for otherwise, where all is in tumult, no remedie can bee expected, except it come from abroad. And therefore, Plutarch holdeth it for the highest and principall point of polliticke Science in anie Gouernor, to know, how either to prenent seditions that they neuer grow; or else quickly to appease them, when they are growne, be they neuer so little. For, euen as the least sparke that is, may fal into such a matter, that it may set a whole house on fire: so the least ciuill sedition, may fall among such persons, and in such a time, that it may put a whol Commonwealth in combustion, and vtterlie ruine it. And for this cause, wise Gouernors haue an eye, not only to dissentions concerning the Commonwealth, & publick matters: but also, to priuate quarrelles, though they be among meane men, because (many times) they redound to publicke detriment, whereof Plutarch recounteth a very notable example.

Solons Lawe reiected by Plutarch.

Ibidem. A principall point of politicke science, either to preuent seditions, or quickly to appease them.

Plutar. Ibidem. A Storie of the dissention of two young men of Syracusa.

Two young men of Syracusa, were so great Friends, that the one of them beeing to go abroad vpon occasion, recommended vnto the other the care of his Concubine. Hee in his friends absence, being ouercome with loue and lust, abused her. In reuenge whereof, his friend (at his return) corrupted the others wife; by which meanes, there grewe a great quarrell betwixt them. And the matter comming to the notice of the Senate, a wise Senator gaue aduise, to banniſh both, least their priuate quarrell might breed some publicke sedition. But his Counsell was neglected; whereupon followed, that the Friends on eyther side taking parties, made (within a while) such a tumult and ciuill warre in the Cittie, that the whole state was ouerthrowne thereby.

Good aduise neglected causeth much harme.

The danger that groweth toa Prince by maintaining diuision among his subiects.

But, as all priuate quarrels may proue daungerous to the Commonwealth, so most of all is it, when they grow betwixt the greatest personages. In which respect, Phillip de Comines greatly blameth such Princes, as do not seeke to compose dissentions and quarrelles, among some of their greater subiects: but rather nouriſh them, by fauoring one partie more then another, wherein they do no other (saith he) but helpe to set their owne house on fire. Whereof hee alledgeth two notable examples, the one of the Queene of England, wife to King Henrie the sixt, who taking part with the Duke of Sommerset, against the Earle of Warwicke, was an especiall cause of that Warre, which the Earle made (many years togither) against the King and House of Lancaster, to their vtter ouerthrow. And therefore (sayth he) the Queene should haue done much more wisely, if she had shewed her selfe at the first indifferent betwixt the two parties, & holpen to agree them.

Phil. de Com. Cron. du Rey Louis. Cap. 138

War in England betwixt the King, and the Earle of Warwicke.

The other example which hee alledgeth, is of Charles the seauenth, King of France; who, when hee was Daulphine, tooke part with the Duke of Orleance, against the Duke of Burgundy, in a priuate quarrell of theirs. In reuenge whereof the Duke of Burgundy, called Henrie the fift, King of England, into Fraunce, and helped to Crowne him, and his son after him, Kings in Paris.

Henrie the fift K. of England Crowned in France.

And whereas, Phillip de Comines, seemeth to take it for no inconuenience, that a young Prince, should sometimes for his sport and pleasure, nouriſh some iarres and quarrelles among the Ladyes and Gentlewomen of his Court, I cannot but dissent from him therin, because Womens iarres, may make mens wars. And experience hath taught, that mutations haue sometimes hapned in States, by womens quarrels. As in Rome, where Fabius Ambustus hauing married his two Daughters; the elder, vnto a Nobleman called Sulpitius, who was after made consull; and the younger to a Plebeian, called Licinius Stolo, who (by the Lawes) was not capeable of that dignity. It chanced, that a disgust fell betwixt the two Sisters; for that the younger, visiting the elder, who was then wife to the Consull, and holding her selfe to bee contemned of her, in respect of her meaner estate, lamented so pittifully to her Father, that to appease her, he practised with the people, to make his Sonne in Law, Licinius Stolo Consull, in derogation of the ancient Law and Custome, which excluded the Plebeians from the Consulship. And although the chiefe Senatours, oppoſed them-

Phillip de Comines, reproued, for alowing in a yong Prince, to nouriſh quarrels amongst the Ladies of his Court. Plin. de viris illust. Tit. Liui. Dec. 1. Lib. 6.

The trouble that often ariseth by the dissentions of Women.

themſelues thereto with might & maine, as to a great noueltie, and a matter verie preiudiciall to the dignity of the Senate, yet he preuailed; and not only procured a Decree, that from thenceforward, the Plebeians might be Conſuls, but alſo obtained the election of Licinius Stolo, his Sonne in Law. And this was done, to ſatisfie the diſdaine of a woman againſt hir owne Siſter.

The diſſention betwixt the Dutches of Somerſet, & Q. Katherine Par in England

But more dangerous and lamentable, was the quarrel of two Siſters in England in the time of King Edward the ſixt, one of them being Queene Katherine Parre, lately before, wife to King Henrie the 8. and then married to the Lorde Thomas Seymer, Admirall of England; and the other was the Dutcheſſe of Sommerſet, VVife to the Lorde Protector of England, Brother to the Admirall. Theſe two Ladies, falling at variaunce for the precedence which either of them chalenged; the one, as Qu. Dowager, and the other as wife to the Protector, who then gouerned the King and all the Realme, drew their Husbandes into the quarrell, and ſo incenſed the one againſt the other, that the Protectour procured the death of the Admirall his Brother: whereon alſo followed his owne deſtruction ſhortly after. For, being depriued of the aſſiſtance and ſupport of his Brother, he was eaſily ouerthrowne by the Duke of Northumberland, who cauſed him to be conuicted of fellony, and beheaded. Beholde what inconuenience followed, by the falling out of two women. Therefore Ariſtotle wiſely aduiſeth Princes, To haue care that their wiues doe no diſgraces, nor giue iuſt cauſe of diſguſt vnto the Wiues of their ſubiects, becauſe Commonwelths haue bin ouerthrown by ſuch meanes.

Beholde the fruits of mallice & ſpleene in Women.

Ariſtot. in Pol. Lib. 5. Cap. 2.

But what meruaile is it, if the quarels of weomen may bee daungerous vnto a Commonwealth, ſeeing a famous and pernitious faction in Italy, began by the occaſion of a quarrel betwixt two Boies, whereof the one gaue the other a box on the eare. In reuenge whereof, the father of the Boy that was ſtrucken, cut off the hand of the other which gaue the blow. VVhoſe Father, making the quarrell his owne, ſought reuenge of the iniury done to his ſonne, and began the faction of the Neri, and the Bianchi, that is to ſay, Black and White: which preſently ſpred it ſelfe thoroughout Italy, and was the occaſion of ſpilling much Chriſtian blood.

A quarrel began in Italie, betwixte two Boyes, which cauſed much blood-ſhed.

Tarcagnota hiſt Mund par. 2. lib. 15.

VVhereby we may ſee, how neceſſary it is, for Gouernors, to haue an eye vnto quarrels, though among mean perſons. And how dangerous it is for a Prince, to make deuiſion in his State, betwixt great perſons, to ballannce and counterpoize one of them with another, to the ende, that they ſhall not conſpire againſt him. As Machiauel counſelleth abſurdly, following the olde tyrannicall Precept; Si vis regnare, diuide. If thou wilt Raigne, make diuiſion. As though it ſhould bee alwayes in the Princes power, to moderate the ſame at his pleaſure, whereof no mortall creature can aſſure himſelfe, bee he neuer ſo wiſe or potent. And therfore, we may ſay of ſuch dangerous courſes, as ſaieth the Booke of Eccleſiaſticus, Qui amat periculũ peribit in illo, He that loueth danger, ſhall periſh in it.

The danger of Machiauels doctrine, concerning diuiſion.

Eccleſ. 3, 27.

Neuertheleſſe, to returne now vnto Solons Law, which condemneth neutrality in publicke ſeditions or factions; although in ſome caſes, the ſaid law would be pernitious to a Commonwealth: yet in ſome other, I holde it ſo neceſſarie, as that no man could do his dutie eyther to God or his Countrey, except he ſhould put the ſame in practiſe.

In what caſes neutralitie is to be allowed or diſallowed

As for example, if the quarrell were for matter of Religion, or touching either the ſeruice of God, or the publicke good of the Commonwealth; or for the iuſt defence of the rightfull Prince, and Gouernour thereof. In theſe caſes, all neutrality were vnlawfull. For, when there is queſtion of Gods ſeruice, to bee then neutral, were nothing elſe but to betray Gods cauſe, and to declare a Mans ſelfe to be his owne enemie. According to our Sauiours ſaying; Qui non eſt mecum, contra me eſt, & qui non colligit mecum diſſergit. Hee that is not with mee, is againſt me: And he that gathereth not with me, ſcattereth. And therefore, the Neutralles in that caſe, are thoſe whome the Holy Ghoſt calleth Tepidi, men that are lukewarme, of whom the Scripture ſaith in the perſon of God. Vtinam eſſes aut calidus, aut frigidus. Sed quia tepidus eſt, euomam te ex ore meo. I wold thou wert eyther hot, or could. But becauſe thou art but luke-warme, I wil therefore ſpet thee out of my mouth.

Neutralitie vnlawfull in deuiſions concerning Gods ſeruice.

Luke 11, 23.

Apoc. 3, 15, 16.

Againe in the other caſe, where the Controuerſie concerneth the good of the Neutralitie condemned, in matters concerning the iuſt defence of the Prince or Cõmonwealth.

the Commonwealth, or the iuſt defence of the King or Gouernor: Newtrality in this caſe, were meere treaſon, and ſhold iuſtly deſerue not onely the note of infamy (as Solons Law ordained) but alſo any rigorous punniſhment whatſoeuer. And therefore in all ſuch caſes, all men are bound in conſcience and duty, without any delay, to declare at leaſt their good willes and affections, for maintainance of ſo iuſt a cauſe. And where perſwaſions will not ſuffice, then to employ all force, yea, and their liues, for ſuppreſſing of ſuch ſeditious wretches, rather then to ſuffer that they may any way preuaile.

Neutrality in priuate quarels condemned.

But in other caſes, as when ſome perticuler mens priuate diſſentions do grow to a publicke ſedition; or, when the contention is not betwixt the head, and ſome of the members, but betwixt the members themſelues; to adhere to either partie (as Solons Lawe commaunded) were no other, then in ſtead of Water wherewith to quench fire, to caſt on Oyle, to noriſh and augment it, to the great danger and detriment of the whole State. Therefore, in ſuch a caſe, the neutrall & indifferent man, may beſt helpe to remedie the diſeaſe of the Commonwealth, putting on (as Plutarch ſaith) the Buskin of Theramines, which ſerued for both feet. That is to ſay, dealing indifferently with both parties, to draw them to a compoſition; not for his owne eaſe, or to auoyde the participation of publick or common calamity, as Solon in his Law ſuppoſed of Neutrals, but to extinguiſh the fire kindled in the Commonwealth, or at leaſt, not to miniſter further matter therto, by any act of his.

Plutarch in his inſtructions for ſuch as deale in matters of State.

Thus then we ſee, how Solon erred in his Lawes and ordinances, though Ariſtotle ſeemeth to preferre him before all other Law-makers, cenſuring & controlling all the reſt, and excuſing him in that wherein others reprehend, and concluding him to be an excellent Law maker. So doth Plato, who for patternes of all ſuch as ſhall inſtitute Commonwealthes and Lawes, propoſeth Minos, Solon, and Lycurgus, of which laſt man I meane to ſpeake.

Plato de Legib.

CHAP. IIII.

The Weakeneſſe of Law-makers, exemplified in certaine wicked and abſurd Lawes, of Lycurgus, Plato, and Ariſtotle. With certaine Obſernations, no leſſe pious, then Politicall.

Plato in Licurgo.

Licurgus was no leſſe famous for his royall Birth, then for his great wiſedome. For, he being Brother to Polidectes king of Lacedemonia, ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, at the earneſt requeſt of the people, in regard, that his Brother left no yſſue, but only his Wife great with Childe. And beeing earneſtly ſolicited by her, to marrie with her, with promiſe to deſtroy the Childe in her wombe, to the end, that his Kingdome might bee the more aſſured: hee did not only refuſe it; but alſo, when the Childe was borne, and proued a Sonne, he proclaimed him King, taking onely to himſelfe the tutelage of him, and the gouernment of the Realme during his minority. VVith intention in the meane time, to reforme it, beeing growne to great corruption, and almoſt vtterly decayed. And therefore, he aboliſhed moſt of the olde Lawes, and ordained newe; by the vſe whereof, the Lacedemonians flouriſhed many yeares, aboue all the reſt of the Græcians; inſomuch, that they hadde the Dominion of al Greece, for ſome certain time.

Lycurgus earneſtly ſolicited by his Brothers wife to mary with her.

Of the lawes of the Lacedemonians, reformed by Licurgus.

How Licurgus erred in framing his Cõmonwealth rather for warre then peace.

Neuertheleſſe, if we examine his Commõwealth, and the Lawes therof, we ſhal finde, that hee failed both in true prudence, & immortall Vertue. For whereas a good Law maker, ought to frame his Commonwealth, no leſſe to Religion, Iuſtice, and Temperance, then to Fortitude, that it may ſtand and floriſh, as well in time of peace, as in warre: his Lawes tended principally, to make the people valiant and warlicke: whereupon it followed, that the Lacedemonians flouriſhed ſo long as they had warres. But when they came to enioy peace, they fel to decay within a while, as Ariſtotle noteth, whereby the error of Lycurgus euidently appeaappeared. For, as peace is not ordayned for warre, but warre for peace, as motion and labour is ordained for reſt (in which reſpect, Cicero ſaith: Warre is to be vndertaken, ſo that peace may bee attayned thereby.) So in like manner, a Commonwealth is rather to bee framed and ordained for peace, then for warre, and yet for both, that it may ſtand by both. In which reſpect, the Commonwealth of the Athenians, as Plutarch writeth, choſe Pallas for their Patroneſſe, who was called both Polemica and Politica, that is to ſay, Warlicke and Ciuill. As alſo the Thebanes had for theirs, Hermonie, which was helde to bee the Daughter of Mars and Venus: whereby they ſignified, that the hermony of a Common-wealth, conſiſteth in the conſonance and coniunction of Military and Ciuill Diſcipline. Which alſo Iuſtinian ſpecified, in the inſtitutes of the Ciuill Law, ſaying; Imperatorium maieſtatem, &c. It is conuenient, that the Imperial Maieſtie bee not onely decked and adorned with Armes, but alſo defended with Lawes.

Ariſt. in Polit. Lib. 2. cap. 7.

Cicer in Offic. lib. 2.

Plut. in Phocione & pelopida.

Iuſtin. In ſtitut. in prœmio.

But in the Commonwealth of the Lacedemonians, this was no way performed. For the Lawes of Lycurgus, tending only to make them ſtrong, laborious, and valiant: could not make them Religious, iuſt, and truly temperate, which for Ciuill Diſcipline, and peaceable gouernement, is moſt requiſite. As for Lawes tending to Religion, we find none made by Lycurgus, nor any religious act of his, but onely one more ridiculous then Religious. As hee that dedicated an Image to Laughter, which hee made a God, or (at leaſt) would haue to be worſhipped as a God, to make the people mery at their publicke Feaſts and meetings. And as for Lawes pertaining to Iuſtice, he made few, and one among the reſt, which opened a great gappe to Iniuſtice, and to all cozenages and deceipt. For he ordained that it ſhould be lawfull for any man, to ſteale any kinde of meate, ſo that he were not taken or diſcouered in the dooing of it. And that Boyes and Children ſhould haue ſo little allowed them to eate, that they ſhould be forced to proule & ſteale for their better prouiſion, to make them thereby the more induſtrious, nimble, & quicke of ſpirit: and others, more warie and watchfull, to keepe well that which they had in ſo much, that he which could ſteal moſt cunningly, was moſt commended.

Whereto the Lawes of Licurgus tended.

A ridiculous Law of Lycurgus.

Plut. in Licurgo

But who doth not ſee, that this was the next way to fil the Commonwealth with Theeues? For, is it likely, that they (who from their Infancie) are brought vppe in ſtealing & pilfering triſles, wil afterward (when they haue got the full habit thereof) not forbear to ſteale things of greater importaunce? Or, can Theeues practiſe their occupation with more ſafetie anie way, to become in the end moſt expert, and thereby pernitious to the Commonwealth, then with the warrant, and vnder protection of the Lawe? Seeing the penaltie ordained for them that were taken with the manner, was not inflicted for the Iniuſtice of the fact, but for their lack of skil and dexterity in the performance, which muſt needs make euery one labor to excell in the act of Theeuery. Finally, when the Law not onely permitteth but alſo induceth men to deceiue ſomtimes, and in ſome thinges, doth it not alſo diſpoſe, and, as it were, direct them to deceiue as often, and howſoeuer they may? Therefore, good and wiſe Law-Makers ſeeke to preuent euils, and to cut off the occaſions of vice, and not to adminiſter matter or occaſion thereto, which in our corrupt Natures, breedeth a bridle to reſtraine it, and not a ſpurre to pricke it forward.

Cunning Theft and deceit allowed of in the laws of Lycurgus.

Contending for excellēce in theeuetie.

The care and reſpect of good Law-makers.

And this may alſo be ſaide, in reſpect of another Law of Lycurgus, inducing to intemperance, and al kind of incontinencie. For, although hee ordayned ſome thinges notably, for the education of youth, tending (as it ſeemed) vnto the repreſſion of Concupiſcence and diſſolute life (as a verie ſpare and homely diet, hard bedding of Reeds, or as ſome write, no beds at al, continual labor and exerciſe, one only Garment for the whole yeare, and ſuch like) yet it appeareth, that his meaning was no other therein, but only to make them able to endure the labour and toile of warre.

Another Law of Lycurgus, inducing iutemperancie and incontinency.

Iuſtine in lib. 3.

For he ordained other lawes, ſo much in fauour and furtherance of Luſt and all carnality, yea in the verie worſt kind, that it may be iuſtly ſaide, he made his whole Commonwealth, worſe then a Burdello. For he inſtituted certaine Wraſtlings & Daunces, with other exerciſes of Boyes and Wenches naked, to be done in publicke at diuers times in the yeare, in the pre-presence of both old and young men: but what effect it might worke in the mindes and manners of their Cittizens, a man may easily iudge. Especially, seeing both their Lawes and Customes permitted, that men should be enamored of Boyes, which was held for lawdable, and necessarie for their good education: it beeing presumed, that their louers woulde carefully enstruct them in vertue and honesty.

Plut. in Licurgo

Absurd lawes of Licurgus, tending to lasciuiousnesse.

Furthermore, Adultery, which was punnished with death, not onely by the law of Moyses, but also by the law of the Romaines, and other Nations, as a thing pernitious to any Commonwealth, was not onely permitted, but also approoued by Lycurgus his law. Ordaining, that if an olde man married a yong Wife, shee might (with her husbands license) make choise with any yong man that she liked, to haue a childe by him, which hir Husband brought vp as his owne. And if a valiant or vertuous man (as good Souldiers were there termed) liked well of anothers mans wife, hee might demaunde leaue of her husband, to haue yssue by her, which was not denied, but thought conuenient for their Commonwealth, to maintaine a good race or breede of Valiant man therein, as Plutarch testifyeth, in defence of this Law of Lycurgus. This then being so, what meruaile is it, that al sinne of the flesh and beastlines, raigned more in Lacedemon, then any where else in Greece, as Aristotle witnesseth? Nay what wonder was it, that almighty God (of his iust iudgement) plagued them for it in the end, with a memorable ouerthrow at the plaine of Leuctra? Where they lost the Dominion of Greece, by the occasion, and for the punnishment of an horrible Rape, committed by two of their Cittizens.

Leuit. 20, 10. Lex Iulia.

Adultery permitted by Lycurgus.

Plut. in Licurgo

Arist. in Polit. Sib. 2. Cap. 7. The ouerthrow of the Lacedemonians at the plaine of Leuctra. Plut. Narratione amator. Diod. Siculus in l. 15. c. 14. cap. 20. vii. 3.

But to conclude, concerning Licurgus and Solon, I will not stand vppon other things, reproued by Aristotle in the lawes of Lycurgus: seeing it is euident inough, by that which I haue touched before; that these two mirrors of Law makers (for so were Solon and Licurgus accompted of al antiquity) may serue no lesse then others of meaner marke, for examples of mens infirmities, and weaknesse of wit in matters of Commonwealth. To whom, I will now adde Plato and Aristotle, who, although they founded no Commonwealths, as the other two did; yet, they framed (in writing) either of them one, wherein they laboured to shew, both the excellencie of their owne wit, and the perfection of humaine policy; yet therin notwithstanding, they euidently declared the weaknesse of both.

Licurgus and Solon accounted by antiquity, mirrors of Law-makers.

For, what can bee more absurd or impious, then the community which Plato ordained in his Commonwealth? Not only of goodes and possessions, but also of women? which was done to the end, that no man should haue any thing proper or peculiar to himselfe: insomuch, that fathers & mothers should not know their own children, neither yet any child know his owne Parents. VVhereby hee thought, to establish such a perfect vnity in the Commonwealth, that no man should be able to say; this is mine, or this is thine, but euerie man haue a generall care of all. Whereas, if that Lawe were put in practise, the vtter ouerthrow of the Commonwealth, and of all humaine society must needs follow theron. For Matrimonie beeing taken away, and such a promiscuous and beastly procreation introduced: the Naturall loue betwixt Parentes and their Children; Bretheren, Kinsfolkes, and Allies, all Consanguinity, Kindred, and Affinity, wold be quite abolished. Horrible Incest betweene Kinsfolkes, Brother and Sister, Father and Daughter, Mother and Son (which all Nations abhorre) would ordinarily be committed, and in occasion of quarrels (which somtimes could not be auoided) one Brother would kill another, the Father the Sonne, and the Son the Father, through want of knowing one another: beside very manie other inconueniences, declared verie perticulerly, and at large, by Aristotle in his Politickes. He proueth also very euidently, that the vnitie which Plato sought to establish in his Common wealth by law, would not follow theron, whereby appeared his double error. All which I omit for breuities sake, to speake a worde or two of another Lawe of his. Hauing ordained, that young men shold for encrease of their strength and agilitie of bodie, exercise themselues Naked at certaine times, and in certaine places appointed for that purpose, called Gimnasta, he commanded also (not as Licurgus did in Lacedemonia, that young Girles and Wenches should daunce Naked among Boyes; but farre more absurdlie) that

Plato in lib. de Legibus.

The impious Lawes of Plato in his commonwealth.

Promiscuous and beastly Procreation in the Lawes of Plato.

Arist. in Polit. l. 2. c. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Another most absurd Platonical Law.

that Weomen, in the flower of their youth, should Dance, Wraſtle, Runne, Ride, and do all exerciſes with yong Naked men, as well as they. Which (ſaieth he) whoſoeuer miſliketh, vnderſtandeth not howe profitable it is for the Commonwealth.

Plato accounted to be the Prince of Philoſophers.

But who coulde immagine, that the Prince of Phyloſophers (for ſo was Plato eſteemed) could ſo farre forget himſelfe, as, hauing inſtituted and framed his Commonwealth, to all kinde of vertue, as the onely meanes to arriue at perfect felicity: for which purpoſe, he gaue notable documents and Precepts; & made excellent Lawes concerning all vertues: and among the reſt, touching chaſtitie: who, I ſay, conſidering this, could imagine, that this Profeſſor, Maiſter, and teacher of Vertue; this commender and Commander of Chaſtitie; woulde not onely permit, but alſo ordaine a thing ſo contrarie to his owne profeſsion, to the end of his Commonwealth, and vnto his owne Lawes, Precepts, and Counſels, as the laſciuious Aſpect of naked women? Whereby, the fire of Concupiſcence being kindled in men, and the bridle of Naturall modeſtie taken from weomen: what elſe could followe thereon, but all beaſtlie diſſolution, and Carnallitie of life, as well in the one, as other?

Plato contrary to himſelfe, allowing young women in the companie of naked men.

For, Precepts are giuen, and Lawes ordained in vaine, againſt incontinency; when the occaſions, prouocations, and nouriſhmentes thereof, are permitted. Which whoſoeuer vſeth to admit, playeth with the flame, as the Flie doth, and commonly is burned thereby. How many do wee ſee daily ouercome with vice, and eſpecially that of the fleſh, becauſe they will not forbeare the occaſions? we may put fire to ſtraw when wee will, but we cannot quench it when wee will. It is in our owne power and choiſe to combate with our enemy, but the victorie is not in our hands. Euen ſo, we may eaſily enter into the conflict; and admit the allurements of ſinne when we liſt, but cannot ſo eaſily ouercome it, nor yet retyre our ſelues when we liſt: And therfore, in this kinde of combate, the veriеſt Coward gets the victory, that is to ſay, hee which flieth away at the firſt, or rather dare not abide, to ſee ſo much as the face of his enemies. In which reſpect, the Holy-ghoſt aduiſeth vs, Fugite a fornicatione, Fly from fornication. And, Iuuenilia deſideria fuge, Fly from all the luſts of youth. And again, Sicut a facie Colubri, fuge peccata, As from the face of a Serpent, ſo fly & run away from ſinne. Whoſoeuer delighteth to admit the occaſions; whoſoeuer, I ſay, doth not ſhut vp the doores and windowes of his eyes & ears, againſt the enticements of luſt, but is content to entertaine them into the ſecret Cabinet of his heart, although hee were ſtronger then Sampſon, holier then Dauid, and wiſer then Salomon, let him make account to be vanquiſhed as they were.

Lawes ordained in vaine againſt Vice, when the occaſions thereof are permitted.

What remaineth not in our power we haue no command of.

1. Cor. 6. 9. 2. Tim. 2. 22. Eccleſ. 21. 2.

Sin preuented, is halfe conquered.

Therefore Ariſtotle, Platoes Scholler, knowing how eaſily men are corrupted, by the hearing and ſight of wanton and laſciuious obiects; and eſpecially, Children (whoſe firſt impreſsions of good or bad, are hardly remoued euer after) ordained in his written Common wealth, that they ſhold be kept from the hearing of wanton talk, and from the ſight of laſciuious Comedies, and ſuch other repreſentations as might moue them to carnal cogitations, which enflame cõcupiſence to all inordinate appetites. In reſpect whereof, hee commaunded, that Magiſtrates ſhould not ſuffer in the Commonwealth, any diſhoneſt Images, or wanton pictures, which might repreſent anie vncleane or laſciuious act to the beholders. VVhich when I conſider, I cannot but lament the little care that is commonlie had thereof, in any Chriſtian Commonwealthes; where, not onely moſt mens mouths ouerflow with beaſtly and diſhoneſt talke, but alſo al places are furniſhed with wanton and laſciuious pictures and Images, euen as with ſpecial ornaments. Beeing kept likewiſe in their Bed-chambers, and moſt ſecret Cloſſets and Retreats, for ſatisfying their libidinous eies, and prouoking their ſpent and languiſhing Luſt, with the frequent and greedie aſpect of them. I am aſhamed to ſay the reſt, or that I haue ſayed ſo much, conſtrained thereto by the iuſt griefe, which I conceiue for ſo great an abuſe, that hauing beene forbidden and diſallowed by Paynims, is neuertheleſſe permitted among Chriſtians.

An excellent order taken by Ariſtotle, forbidding wanton talke, and laſciuious pictures. Ariſt. in Polit. Lib. 7 Cap. 17.

The final care in Chriſtian Commonwealthes bemoaned.

That which hath beene diſallowed by Paynims, is ſuffered by Chriſtians.

But to returne from whence I digreſſed. I conclude, that theſe Platonical laws had been more fit for a Sardanapalus, or a Heliogabalus, if they had written of Commonwealth affairs: then for a Plato, who professed himselfe to bee a Physition of soules, a reformer of manners, a teacher of temperance, and the Schoolemaister of all Vertue; so blinde is man, be hee neuer so wise, without the light of Gods grace. But perhaps, some may thinke that Aristotle, his Scholler (who was the wonder of the world for his wit, and vndertooke to censure and sindicate him, and all other Lawe-makers before him) saw clearer into matters of Law & Commonwealth, then they. Let vs then examine him a little, and we shall find, that he erred more absurdly, then anie one of them.

As may appeare by two of his lawes: whereof the one was, that if a man had any deformed or lame child, he should cast it out like a whelpe, and expose it to perrish. And the other was, that if a man had aboue a certain number of children, which number hee would haue to be determined, according to euery mans abilitie, his wife should destroy the fruite in her wombe, when she found that she had conceiued. Wherin he shewed himselfe more vnnaturall and inhuman, then the verie brute beasts. For as Cicero saith verie well. These two thinges cannot agree together, to wit; that Nature would haue procreation; and yet, when the Creature is borne, that it should not be loued and conserued. Which appeareth euidently, saith he, in brute Beastes, whose labour and care in conseruation of that which is borne of them is such, that we may acknowledge the force and voyce of Nature therein. Wherefore, it is manifest, that as we Naturally shun and abhorre all kinde of griefe, so should we bee likewise moued to loue the yssue of our Bodies. Elsewhere also he saith; Whereas it is common to all liuing creatures, to haue a care of those things which they haue brought forth: Euen so Nature hath giuen specially to man, a loue to his Children, and a care to prouide them of all things necessarie. Thus saith he, and common experience teacheth as much.

What then can bee more dissonant from reason and Nature, then that a mã who is borne, and Naturally enclined to Clemencie, Humanity, and Pietie; should shew himselfe vnkinde and inhumaine, not towards Beasts, but towardes men; not towards strangers, Friendes, or Seruants, but towards his own children? And that for no fault of theirs, but for some defectes or deformitie of bodie, which they could not remedy, but ought rather to moue pitty and compassion in a man, then rigour or crueltie. Beside, such corporall defectes doo not for the most part, hinder the operation of the minde and vnderstanding. Therefore, it may well happen (by execution of this inhumaine Lawe of Aristotle) that not onely a Father shalbe depriued of a good Sonne: but the Commonwealth also, looseth a necessarie and notable Member. For as Seneca saith: Ex casa vir magnus exire potest, et ex deformi, humilique corpusculo formosus animus, & magnus. A notable man may come out of a poore Cottage: and a beautifull and high minde, out of a lowe and deformed body. Could Corporall imperfections and deformities exclude Æsope from the number of Philosophers? Or take from Crœsus the reputation of a most excellent & wise prince? Hee Wrote of himselfe (hauing inuited Anacharsis the Philosopher to come to his Court) That although Nature hadde made him deformed, Crook backt, one eyed, lame of a Legge, a Dwarfe, and, as it were a Monster among men: yet he thought himselfe so monstrous in nothing, as in that hee had no Philosopher in his Court, and of his Counsell.

The like may bee saide of a notable, though verie deformed Byshop of Cullen; of whose great Wisedome and Vertue, William of Malmesbury, giueth testimonie, declaring the occasion of his aduancement, to that great Arch-Byshoppricke, in this manner:

An Emperor of Germanie, saith hee, being a Hunting, and wandering by chance with verie few or none with him, in a Morning, vpon the Sunday before Lent, called Quinquagesima, came vnto a poore parish Church, dissembling himselfe to bee a Souldier, and desired to heare Masse. The Parish Priest, beeing a man so deformed of bodye, that he was Peæ portentum Naturæ, almost a Monster of Nature, saide Masse before him. And as the Emperor wondered with himselfe, that Almighty God, who is of infinite beauty and Maiestie, vvoulde suffer so deformed a creature to do him such high seruice, it chanced that the Priest, reading

Plato professed to bee a Physition of soules.

Arist. in Polit. lib. 2 cap. 1, 2, 3 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

Two absurde Lawes of Aristotle.

Arist. in Polit. lib. 7 cap. 16.

Cicero de finib. Lib. 3.

Cicero in Offic. lib. 1.

The absurditie and inhumanitie of Aristotles Lawe, for the exposition of lame & deformed Children.

Deformitie of body doth not preiudice the beautie of the minde.

Sen. ad Lucul. Epist.

King Crœsus, very deformed of body, yet a wise and excellent Prince.

Gneuara in vita Mar. Aurely

Guliel. Malmes. lib. 2 cap. 10.

A Storie of a deformed Priest, made Archbyshop of Cullen.

ding the Verse of the Tract, which was that day; Scitote, quoniam Dominus, &c. Know you that our Lorde is God, and that he made vs, and not we our selues; he pronounced that in such a different tune and voice, from that which he hadde reade before, that the Emperor tooke it as an apte answere to his present cogitation, and began to conceiue so reuerently of the Priest, (being further enformed of his life and vertue) that he made him Archbyshop of Cullen, much against his wil, &c. Whereby appeareth the absurdity of Aristotles law. For, if it had beene in force, where this deformed Byshop was borne, the church had wanted a notable Pastour, and the Common-wealth an excellent and spirituall member.

Furthermore, it is manifest by Aristotle himselfe, that this Law of exposition of Children, is most vniust and iniurious vnto the Commonwealth. For, whereas he prooueth in his Ethicks, That a man may not kill himselfe: hee affirmeth among other thinges, That hee which besides the course and forme of Law, doth hurt another, who neither defendeth himselfe, nor hurteth him, doth iniury to the Cõmonwealth. Therefore, how much more iniurie is it, to destroy an innocent Childe, that can neither defende himselfe, nor hurt any other, and may (in processe of time) doo notable seruice to the Commonwealth?

The like also may be said of the other Law of Aristotle, concerning abortion, or destruction of the Childe in the Mothers womb, being a thing seuerely punished, by all good Lawes, as iniurious not only to Nature, but also to the commonwealth, which is thereby deprined of a designed Cittizen, as Cicero termeth it. So speaketh he of a Woman of Miletus in Asia, who hauing procured the abortion of her Child, a little before hir time of trauaile, was condemned vnto death. Neque iniuria (saith hee) quia designatum Reip. ciuem sustulisset. And verie iustly, for that she made away one, that was designed to be a Cittizen of the Commonwealth. In which regard, the Ciuill Law doth grieuously punnish all wilfull abortion, after Conception, whether the Childe haue life, or no: inflicting death, if the Childe were alreadie quicke; and otherwayes, banishment, with Confiscation of the Offenders Goodes, if they be Noble, or of account; and condemnation to digge in the Mines, if they be poore. Besides, our Cannonists do holde it to be a deadly sinne, either to procure abortion after conception (though the childe bee not quicke or voluntarily to hinder conception, or to cause sterility: because it is (say they) Contra bonum prolis generandæ, Against the good of generation, which Nature ordaineth, for the continuation of mankinde, and maintenance of humaine society. Therefore, whereas Aristotle himselfe aduiseth, that the abortion bee procured after conception, before the Childe haue life, adding this reason, For that to do it after, were Nefas, a Wicked act.

His reason excuseth not his absurditie in this Lawe, and condemneth him of wickednesse in the former, concerning the exposition of Children For, if it be a wicked act, to kill a quick Child before it be borne: much more wicked and cruell is the act; to expose it vnto destruction and death after it is borne, when it hath farre more sence and feeling of hurte; and Naturally mooueth more to compassion.

But perhappes some will say, that hee which exposeth or layeth forth a Child, dooth not kill it: for, that it may happe (as manie times it hath) that the Childe may bee taken by some other, and nourished: as it chanced vnto Moyses, Romulus and Remus, Cyrus King of Persia, and diuers others.

Whereto I aunswere, that although the prouidence of GOD, ouercommeth manie times the mallice of man; yea, and turneth it to good: yet mans offence, is neuer a iotte the lesse, neyther can anie chance that happeneth after an acte, alter the Nature of the acte. I meane, it can neither rectifye it, if it bee ill done; nor make it ill, if so bee that it bee well done.

And therefore, I say, seeing reason and the Lawe of Nature commaundeth (as I haue shewed before) that euery one haue an especiall care, of the life & conuersation of his Children, he which not onely forsaketh his owne Childe, that hath not anie way offended him; but also exposeth it to the perill of death, cannot be excused of vnnaturall dealing, inhumanitie and impietie, although some stráger should chance afterward, to proue more

Psalme 100, 2

A note well strained, & in apt houre.

Aristotle vbi. Abortus. Armacha ibid.

Arist. ibid. vt supra.

Aristotle confuted by his own assertion

Arist. in lib. Ethic. 5 Cap. 11. Aristotle against himself

An obiection made & answered.

Exod. 2, 5. Plut. in Romulo Iustin. in lib. 1.

Arist. in Polit. lib. 7 Cap. 16. The absurdity of Aristotles law, concerning the destruction of children in their mothers wombe. Cic. in Orat. pro Cluentio.

A note well worth the obseruation in Fathers and Mothers.

ff. de pœnis Lib. Si aliquid patrag. qui abortionem.

more humaine and pious toward it, then the Father himselfe.

Well then, to conclude this point. I say of Aristotle, as Augustus Cæsar said of King Herod (when he vnderstoode, that among the Innocents which he had caused to be killed, after the birth of our Sauiour, one of his owne Sons was slaine) It is better, quoth he, to be Herods Pigge, then his Sonne. And this he said, in regard that Pigges were not killed in Iudea, because the Iewes did not eate anie Swines Flesh. And euen so I say, it were better to bee a Beast in Aristotles Commonwealth, then a man, for Beastes shoulde bee assuredly cared and prouided for by their Dammes: whereas the Children of men, should bee in daunger to be forsaken both of Father and Mother, and so perish.

Macrob lib. 2. Satur. cal. cap. 4.

Herods owne sonne slain among the Innocents.

And heere I cannot forbeare to say somewhat, of another Constitution of his, which I knowe not, whither it were more absurd or ridiculous. We made mention a little before, of a notable Law of his, forbidding in his Commonwelth, the vse of lasciuious Pictures & Images; least young men, and especialy children, might be corrupted in manners by sight of them. Neuertheless, he excepteth in the same Law, the Images and Pictures of certaine Gods: In whom (saith he) Custome allowveth Luciiousneße. Meaning no doubt, the painted and graued Stories of the Adulteries of Iupiter, Mars, and Venus, and other Gods and Goddesses, set foorth euery where amongest the Paynims, as well in publicke places, as in their priuate Houses and Temples. Wherein may bee obserued, the ridiculous absurdity of this great Phylosopher, not only in matter appertaining to Religion, but also in matter of Commonwealth; yea, and concerning his owne law formerly mentiond. For, what could it auaile, to take away all other wanton pictures and representations that might corrupt the minds of youth, when he expressely alloweth the vse of Lasciuious Gods pictures, which must needes corrupt them much more, and as it were, instill into them, vicious affections & wils together, with their Religion, and by example of their Goddes? For, by their immitation, they could not but hope to attaine, as well to perfection of Vertue, as to eternall beatitude and felicite, beleeuing as they did, that they were true Gods?

Another absurd errour of Aristotle.

Lasciuious pictures and Images of Gods, absurdly allowed by Aristotle.

If Gods do amisse, men presume to follow.

For, how could any man bee perswaded, that Adulterie deserued punnishment, or was not a great, yea, a Diuine Vertue, seeing Mars taken tardy with Venus, or Iupiter stealing away Europa, in the shape of a Bull; or violating Læda, in the forme of a Swanne; or entering into the house of Danae (by the Louer) in a Golden showre? Would not anie man that were Religiously deuoted vnto these Gods, bee animated by sight of them to do the like? Yea, and Children, learning their Religion, and not only hearing, but also seeing euery where, by Pictures and Images, that such actes were committed by their Gods, could they imagine, that the same were euill, and not to be imitated?

Mens mindes corrupted amongest the Gentiles, by the sight of the lasciuious pictures of their Goddes.

This is verie well declared by Lucian, of his owne experience, who, in his Dialogues, maketh Menippus say thus: When I was yet but a Boy, and heard out of Homer and Hesiode, of the Adulteries, Fornications, Rapes, and seditions of the Gods, Truely I thought, that those thinges were very excellent, and began euen then, to be greatly affected towards them. For I could not imagine that the Goddes themselues would euer haue committed Adultery, if they had not esteemed the same to bee lawfull and good. The like also signifyeth Chærea in Terence, who beholding a Table, wherein was painted how Iupiter deceiued Danae, when he came in at the top of the house, saith; that hee was greatlie encouraged to defloure a yong Maid, by the example of so great a God. At quem Deum? (saith he) Qui templa cæli summa sonitu concutit. Ego homunicio hoc non facerem? Ego vero illud ita feci & lubens. But what God was this? Euen hee, which shakes the highest Temples of the Heauens vvith Thunder. And therefore, might not I, that am but a poore wretch, doe the like? Yes truely, I did it, and that with all my heart.

Lucian in Menippo.

Ter. in Eunuc.

These are the effects, that the sight of such Lasciuious Pictures of the Goddes, must needes worke in their minds which beholde them; and are withall, Religiously affected towards them. And therefore, Aristotle permitting these, and forbidding all other, to preuent thereby the wonderfull corruption of youth, may verie fitly bee compared vnto one, that should Aristotles absurdity made plaine & manifest.

should make a Law to prohibite the burning of houses, except it were with some artificiall wilde fire, that could not bee extinguished. For such may be said to be the fire of Concupiscence, kindled in the minds of men or Children, by Religious acts or representations, which maketh such impressions, as neuer after can be rased out againe, so long as affection to the same Religion remaineth. Which maketh me therefore to conclude, that Aristotle failed and erred no lesse, or rather more absurdly, then the other Lawmakers, whose errors hee censured and controlled.

A verie true and apt Comparison.

Heereby two things are inferred, and do appeare euidently. The one, the weakenesse of mans wit, when it is not supported and directed by the grace of GOD. And the insufficiencie of humain lawes, through the weakenesse of the Law-Makers, who intending (manie times) to make good and wholesome Lawes, for benefit of the Commonwealth, doo ordaine things very inconuenient and preiudiciall thereto: which Cicero obserueth in some of the Wisest men of his time. I can tell you (saith hee) of Marcus Cotta, whose Law concerning priuate iudgements, was abrogated by his own Brother, the same yeare that it was made. And the Lawes of Licinia and Mutia, made by two most wise Consulles, were in the iudgements of al men not onely vnprofitable, but also, pernitious to the Commonwea'th. As also the Lawes called Liuiæ, were abrogated by the Senate in an instant. And in like manner, I holde the Lawes Seiæ and Apuliæ to be nothing worth. Thus farre Cicero.

The weakenes of mans wit, and the imperfection of Lawes inferd vpon the premises.

Cic. de Reip. in fragmentis.

The like whereof might be exemplified in euery Commonwealth, but this shal suffice at this time, concerning Lawmakers. Now let vs consider Law in it selfe, what it is; to what end it is ordained; and what it can perform in a Commonwealth, for the perfection & establishment thereof.

CHAP. V.

What Law is: To what end it was ordained. And what it can performe in a Commonwealth.

Plato, speaking generally of all Law, as well written as vnwritten, defineth it to be, A reasonable rule, leading and directing men to their due end; for a publicke good, ordaining Penalties for them that transgresse, and Rewards for them that obey. And Cicero more briefly thus: Law is (saith hee) the highest or chiefe reason grasted in nature, commaunding those things which are to be doone, and forbidding the contrary. And againe, Law is the force of Nature; the vnderstanding and reason of a Wiseman; the rule of right and wrong. And speaking more perticulerly of written Lawe, hee saith; It is the reason & vnderstanding of a Wiseman, who ordaineth in writing what he thinketh good by way either of commandement, or of Prohibitions. Lastly, the Ciuilians, most briefly and properly defineth it thus. Lex est sanctio sancta, iubens honesta, prohibens cõtraria. Law is a holy decree, that is to say, A Decree which ought not to be broken, commanding good and holy things, and forbidding the contrary.

Plato in Mino. & de Rep. et de Leg.

Cic. in lib. 1. de Legibus.

Idem.

The definitiõ of written Law.

Accurs. in instit. ff. de Legib. et Senat. cons. 3.

This Law, Plato calleth, The soule, that giueth forme and life to the Commonwelth, and the Anchor that stayeth and assureth it. And Cicero sayth; That neither any house, nor Cittie, nor Nation, nor yet humaine kinde, can stand vvithout Law. Nevertheless, how excellent or defectiue soeuer it is for a Commonwealth, yet it is to be vnderstood, that all Lawes whatsoeuer (which are meerely humaine) are Defectiue and insufficient, for the perfect Gouernement of a State. For whereas humaine Lawes consisteth eyther in Written Statutes or Decrees, or in the Commandements and Ordinances of a wise Magistrate (which Magistrate, Cicero therefore calleth, A Speaking Lawe, as he also calleth the Lawe, A dumb Ma-

Plato de Legib.

Cic. in lib. 3. de Legib.

All Lawes written or vnwritten, are defectiue.

The Magistrate a speaking Law: & the Lawe a dumbe Magistrate.

giſtrate) yet it is euident, that neyther of both apart, nor yet both concurring, can ſuffice.

The imperfection of written lawes.

For the firſt, whereas written Lawes are vniuerſall, and concerne the action of men, which are infinite and perticuler, it is not poſsible, that any Law-Maker ſhould extend his Lawes ſo farre, that they may ſufficiently prouide for all caſes that may occurre; but that hee muſt leaue place for the determination and iudgement of men, according to equity. As not onely Ariſtotle, but alſo the Ciuilians themſelues, doe teach, and experience is daily ſeene thereof. In the neceſſity of interpretation and mittigation of Lawes; in Diſpenſations, and in Appealations from Law to Conſcience; whereby the imperfection of al written Lawes, ſufficiently appeareth. And as for the ordinances of wiſe Magiſtrates, it is manifeſt (by that which I haue ſayde before, concerning the errours of wiſe Gouernors and Law-makers) that the weakneſſe and blindneſſe of mans wit, and the corruption of his Nature, is ſuch; that hee can neither ſee ſo clearely in all caſes, nor yet be ſo voide of affection and paſsion, that he can be able to determine, decree, and iudge according to equity. In which reſpect, Ariſtotle diſputeth, Whether it were better, That a Commonwealth ſhould be gouerned by good Lawes, or by the wil of the beſt man? And he preferreth the Gouernment of Lawes, before the other, ſaying; The Law is (as it were) a pure and cleare vnderſtanding: whereas the vnderſtanding of the beſt man, is ioyned with ſenſual appetite, whereby it may bee corrupted. And therefore, where the Law gouerneth, there God gouerneth: but where man gouerneth, be he neuer ſo wiſe and vertuous, there a cruell Beaſt (to witte; Concupiſcence and Paſsion) entreth into the gouernment with him, and manie times obſcureth his vnderſtanding. For which cauſe, the Magiſtrate ought in all caſes, wherein the meaning of the Law is cleare: to iudge and determine according to the preſcript thereof, as the Ciuill Law it ſelfe ordaineth. And Cicero ſaith: As the Magiſtrate gouerneth the people, ſo ſhou'd the Law gouerne the Magiſtrate. Whereupon I inferre, that ſeeing no Law-maker can ſo ſufficientlie prouide for the gouernement, and direct ruling of a Common-wealth, by the Letter of the Law; but he muſt leaue infinite caſes, yea, and the interpretation of the Lawe themſelues, to the determination and iudgement of men, who are alſo (on their part) defectiue, to wit; ſubiect vnto paſsion and error: It followeth then, that neither the Law without the Magiſtrate, nor the Magiſtrate without the Law, nor yet both concurring, can ſuffice for the perfect gouernment of a commonwelth, but ſhould bee to ſupply the defectes of each other. And therefore I conclude, that there is no ſufficient and aſſured meanes, to eſtabliſh any State by humain Lawes.

Ariſt. in Ethic. lib. 5. cap 10. Iul. lib. 1. ad dictum ff. de legib. & Senatus conſtit. 3 et Iul. Lib. 89 digeſt.

The imperfection of vnwritten lawes

Better to bee gouerned by good Lawes, then by the wil of the beſt man, & why. Ariſt. in Polit. lib. 3 cap. 12.

Where good Laws gouern God doth gouerne.

As a Magiſtrate ſhould gouerne the people, ſo ſhold the law gouerne the Magiſtrate. Iul. Lib. 15 digeſt. ff. de legi. & Senat. conſtit. 3.

Cicer de legibus

No ſufficient meanes to make a perfect Common welth, by humaine Lawes & Magiſtrats.

This will be more euident, if wee conſider, what are the eſpeciall ends whereto Lawes were ordained, and what they can perform. Two things are principaly intēded by them. The one, the adminiſtration of Iuſtice, by the deciſion of cauſes, controuerſies, and ſuites, betwixt partie and partie. The other, is the reformation of manners, and repreſsion of vice, for that it is pernitious to a Commonwealth. Of the firſt I haue already ſpoken ſufficiently, as well in the weakeneſſe of the Lawmaker and Magiſtrat, as imperfection of the Law, in the determination of cauſes. And therefore, I will a little further enlarge my ſelfe, concerning the latter; which is, ſuppreſsion of Vice, and reformation of manners: and I will declare, that humaine Lawes cannot ſufficientlie performe, either the one or other.

Two principall endes wherinto humain Lawes do tend.

A reference to the former diſcourſe.

If Lawes were able to reforme mens maners, or to repreſſe vice, they muſt do it, either by Precept, or by Prohibition, or by Permiſsion, or by Rewarding, or by Puniſhing, for in theſe fiue things, conſiſt al the force of human lawes, as the Lawiers do teſtify of themſelues. For the two firſt, to wit; Precept & Prohibition, they are altogether vnable and inſufficient, to bring the corrupt nature of man to any perfection or vertue. For, what other help haue we thereby, but only the knoledge of our duty? which knowledge alone, as Ariſtotle ſaith, Helpeth litle or nothing to vertue, the praiſe and commendation whereof, conſiſteth in action and operation. Becauſe it nothing auaileth, though wee know neuer ſo much, if we do not put our knowledge in practiſe. And as little it profiteth a ſickeman, to know what meat is good for him: when hee hath ſuch a loathing vnto it, that hee cannot eate it. Euen ſo, the ff. de legib. & Senat. conſult. tit. 3 Iſidor. Lib. 5. Etimol.

The force of human lawes conſiſteth in Precept, Prohibition, Permiſsion, Reward and Puniſhment.

Ariſt. in Ethic. lib. 2. cap. 4.

the corrupt nature of man hath litle help or remedy by the knowledge of his duty: when vertue is so loathsome vnto him, that he cannot brooke it. For, as Seneca saith. Nihil proderit dare præcepta, nisi prius amoueris obstantia præceptis. It is to little purpose to giue precepts, except thou first remoone the obstacles of them. And therefore the Poet saide truely

Si possem, sanior essem;
Sed trahit inuitum, nouus vis, aliudq; cupido,
Mens alius suadet, video meliora, proboq;,
Deteriora sequor.

That is to say;

I would bee better, if I could; but a new and strange force draweth me against my will. Sensuality perswades me one thing, and reason another. I see and approoue the better, but I follow the worse.

Also, the Apostle speaking in the person of our corrupt nature, testifieth the same, saying. Scio quia non habitat in me, &c. I know that there dwelleth no goodnes in me, that is to say, in my flesh: For I haue a good will or desire, but I cannot performe it. For I doe not the good which I desire to doe; but I do the euill which I would not do. Thus farre the Apostle. Whereupon it followeth, that precept and prohibition of the Law (whereby wee haue the onely knowledge of good and euill) litle auayleth vs for the attayning of vertue; except the infirmitie and corruption of Nature, be cured by some other meanes. For Animus (saith Seneca) vt ad præcepta posit ire, soluendus est. The Soule must be loosed from the bonds that tye and entangle it, or otherwise, it cannot follow the good precepts that are giuen.

But what if the prohibition of euill doe hurt also, if it be not otherwise holpen? The Apostle prooueth this clearely. Peccatum (saith he) non cognoui, &c. I knew not sinne, but by the Law, for I know not concupiscence, but because the law said: Thou shalt not lust. And sinne, by occasion of the Commaundement, hath wrought all concupiscence in me. And how true this is; common experience may teach vs, seeing nothing is more proper and peculiar to the mallice of mans Nature; then desire to doe that which is forbidden, and commonly for no other reason, but because it is forbidden. Which the Poet signifieth elegantly, saying;

Cui peccare licet, peccat minus; ipsa potestas
Semina nequitiæ languidiora facit, &c.
Nitimur inuetitũ semper, cupimusq; negata.
Sic interdictis imminet æger aquis. (ta:

He which hath leaue to sinne, sinnes lesse: for the libertie to sinne, weakeneth the very roots and seeds of sinne We alwaies striue to doe that which is forbidden vs, like to the sicke Man, who thirsts most after forbidden Water.

And another Poet saith to the same purpose. Gens humana ruit per vetitum nefas. Mankind runneth head long to sinne, when it is forbidden him. For euen as a torrent or Land flood, running a violent and precipitous course, and meeting with any stop by the way, becomes the more furious, and with re-doubled force makes it selfe passage, bearing downe all before it: Euen so, mans corrupt Nature, being carryed head-long with vnbrideled desires, and finding it selfe represſed or hindred, by any Law or Commaundement; breaketh down the bankes or bounds of dutie with redoubled fury, in such sort, that it committeth double offence, to wit; it doth not onely the desired euill, but breaketh the Law also. As the Apostle insinuateth, saying: Lex iram operatur, &c. The Law worketh or causeth wrath, for where there is no Law, there is no breach of Law. Whereupon Saint Augustine saith. The letter of the Law killeth, for it makes a man rather know euill, then eschew it, and by that meanes, rather encreaseth then diminisheth sinne: because mans concupiscence or vnlawfull desire, is accompanied also with breach of the Law. Whereby it appeareth, that the Law in commaunding or forbidding, helpeth not sufficiently the reformation of mans corrupt nature.

But can Permission, or conuenience with euill (which is another point of the Law) worke any greater effect? Who seeth not, that it dooth nothing else, but bewray the imbecilitie and imperfection of the Law? Because it is forced to permit that, which it gladlie would, and should remedy, but cannot. And therefore I will proceede, to treat of Reward and Punishment, wherein, as Solon was wont to say, principally consisteth the gouernment of a Commonwealth. And Isidorus saith; Legis præmio aut

Senec. Epist. 95 Precepts alone little auaile to the obtaining of vertue.

Rom. 7. 18. 19.

The precept and prohibition of the Law.

Senec. Epist. 95.

Rom. 7. 7. 8.

Prohibition (of it selfe) rather hurteth then otherwise.

Ouid. Lib. 2. de Arte amandi.

Mans corrupt nature thirsteth after things forbidden.

Horatius 1. Carminũ Od. 3.

An excellent comparison.

Rom. 4. 15.

In decretis ex S. August.

Permission sheweth the imbecility of the Law.

Isidor. Lib. 5. Etimol.

Of reward & punishment.

aut pœna, vita moderatur humana. Mans life is wholy gouerned by reward or punnishment of the Law.

Now then, for as much as these two haue all their operation, about the effects of Vertue or Vice, that is to say; about good or bad actions (which are onely rewarded and punished by Law) and not about the rootes and causes thereof, to wit; the good or bad habits or affections of the mind, from whence doe spring all good and euill actions: It is manifest, that though they may bee Motiues to good; yet they cannot bee effectuall and sufficient meanes to work it. For, so long as the cause remaineth; so long will the effects follow thereof, at one time or other. We see that trees are yearely lopped, and Vines cropped: yet while the rootes remaine sound, they bud afresh, and bring foorth new Boughes, Leaues, and Fruits. Euen so, although euill and sinfull Acts be punished in wicked men, yet if the causes from whence they proceede (to wit, inordinate affections and passions) be not taken away; they produce the very same effects sooner or later, openly or secretly. For, what commonly followeth on the punishment of a vicious Act, when the habit of the Vice remaineth: but that the offender sinneth more warilie another time? And how often do men offend the lawes, without punishment, yea, without any feare or danger thereof? That Man (saith Cicero) who feares nothing but a Iudge and a Witnesse: what will he not do in the dark? Or when he finds a weak and rich man alone, of whom he may safely haue the spoile?

Example by the yearely lopping of trees & vines.

Cicero de legib.

Furthermore, how many waies may the penaltie of the Law bee auoyded? Some escape it by their power, in which respect, Anacharsis compared Lawes to the Spiders Web: which takes onelie the little Flyes, while the great ones breake thorough it. Some againe auoyde it by corruption, either of the Iudge, Witnesse, or Iurie. And some by fauour or friendship. Others by negligence of Officers, which doe not execute the Lawes: And some by the Princes pardon. But what shall we say of such, who offend the Law, not onelie without punishment; but also with reward? To the ende, that this may the better appeare, and that wee may see How many waies the penalties of politicall Lawes may be escaped.

Plutar. in Solon

(withall) what force Law may haue, for suppressing the mallice of mans nature: let vs consider the power of a contrarie Law, which encountreth euery Common-wealth, and impugneth Politicall Law, to wit, the Law of the Flesh, whereof the Apostle saith. Video aliam legem, &c. I see another Law in my body, repugnant to the Law of my minde. Rom. 7. 23.

And for as much, as this Law hath also her Precepts, Prohibitions, Rewards, and Punishments: Let vs put it in a Ballance with the Ciuill and Politicall Law, weighing the one with the other, that we may see, whether wil be like to ouer come, in a man deuoyd of Gods grace, & consequently in Common-wealths, that relye onely vpon humaine pollicie and power.

An exact cõparison of politicall Law, with the Law of the Flesh, to shew the aduantage of the later.

It is therefore to be considered, that the Carnall Law, flowing from the very bottome of mans corrupt Nature; is so much stronger, and more forcible, then the other, to moue and draw him: by how much it is more internall and familiar with him, and the end or scope thereof more agreeable, and consonant to his corrupt humour, will, and affection. For Politicall Law tendeth onely to Bonum verum, and Bonum commune, A true good, and the common good, consisting in sollide & perfect vertue: whereas the Carnall Law tendeth to Bonum apparens, and Bonum priuatum; An apparant and priuate good, consisting onely in a Mans owne profit, pleasure, and delectation, whereto euery one is (of his owne corrupt nature) enclined.

Whereunto the Politicall and Carnall Lawes doe tend.

The like also may be said, of the Statutes and Decrees both of the one and other, that is to say; their Precepts and Prohibitions: consisting in Commaundements Negatiue and Affirmatiue. Wherein the Carnal Law hath also the like aduantage, in respect of the greater facilitie of the precepts thereof, and difficulty of the things it forbiddeth. For, whereas the Ciuill and Politicall Lawe commaundeth vs, to loue our Neighbours as our selues, and to preferre the publique good before our priuate; to be temperate and continent; not to Steale; not to deceiue; nor to commit Fornication or Adultery: The Law of the Flesh, beeing opposite in all, commaundeth the contrary; as to loue our selues better then our Neighbours; to prefer

The Statutes of both the Lawes, politicall and carnall.

The opposition of the law of the flesh.

preferre our priuate good before the publique; to steale; to deceiue for our commoditity; and to commit Fornication and Adultery for our pleasure. And to conclude all, in one precept, it saith: Ede, bibe, lude, post mortem nulla voluptas. Eate, drinke, and be merry, for after death there is no pleasure.

The Carnall Laws precept

The Statutes of the Carnall Law, the Holy Ghost layeth downe notably, in the Booke of Wisedome, speaking of wicked men, in these wordes. Dixerunt impij, &c. The wicked said. Let vs enioy the goods that we haue, and vse the Creature in this time of our youth, without delay. Let vs fill our selues with Wine and Oyntments, and let vs not loose the floure of the time, &c. Let vs leaue euery where the signes of our mirth, for this is our part, and this is our lot. Let vs oppresse the poore iust Man, and let vs not spare the Widdow, nor haue respect to the hoary Haires of any. And let our strength be the Law of iustice. These are the Statutes of the Flesh, which how much more consonant and agreeable they are to mans corrupt Nature, and how much more easie to be performed, then the statutes and decrees of Politicall Law, which commaunds and forbids the contrarie; I neede not to declare.

Wisd. 2, 6, 7. 8 10, 11.

The Statutes of the carnall Law.

But who knoweth not, that to learn Vice, a man hath no neede of any great wit, or of a Councellour, or of compulsion? who is so simple, that he hath not wit enough to be wicked? Whereas, to be vertuous, we neede not onely wit and capacity, Maisters & Teachers: but also Lawes, stripes, Prisons, Giues and Gibbets. And yet, as Seneca saith; We may thinke we profit well, if we be none of the worst. So that, he which is eyther left to his own corrupt Nature, or hath no other then humaine help: is drowned in vice and sinne, before hee come within a kenning of vertues port. We are (saith Seneca) taken vp by the way; wee labour to come to Vertue, being already entangled and intercepted by vice. And no maruaile, seeing men voyde of Grace, (for such I speake of) haue neither sufficient Armes to defend themselues, nor refuge where to saue themselues. For reason, which is their onely Weapon, not being strengthened by Grace: is so weak and brickle, that it breaketh at the first blow. And Morall Vertue (wherein consisteth all their hope and refuge) is so hard to be attained: that a man receiueth many deadly wounds of his Enemy, before he can arriue where it is. Besides, his danger is the greater, because his Warre is so domesticall and intestine; that hee is not secure from harme himselfe. For, he is to fight, not onely with the World and the Deuill, but also with his owne passions and affections, in so much, that his greatest feare may be; least he himselfe betray himselfe, and render himselfe Prisoner to his Enemy.

Mans prompt nesse and forwardnesse to learne euill.

Seneca in Epist. 75.

Seneca vbi supra.

Reason the only weapon, being strengthened by grace.

Furthermore, wee see that our proclinity to Vice, and auersion from Vertue, is such, that as it sufficeth to flesh a Dogge onelie once vpon a Sheepe, to make him a Sheepe-wurrier as long as he liues: Euen so, one onely tast of vice is enough, to make a man vicious euer after. Whereas contrariwise, many acts are requird, to the attaining the habite of any one vertue, and so timely is mans friendship with sensualitie, the Mother of Vice, and so late his knowledge and vse of reason, which leadeth to vertue: that he hath gone halfe the way to Vice, before hee know where Vertue dwels.

Vice is very easily learned but vertue very hardly.

By meanes whereof, he commonlie groweth to bee vicious very earlie; to wit, in his Childe-hood, and vertuous very late, if euer he prooue vertuous at all. For the way to vertue is long, and full of difficulties; but the way to al kinde of vice, is easie, and, as Salomon saith; Complanata lapidibus, Made plaine with stones, eeuen, and wel paued, short, and gone in a trice. Hesiodus saith, Haud procul illa habitant, breuis est via quæ sit eundem. Vice dwelleth not farre from vs, the way is short, and all in a descent Whervpon the Poet saith; Facilis descensus Auerni; The descent to Hell is very easie. Finally, of these two waies our Sauiour saith. Lata porta & spatiosa via est, &c. The way is broad and spatious that leadeth to perdition, and many enter in thereat: but the Gate is strait, and the way is narrow, which leadeth to life, and few men finde it. Thus we see, what great aduantage the Law of the flesh hath, of the Politicall Law, in respect of the facilitie that men finde, to fulfill the precepts thereof, which (in some) are nothing else, but to be vicious.

Men learne halfe the way to vice, before they know vertues dwelling.

Eccle. 21. 10.

Hesiodus.

Virgil in Lib. 6 Aeniad.

Mat. 7, 13, 14.

The aduantage that the carnall Law hath of the politicall law.

But

The Carnall Law hath her Aduocates, Orators, Philosophers and Teachers.

But wanteth it any thing, wherewith Politicall Lawe is furnished? Hath not she them in as high a degree, and able to hold equall competence? Hath not this Carnall Law (thinke you) her Aduocates, Orators, Philosophers, & Teachers, to publish and proclaime it, to plead it, to teach it? What say ye to all the Sect of Epicurus? Whose Doctrine consisted principally in the Precepts of this Law, and impugning (as much as he durst) the Ciuill and Politicall Law? In which respect, al Epicurians were banished out of many good Common-wealthes of Greece; as Plutarch testifieth, and that worthily. For Epicurus hauing made a demaund, in certaine questions which hee wrote, whether a wise man would not doe against the Political Law, if he might be sure to escape vnpunished? aunswered freely thereto himselfe, Yes truly. And writing to Idomeneus, one of his Schollers, he admonished him seriously; not to subiect himselfe to the Lawes and opinions of Men, when soeuer he might hope to auoid the penalty of the lawes. And Metrodorus, a Disciple and familiar friend of his, writing to his Brother: forbad him to go to the warres, or endanger himselfe for the good of all Greece; aduising him, rather to drinke good Wine at home, and entreate himselfe well, that his body might receiue all pleasure and contentment. Concluding, that the chiefe and soueraigne good, consisteth in the belly, and in the pleasures therof. This is the Philosophy that belongeth to the Law of the flesh, and experience sheweth, what number of professors there are thereof in euery Common-wealth. Quorum Deus venter est, as the Apostle saith; Whose bellies are their Gods. Whose endeuors tend to nothing, but to their priuate pleasure & commodity. Who imploy their wits, studies, and pens, to nothing so much, as to publish and promulgate the Carnall Law, in amourous and lasciuious Books, wanton Poems, and scurrillous baudy Ballads, which abound euery where, to the corruption of youth, and consequently, to the preiudice of the Commonweale, & to the great shame of Magistrates, that see and suffer it.

The doctrine of Epicurus & his followers.

Metrodorus a Disciple of Epicurus.

Idem in his Treatise, that a man cannot liue merily in the Sect of Epicurus.

Phil. 3, 19.

Youth corrupted by lasciuious books and ballads.

Moreouer, to the end we may see, that this Carnall Law will yeild in nothing to the Politicall: hath it not also Common-wealths wherein it gouerneth, and a prudence and pollicy appropriate vnto it? Yea, polliticke Princes and Magistrates that practise it, and politick writers that teach and maintaine it? Looke vpon all tyrannicall States, where all is ruled according to the precepts of this Law: doe Magistrates and Gouernours practise any other pollicy, but Prudentiam carnis; as the Apostle calleth it, The Prudence and wisedome of the flesh? And Machiauell, whose workes are so highly esteemed of many men at this day: doth he teach any other gouernment, then that which proceedeth from the principles of this law, to wit; from selfe loue, and perticuler interest? Yet this were not so much to be wondred; at if it had not also a Religion conforme to it selfe, with Doctors and Diuines, to Preach and defend it. For as Politicall Law, hauing the help and assistance of true Religion, is more perfect, and worketh far greater effects in the Common-wealth, for the establishment and conseruation thereof: So also hath the Carnall Law, being masked with the Vizard of some Religion, eyther true or false, is of farre greater force, to ouerthrow or destroy any Common-wealth. And therefore it seeketh alwaies, to haue eyther the apparance and shew of true Religion, (in which respect, Machiauell teacheth his Tyrant to be an Hippocrite) or else it serueth it selfe, with some new fangled and false Religion: which the Apostle signifieth, when amongst Opera carnis, The workes of the flesh, he numbreth Sects of Heresies.

The Carnall Law hath Common-weals wherein it gouerneth.

Rom. 8.6.

Machiauell de Principe.

The Carnall Law hath Religion and doctours and Preachers.

Gal. 5. 20.

But perhaps you will say, that the other Law (in rewarding and punishing) surmounteth this, and represseth it in such sort, that it can haue no force in any wel gouerned Commonwealth. Let vs then examine this a little, and we shal finde: that the Politicall Law hath no oddes of this in that point, for it hath rewards and punishments also, as well as the other. The rewards which this Law proposeth, are diuers; for it promiseth (for some thinges) the pleasure & delight which is taken in the action, with the which, the party thinketh himselfe so well satisfied: that he is contented (many times) to bestow his Mony, yea, to venter his life to obtaine it.

The rewards which the law of the Flesh proposeth.

Some-

Sometimes againe, it propoſeth ſome commoditie or benefit, which may accompanie or follow the fact. And laſtly, it findeth meanes (otherwhiles) to rob vertue of her reward, and apply it to it ſelfe: in ſo much, that there is no remuneration promiſed by the Politicall Law, whereof the Carnall may not ſometimes giue hope, to ſuch as follow it. As I will make euident, by compariſon of the one with the other: whereby it ſhall appeare, that the Carnall Law hath euery where the aduantage.

The two laws compared together.

Therefore (I ſay) that the rewardes propoſed for Vertue by the Politicall Law, are vncertaine, in reſpect of the other, for neither is ther any at all aſſigned for very many good actes, neyther are all thoſe rewards promiſed, performed. Whereas on the contrary, the rewards of Vice, are commonly more certaine, for eyther they goe before the act (as it falleth out in bribes, and many other caſes of vnlawfull gaine, where the reward is paid before hand) or elſe they accompany the fact (as in al caſes of intemperance and incontinency, wherein onely pleaſure is ſought, or in coſenages and deceipts, which bring preſent gaine) or elſe they follow vpon the deede, as when ſome vnlawfull act is done, vpon promiſe of future pay. So that, for Vice the reward is alwaies eyther aſſured, or (at leaſt) hoped for and expected; which is no ſmal Motiue to induce men thereto. But for vertue, neither is there any reward to bee had many times, nor yet hope of any by politicall Law, as we ſee by experience in very many Men, who liue laudably in the Common-wealth all their liues: and yet are ſo farre from hauing any remuneration, or from expecting any; that they thinke themſelues happy, in that they can eſcape the penalties of the Law.

The reward for vertue very vncertain.

The rewards of vice are certaine, for the moſt part.

Good men dy many times, yet neuer reſpected.

But let vs proceede a little further. Is there any reward for vertue, ſo aſſured by Politicall Law, that Vice cannot; yea, doth not abtaine it daily? Hath it not honour (many times) for reward, as well as Vertue? Who ſooner riſeth to the higheſt offices, and credit in ſome Courts: then the Miniſters of the Princes pleaſures, or Inſtruments of his wickedneſſe? As Seianus, vnder the Emperor Tiberius. Two Slaues, called Narciſſus and Pallas, vnder Claudius. Tigellinus, vnder Nero. Pexennius, Cleander, Regillus, Iulianus, and other Slaues, vnder Comodus. All which men, gouerned both the Emperours, and the Empire: to whom I might adde diuers other, if I thought it conuenient. For, whether wee looke to former times, or to the preſent: we ſhall finde euery where, as many aduanced by euill meanes, as by good. For no man is ſo wicked: but if he haue Mony, he may hope for any preferment whatſoeuer.

The miniſters of vice ſooneſt exalted to honour.

Suetonius in Tiberio, Claudio, Nerone.

Lamprid Hero. Pedro Mexia. de vitis Imper.

Curia pauperibus clauſa eſt, dat cenſus honores
Cenſus amicitias, pauper vbique iacet. (res,

Ouid. Eleg. 7.

The Court (ſaith the Poet) is ſhut vp to poore men: but wealth giueth honours, wealth giueth friendſhip, and the poore Man lyeth euery where in the duſt.

And if we conſider alſo, how Princes doe commonly beſtow their rewardes: wee ſhall ſee that merit is leaſt reſpected. Which Phillip de Comines ſheweth by a pleaſant example, of Lewes the eleauenth, King of Fraunce, and Charles Duke of Bourgundy. Who, after the battaile (which was fought betwixt them at Montlehery in France) being determined to reward and puniſh ſuch, as had deſerued well or ill in their Armies, and finding, that diuers ranne away on both ſides, while the battel was doubtfull (ſome on the one ſide an hundred Miles Eaſt-ward, and others on the other ſide, as many Weſt-ward) the K. of France tooke from one of his Subiects, all his Offices and dignities for running away, and gaue it to another that ranne ten miles further then he. The Duke of Bourgundie depriued alſo one of his, of all his goods and authority, for the like cauſe, & within a while after, gaue him more then euer hee had before. Whereby (ſaith Comines) it appeareth, that Princes beſtow their rewardes and fauours, not like Angels, but like Men, as they are.

Philip de Comines in Cron. du Roy Louys. Ca. 7

Rewards giuen without any deſert.

Seeing then, that Vice hath not onely perticular rewards, either of gaine or commoditie, or of pleaſure at leaſt, (which contenteth ſome more then Gold) but alſo hope of the rewards due to vertue it ſelfe, eyther by the Princes error or infirmitie, or by his fauour, or by

Kingdomes & Crownes oftentimes are obtained by wickednesse.

by purchase, or by accident and chance, (whereby many wicked men are also aduanced.) What aduantage can the Politicall Law haue of the other, by proposing reward, though it be neuer so great? Doe we not see Crownes and Soueraignties (wherin most men place the greatest felicity of this life) procured by murders, mischiefes, and most wicked meanes? And doth Machiauell propose any lesse reward to his Prince (for extreame wickednesse) then assurance in Soueraignety? So that the most wicked man that is, hauing hope to get or conserue a Crowne, (or rather, Soueraigne State) by some murder or mischiefe: what greater, or so great a reward, could he expect for all the vertue in the world, by obeying Political laws? Did not very many (in old time) get diuine honours, though they were most wicked men: as Iupiter, Venus, Bacchus, Hercules, Tiberius Cæsar, and diuers Emperours as bad as he? And so it would still fall out, if Christian Religion had not expelled Idolatry out of the world. Whereby we see, Politicall Lawes, without the helpe of Gods Grace and Religion (for I consider them here) cannot assigne so great a reward for vertue: but that the wickedst man in the world may hope also to haue it, though he follow and obey the lusts of the flesh.

Wicked men honoured for Gods in elder times.

Wicked men somtimes get rackes and topes in stead of dignities.

But a man may say, that many wicked men, which promise themselues great gaine or aduancement, by some wicked act: get nothing in the end, but rackes and ropes in recompence thereof. This I grant, but then let vs also consider on the other side, how many notable Men, eyther loose their liues in actions, for which they should bee rewarded, or, in stead of the reward which they deserue, get nothing but ignominy, banishment, hatred of their Princes or people, death, and vtter ruine? As Marcus Coriolanus, Furius Camillus, Scipio, Cicero, Themistocles, Aristides, Phocion, Dion the Sicilian, and infinite others. Some of which men, were depriued of their Dignities, others banished their Countries, and others shamefully put to death by publike authoritie; after they had done great seruices to their Common-weales and States, wherein they liued. And did not Lewes the eleauenth, King of France, discouer a great secret, concerning the humors of Princes, in rewarding seruices past, when he said; Il perd souuent d'auoir trop bien serui; It ouerthroweth Men many times, to haue done too good seruice? Signifying, that Princes are more willing to haue others beholding to them; then to bee themselues beholding to any. And some, as well Princes as others, are of such Nature, that when they see their obligation so great to any man, as they thinke that they cannot commodiously reward him, according to his satisfaction and merit: they hold him then but for an eye-sore, and seek to rid him one way or other. Therefore, how vncertaine and casuall is the reward of vertue by Politicall Lawes, seeing the distribution thereof is in the hands of such: as for some perticular respect, or interest of their owne, may not onely forbeare to reward, but also (some-times) vndoe and destroy those, that haue best deserued of them and the Commonwealth? Thus much of Reward.

Philip de Comines Cap. 92.

The vncertainty of the reward of vertue, by Politicall law.

Wicked men sometimes get rackes and topes in stead of dignities.

Vertuous mē disgraced and punished.

Read Plutarch in the liues of all these men

Now, to speake of Punishment, wherein consisteth the greatest force of any Politicall Law, for the repression of mans mallice: let vs see, what are the penalties or punishments, where-with the Law of the flesh terrifieth men, to diuert them from vertue, and to draw them to vice. For, although it cannot (of it selfe) inflict any punishment vpon the true louers of vertue, who tread downe and triumph ouer all power of the flesh, and Lawes thereof: yet it setteth vp certaine Scarre-Crowes, to fright such simple Soules as it deceiueth, proposing vnto them farre greater difficulties, labour, and paine, then there is (indeed) in the practise and exercise of vertue. Which difficultie, they hold for no other then continuall affliction, and (as it were) a penalty or punishment, inflicted vpon such as labour to be vertuous. By meanes whereof, they contemne the penalties of Politicall Lawes, esteeming them, not only more easie to bee auoyded, but also more tollerable to bee borne, then the other. I say, more easie to be auoyded, for that, neither there is a penalty imposed for euery offence, neither are those that be ordained, alwaies exacted vpon offenders. For, as I haue noted before, they are many times escaped, eyther

The penalties and punishments which the Carnall Law threateneth.

The Scarre-crowes and false frights of the carnall Law.

The escapes of the carnall Law.

ther by power, or by fauour, or by corruption of Officers, or by their negligence, or by their Princes pardō, whereas the paines that worldly men conceiue to accompany vertue, seeme to them ineuitable, except vertue it selfe be auoyded: whereto no man can arriue, but by the strait, narrow, and painefull way, which I haue before described.

Penalties of the politicall law seeme more tollerable to wicked men, then the penalties of the carnall law.

And againe, the penalties of Politicall Lawes, doe seeme to them more tollerable then the other, becausе al penal mulcts, consist either in payment of Mony, or in Infamy, or in corporall or Capitall punishment. If in Mony, they feare it not much; for they are content to buy their satisfying there-with, and many we see doe voluntarily begger themselues, to obtaine their pleasures. If the penalties consist in Infamy; what care they for it, who hold sinne for no shame, but as an honour? And (as the Psalmist saith) Gloriantur in malitia; They glory in wickednesse. Et lætantur (saith Salomon) cum male fecerint, & exultant rebus pessimis, quorum via peruersa, quorum gressus infames sunt. Who reioyce when they haue done amisse, and exalt in the worst thinges. Whose waies are peruerse, whose steppes are infamous. If the punishment be Corporall, or Capitall, they esteeme the practise of vertue more painefull. For, what affliction, Prison, restraint of liberty, torment or death, can seeme so grieuous to a Man giuen ouer to lust and pleasure, as to afflict himselfe by restraint of his owne will? To conquer and subdue his owne vnbrideled affections? To chastise his body, that it may be made obedient to the Spirit? To mortifie and crucifie himselfe? To dye to his Lust and Concupisence? Yea, and to bee (as it were) his owne Butcher and Hang-man? To execute all this vpon himselfe, not for once or twice, or for a day or two, or for now and then: but daily, continually, and without intermission: for otherwise, true vertue can neither be attained, nor conserued. Can any thing (I say) seeme more irkesome, or any punishment more corporall, or capitall, to sensual & fleshy men, destitute of grace? Qui non percipiunt ea quæ sunt spiritus dei; Who haue no feeling or apprehension of matters belonging to the spirit of God?

Psalme 52, 1.

Prou. 2, 15. 16

Nothing more tedious and irksome to euill men, then vertue.

A hard lesson for a worldly man.

1. Cor. 2. 14.

Corporall torments, they think (with Epicurus) the greater they are, the sooner they dispatch a Man out of paine, & the lesse they be, the more tollerable they are, and death they hold for an end of misery. But the labours and paines, which they imagine to be in continuall exercise of vertue: they take for a continuall and neuer dying torment, & for an euerlasting death. So that, very many are so disgusted with the onely conceipt & apprehension thereof: that they will not take so much as a tast of vertue, to auoid any penalty of Law whatsoeuer: as we see daily in many Malefactors that are incorrigible. And again, diuers that haue already made some entrance, into the course and way of vertue, are thereby so wearied within a while: that they vtterly despaire, euer to arrine at any perfection therein, such men (I mean) as haue no light or help of Gods grace. Insomuch, that one Sextius, a Gentleman Romaine, of whom Plutarch writeth, hauing giuen himselfe to the study of Philosophy, and the practise of morall vertue, was within a while so discouraged: that his friendes had much a do to keepe him from drowning himselfe. Æmelius Probus testifieth, that the Son of the famous Dion of Scilie, being restrained by his Father, from the licentious life which hee had led (for some long time) in his Fathers banishment: did desperatly cast himselfe from the top of the house, and brake his necke.

Epicurus his opinion of corporall torments.

The great auersion of wicked men from vertue.

Plutar. in Lib. de Tranquil. anim.

Amelius Probus in Dione.

But put the case, that Subiects might be made vertuous, by the feare of punishment: what remedy is there for the Prince, when he is of a bad and maligne Nature? Truelie none, for he feareth no penaltie of the Law, being himselfe aboue the Law: and as for good councell, if any man dare giue it, hee dare contemne it. What good did the good councell and precepts, of the Diuine Plato, and of famous Dion, to the two Tyrants of Sicily, the Father & the Son, called Dionisius? In requitall of their good enstructions, was not Plato solde for a Slaue, and Dion bannished out of Sicilie? What benefit reaped the wicked and cruell Nero, by all the good discipline he receiued from the wise Seneca? Did he exercise any lesse cruelty on him, then vpon all others? And what good effect wroght the good education, example, and enstructions, which the

No meanes in politicall law, to reforme a vicious prince

Dionisius Father and Son, two Tyrants of Sicily.

Nero & Seneca

Marcus Aurelius and his Son Commodus

Emperour Marcus Aurelius (called the Philosopher) gaue to his Sonne Commodus? Succeeding him in the Empire, was not he far more detestable and hatefull for vice, then his Father was renowned & beloued for vertue? If then there be no sufficient meanes, by lawes, education, counsell, or exhortation, to reforme the vicious and corrupt Nature of a wicked Prince: who seeth not, that (by consequence) there is no assured meanes, to make the Common-wealth vertuous? For though it bee neuer so well ordered and disposed in the body: yet it may receiue such corruption from the head, that it may perish thereby. For, as Plinie saith; Euen as in Mens bodies, so in Common-weales, the disease is most grieuous and dangerous, which proceedeth from the head. And we commonlie see, that the maners of the people, are conforme to the manners of the Prince.

The Princes life is a great example to the Common wealth.

Plin. in lib. 4. Epist.

Now then to conclude. What sufficient meanes there is in Politicall Law, to suppresse the Law of the Flesh, and to make the Prince and people truely vertuous? Is it precepts or Prohibitions? Nothing lesse. For, if they consist but in wordes; they are easily contemned. And (as I haue said before) Prohibition doth encrease the disease, that is to say; the offence and sin, rather then remedie it. And as for permission of euill, it doth but bewray the weakenesse of the Politicall Law, and shew the force of carnall Law: which the other is faine to permit, because it cannot redresse it. What then? Is it punnishment or reward? Neither of both. For, as I haue signified, either the offences are so secret, that they are not subiect to punishment: or the Law is deluded, and the penaltie many waies auoyded. Or if not, yet in respect of the paines, that wicked men imagine to be in the exercise of vertue, they are litle feared. And as for reward, what reward (ordained by Law) can so satisfie a sensuall man, as pleasure? Which he holdeth for his Soueraigne and chiefe good, and for the onely felicity of his life? In so much, that I haue heard some men, most wickedly protest and sweare, that if it were not for the pleasures of the flesh; their liues would be loathsome and hatefull vnto them. Therefore Licurgus (with great reason) despaired, to make either the King, or the Subiects in his Common-wealth, vertuous by the force of Lawes. For which cause, he ordained (as Aristotle saith) that the Kinges of Lacedemonia should not be perpetuall, but gouerne for a time: least some euill King, if his gouernment were for tearme of life, might destroy the Common-wealth.

No sufficient means in Politicall Law, to make the Prince and Common-wealth truely vertuous.

Al the premisses examined ouer in due order for a Conclusion.

The insufficiency of Politicall Law for the reformation of vice acknowledged by Lycurgus. Arist. in Polit. Lib. 2. Cap. 7.

CHAP. VI.

Of Sleepe and Rest; And what manner of seating, or lying in our Beds, ought to be obserued in our sleeping, as well for ciuility as for health.

BY good reason did Galen say; That Sleepe is the repose of the whole body, and principally of the animall faculties, and without sleepe, a Man could not subsist: therefore there are certaine rules to be obserued in sleeping, as necessary as in eating and drinking. For it is not enough, that a man sleepe seauen or eight houres in a night; rise early in the morning; shun sleepe after dinner, vpon an indigested stomack, &c. But he is to vnderstand withall, what comportement or behauiour is conuenient for him in sleepe. Beasts and other animals, do heeein lend vs some enstruction, for they do not fall downe backward, when they prepare to rest; but couch downe vpon one of their sides, and (almost ordinarily) on the right side, and according to Nature, neuer faile therein. Neuertheleese, albeit that men are endued with reason, yet very hardly shall three men bee found, lying in on Bed, or in one company, that do take their rest after one and the same manner. For one will haue his head raised high, another low. One lyeth to sleepe on the right side, and others on the left very ordinarily. Some on their bellies, or on their backs. In regard whereof, many people (thorow want of due obseruation) doe fall into grieuous diseases, which proue (oftentimes) incurable, or are found stifled in their sleeping, which falleth out too ordinary.

Galen his definition of Sleepe.

Beasts do giue enstruction for sleep.

Man onelie is disordered in the maner of his sleeping.

The man that desireth to preserue his health,

What behauiour is to be obſerued in ſleeping.

health, ſhould ſleepe on his right ſide, during the time of his firſt ſleepe to the end, that the meates may deſcend into the bottome of the ſtomack: becauſe it is fleſhy, and leſſe full of membranes then the vpper part; and ſo, by conſequent, more hot and proper for concoction. Afterward, for his ſecond ſleepe, hauing continued ſome foure houres, or therabout, on the right ſide: he may turne on the left, to the end, that the liuer may the better extend it ſelfe, and reſt vpon the ſtomacke. In doing thus, digeſtion is made perfect; becauſe the Liuer is hotter then the belly, and embracing al, ſerueth as if it were a warmth of fire. But if a man be conſtrained to keep his bed long, at one time & other, he muſt obſerue turnings, one while on the one ſide, and then on the other.

Of ſleeping on the belly, what inconueniences are cauſed thereby.

To ſleep vpon the belly auaileth nothing, except in ſuch as are of bad digeſtion, for ſuch manner of lying heateth the ſtomacke ſo well, that it facilitateth and accelerates concoction: but then it bringeth a great diſcommodity; to wit, that it filleth the eyes full of defluxions, and (conſequently) troubleth the ſight, hindereth the excrements alſo, in their auoydance out of the belly.

Of ſleeping on the backe and reines.

To ſleepe vpon the backe and reines, doth manie times engender ſtones & ſand in them, and being no way helpfull to digeſtion, cauſeth the Rhume to riſe, which coueteth moſt vp to the throat, and haſteneth a man to the Falling-ſickneſs, Apoplexies, and other capitall diſeaſes, beſide the puffing vp or ſwelling of the Lights, and the Midriffe or Diaphragma. Wherfore, of al healthful ſituations for ſleep, there is none better (as hath beene ſaid) then to reſt on the ſides: for beſide all other benefits enſuing thereby, the body being turned one while on the right ſide, and then againe on the left, feeleth pleaſure, contentment, and ſweeteſt eaſe.

Of ſleeping on the ſides.

The bodies figure in a healthfull mans ſleeping

The body then ought not to bee ſo much extended or ſtretched out, being turned on either ſide: but that the thighs and legs muſt be ſomewhat bended or retired, for ſuch is the figure of a healthfull mans ſleeping. The head ſhould not be laid too high, nor too low: for being raiſed too high, it prepareth a man to the Cough, and infirmitie of the Lunges, and cauſeth that he cannot ſleep ſoundlie. And being laid too low, it procureth broken and painefull ſleepes, and engendereth offenſiue dreames.

Of an apt Boulſter for the head.

Of ſleeping with open eyes.

To ſleepe with wide open eyes, indurates (all along) the Tunickles or couering skinnes of them, and ſo by conſequent, begetteth a ſhort or nere hand ſight, becauſe that the viſuall Spirit cannot penetrate croſſe-wiſe. It may alſo happen, that ſome thing falling ſtrangely into them, may greatly harme and periſh the ſight. And in any ſharpe or extraordinarie diſeaſe, to ſleep with the eyes open, it is an aſſured ſigne of death: except the party haue been long invred thereto; or haue had ſome great fluxe of the belly; or taken ſome violent purgation; or elſe hath endured long watchings.

Of ſleeping with the mouth open.

To ſleepe with the mouth open, is very contrarie and incommodious to the health of a man, becauſe hee draweth aboundantly to him (by the vocall Artery) all the ayre that it meeteth withall: which commonly (in the night time) is very impure and troubled. By meanes whereof, the Conduits whereby a man reſpireth, being ouer-moyſtened: either it maketh the voyce hoarſe, or dull and feeble. Whereas, if a man ſleepe with his mouth cloſed; then the exteriour ayre (by little and little, and not in any exceſſiue quantitie) entereth at both the paſſages of the Noſthrils, and ſo goeth on to the Lights, where it moderateth the heate of the heart. Which is the cauſe, that they which ſleepe with their Lippes faſt ſhut; doe feele themſelues the leſſe diſturbed. For they that ſleepe open throated, by reaſon of the breath, which entereth and iſſueth forth aboundantly: the tongue and roofe of the mouth becommeth very much dried, which makes them, both in the night time, and in the morning, to finde themſelues much altered.

Of ſleeping with the mouth cloſe ſhut.

The lips faſt ſhut.

Sleeping opē throated, how dangerous it is.

A good Compariſon.

In like manner, when the breath is ſome way kept and retained, concoction is made the more ſtrongly & ſoundly: euen as meat is the better boyled in a couered pot. There may happen many other inconueniences beſide, for in ſleeping open throated; a Feather may fall, and paſſe into the body, which will cauſe a continuall Cough, by reaſon that neuer, or very hardly, it can be auoyded, and ſo grow to a deadly Phtiſicke. A Serpent Stellio, Spider, or ſome ſuch venomous Creature, may alſo get his paſſage, without all meanes of recouery, as I haue knowne too often.

A deadly Phtiſicke.

After what manner to hold the arms

As concerning the Armes, if they be held croſſe-wiſe, like the ſigne of the Croſſe, or elſe halfe courbed, and the hands reſting vpon the little belly; it is very healthfull. But one thing (kinde Reader) take as a warning, that it is a very euill cuſtome, to talke in the night time, and a notorious inciuility. For ſuch as are vſed to prattle at their wakings, doe very hardly fall to faſten on ſleepe againe. And ſo conſequently, ſuch wakings doe cauſe Crudities in them: becauſe their ſleeps haue not bin ſufficient, to boyle the meates receiued into the ſtomacke. Another reaſon is, that it impeacheth and interrupteth the reſt of others, who (perhaps) take little delight in talking at ſuch vnfit houres: but when once they haue made cuſtome of it, they keepe it as an eſpeciall habite.

Of talking in the night time, how hurtfull it is.

Of ſnoring or ſnorting in our ſleepe.

Some, in their ſleepe, are ſubiect to ſnore or ſnort, eſpecially fat and round bellied people. It is a thing very odious and offenſiue, to lie by ſuch a body, or in the Chamber where ſuch a one reſteth. A man were almoſt as good, to lodge in a Stye among the Swine, as neere or with ſuch perſons, eſpeciallie, ſuch as delight in liuing ciuilly and honeſtly. Therefore I will ſet downe a prettie receipt, which a Portugall Apothecarie (but yet a Iew by his Religion) taught me againſt this vndecency, and the receipt is thus. He that is ſubiect to this infirmity, halfe an houre before he goeth to reſt, let him eate a little Conſerue of an Hearbe called Perſil d'Aſne, Aſſe-Perſelie, or Wilde Cheruill. It is an Hearbe very ſufficiently knowne, and the Conſerue muſt be made of the root thereof. I haue made good experience of it many times. Or elſe let him gargarize a pretty deale of good Vineger, made ſomewhat warme, a quarter of an houre before he lyeth downe. This laſt remedy was practiſed by a Courtier (in the time of King Charles the ninth) with very happy ſucceſſe: for, if he had ſnored neuer ſo little (as he was much ſubiect thereto) hee had loſt the gracious fauours of a Gentlewoman, who admitted him to her owne Lodging, her Husband being abſent.

A pretty Receipt againſt ſnoring in ſleepe.

* Myrrhis, Mockcheruill, an Hearb like to Hemlocke. Some call it Kex or Kexes.

Therefore I would gladlie perſwade Fathers and Mothers; yea, Schoolemaiſters and others, who haue the charge of youth and young Children, to conſtraine and accuſtome them in their tender yeares, to honeſt, decent, and wholeſome lodging in their Beds: For, beſide the comlineſſe and ciuility, it is no meane propagation of their health. And let me tell ye more, thorough ſuch vndecent behauiour in bed; I haue knowne many vnhappy quarrels and debates, ſometimes betwixt the Husband and Wife.

The Authors friendly aduertiſement.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the conſtancy, of ſome Lacedemonian, Romaine, and French women: At the deceaſe of their Children, hurts, and nurſing of them.

THat Commonwealth may tearm it ſelfe happy, wher the Weomen are not only chaſt: but likewiſe endued with manly Spirits, full of conſtancy and magnanimity, for of ſuch Women (commonly) are Heroycall Children bred and borne. Which Argument giueth me leaue, to ſpeake of ſome Weomen among the Lacedemonians; then the Romaines, and laſtly the French; but firſt we will begin with the moſt generous Lacedemonians.

Of good and generous women come worthy Children.

Lacedemon, Sparta, and Laconia, were all but one, to wit, a people and Country ſcituated in Peloponneſus, a Region of Greece, where Lycurgus had not onely beene King, but alſo was their Law-Maker. He left them many good lawes and Morall precepts, which while both the Men and Weomen knew how to keepe: they continued Lords of themſelues, liuing in all enfranchiſement and

The ſeuerall names, of Lacedemon, & ſcituation thereof.

What benefit enſued by keeping the Lawes of Lycurgus.

and libertie. But ſo ſoone as they wandered and ſwerued, from thoſe good manners which the ſaid Lycurgus had taught them: they became forthwith Seruants and Slaues vnto others. During ſuch time, as they were obſeruers of his Morall precepts; it happened, that the Athenians made Warre, in hope to ſubdue them; but as they were farre inferior to them in their forces, ſo were they as ſtoutly and valiantly reſiſted.

Of a mother and her onely Son.

Among the women of Sparta, there was one, that had but one only Sonne, who was grieuouſly wounded in the foote, and greatly complained, of the yrkeſome paines which thereby he endured: but his Mother ſaide vnto him. My Sonne, if thou didſt ſet vertue before thine eyes; not onely would this anguiſh bee forgotten: but (in reuenge thereof) thou wouldſt ſhew thy ſelfe valiant. But the Mothers of our Countries, doe cuſtomarily augment the grieuances of their Children, by teares and cockerings, too frequent among them. Whereas this worthy Mother, did breath her Spirit into his Heart, to teach him, how hee ſhould ſuffer harmes manfully, and not to complaine, like a cowardly woman.

Good & courageous counſell of a Mother.

Foolish Mothers of theſe times.

Two honorable minded Mothers.

Another Lacedemonian Woman likewiſe, hauing tidings brought her, that one of her Sonnes was ſlaine in the battaile, ſaid: Why, he was one of my Sons too: reioyſing in the generoſitie of her Son, and neuer mourning for his death. Contrariwiſe, another woman, hearing that her Sonne fled away cowardly; quoth ſhe. He neuer was any Son of mine. Intimating thereby, that ſuch Sons deſerued no acknowledgement, who degenerated from the vertue of their Anceſtours.

Another Mother worthy of immortall cõmendation.

I cannot forget another Laconian Woman, who had fiue Sonnes, and all of them loſt their liues, fighting valiantly for the freedome of their Countrey. She, going into the Subburbs of the Citty, to know the iſſue of the battaile, meeting with a Vant-currer, demanded how all matters went? And he told hir the fatall hap of her fiue Sonnes. Wicked Slaue (quoth ſhe) this is no anſwere to my demaund. I pray thee to tell mee, in what eſtate ſtands the affaires of the Commonwealth? Hee told her, that the victorie went with the Lacedemonians. Why now (quoth ſhe) thou art an honeſt man, and I beare my Children death patiently. Was not this a Woman full of honour, and endued with an incomparable Spirit; to prefer the welfare of the Commonwealth, before ſo many liues of her dear eſteemed Sons?

Cicero in lib. de Orat. 3.

Cicero alleadgeth another, who was a noble Romaine Lady, no leſſe to be eſteemed then the Laconian women. She beholding her Sonne, named Spurius Caluidius, that could go no other-wiſe, but euen as Beaſtes doe, on all foure, through the greateſt wounds he had receiued in the warres, fighting for his Countries liberty, and perceiuing him to bee aſhamed, becauſe one had ſcorned him for going in that manner; ſhe ſaid vnto him. Thou ſhouldſt be the more iocond, and proud of thy valour, that made thee go in this crooked manner; then grieue at that poore ſpirit, that dare not ſhew his face where thou haſt beene.

A moſt valiant Romaine Mother.

Generous women of France.

But let me tell ye, that neither Lacedemon nor Rome, contained all the generous Weomen: for in our Native Country of France, there haue bin very many, and yet are at this preſent, of whom I will (for breuities ſake) alledge but two. The firſt ſhall bee Madame Margaret de Sauoye, Wife to the deceaſed Anne de Montmorency, Conſtable of France, who had fiue Children, all worthily educated, and euermore moſt louingly affected vnto the Crowne of France, as beeing very remarkeable for their fidelitie, as alſo well prouided of honourable eſtates. When newes was brought her, that one of her Sons was dead, named Mombrun, whom ſhe moſt dearely affected aboue all the reſt, and was ſlaine in the battaile at Dreux, fought againſt the French Proteſtants, in the yeare 1562. and alſo that her Husband (being wounded) was there ſurprized: She ſaid. Bleſſed be God, as well for the bad as the good, and gaue him hartie thankes, not onely becauſe her Sonne was ſlaine; but that her Husband remained wounded, and a Priſoner, for the ſeruice of his King, &c.

The Battaile at Dreux, in Anno 1562.

The braue reſolution of Margaret de Sauoy.

Madame de Saint Blancar, Wife to the late magnanimious Mareſchall de Biron, was viſited by a Lady of great Birth, who brought with her very goodlie workes of Silke, which ſhee and her Daughters had wrought in Samplers.

Madame de Blãcar, wife to the Mareſchall Biron.

She brought with her alſo one of her Children; that daunced delicately, and played ſweetly on the Gitterne, whom ſhe ſhewed to the ſaid Lady Marſhall, that ſhe and her Children, ſhould learn to ſpend their time in the like delightfull exerciſes. Madame Marſhall made her anſwer; That ſhee could not deuiſe any better works exerciſes, wherein to enſtruct her Sons and Daughters; then in the fear of God, and good maners; whereby their harts would become magnanimious, to do ſeruice for their King, according as their Father had formerly done. And indeed, all the Male children iſſuing of her, were very braue minded and valiant men. As for her Daughters, ouer and beſide their happineſſe, to marrie with wiſe and worthy Knights: ſo were they well eductated in houſhold diſcipline, by their excellent breeding, and famous houſes of generous nouriſhing. As Madame the Counteſſe de Chaſteauneuf, whoſe Huſband is (at this preſent) Lieutenant to the King, in higher and lower Lymoſine. Madame de Force, & others that I know.

Madame de Biron of a vertuous & manly courage.

Let then great Ladies of blood, and others of meaner birth, bee aduertiſed by this diſcourſe, that if it happen, that their Husbands and Children dye, or become maimed in their Kings ſeruice, and for the good of the Common-wealth: they would not bee ſo weake hearted, as to lament, grieue, or beate their heads againſt walles, becauſe ſuch behauiour is not ſeene, but in Women of ignoble and ſlender worth. But fixing rather before their eyes, the generous Spirits of theſe Laconian, Romaine, and French Ladies, formerly exemplified; to account themſelues happy, when ſoeuer the like diſaſters ſhall happen to them. Conſidering withall, that they whom they eſteeme to be dead, do liue, and they ſhall ſee them again at the day of reſurrection, accompanied with much glory and honor.

A generous Exhortation of the Author to Ladies of greateſt birth and others.

The greateſt to any Chriſtian ſoule.

To Iob, all his goods and wealth were redoubled, onely his Children excepted, for he begat but ſuch a number, and in the like number he had them againe. Yet heerein the promiſe of God was as well accompliſhed, as in his other goods: for he knew that they were not dead, but ſhould be raiſed againe, and re-knowne of their Father and Mother. It may be preſumed, that ſuch women as are ſo full of ſorrow and vexation; do not beleeue any reſurrection. Otherwiſe they would embrace aduiſe and enſtruction, to teach their Sons & daughters al ſuch exerciſes, as might redound to the benefit of the Common-wealth. As their Sons to haue learning, to manage Armes and Horſes, with all vertues becomming man-hood. Their Daughter to feare God, and learne womens huſwiuery: not idle Samplery, or Silken follies, which (elſe-where) is the exerciſe of Eunuches & Slaues. I would wiſh them to hold as firme a purpoſe, as did Madame Katherine du Salaignat, Wife to the late Meſſiere Geffrey de Saillet, a braue and hardy Knight in his life time. She ſending her Sonnes (in their very young yeares) to Paris for enſtruction, was aduiſed by ſome familiar Friend, to keepe them (as yet) at home, becauſe they were but young and tender. She made anſwer. That her Children reſembled Veſſels wholly new, wherein if good liquer were put at the firſt, they would ſauour thereof ſo long as Nature laſted. In like manner, if Children embrace good doctrine in their young age, they will reliſh alwaies after thereof, euen to old age. Which they cannot doe, being kept vnder the Mothers Wing, as wee tearme it, where neither are like Maiſters, or commodious meanes, as is in ſuch places, wher all vertues are taught, to ſuch as will ſeeke for them. For this good Lady added, That ſhe deſired rather to be without Children, then that they ſhold be not vertuous. And indeed, ſuch did her Sons proue to be, and good Seruitours to their King, notwithſtanding all the partialities in France.

Example of the Lady Katherine de Salaignat.

A worthy preſident for all cockering and nice Mothers.

The bountifull mercy of God to Iob.

In the caſe of Death, how Parents ought to comfort themſelues

CHAP. VIII.

Againſt Obtrectation, or Detraction. And why it is more vnſeemly for men, to ſpeak euill of Women, then Women of Men.

ALl Diuines and Philoſophers, as well Auncient as Moderne, haue held, and doe maintaine, that detraction is one of the braunches of Enuy, which Detraction one of the branches of Enuy.

which delighteth and nourisheth it selfe by calumny and lying: whereby people of honest conuersation, do continualy receiue most greeuous wounds; by giuing ouer light beleefe, to such as haue a felicity in lying. And therefore, Diogenes the Cinick being demaunded, what bite of any Beast was most hurtfull and dangerous, answered: Amongst furious and wilde Beasts, none like the Detractor, and among tame or gentle, only the Soother and Flatterer. Vpon the same words, Themistocles the Thebane, said; There is no greater paine or miserie in the worlde, then to know and behold the honor of an honest and good man, to be in the mercy of a venomous tongue, there to be outraged by detracting speeches.

Diogenes his answere, concerning Detractors and Flatterers.

Full wel we know, that vertuous fame and good renowne, is more precious then any treasure whatsoeuer. No lesse shame and wrong is done to a man, in taking away his honest name and good esteeme, then as if hee were robbed and despoiled of all his substance. But aboue all other, Detraction and calumny yeeldeth most pernitious effects, when Princes do willingly lend eare to deprauers; by whom, euen themselues doe become at length corrupted. For the enuious detractor, dealeth like a bad Painter, who when he hath made a mishapen Cocke, commandeth his Boy, to driue all Naturall Cockes farre enough off from his foule handy-worke. So hee, from such as he would command or gouerne, hee striues to keep off al honest minded men, for hee cannot worke his intent openlie, becausse hee stands in feare of their Vertue, whom he hateth in his heart. Hee maketh a shew of honouring, admiring, and affectuous embracing: but vnderhand, and behinde his backe, hee casteth forth and soweth all seditious slaunders. But if his claudestine, and secret-wounding reports of the absent, do not quickly beget the yssue of his intent: hee hath yet alwayes readye in his memory, that which in elder times was obserued by Medius.

Good fame is the greatest riches in the world.

Princes subiect to heare flatterers and Detractors.

An excellent Comparison of the deprauers.

This Medius of whom we are to speak was as the Maister, or chiefe of all the troope of flatterers, that houered about the mightie Alexander, euermore bandying against well disposed people in his Court. Hee gaue instruction, that no one should bee so bolde, as to backebite openly, or vse the power of calumnie too apparantly. But rather in such sort (quoth he) that albeit the partie bitten doe recouer his harme; yet that the gripes or scratches may remaine incureable. Euen so, by such scarres and gripes of lies and false accusations, or to call them better (according to Plutarch) by such Cankers and Gangreues, many great persons haue suffered themselues to be corrupted and retained still in their memory, detestable vntruth, deliuered of vertuous men, to their innocent ouerthrowe, and their owne great dishonor.

Of Medius, chiefe of the Flatterers about King Alexander.

The Wicked speeches of detracting Medius.

All the enmities and quarrelles, as wel among great as meaner persons, whence haue ensued so manie slaughters, as dayly are beholde with great greefe: neuer had any other ground or Originall, but onely detracting the honour or repute of absent people. Now, albeit this Vice in generall, is most infamous, and aboue all other, vnsightly and il-seeming in persons of honor: yet, of both the sexes, I hold it to be more inciuil and disgraceful to a man, then to a woman. Howbeit, I know, that there are manie people, that are of contrarie opinion vnto my present purpose of speech. My first reason is, that among all the Nations of the world, there is a natural Law, obseruing it selfe; whereby a dissolute life is not held as any Vice, defect, or infamie in men: but in women it is an opprobrie, & so extreame a shame, that she of whom an euil report hath once passed (be it true or false in the imposition) she standeth for euer blamed or branded. Therefore, a wel aduised man, wil neuer touch the honor of women.

Detraction the ground of quarrels and murders.

Detraction is more vnbeseeming in men then women, and the reasons why.

The first reason.

There is likewise another reason, to wit; That Women beeing imperfect creatures, and of little or no dignitie at al, in respect of men, it were verie requisite, that (seeing of themselues they are not capeable, to performe any vertuous action) some bridle or restriction were imposed on them, by shame and feare of infamy, that any good qualitie (though it were perforce) might bee planted in them. And it seemeth, that continency was thought more necessarie for them, then any other, for the better certitude of their Children. Now, because this hath beene enforced, euen by all ingenuous subtilties, Arts, and possible meanes or wayes, to make Ladies become continent;

The second reason.

Continencie thoght most conuenient in women.

timent; yea, it hath appeased, and (as it were) consented thereto by themselues, that in all other things they are of no validity, but continually they doe the contrary to all that they ought to do. Wherfore, seeing it is lawfull for them, to commit all other errours without blame, let them neuer bee taxed with those imperfections that they haue done, they being all permitted to them, which (in this respect) must not be iudged inconuenient, or carelessely regarded by them; prouided, that their Chastitie be preserued.

Women alowed to commit all errours, their chastitie reserued.

And yet for all this, I doe not inferre that it is lawfull for weomen to depraue or mispeake by any means: for, as I haue saide, it is one of the very greatest imperfections, and draweth vnto it more contempt and disgrace, then any other Vice whatsoeuer. But I would aduise honourable and worthy women, if at anie time it happen, that a Woman haue spoken reproachfully of them, or such as do appertaine vnto them, to tollerate & make no account thereof, for the reasons forementioned. But on the contrarie, it is a worke of piety, to offend their quarrel, if any do presume to defend their honor. And so much the rather, because it was neuer knowne, that euerie any Knight, who vndertooke the Combat, to support the honor of a woman, was at anie time vanquished.

An aduertisement to Ladies, and al other women.

An act of pietie to defend womens honor.

Wee haue some proofe thereof, by a History, which Valentinus Barruchius, a Natiue of Tolledo in Spaine, hath sette downe a in great Latine Tome, most exactly written, and in verie elegant phrase, the briefe whereof, is thus: A Daughter to the King of England, being maried to a Duke of Sauoy, & Prince of Piedmont; by not yeilding to the immodest requests of the Count of Pancalier (whome the Duke her husband, had left Regent and Lieutenant of al his Lands in his absence while he was busied in the wars of France, because hee was there Constable) falsely imposed on her the crime of Adulterie, which he saide she had committed with his Nephew. And being to combate against all such, as woulde gainesay the truth of his deposition, he presented himselfe in the Lists.

A History alledged by Valentinus Baruchius of Tolledo, concerning the false accusation of a Dutchesse of Sauoy.

In the end, as a matter proceeding from Diuine inspiration, a Knight of the Noble house of Mendoza, who although he was farre inferiour in bodily strength, not only in regard of a former long sicknesse, but also by so long a way of trauel, which had so tired himselfe and his horses: yet he accepted the cause and Combate, to maintaine the honor of that vertuous Princesse. He foiled him in fight, and made him confesse his damnable imposture. After which, partly by some grieuous wounds receiued, but more by meere spight and hatefull malice, he died within few daies. And yet the said Count was one of the most valiant and strongest Knights (of his time) in al Lombardy.

The Noble Mendoza of Spain, defended the cause of the wronged Princesse.

In Fraunce, about the space of threescore yeares since, the combat was granted by King Frances, first of that name, to two French Knights, the one named La Chastaigneraye, and the other Iarnac. It was a great quarrell to bee discided, because the Lord de la Chastaigneraye, had offended the honor of a Ladie, that appertained in blood to the Lord de Iarnac. These two Knightes, fighting in the single Duello, and according to the Kinges iudgement, the whole Court, and all the spectators, it appeared that La Chastaigneraye, would haue the vpper hande, as hauing made good proofe of his person, in diuers battailes, and single combates: yet notwithstanding, Iarnac slew La Chastagneraye, and, as manie people were perswaded in Conscience, by the iust iudgement of God, for hauing defamed so worthy a Ladie. If it might be permitted, I could alledge infinite other Histories, tending to this purpose: but feare of offending, is my onely hinderance. And therefore, I will conclude with the Prouerbe, more then true: That neuer were Women depraued, but by a Knaue or a Coward.

A Combate tried between two French Knights.

General opinion is often times deceyued in proofe.

An auncient Prouerbe.

CHAP.

CHAP. IX.

How Pythagoras founde out (verie ingeniously) the iust measure and proportion of the bodie of great Hercules.

IT is verie memorable, & therefore not to bee let passe in silence, the ingenious inuentiō found out in a subtle and curious maner, concerning the true shape and measure of Hercules his body. When it was knowne, that the place where the Olympian Games were solemnized (from fiue years to fiue yeares) in Achaya, neere * Elis, & before the Temple of Iupiter Olympus, had been measured by Hercules, who hadde there made a Stadium, containing six hundred and fiue and twentie foote, by the measure of his owne foote. Vnderstanding also, that the other Stadiums, which his successors afterward ordained throughout all Greece, did hold the like length of sixe hundred and fiue and twentie foote, it appeared yet neuertheless, that they were much shorter, then that of Hercules. For, Pythagoras knew easily by this proportion, how much the foote of Hercules contained in greatnesse, from the ordinarie feete of other men. And hauing thus vnderstoode, the size or measure of his foote, hee comprehended thereby: that the whole bodie of Hercules, must needs be (according to that proportion) much greater then the bodies of all other men, in regard that his Stadium surpassed al the rest.

*A Towne in the west part of Peloponnesus, neere the Riuer Alpheus where the Olimpiā games were performed.

CHAP. X.

How the Iewes did continually, and from time to time, giue Law and Religion to such as were their Conquerours and Commanders.

SEneca fel into great admyration, so did diuers others, how it shold come to passe, that the vanquished Iewes, disperssed and scattered vnto the foure Corners of the world, should administer Law and Religion to their vanquishers. For, as concerning their subiectiō, they are a people that haue beene troden vnder foote by the Egyptians, Assyrians, Persians, Græcians, Romaines, Turkes, &c. and how many Maisters soeuer they hadde, yet they neuer changed or altered their Law. Amongst other people, in matter of their Law and Faith, hath beene found some semblable constancie: but that the subdued, transported, vilified, made slaues, led in triumph thorowe Empires; that such men, I say, should not only subdue the hearts of their Triumphers to God, but (in a manner of speaking) traine their Gods also themselues, in triumph after them, is verie admirable. That the Conquerour could not giue Law to the conquered, but that the vanquished hath done it to the victor; the subiect vnto the Prince; the Captiue to the Maister; and the condemned vnto the Iudge; Who would beleeue this, I pray ye, except he saw it? And hauing seene it, how can he say otherwise, but that GOD onelie did it?

But if Seneca could hear me peaceably, I woulde deliuer him from this astonishment and admiration, so strangely conceited, as thus. Those Gods which the Iewes had caused to be left to the people (commonly called inuiolable and immortall) consisted of dumbe and insensible Statues, disguised like men, Beastes, and Fishes; and some of them, resembled hideous Monsters. So that infamous Dæmons, possessed themselues of these Statues and Symulacres, and in them required

Seneca in his Booke of Superstition.

The Iewes euermore subiect vnto be made captiues.

A rare & vnusuall thing in common obseruation for the vanquished to be victor.

The Idols of the Gentiles wer Demons, without anie vertue.

red worse matters of men, then did the most detestable Tyrants that euer were. As, that a man should geld himself, lame himselfe, kill himselfe, yea, and that men should Sacrifice Women, Virgins, and Children to them.

The Transmigration of the Iews, was for the honor and glorie of God.

But when the people heard speech of one only true God, the Creator of heauen and earth; and that he would be serued in heart and spirit: these wordes, although they came forth of a poor slaues mouth, made Captiues of the men themselues that heard them, and subdued their Gods. What then shall we say of the Iewes transmigrations, and flitting from place to place: but that they were as so many Colonies and Preachers, to proclaime the true GOD, and euen as so many armies, to extirpate Idolles?

That it could be no otherwise, Daniell and his associats, being as the rest) transported into Assyria, he shewed vnto the King, that the Idoll Bell (which hee caused to be worshipped, and had daily deliuered him such quantities of bread made of the finest Flower, a great number of Sheepe and fatted Cattle, and six * Amphores of Wine) was no true God, though he himselfe worshipped him, and went euery day to adore him, as beleiuing that he deuoured all that meate and wine. He made it apparant to him, that it was but a meere manifest deceite, performed by his Priests & Sacrificers, who with their Wiues and Children, came in the night time, and eate vp al the Viands set before the Idoll, for which they were deseruedly punished.

Daniel discouereth the Idoll Bel to the King of Persia

* An ancient measure, containing 36. quarters.

After he had thus shewne to the Assyrian King, the vanitie of the Idoll Bel, the King tooke him, and shewd him a mighty great Dragon, which the Babylonians, and himselfe, as well as the rest, worshipped beside the saide Idoll Bell. The King saide to Daniel, Thou wilt not say that this is of Brasse, like the other, this cannot be denied to be a God. Daniel hauing obtayned leaue to kill the Draggon, without the help either of sword or staffe, with pitch, fat, and haire (which he boyled altogether) made rounde balles thereof, and threw them into the Draggons throate, which made him burst in sunder. And then said Daniel, Behold what ye haue worshipped. But for these thinges, the people threw Daniell into a denne of hungry Lions, of which Beasts hee was not deuoured, although he had nothing giuen him to eate, in the space of seauen dayes before. At the end of which time, the King finding Daniel yet liuing amongest the Lyons caused him to be taken forth, and forsaking all Idolatrie, worshipped the true GOD, the God of the Iewes. Were not these worthy slaues, that conuerted this great King, and thus triumphed?

The King shewed Daniel the great dragon.

Daniel killed the great dragon.

Daniel cast into the den of Lyons.

Daniel deliuered, and the K. conuerted.

Who gaue intelligence to Cyrus, K. of Persia, concerning the true God, the God of the Israelites and Iewes, and to cause him send home the captiued Iewish people, giuing them meanes to repayre the Temple, ruined by the Assyrians, commanding them also, to pray to God for his prosperity; but euen the same slaues of the Iewes? May we not likewise say as much, of Alexander the Great? He was broght to worship the true God, throwing and prostrating himself before Iadus the High-priest, who came before him with all the people of Ierusalem, hauing their heads and feete bare, to implore his mercie, and not to bee put to death by him, because they gaue him no aide with men and victualles, when hee besiedged Tyre. Notwithstanding, these conquered and halfe-dead Iewes, by their humble maner of behauiour, but Gods grace more especially woorking, caused that great and inuincible Monarch, to fall on his Knees before their chiefe Priest; and not onely so, but to embrace them with amitie, and graunt them manie gratious priuiledges. And to their Neighbors the Samaritans, who obserued not the same Religion, he gaue inhibition and countermand, of enioying the same immunities. And himselfe would confesse, that the Iewish Law was good, but the Gracians Law was of no worth.

Cyrus, King of Persia, beleeued in God.

Quintus Curtius in the life of Great Alexander.

Alexander inspired by God to his humility.

Did they not impose the selffame Law on the Egyptians, who likewise led them into Captiuity? Wee may read in the Greeke Histories, that after the death of Alexander, many of his Kindred, & some of his aduanced fauourites, possessed themselues (as best they could) on diuers portions of his Monarchy. And among the rest, Ptolomy seazed on Egypt, and on many other adiacent Prouinces. And purposing to do as muchon Iudea, he was impeached by the Iewish people, who would acknowledge no other superiour, but their High-priest and Sacrificer.

Ptolomie got the possession of Egypt, and spoyled Iudea

Where-

The Iews led Captiues into Egypt.

Whereupon, Ptolomy entred into Palestine, made there great deuastation and spoile, beating down diuers strong forts, and led away many thousands of them, as captiues into Egypt, where they were ill entreated, and employed in the baseſt & vileſt slaueries. All which notwithstanding, poore soules, they ceased not to cry and call to the Egyptians, that their Religion was false, and that they had manie monstrous Gods: As Onions, a Cow, a Crocodile, and others.

The captiue Iewes did shew the error of the Egyptians.

In the end, their declarations were so manifeſt, and their cries so violent on their Idolatries, that the verie wiſeſt men of the Countrey, with their King Philadelphus (one of the succeſſors to the former King, who led the poore Iews awaie as Captiues) lent eare vnto them, and found all true, which the miſerable and diſtreſſed Iewes had preached to them. In regard whereof, the King wold needs make more ample enquiry, concerning their Law and Religion. He caused al the Books of the Old Teſtament to be translated out of Hebrewe into the Greeke tongue, by seauenty Interpreters of the Iewes (moſt learned in the said tongues) seperately, so that they could not confer one with another, to know whether they agreed in their traduction of the Booke of the Old Teſtament, or no. When he had found a meruailous concordance in the seuerall translations, and had read, and read againe the saide Booke; hee acknowledged, that his Captiues the Iewes had saide nothing but the truth; and that there was but one God, the GOD of the Israelites, and the Iewes. Wherefore, he afterward embraced the feare of God in his heart, reformed his life, and set at liberty all the Captiue Iewes, throughout his Land. Thus you may see, how the vanquiſhed gaue Law and Religion to the victor.

The Bible translated out of Hebrue into Greeke.

The vanquiſhed gaue law to the Victor.

The Syrians warred on the Iewes.

When that the Egyptians had suffered the Iewes to liue in peace, the Syrians within a while after, conceiued hatred againſt the Iewes, and perceiuing Ciuill diſſentions to be among them, they also warred on them. Antiochus their King (by the meanes of Traitors) was brought into Ieruſalem, where hee placed Idols in the Temple, rauaged all Iudea, and ledde away a great number of Captiues, according as Zonarus declareth. Yet the poore captiued Iewes shewed vnto the Syrians, that they had done verie euill, in polluting the Temple of the true GOD, for which they should be seuerely puniſhed. As afterwardes it came to paſſe, for the saide King Antiochus was conquered by the Romaines, and paide tribute to them. Then could the Syrians and their King, remember the predictions of their poore captiues, whom they did gladly set at libertie, and entreated, that they woulde pray to God for them, being afterwards in the Romains safegard.

The Syrians instructed by the Iewes.

It were a matter impoſsible for me, to set downe all the Kingdomes, where the Iewes haue beene kept Captiues, & perſecuted: and yet neuertheleſſe, ſtill acknowledged, that they worshipped the only true God, and brought diuers kings and people to diſcerne their Lawe. And some verie speculatiue Diuines, haue bin perſwaded, that theſe Captiuities of the Iewes had not beene permitted by God, but onely to the end, that they shoulde beare teſtimonie in all the quarters of the earth: that the Hiſtories of the Olde-Teſtament were true, and that the God of the Iewes, was the only true God. Therfore, it was no ſuch matter of wonder, as Seneca made it, that euermore the Iewes gaue Law to the Conquerours, and ſuch as kept them in captiuitie. For the law of the Gentiles, was nothing elſe but vanitie and lies: but that of the Iewes, was grounded on the knowledge of the true God.

The captiuity of the Iewes vnexpreſſable.

The cauſe of the Transmigrations of the Iewes.

The Lawe of the Gentiles.

CHAP. XI.

Of Sorrow or Mourning for the dead. How it hath beene obſerued, and yet is to this day, in manie Prouinces and Countries of the world.

TO mourne and sorrowe for Parents, Kindred & Friends deceaſed, is not any matter of Nouelty, but moſt ancient. For it is found, that seauen score and ten yeares after the floode, and threeſcore yeares after the death of Noah, and in the year of the world, two thousand ſixtie, according to the calculation

The antiquity of mourning for the dead.

lation of Carion, and of other Chroniclers, that Abraham mourned and sorrowed for his wife Sara, the space of thirtie dayes. I thinke, that the Iewes afterward continued (and yet do to this day) the custome of mourning, for no more then 30 dayes. But Christians, belonging to the Church of God, vsed mourning a whole yeare, to wit; cloathed in blacke for the most part: but Women, were cloathed partly in white, and partly in blacke; especially in some Countreyes, which was done according to the diuersity of Nations. But the ancient Romaines, before they were Christians, mourned 9. moneths onely. Heere we are to know, that if a Christian man or woman, in those parts, wearing mourning, came to agree againe in a second marriage, during the yeare appointed for mourning, the Matrimony was stayed; but thence-forward, hee nor shee were bound to weare any more mourning.

Mourning vsed amongest the christians

Mourning of the Latine Christians.

The people of the Greeke Church, mourned a whole yeare, like to them of the Latine and Romaine, and neuer made any motion of a second marriage, during the limited yeares space: but did much more, for euerie day of that yeare, at a certaine appointed houre, all the people of the house, vsed lamentations, and very greeuous cries, for the party deceased. But at the renewing of the year, they left off their mourning habits, and Funerall sorrowings. In the times of Terence and Plautus, Commicall Poets, the like was practised.

The mourning of the Greek church.

Terence and Plautus.

They that inhabit the great Isle of Iapparia, and (wel-neere) thorow al the Prouinces, which are called Malabria, after that the dead mans bodie is publickelie throwne into a fire, and one of his liuing wiues therewith, the neareſt in Kindred to the deceased party, weareth a garment of Violet colour, and neuer putteth it off for a whole yeares space, eating also but one meale a day during that yeare.

The Mourning of the Malabrians & Iapparians.

They that are of the Mahometan Religion dwelling in the lesser Asia, Europe, and Affrica, do mourne no longer for any man or woman deceased, but onelie eight dayes; & that it is the limited time for mourning. Their Garments are of coorse wollen cloath, gray of colour (called among them, Chenine or Felte) and whereof couerings are made for horses. But such as will not weare them of this fashion, do carry a white Linnen Cloath, hanging down from the Turbant so low as the Girdle, and so go on with Teares and cries to the graue.

Postel. in lib. 2. De Repub. E.

The mourning of the Turkes.

If the deceased Turk be a man of qualitie, and had Dogges and Horses, before he bee brought foorth of his dwelling to buriall, they rub their noses with some sharpe graine or hearbe, to vrge teares out of their eyes, that they may appeare to mourne for their deceased Maister, & they are made to follow the bodye to the Graue, which commonly is without the Cittie, and so they continue on the mourning for eight dayes. Al which notwithstanding once euery day (during this short time of sorrow, at a certaine limited hour in the day time, all the Kindred and friends do meet at the graue, to pray to God for the dead mans soule. The eight dayes being ouer-passed, all mourning is laide aside, and then they make a Feast: which beeing likewise ended, the suruiuer may then seeke after a seconde match.

Beasts made apt to mourn for the dead.

The Turkes vse praier for the dead, and Feasting.

Some do Write, that the Parents or Kindred of the dead, during the space of a whole yeare, do giue order to certaine men, called Saintons, to read euery daie in the Alcheran ouer the Graue, for the saluation of the deceased parties soule. In like maner, that some women very much deuoted to the Mahometan Religion, do leaue diuers Legacies, to such as vse the wars, during the space of a year after their husbands death, to bring them home the heades of Christians, to offer vpon their graues. And commonly, they allow a * Sultain of Gold, to bee giuen for euerie head: but he must produce good witnes and testimony, and it must bee soundly verified, that it is a Christians head. Most vsualy they do but bring the skin or form of the face, but sildome the whole head. And this is the mourning of the Turkes.

Of certaine Turkish Women, cruelly superstitious.

*A Turkish Coin of gold, valewing 7.s. 6.d. Sterling.

It was my chance to find another mourning, of much longer continuance, then those formerly recited; which is vsed in a great Prouince named Cormes, subiect to the Persian, and professing the Mahometan Religion. This Prouince lyeth in so hot a country, that the inhabitants are wholy black. Neuertheless, the Lande is rich, abounding in Horses, gold, Siluer, and Precious stones, of inestimable value for many rare and beautifull embellishings. Notwithstanding, the aire is meruailous

Mar. Paulus in lib. 1 cap. 23.

lous vnhealthfull for Straungers, and therefore (very often) it causeth their death. The Vice-Roy of the place, knoweth well enough how to appropriate to himselfe (by way of Eschetage) what goods soeuer doe belong to strangers, being no Natiues of the Counery. And therfore when any one there dyeth, the wife of the dead man doth weare mourning the space of foure yeares, and neuer marrieth againe during that time. But all that long and irksom limitation, she hath certaine sequestred houres daily, to kneel in her Chamber, accompanied with some of her necrest kinred & friends; to make moanes, lamentations, and funerall complaints, for the losse of her deceased Husband. As concerning the Men of this Country, and so of Turky; I cannot giue ye any assurance, of their mourning for the death of their Wiues: because their King despenseth with them, for the marrying of manie wiues. But the women of this Prouince of Cormos, are much to be commended for their chastity, beyond many of them remaining among vs, who rarely will tarry a yeares space of mourning.

The women of Cormos doe mourne for their husbads death, the space of foure yeares.

CHAP. XII.

¶ Of diuers Paganes, that tooke the matter very offensiuely, and a great dishonour to themselues; that any one should misprise, or contemne their Religion.

Pausanias reporteth, that neere the Citty of * Mantinea in Arcadia, there was a Temple consecrated to Neptune, the enterance whereof was interdicted to men: and yet notwithstanding, it had no other guard or defence, but certaine little woollen cords, placed before the Gate, which caused such dreadfull fears, as the place thereby was accounted very reuerent. It chanced, that Æpythes, Son to Hippotes, King of Arcadia, a man slenderly affected to Religion, without any reuerence or respect, did cut the saide cords, and as he would haue entred into the Temple: the Waters of the Sea gushed foorth aboundantly vpon him, and wholy blinded him, so that hauing lost his eyes in this manner, he presently died. The auncient fame and report was, that the Waters were noted and obserued to rest in that Temple: And it was reputed to bee the greater Miracle, because the Sea was three miles, or thereabout, distant from that place.

Paus. in lib. to * A Citty of Arcadia, some times also called Antigonia.

Æpythes, Son to Hippotes, King of Arcadia.

In the Citty of Cabiria in Beotia, within a mile of Thebes, there stood a Temple dedicated to Ceres, and entrance thereinto was granted to none; but only the Cabirians. It so fell out, that Mardonius, one of the Captaines to Xerxes, entring thereinto with his Souldiours, to rob and bereaue it of the Treasures: both he & all the rest of his Army, were (in an instant) surprized with such a sudden fury, that casting themselues down headlong into very deep ditches, and from the tops of Rocks and Mountains, they all dyed most miserably. The like happened to the Souldiers of great Alexander, who hauing taken Thebes by power, they would likewise enter into the said temple: but being smitten with lightning from heauen, they ended their liues cruelly, which prooued a mightie terror to the Nation of that age. Phlegyas, King of the Orchomenians, or (according to Virgil) of the * Lapithes, hauing done infinite dammages in Greece, surprizing many Townes and Cities: became (in the end) so ouer-weening & foolish-bold, that he sacked the Temple of Apollo in Delphos, and slew Philamon, who brought a power of people to rescue the Temple. But it came to passe, that within no long while after, all the Counttey of the Phlegyans was vtterlie ruinated, by a violent earthquake, and flaming Arrowes shot from Heauen, which killed most of the people, & they few that remained, died of the plague. Vpon which sacriledge, and contempt of the Gods, Virgil saith, that their king Phlegyas is grieuously punished in Hell.

Paus. in Lib. 9. A Temple in Beotia dedicated to Ceres.

Another accidene concerning the same Temple.

* A people dwelling in a part of Thessalie.

Philamon a cunning Harper, Sonne to Apollo.

——Phlegyas miserimus omnes
Admonet, & magna testatur voce per umbras,
Discite iustitiam moniti, et non temnere Diuos.

Virg. in Lib. 6. de Aenid.

Which Verses were thus translated by Masures:

——Phlegyas in that place,
Forewarneth all, of his great misery,
And as sad witnesse of such wretched case,
In those dim shades he cryes out wofully:
Learne to do Iustice: And by my contempt
Of the high Gods, do you like fate preuent.

* Betweene the two Riuers, Sybaris and Crathis.

The Sybarites, people of a * citty in great Greece, (so called, by reason of a Riuer which passeth there along, named Sybaris) being desirous to vnderstand the future felicity of themselues and their Citty: sent to consult with the Oracle of Delphos, to be resolued in the matter. Whereto Apollo in his * Pytheum, gaue them this answer. Your Land shall run to perdition, & your felicity shal haue end; when you begin to make more account of men, then of the Goddes. The Ambassadors hauing heard this answere, made report thereof to the Sybarites: who tooke good courage to them, perswading themselues assuredlie, that such disaster should neuer happen to them, and therefore their felicity would be eternall. But within some pretty while after, it happened, that a Maister beating his Slaue neere to the Temple: the Slaue fled from him, & knowing that the temple affoorded refuge, ran thereinto, and mounting vp to the Altar, embraced the Image. His Lord pursued him, & hauing forcibly recouered him from the Statue, without any reuerence of the place, began againe to giue him many Bastonadoes. The seruant fled frō him once more, ran to saue himselfe at the Tombe of his Lords deceased Father: but then, in meer paternall duty, hee left punnishing any more, and pardoned the fault which hee had committed. All this being noted by Amiris, one of them that had bin Ambassador to Delphos: he cald to remembrance the former words of the Oracle, and declared to some other of his Friends, that the time for accomplishment of Apolloes answere; was euen now come. But they giuing no credit to his words; imagined that hee was become foolish. Which when he perceiued, he took hold of their supposition, and (soone after) counterfeited as if he were growne somwhat distracted in his sences. So that, making publike sale of all his goods, and getting a large summe of Mony together: he departed suddenly thence, & went to dwell in Morea, expecting continually the fate of his Country. It fortuned, that within no long time after, the Cittie of the Sybarites (by what accident I know not) was raced, rent, and torne, and vtterly made a heap of stones.

* The place where Apollo made answer.

The Historie of a slaue beaten by his Lord and Maister.

That which could not be gained in reuerence of the Gods, was for a Fathers sake won.

Amyris makes open sale of all his goods, fearing what was to follow.

King Cambyses his vnhallowed intent against the Cambyses, the Son of Cyrus, sent fiftie thousand men to destroy the Temple of Iupiter Hammon: but by a sudden furious tempest, they were al quite ouerwhelmed with heaps of sand, before they could get thither, and so perished most wretchedly, without executing their pernitious desseigne. All they which were with Quintus Cepio, at the robbery of the Gold out of the Temples of Tholouse in France, to the quantity of one hundred & ten thousand markes of Gold, and 500. Millions of markes in Siluer: dyed euery Man of them (with all their kinred and Families) within that yeares compasse, and not aboue one of them, did carry so much as one piece therof home to his own house. Strabo hath left it written, that this Treasure of Tholouse, was a part of the Delphian riches. For Brennus, Captaine of the Gauls, being assisted by the * Tectosages, had ransacked Delphos: according as we find it recorded by Iustine the Historian. As then these Tectosages made their retreat to Tholouse, which was their auncient Country: the plague began to assaile them, and neuer ceased, vntill such time, (as answere came from the Diuines) that they had drowned al the Gold and Siluer (gotten by sacriledge) in the bottome of the Thoulouzan Lake. Out of which place it was (long time after) won and gotten, by Q. Cepio & his followers, who carried it thence to their owne deare detriment. The Romains hauing surprized Carthage, certaine of them despoyled the Statue of Apollo, of a costly robe of Gold worne about him: but the hands of him that cōmitted this sacriledge, wer fouud cut off, and fastned to the same garment. And Brennus, captain of the forenamed Gauls, entred forcibly into the Temple of Apollo at Delphos: and hauing committed it to publike spoile, was so furiously possessed, that he slue himselfe with his own hands.

Temple of Iupiter Hammon.

Aul. Gel. in lib. 3. Cap. 9.

Strabo in lib. 4.

People of the west part of Narbon, towards the Pyrene Mountaines. Iust. in Lib. 32.

The Romaines at their surprizal of Carthage.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Seiane Horse. And of the admirable Statue of a Horse, erected in Altina, a Citty in the Country of Olympia.

Caius Bassus, in his Comentaries, and Iulius Modestinus, in his second Booke of confused Questions (agreeing with that which Aulus Gellius reporteth in his Attick nights) do relate a memorable History, concerning the Seiane horse, & in this maner. In the Prouince of Argos, there Caius Bassus in Comment. lib 3 Cap. 10. Iul. Modest. in Quest. lib. 2. Cap. 1. Aul. Gellius in Noct. Attic.

there was a horſe bred, reported to be of the race of thoſe Horſes, belonging vnto Diomedes the Thracian, which horſe Hercules brought with him into Greece, after he had ſlain the ſaid Diomedes. This horſe was of a Bay colour, and of vnuſual greatneſſe; his Maine yellowiſh and long; his Noſthrils very wide and open; his eyes great; his legges well formed; his breaſt goodly, and his taile long: in briefe, hee was perfectly faire, well limbd, ſtout, and full of courage for the wars. In the time of his beeing but a Colte, great rumour ran abroad of him, in Aſia, Iudea, Thebes, Pentapolis, and all ouer Greece, procuring very many (from all theſe parts, and many more beſide) to trauaile to ſee him; others to buy him; and diuers to draw his figure or proportion. But this goodly Beaſt had ſuch an vnfortunate deſtinie, that whoſoeuer was his Maiſter; muſt needes periſh, with his Familier, Houſe, and Goods whatſoeuer. For proofe wherof, ſuch as bought him, and mounted on his backe (which were fiue worthy Knights) dyed all both miſerably and infamouſly. The firſt that bought and backt him, beeing then little aboue two yeares old: was Cneus Seianus, a Romaine Conſull, and of great birth, as alſo verie verie wiſe in gouerning the Commonwealth, who being to returne out of Perſia to Rome, followed the faction of Octauius Auguſtus; in regard whereof, ſixe moneths after hee had bought the ſaide Horſe, Marke Anthonie cauſed his head to be ſmitten off in Greece, and commanded that his body ſhould remaine without any buriall. Now, becauſe that Cneus Seianus was the firſt Buier and Maiſter of this Horſe, and alſo had (by his death) firſt experimented his fatall fortune: hee was therefore called the Seiane Horſe.

Great affection to a Horſe that had ſo fatall a deſteny.

Cneus Seianus, firſt bought the Horſe.

Afterward, a Romaine, named Cornelius Dolabella, Conſull alſo: bought this horſe at an hundred thouſand Seſtertiaes, which amounted to the value of two thouſand Duckets. But if hee had knowne, that hee bought misfortune at ſo deare a rate: he neuer would haue accepted him in giſt: For within leſſe then a yeares ſpace after hee had him, the vnfortunate Dolabella was maſſacred in Syria, in a mutiny of people that roſe againſt him, and being thus ſlaine, his body (in meere deſpight) was dragd along the ſtreets. Dolabella being thus dead, Caius Caſſius, who had great commaund in Rome, performrd many warlike exploits in Aſia, and had beſiedged and ouercom Dolabella in that ſedition: took the horſe for his owne imployment; but hee had not kept him any long while, till his troups being vanquiſhed, and his Armie quite broken, himſelfe dyed very miſerable.

Cornelius Dolabella the Conſull, ſecond Maiſter of the Horſe.

aius Caſſius, third Maiſter of the Horſe.

Thus writeth Aulus Gellius, howbeit, I haue elſe-where read, that at a Dinner, both Hee, his Wife and Children, were poyſoned, and all them dyed within an houre after. Vpon the death of Caſſius, this vnhappy and diſaſtrous Horſe happened into the power of great Marke Anthony, who found him ſo faire, and well fitting his owne minde, that hee gaue in recompence to the bringer of the horſe, as much as hee would haue giuen him if he had bought him. Marke Anthonie was vanquiſhed by Auguſtus Cæſar, in a battaile on the Sea neere to Actium, and ſauing himſelfe by flight into Alexandria, (where likewiſe he was engirt, with ſharp beſiedging;) hee ſtabd his owne Sword into his belly, and ſo periſhed by a violent and contemptible death. When Marke Anthony was thus dead, a Knight of Aſia, named Nigidius, bought the Horſe, at a reaſonable price, becauſe now hee grew to waxe olde: but his ſucceſſe proued as deare and fatall, as any of the former owners, and much more notorious. For within the years time of buying this Horſe, as he rode with him ouer the Riuer * Marathon: the Horſe ſtumbling in the Water, could by meanes recouer himſelfe, but there, both Maiſter and Horſe were drowned, and neuer after any tydings heard of them. This Hiſtorie made way to the ancient and well known Prouerb, to wit; He had the Seiane Horſe, which continuallie was ſpoken of him, that came to any miſerable and vnfortunate end. As the like was otherwiſe vttered, He met with the Gold of Tholouſe, for the reaſons remembred in the precedent Chapter.

Mark Anthany the fourth Maiſter of the Horſe.

* A Towne & Promontory of Epire, where Aug ſtus, after he had foiled M. Anthony and Cleopatra, built the Citty of Nicopolis.

Belonging to a Towne ſo named, tenne miles diſtant from Athens.

Eraſmus Chilia. 1. Cent. Lib. 10.

A very admirable matter is likewiſe remembred, of the Statue of the Horſe of Phormius, erected in Altina, a Citty of Olympia in Elis. There ſtood a horſe of Braſſe, without any taile; yet appearing very goodly, and forged by the hands of Dioniſius the Argiue, in honor of Phormius the Arcadian, as was plainely giuen to be vnderſtood, by certaine Carracters or Letters engrauen on his ſide. And the Eliens were verily perſwaded, and held it for infallible, that Stallions and Mares ſhould both beget and bring foorth the goodlier Beaſtes, if the act were performed before this Statue. And whether it conſiſted in ſome matter of enchantmēt, or any other vnknowne myſtery, I know not; but if a man rode on any Stallion by this Statue: his rider could not be able to ſit him, but he would breake al his Furniture, Bridle, Raines, Girts, &c. of what ſtrength ſoeuer, and neuer ceaſe till hee were at liberty, offering then to couer the Statue, as if it had bin a liuing Mare. And this was not don in the Spring time only, whē theſe beaſts are ſaid to be moſt thereto inclinable; but euen at other times likewiſe, contrary to the naturall cuſtome of Horſes. And he could not be had thence, but by violent ſtrokes, and great compulſion.

The Statue of Phormius his Horſe.

A ſtrange perſwaſion of the Eliens.

This is recorded by diuers good Authors for a truth.

CHAP. XIIII.

Of Lais, the famous Courtezane of Greece; And the Epitaph engrauen vpon hir Tomb.

Lais in her tender youth, taken & ſold among ſlaues

Lais the onely famous Courtezane in all Greece, and reputed as an honour to the Corinthians.

LAis was borne in a Towne of Sicily, named Hiccara, and being a young Girle, when Nicias, Duke and Captaine of the Athenians, ſurprized both Catania & Hiccara: ſhe was alſo taken by ſome of the Souldiers, and brought to Corinthe, where ſhe was ſold among diuers other Slaues, in the open Market. Being afterward enfranchiſed and ſet at liberty: ouer-much licence, want of reſpect and correction (being abſent from her Parents and Friendes, whoſe care ſhould haue extended, for her good education in honeſt and ciuill manners) was the onely cauſe of making a booty of her honor, to him that wold giue the moſt for it. So that, through wanton carriage in men, as forward as ſhee to all looſeneſſe: ſhe won the fame and reputation, of the moſt queint and witty Courtezane (of her time) in all Greece. Wherupon, the Corinthians did eſteem her as a great glory to them, and held themſelues to be not a little honoured by her, inſomucht, that they ſtiled her to be a natiue of their Country, and left it recorded in their Bookes and writings. Some ſay, that ſhee remained a great while in the Camp of King Pyrrhus, and went along with him into Italy: from whence returning againe to Corinthe, there ſhe made her retirement altogether. This amourous woman, was endued with ſuch exquiſite beauty, that the chiefeſt Painters (according as Athenæus reporteth) came expreſly to Corinth to ſee her, to draw her Picture, & beare thence the true figure of her face, breaſts, & whole body. She was of ſuch entiſing nature, that men of the greateſt wealth, would giue a knocke at her doore; yea, many Kings, Princes, and great Lords cam, not only from Europe, but from Affrica likewiſe, to ſerue, court and require her fauour. In briefe, ſhee was generally affected, highly eſteemed, and enflamed all Greece, to woe & win her. For either in ſpeaking, ſinging, dauncing, or what elſe, ſhe could performe it with ſo abſolute a grace: that ſhe meerly rauiſhed the harts of all men to behold her, and hardly could they refraine to be out of her company, ſuch a commanding power had her beautie ouer them. Notwithſtanding, ſhe would neuer yeild her ſelfe to one Man; albeit Ariſtippus, Demoſthenes, and Diogenes, were extraordinarily enamoured of hir. True it is, that Ariſtippus made his vant, that he had Lais alone in his owne priuate poſſeſſion; whereas others did deſire that they could haue the like fauor. Demoſthenes came once from Athens to Corinthe, in a diſguiſed habit, to ſee Lais, and enioy her if he could. But before ſhe would open the doore to him, ſhee bad him firſt ſend her 10000. Drachmaes (which valued 1000. Crownes, but elſe wher I haue read 8000.) for one nights lodging with her: he was ſo amazed at the demaund, that preuailing ouer the heat of his affections, hee went away, ſaying out aloud; I will neuer buy repentance at ſo deare a price. Aulus Gellius recordeth it in this manner. οὐκ ὠνοῦμαι, μυρίων δραχμῶν μετὰ μέλανος. That is to ſay: I will not buy repentance with a thouſand Drachmaes. This hee ſpake (as I thinke) according to the ſaying of Diogenes, to wit: That euery Creature is ſad after the Veneriall Act.

Athenæus a worthy Philoſopher of Cilicia in Auguſtus time.

From far and neere they came to Corinth to ſee Lais.

Lactan. in Lib. 3. Cap. 14.

Aul. Gel. in lib. 1. Cap. 14. Macrob. in Sat. Lib. 2. Cap. 2.

I haue read that the Drachmae was a piece of Mony valuing three ſhilings ſixe pence.

One

The Answere of Lais concerning the Philosophers of Athens.

One day, in the presence of Lais, there was one that verie highly commended the Philosophers of Athens to be excellent Wisemen, lerned & honest. Wherto Lais answered thus: I knowe not what great Learning is in your Philosophers, much lesse what they studie, or what Bookes they read: considering, that I who am a woman, and neuer was in Athens, do beholde them to come hither: & being Philosophers I can make them to bee Louers. And yet notwithstanding, they cannot make anie of my other fauourites, Philosophers.

Aristippus the Philosopher, borne in *Syrenaica, of whom, I haue formerlie made mention, did yearely continue for the space of two moneths, in the time of the Neptuanales (Feasts Dedicated vnto Neptune) with Lais in Egypt. And beeing reprooued by a familiar frend of his, becausse he spent so much money vppon that woman, who would neuertheless entertaine Diogenes without anie salarie, returned this answere. I giue bountifullie to Lais, because I would haue my fill of content with her; and yet not to hinder anie other from enioying her. Diogenes on a time said vnto him: Aristippus, thou thinkest that thou hast thy pleasure alone with Lais, and yet she is a common Whore: Either lead thy life like a Cynick, as I do, or else leaue hir I would aduise thee. Aristippus presentlie replied. Diogenes, Doost thou deeme it inconuenient, to liue in an house vvhere one hath dwelt before thee? Or to venter in the same ship, where many others haue formerly successefully sailed? Compare my case then on the contrarie, that feare not to affect the Woman, where many fauourites haue beene accepted before me.

*Syrenaica, a Countrie in Affrica, called also Pentapolitana, of the fiue Cities Beronice, Arsinoe, Ptolomais, Apollonia, and Cyrena. Athen. in li. 13 Cap. 20.

Discourse betweene Aristippus & Diogenes, concerning Lais.

If Lais knew in hir youthful time, how to make sale of her kind entertainment to her Louers, and at so deare a rate, as beuty was sildom bought at the like cost: we must needs conceit, that when more mature and riper yeares came vpon her, she could much better skill of making hir Market, being so well plied with bountifull Pay-maisters. Moreouer, when her gallant flouring daies were passed ouer, that her faire complexion began to faile, and furrowed wrinckles appeared in her face: she flew not then so lostie a pitch, but was content to welcome both young and olde, rich and poore, faire and deformed, lusty bloods, and cooler spirits; and to be briefe, all goers and commers indifferently, without exception, and at how meane a price soeuer. As Iphicrates painted her forth, in liuely colours, by those Verses which Athenæus wrote of her, the substance whereof, are to this effect. Lais is a very slothful drunken Woman, doing nothing but eate and drink all the day long. I thinke she hath experimented the behauiour and custome of Eagles, vvho when they are young, do seize on Sheepe & Hares on the highest Mountaines, lifting them aloft by the gripes of their Talents, but when olde age stealeth on them, then they leaue that bigger prey, and flie at none but young and smallest Birds. Euen so, Lais beeing yong and gallant, had great sums of Money giuen for enioying her fauours; but when many yeares came on her, and blemished the beauty of her former cariage, she wold go then whither any man pleased, the Carolus or the Sous, serued insted of a Crowne of former offers, and old or yong was not to be reiected.

*Athen in li. 13. Cap. 20.

*Woorth an English penny, but valewing ten pence Tour.

Authors do not agree, concerning the place where Lais died; some say, it was at Corinth, she being aged 72. yeares, and that the Corinthians made her a magnificent Tomb without the Citie where she dwelled (for they did not allowe anie Whores or Harlots to abide within the City, neither vsed they to bury their dead within their wals) and that on the top of hir Sepulcher stood a carued Lionesse in Brasse, holding a male Goat betweene her former feete. Some others, do holde it assuredly, that hir death happened in Thessaly, whether she had followed one, named Hippostrates, whom Athenæus calleth Pausanius, and Plutarch Hippolochus the Thessalian. She doating in affection towards him, forsooke the Mount of Acro-Corinthus (continually bedewed with fresh springs & waters) & escaped secretly without the knowledge of anie of her louers, into the field of Alexander, where other women, being both ielious and enuious of her fame, forcibly drew her into the Temple of Venus, and there stoned hir to death with stones. Athenæus saith, with seats and stooles: for which cause, it was after called the Temple of Venus the Murdresse: otherwise tearmed ἀσεβείας ἀκαρεσίτιος. Of Impious Venus. Her Tombe was found in Thessaly, neere to the Riuer Peneus, whereon was made an Vrne of stone, and thereon was engrauen certain Greeke Verses, which were translated thus in Latine.

Variance amongauthors about the death of Lais.

*Athenæus vbi sup. Pausanias in Lib. 2.

*A high Hill in Morea.

Lais was skilful in making vse of hir vain time, yet stooped to al prices in her elder dayes.

Lais beaten to death with stones.

A Riuer running between Ossa and Olympus.

Roboris inuicti animi ſit Græcia quamuis,
Victa tamen formæ paruit illa ſuæ.
Laidis ipſe parens amor eſt, aluitq́, corinthus
Ac nunc ipſa tenet inclita Theſſalia.

By the Author thus turned into French.

Bien que la Greece ſoit d'inuincible courage,
Vaincue toutesfois a cede au viſage
De ſa chere Lais, belle comme la iour,
Braue et Pimpante en tout, fille du Dieu Amour:
Aux meilleurs de ſes ams Corinthe la nourrie,
Et ores ſes os ſont gardez en Theſſalie.

And thus by the Tranſlater into Engliſh.

Though Greece was of vnconquerable might,
Yet ne'rtheleſſe it yeelded, and gaue way
To the faire lookes of Lais, bright as the day:
Heate in all forme, the Loue-Gods deare delight.
Corinth gaue breeding to her better daies,
But Theſſaly keepes both her Bones and praiſe.

CHAP. XV.

Of Androchia and Alcida, who were Siſters. Alſo of Macharia, Daughter to Hercules: Which Ladies, for the ſafety of their Countries, ſlew themſelues.

Soph. in Antig. Pomp.

Ophocles maketh mention, in one of his Tragedies, that at Thebes, in the temple of Diana Eulia, were buried two Virgines; daughters to Antipenus the Thebane Cittizen; the one, beeing named Androchia, and the other Alcida.

*A Tyraunt whome Hercules draue out of the City Orchomeni.

It happened that * Erginus, King of the Orchomenians, hauing beſiedged the Cittie of Thebes, with full determination to ruinate it, in reuenge of the death of his Father Climon: the Thebanes conſulted with the Oracle, concerning theyr fortune in this extreamity. Afterward, when the two fore-named young virgins had vnderſtood from the Oracle, that if two ſuch Virgines were to bee found (of Noble Family) and would bee ſo courageous as to kill themſelues: they ſhoulde thereby be the cauſe of their Citties freedome, and ouerthrowe of the Enemie. Theſe two young Ladies, deſiring to be that happie paire of Virgins, and preferring their Countryes deliuerance before their owne liues: killed themſelues preſently, and the enemy returned aſhamed and foiled; whereby both honor and victorie remained to the Thebanes, to the eternall praiſe & memories of thoſe two worthy Virgins.

The rare reſolution of two famous Virgins.

Hercules eſcaping the power of * Euriſtheus, went into Thrace, where hee remained til the time of his deth. He being dead, Euriſtheus demanded his Children of Seix, Lord and commander of Thrace, who fearing their liues loſſe, ſent them to Theſeus at Athens, to whoſe eſpeciall care and truſt hee re-commended them. When Euriſtheus had intelligence ther-of, he proclaimed war againſt the Athenians: who as well for their owne ſafetie, as the Children of Hercules, determined conſtant reſiſtance againſt Ceix. But conſulting with the Oracle, which ſide ſhold be the Conquerour in this doubtfull triall, the Oracle gaue anſwere, that they ſhould haue the dayes victory, prouided, that one of Hercules his Children, muſt firſt die. This was no ſooner heard by Macharia, Daughter to Hercules: but inſtantly ſhe ſlew her ſelfe, and the Athenians were the Conquerors. Thus you may ſee, how the Deuill could get himſelf ſacrifices, and make humain creatures prodigall of their liues to him, in thoſe darke dayes of ignoraunce, when almoſt the whole world beleeued thoſe deluding Oracles: wherein, for any one truth, infinite Lies, Riddles, and Ambages, were deliuered vnto the poore ouer-credulous people.

*The King of Greece, the Theame of Iunos reuẽge on Hercules.

Macharia daughter to Hercules ſlew her ſelfe, for the Athenians deliuerance.

CHAP. XVI.

From whence came at firſt, our Orange and Cedar Trees. And how the Cedar is verie good and ſouerayne, againſt the poyſon of Serpents.

Oranges, Citrons, & Cedars offered to the Gods.

Ranges, Citrons, and Cedars, were neuer in ancient times known to be good to eat: but onely they were giuen as Offeringes vnto the Gods, and eſteemed moſt eſpeciallie for their beauty and ſight; & being ſhut vp in cheſts chests or coffers, to yeild a pleasing sauor to Cloathes and Garments, as also to preserue them from Mothes & worms. Then, in regard that they first came out of Persia and Media: men vsed to call them Persian Apples, and Median Apples; Howbeit, Iuba, in his Histories, tearmes them Apples of Gold, or Apples of the Hesperides. In no long while after, men began to eate of the Cædar, and thereupon appeared, that a meruailous vertue was found therein, against the venome and poyson of Serpents & Aspicks. To approue the truth therof, we finde it credibly recorded, that two men, being condemned to death in Ægypt, their sentence was; that they should be exposed to Serpents, to bee deuoured by them, which kind of death had beene vsed among them from olde Antiquitie. The day being come wheron they should dye, one of them was (accidentally) visited by a friend of his in the Prison, who was champing and chewing a piece of Cedar in his mouth, and bestowed some little part thereof on the condemned Prisoner, which hee accepted very thankfully, and byting thereon, gaue some also to his deathes companion, in meere simplicity, and without knowledge of any secret vertue therein.

Iuba, in his Histories.

The Historie of two men condemned to death in Egypt.

They being brought to the place of death, and thrust out to the greedy Serpents; they would by no meanes come neere them, or touch them, but auoyded so farre as possibly they could from them. The Officers of Iustice beeing there present, began to examine, what might be the reason of this sildome seene wonder: whereupon they found, that the Cedar (eaten by both the Prisoners) was the onely cause. But in regard they intended a more ample proof thereof, on the next day following, they caused one of the condemned Men to eate of the Cedar againe, but gaue to the other his accustomed food, and bringing them both to the place of execution: all the people beheld, that the Serpent ran fiercely on him that was fasting from Cedar, tearing and renting him in infinite morsels; but left the other againe without any touch, who died also the day following by the same Serpents, according as his fellow had done before him.

Deuouring Serpents refused to touch poor condemned men, only because they had eaten Cedar.

CHAP. XVII.

How hurtfull a thing it is to endure fasting or hunger: And what the reason is, that aged people are more capable thereof, the youthfull bodies, yet without any preiudice. Also, whence it proceedeth, and vpon what occasion, that fasting is hurtfull to cholericke persons, and profitable to the Phlegmaticke.

PHisitions doe hold opinion, that two principall inconueniences doe ensue by Hunger and Fasting: the one is, þ the naturall heate is therby consumed; and the other, that the humiditie of the stomack is thereby weakened. The body that is most offended by these two harms, endureth hunger with exceeding great difficulty: but whereas these annoyances do cause no oppression, it is suffered with the greater ease. The Infant then that encreaseth, hath his naturall heat in sufficient strength, and radicall moysture verie subtile: which resolueth it selfe much more by equall proportion, in not enduring hunger then, then it can doe in any other degree of age.

Two inconueniences caused by hunger

Of naturall heat in Infants, and radicall moysture.

Moreouer the sensitiue vertue is then forcibly mooued, whereby it suffereth hunger with much passion and damage, which causeth both heat & the naturall Spirit to diminish mightily, & keeping nourishment then from him: is the maine hinderance to his growth and encreasing. By which occasion we may perceiue, that an Infant or young child is more iniured by hunger, then all persons else in any other age.

The hinderance of an Infants growing.

The young man, that hath attained to his intire and perfect encreasing, although his naturall heate bee as strong as that of the Infant: yet notwithstanding, he hath his naturall humiditie more grosse, and therefore it cannot so soone dissolue, as that in the Childe. In which respect, hunger doth no way so much offend a Man of middle age, as a young younger Child or Infant. For it is vniuerſally obſerued, that in Adoleſcency, Youth-hood, or when a man is neereſt to his original: with ſo much the more paine and difficultie hee endureth hunger, becauſe his naturall moyſture is more ſubtile and reſolueable.

Of the young man in his full state of encreasing.

Of the Aged or old man, in his declining eſtate.

The old, or aged man, hath his naturall heat much abaſed or deiected, and his humidity greatly thickned or cloſed together, which cannot ſo eaſily reſolue it ſelfe. The ſenſitiue vertue alſo is highly decayed in him, and ſenteth nothing ſo perfectly, as when hee was an Infant, a Youth, or in his ſtrength and beſt of yeares. And therefore, hee endureth not ſo much paine and dammage then, as in the precedent conditions. But he who is the decrepite, or very old man, although he haue his naturall moiſture much more groſſe, his heate very feeble, and his ſenſible vertue farre more imperfect, then is in all the other Ages, as being Neighbour and neere to his extinction: yet for all that, how little ſoeuer he ſuffereth the accident or diſcommoditie of hunger; it endangereth the quite-quenching of his naturall heat, whereon immediatlie he dyeth. And therefore it is very needfull, that food ſhould be as often giuen to the decrepite man, as to the young Infant, but yet diuerſly. For the Infant muſt haue enough at euery time giuen him, and but litle to the decrepite man: becauſe, if he ſhould receiue ouer much, it would ſuffocate the ſmall quantity of heate remaining in him; as we ſee by a ſlender flame, when too much Oyle is put into the Lamp.

Of Decripite or the loweſt age of all.

The decripite old muſt be as often fed as a child, but in another kind.

How hunger is cauſed in man, and in al creatures els.

Hunger is cauſed in vs, and all other Creatures elſe, by reaſon that naturall heate continually conſumeth, and dryeth the humiditie of our members, which being conſumed, conſumeth likewiſe the moyſture of the veines, and their conſumption cauſeth attraction from the Liuer, and the Liuer from the ſtomacke. Theſe humours thus conſumed, the Soueraigne Creator hath ordained in vs, that the Spleene or Milt ſhould conuay the Melancholly humor to the ſtomack, which being eager and corroſiue, conſumeth likewiſe the ſubſtantiall humiditie in the ſtomacke it ſelfe, and ſo inciteth a deſire of foode, from whence enſueth the occaſion of Hunger. Which is very hurtfull to Chollericke bodies, becauſe whenſoeuer they ſuffer hunger, their choller deſcendeth into the ſtomacke, and wil not let them eate; but are poſſeſſed with fumes and vapours while choller ſo mounteth, which afterward (when they doe eate) corrupteth and putrifieth the meates receiued. But in Phlegmatique complexions, there is humidity enough in the ſtomacke, and in al the members. And therefore it is profitable for them to endure hunger; for by their ſufferance thereof, their bad and ill-affected humours are conſumed away by choller.

The Melancholly humor

The Chollerick humour.

The Phlegmaticke complexion.

CHAP. XVIII.

¶ That there is not any thing in the World, which is more hurtfull to man, or procureth him more loſſe and danger, then the Tongue: with many notable Examples to that effect.

Anacharſis the Philoſopher, being one daie conuerſing with his Schollers, concerning the tongue, ſpake thus vnto them. Not without great Art and Myſtery (ô my Schollers) did Nature beſtow on vs two Feete, two Legges, two Armes, two Hands, two Eyes, two Eares, and no more but one tongue. As ſignifying thereby, that eyther togue, ſee, or heare, are offices which we can doe as often as we pleaſe: but to ſpeake well, wiſelie, and modeſtly, is more then we can eaſily attaine vnto. He ſaid moreouer. For no other occaſion hath Nature left our face vncouered, our eyes, eares, hands, feete, and al the reſt of our body, except the tongue: which ſhe impaled with Iawes, and walled about with teeth, and afterward defenced it with lippes: but onely to let vs vnderſtand, that (in this preſent life) there is nothing that deſerueth a ſtronger guard, then the vnbrideled tongue. We haue no part belonging to our body, which Nature hath ſo ſurely Rampiard vp, as the tongue. Before it is placed a Bulwarke of teeth, to the end, that it ſhould be obedient

The ſpeech vſed by Anacharſis the Philoſopher to his Schollers concerning the tongue.

Nature left al our parts elſe vncouered, but the toong

The teeth ordained to punish the tong.

bedient to reason, which restraines it, (as with a strong bridle) within: but if it will not be kept backe, her intemperance may be iustly punnished, with a bloody gripe betweene the teeth.

Anacharsis at a Banket with Solon.

The same Philosopher banqueting one day with Solon, was esteemed to be wise, because being a-sleepe afterward, hee was noted by one or two: to hold his right hand on his mouth, and the left vpon his naturall partes of secrecie, as thereby declaring, that the tongue had neede of a much stronger Bridle, then the other partes of Nature. For the tongue containeth in it both good and euill; And Salomon saith: Both life and death is in the power of the Tongue.

Prou. 18.21.

If we vse the tongue well (saith Erasmus) it is as a Horne of plentie or aboundance: but if it want a Gouernour, there is nothing more offensiue.

Eras. in Enchir. Cap. 9.

The Philosopher Pittacus saide. The Tongue resembleth to the world, the forme of a Launces point, but is much more dangerous: for the Launce woundeth the Flesh onelie, but the Tongue striketh quite thorough the Heart.

Pittacus his comparison of the tongue

Affranius, another Philosopher, was one day demaunded, wherefore he spent the most part of his time, in walking among the Mountaines, hazzarding his life euerie houre, where so many wilde Beastes might suddenlie deuour him? Hee presentlie replyed. Beastes haue no other weapons but their teeth, where-with to teare me: but Men cease not daily to commit outrage with their members, and to defame with their malicious Tongues.

The answere of Affranius the Philosopher.

Plutarch, in his Booke of Banishment, declareth, that the Lydians had a Law among them, that such Men as had bad and wicked tongues: should be banished and confined for halfe a yeare, into some distant seperate place, without power of speaking to any one whatsoeuer. And many times it happened, that some of them chose rather three yeares slauery in the Gallies, then to be so bard of speaking for halfe a yeare.

Plutar. in Lib. Exil. cap. 4.

Demosthenes, a Man of great authoritie, and preualance in speaking; was much feared throughout all Greece, and therefore talked at his owne pleasure. In regard whereof, all the chiefe of the Athenians met together on a day, and at a meet appointed place, concluding to bestow a large recompence, and liberall Wages also on him beside. And calling him in among them, to let him vnderstand their bounty and beneuolence; one (in name of the rest) spake thus vnto him. Demosthenes, we doe not bestow this great guifte, either because thou hast spoken, or that thou shouldst speak: but onely to the end, that thou shouldst hold thy peace.

The manner how the Athenians recompenced Demosthenes.

Marke Anthony caused the Father of Eloquence to be slaine, vpon no other occasion: but because hee had spoken too aduantagiously on his behalfe. Which was manifestly declared by Fuluia, Wife to Marke Anthonie, when shee procured Ciceroes Tongue to bee puld out, for his false speaking, and pierced it thorough (in many places) with Needles. Salust, the Romaine Oratour, was verie odious vnto Strangers, and seuerely pursued by his owne Companions: because he neuer tooke Penne in his hand to Write, but it was against some especiall persons; neither would he open his mouth, but it was to deprane some others. The Lydians had an inuiolable Law, to punnish Detractors with death, but Homicides and Men-killers, they condemned them to labour in their Gallies. So that among those barbarous people, for one Man to deprane or defame another: it was reputed a far greater offence, then if he had slaine him.

Mark Anthony caused the death of Cicero.

Of Salust the Romain Orator.

The Lydians law against Detractours.

As King Darius sat one day at Dinner in his Tent, such as hee pleased to accept in companie at his owne Table, beganne to moone some Military Argument, concerning the warlike affaires of Alexander the Great. In which discourse, a Captaine, named Mygdonius, (one very highly fauoured of Darius) deliuered some reproachfull speeches of Alexander, whereupon Darius suddenlie saide. Hold thy Tongue Mygdonius, and know, that I brought thee not with mee to this Warre, to defame Alexander with thy Tongue; but onelie to conquer him in Armes, if thou canst. By which example, we may perceiue, how detestable and odious the Vice of Detraction is: because it is apparent, that euen Enemies themselues

An honorable mind in King Darius towards his enemy.

This Mygdonius is tearmed by some Magnas.

Ouer-much talke is a great blemish to Honor.

selues cannot endure, to heare disgracefull wordes of one another. Pytheus, Duke of Athens, was a very honorable Prince, full of courage and resolution: but yet so ouer-abounding in talke, that it greatly diminished the glorie of all his other atchieuements. A Philosopher beeing bidden to a sollemne Banquet, spake not one word while the feasting continued, which made euery one maruaile at his so long silence, and demanded, for what reason he was so sparing of speech? Whereto he returned this answere. It is much better to know the time when a Man should speake, then barely how to speak: For nature hath taught vs the one, but wisedome is the enstructer in the other.

Read Plutarc. in his little Tracte of too much talking. Of him that found the empty Bottle in the Temple of Iuno Chalcoecos.

No Man (at any time) repented himselfe for beeing silent, but many haue done it for too much talking, because one word hath sometimes beene the price of a mans life. Let him be a Witnesse, who interpreted the signification of the emptie Bottle, found in the Temple of Iuno Chalcoecos in Lacedemonia, after it was stolne thence: by ouer-lauish pratling, when no man demaunded any question of him, hee lost his life, with his owne consent. He could then haue wisht his wordes in his belly againe, but it was too late, and time past: for a word cannot be recouered againe, when it is out of the mouth, no more then a Bird, when she is let go at libertie: whereupon it was saide: That Words haue wingges. Sildome hath an vttered word returned any such seruice, as profit hath ensued by diuers neuer spoken: For wee may alwaies deliuer that wel, which is yet within vs, but neuer call that backe to mending, which is gone from vs.

Of Dpimenides the Painter of Rhodes, that trauailed into Asia.

Epimenides, a Painter, parting from Rhodes, trauailing into Asia, where hee continued many yeares togethet: but at length returned to Rhodes againe, yet no one in the Cittie could heare one word of him, concerning what he had done and seene in Asia. Whereat the Rhodians making no little maruaile, they entreated him, to acquaint them with some discourse of his long trauailes; whereupon, he gaue this answere. I was ten yeares on the Seas, to make me apt for parting from place to place: Other tenne yeares I tarryed in Asia, to better my skill in painting: And sixe yeares afterward I studied in Greece, onely to learne how to hold my peace. Your comming to me now, is, that I should vse wordes to ye, and tell ye newes. Come to me no more (kinde Countrey-men) to any such intent: For you may see Pictures in my House, if you please to buy them, but I haue no newes to feede your eares withall. In my poor opinion, he answered them like a verie wise man, for, by reporting matters of farre Countries, which are rare and diuers: people (of weake capacity) giue no credit to them; others, make a mockery, and most are doubtful of them.

Epimenides his answere to the men of Rhodes.

Reporters of tales & newes are sildome well credited.

Pythagoras being seriously questioned, what was the reason that hee kept so strict silence in his Academie (because in the space of two yeares, all Schollers that came to be enstructed there, might not speake one word, being thereto enioyned by his seuere commaund) returned this answere. In the Schooles of other Philosophers, they teach their Schollers to speake; but mine learne onely how to bee silent. And vndoubtedly, concerning the life of man, there is no higher or fairer Philosophy, that this World can affoord; then how to restraine the tongue, when it is most needfull.

CHAP. XIX.

What Feasts and Banquets were vsed in auncient times; And how Augustus prohibited in Rome, that any Man should inuite another to eate in his house.

AMong the Spartanes, there were certaine Banquets vsed, which they commonly tearmed Phiditia*, and therein they fed on Bread and Swines Flesh sodden in Water, without any thing else for their first seruice. For their last course, which those Auncients called, the second Table: they were serued with Oliues, Cheese, and Figges. And to close vp the feast, they had certaine baked cakes, made of fine Flower and Oyle, cut vpon Bay-leaues: without any Perfumes at their Tables, curious backt meates,

Common Suppers among the Lacedemonians kept in the open streetes.*

or

or choise sauces of sundry tastes, thinges in those dayes neuer heard or thought on, their Feasts & Banquets being much more modest then ours now are. In those elder dayes, thorough al the cities in Creete, on certaine dayes of the yeare; they were wont to make Banquets, common for who-soeur pleased to come to them. For maintenance whereof; euery Citizen gaue the tenth part of all his fruites, which were gathered duely at the Cities entrance, by some of the society thereto deputed. The care and charge of the whole Banquet: was referred to a worthy Lady, who had (vnder her) three or foure weomen of more inferiour degree, beside two seruants, that fed the Fire with wood. In the house appointed for the Feast, first of all were prepared two Tables for the Cittizens, and two other, onely for strangers. The assistants were all serued with equall allowance: but younger people had lesse flesh meates affoorded them, then the elder. At each Table there was appointed a Vessell full of Wine, well qualified with water, whereof they dranke in common, and after they had indifferently eaten, they had other wine brought them, of better qualitie then the first: whereof the grauer sort dranke so much as they pleased, but the younger: in more moderate manner.

Athenæus in Lib. 4. Cap. 5. Feasts in Creet free for all commers.

The manner and preparation of the Feasts.

The Noble Lady, who helde the supreame authority of the Feast, accompanied with some other Ladyes; brought the most delicious meates to them, that in times of warre or peace, had done any famous and remarkeable deede, as being those that best deserued honour. When this Dinner, or Supper (as it fell out to be) was ended, they would sit still, consulting first together on publique affaires and afterward on matters appertaining to the warres, with repetition of their names and seruices, that had best deserued of the Common-wealth; profited their Country; beene beneficiall to the Temples, and houshold Gods of euery Familie; and were dread-lesse of death in all good actions. These wanted not their due praise and commendation, to the end, that yong men hearing the memory of such vertuous persons, might adict them-selues to the like endeauours, and (finally) be pertakers of their glory. This beeing done, they arose from the Tables, and departed thence about their occasions.

The chiefe Lady and disposer of the Banquet.

Their Table talke, after Dinner or Supper.

A notable encouragement for youth full spirits.

The Lacedemonians, at their marriage Feasts, would permit no more but nine persons to dine together, which they did as in reuerence to the nine Muses. And this was conditioned also, that if any man talked at the Table, no wine should bee giuen him to drinke; so that if a man desired to drinke, hee must be sure to holde his peace. This law would serue to good purpose in these dayes, because both in our marriage Feasts and other Banquets, nothing is more vsually heard then noise, rumour and babling, and they are best esteemed, that can maintaine the longest pratling. The * Nancratites in the hallowed Feasts, which they celebrated in honour of their Father Dionysius, or Bacchus, in the Pritaneum, were all clothed in white Albes, then called Pritanean Gownes, and when they had heard the voice of the publique Cryer; they would al fal down on their knees to the ground, and hauing saide certaine priuate prayers, seate themselues at the Table, euery one receiuing two measures of wine; the Priests of Apollo Pitheus, and of Bacchus only excepted, who were allowed a double portion, as well of wine, as of all other thinges beside. Afterward the vse was, that euery one should haue a fayre large slice of very pure bread giuen him, and thereon a piece of courser Bread, with a morsell of Swines Flesh on it, beside a Cake of Barly Bread fryed, or else so much Meale fryed, or a messe of Pottage made of Hearbes, according to the season of the yeare, two Egges, a cantle of Cheese, dryed Figs, and a Cake crowned with a Garland. If any one (in these sacrifices) prouided any other meats then those aboue rehearsed, he was to be ammerced with a pecuniarie fine.

Marriage Feasts among the Lacedemonians.

* Naneratis, a Citty in Egypt.

The allowance of the Priestes.

The Dole giuen at the Feast, and no preparation else, was to be allowed.

The vse of making Feastes and Banquets (as Aristotle writeth) was inuented by Italus, a very auncient King of Italy, who kept company with grosse and boorish people, feeding among them, obliging them (by that meanes) to yeeld him the more obeysance, and he drawing thē also thereby to a more humaine, ciuill and pleasing kinde of life. Suetonius Tranquillus declareth, that the Emperor Octauius Augustus prohibited in Rome, that any of his subiects should inuite one another, to dine or suppe with him: but Arist in Lib. 9. Cap. 16. The first inuenter of Feasts and Banquets.

Sueton. Tranq. in vit. Imp. Octa. August.

yet

yet they might so much honor one another, as to send part of his Viands to the others Table, but not to pertake in eating thereof. But being demaunded, what was his reason for making this Law, he answered. The occasion that moued me to forbid Playes and Feastings, was for nothing else: but because in those plaies, Men cannot abstaine from blaspheming the Gods, and (at Feastes) one Neighbour defameth or backbiteth another. Cicero writeth, that Cato the Censor, being at the point of death, deliuered these wordes. Among other thinges done by me, not as became a good Romaine Cittizen, but rather like a presumptuous and barbarous Man; was this: I being once entreated by a friend of mine, that I would come and dine with him: suffered my selfe to be ouer-ruled, and went vnto him, which I ought not to haue done. For to speake vprightly, no generous and vertuous man, should goe to eate in the House of any Friend, or other: because, hee thereby looseth his owne liberty, and hazzardeth his reputation and grauity in extraordinary perill. A certaine man demaunded of Æschines the Oratour, what hee should doe, to be esteemed a good and honest man? To whom he thus answered. If thou wouldst bee a perfect honest Grecian, thou must go to the Temples willingly, and to warre vpon necessity: but to Feasts or Banquets, neither on thine owne free will, or any importunitie; An answer well deseruing eternall memory.

Pericles, a man of great account among the Athenians, did so highly detest the custome of Feasts and Bankets, and the prouision appointed for them: as hee did neuer dine or sup with any Friend of his, but onely Eurytolemus, on the day of his Nuptials. And yet he was a man of great honor, very liberall, and maintained many people with his goods. Nor doe I (for all this) wholelie condemne Feasts and Banquets: prouided, that mediocrity bee obserued in them. For I hold it very vicious and vnseemely, to shun honest conuersation, and ciuill resort to feede together: as is obserued in Societies and Companies, as well Religious, as others, in their Refectories or dining Haules, as we vse to tearme them. For, not onely Nature, but amity also necessarily requireth; that we should support this Custome of Banquets, which the Latines (our betters) vsed to tearme Conuictum, of Conuuendo, as a familiar kinde of life, when men louingly feede together at one Table. Neuertheless, I much mislike, and iudge it worthy of great reprehension; to super-exceede both in pompe and superfluitie in our Feastes, with such diuersity of meates, as (many times) prooues to a mans vndoing. For nothing makes vs so much like vnto brute beasts; as gluttonous gurmandise, and study wholy applyed for the belly.

The Emperors answere for prohibiting bankets and Playes.

Cicero in lib. 4. de Offic.

The words of Cato Censorius, concerning one Friend inuiting another.

The answere of Eschines the Oratour.

Of Pericles the honourable Athenian.

The Authors generall conclusion on this Argument.

Conuictum à Conuiuendo.

CHAP. XX.

¶ Of many Men, that by their Prodigalitie and lauish kinde of life, made expence of all their faculties in very short time.

THe most Prodigall Man of Auncient times, was Epicharides the Athenian, sirnamed the Little Man; who in sixe daies, consumed all his wealthy Patrimony. Paschisyrus king of Creete, after he had spent all that hee had, and could make beside: at length sold his Kingdome, and liued afterward priuately, in the Citty of * Amathunta, where he dyed miserably. Æthiops, the Corinthian, sold to Archias, all his lands and inheritance, both what hee had in present possession, and was to enioy by his Birth-right: onely to maintaine his excessiue drinking. Cleops, King of Ægypt, hauing laide out vnspeakable expences, for the building of a mightie huge Pyramides, was brought to such extreame necessity; that for his owne meere maintenance, he was enforced to expose his Daughters virginity to publike sale, to make Money of her lasciuious and dishoneſt pleasures. Marcus Tigellus was so prodigall in expences, that all his Flatterers, Picke-thankes, Players, Pypers, and loose Companions, who deriued exceeding benefit daily from him: bemoand his death, & wept bitterly for him. Of him, Horace maketh mention, saying.

Epicharides the Athenian.

* A Citty of Cyprus dedicated to Venus.

Cleops, King of Egypt, that made sale of his daughters virginity.

Societies

Societies of Flatterers infinite,
That follow furnisht Tables day and night:
Sellers of Vnguents, sweets: And Mountebancks,
Lascivious Women, vsing wanton Pranks.
All these Horse-leaches rufully complaine
Tigellius death, whose life was all their gaine.

Horace in Satir 2. Lib. 2. et in Satyr. 3. Lib. 2.

Elianus in Lib. 4. Cap. 7.

The prodigality and voluptuous life of Pericles; of Callias, the Sonne of Hipponicus; and of Nicias, brought them to extreame pouerty, and when Money failed them: they all three, (each after other) receiued Hemlock for their drink at their last banquet, and so ended their daies. Of Callias, Atheneus maketh mention, and Aristophanes, in his Comedie of Preachers, and Lysias writeth, that his Father Hipponicus was the very richest man in all Greece. Demades the Oratour, had gathered such a masse of Riches, as himselfe confessed, that hee felt not the want of any thing: neuertheless, in the end (thorow his intemperance and dissolution) he so wasted and consumed al his wealth, that he was banished from the Citty, because he had beene seauen times accused, for not payment of such fines, wherein the men of Athens had condemned him. And Antipater the Poet of Sidon mocking him, said: He had nothing but his toong and belly left him, for he had wasted and offered vp all to his owne sensuality, &c. * Ctesippus, Son to Chabrias, was so Prodigal, that after he had lauishly consumed all his goods: he sold the very stones of his Fathers Tomb, in the building whereof, the Athenians disbursed a thousand Drachmaes, Cornelius Lentulus, sir-named Sura, a man of Noble race, but of very bad gouernment, spent ouer-vainely, and foolishly (beside his owne possessions) a great sum of Mony belonging to the Common-wealth, when he was Quæstor.

Atheneus. in Lib. 4. Cap 12. Aristophanes, in Com. Predic. Lysias.

Volat. Anthrop. Lib. 15.

* Who after his Fathers death was brought vp by Phocion.

G. Cæsar * Caligula surpassed all Prodigals, in inuentions of profuse expence and dissolutions. He inuented a new kind of Bath, and diuers sortes (neuer before seene) of Viands and Banquetings: for hee would bathe himselfe in curious sweet waters, and cause Pearles of inestimable value to be dissolued with Vineger, and set before them that hee feasted, hauing his Breads and Meates all guilded ouer. Moreouer, he commaunded light Gallies or Foists to bee made (which were called Liburnian Foists) of Cedar wood, hauing all their poopes couered ouer with precious stones. He had large and goodly stoues or Hot-houses, with rare perfumed chambers in them, where he would sit and banquet in the night season: but in the day time, hee had variety of costlie Arbors, Bowers, and Vines, abounding in the plenty of their fruits, wherein he would sit with his Consorts of Musitions, sweetly singing among them. And when he pleased to take the open ayre, it was on the Sea-shoare of Campania, which was reputed (though beeing in Italy) to be the most pleasant and fertile ground in the whole World. As for his buildings and Houses of pleasure, abroad in the spacious fields, in groues, Woods, and other delightfull places: they exceeded all compasse of reason, for hee coueted nothing more, then to effect such things as appeared to be impossible. In briefe, in lesse space then a yeare, he consumed immense riches, with the twenty seauen thousand times * H. S. being an hundred thousand smal Sestertiaes, which Tiberius had left him, amounting to threescore and seauen Millions; and fifty thousand Crownes, allowing fortie sixe Sols to the crowne. But when Money began to fayle him, and he waxed needy: he then gaue his mind to leuying of toules, and excessiue tributes; yea, hee exercised rapines by diuers meanes, beside calumnies and confiscations of his subiects goods.

Caligula obserued no measure in his expences and prodigality.

* A Coine among the Romaines, whereof Denarius containeth foure, and was marked with H S. which signified 2. lib. et dim. &c.

The Emperour Nero, his Nephew, was not a iot inferiour to him in Prodigality, for hee obserued no order or measure in spending and giuing: accounting them to be wretches and anaritious villaines, that kept any written Register of their expences. But contrariwise, he esteemed them to be honorable and magnanimious, that could soonest runne thorough their whole estate in spending. He gaue to Tyridates (as a daily allowance) eight hundred thousand Nummaes, valuing twenty thousand Crownes of our Coyne, a matter almost incredible. He made a present of two goodly Pallaces; the one to Menetrates, a Player on the Harpe; and the other to Spectillus, the Mirmyllon Fencer or Sword-Player. He would neuer ride abroad, or on any iourney, without a thousand Chariots at the least. His Mules were shodde with Suetan. in Lib. 6. Cap. 50. The prodigality of the Emperour Nero.

* So called of harneste bootes, called Caligæ, which he was wont to weare being a Child. Dion in vit. G. Cæsar. Calig.

Excessiue pompe and prodigalitie, not to any purpose.

Siluer, and all his Mulets Saddles and furnitures, were of Cloth of * Canusium, a Towne in Apulia. Moreouer, he neuer would weare any Garment twice.

* Famous for fine wool of crimson couller.

Iosephus, in his Hiſtory of the Iewes warres, maketh mention of the prodigalitie of the Emperor Vitellius; who helde the Empire no longer then eight months and fiue dayes. If his life had beene of any longer continuance (ſaith Iosephus) I beleeue, that the whole Empire could not haue ſuffiſed his exceſſe and prodigallity. This Vitellius was ſo diſſolute and prodigall, that he would haue foure ſeueral meales each day allowed him; which he thus deuided, into Breake-faſt, Dinner, Supper, and Collation. At ſuch time as hee came to Rome, his Brother made him a Supper, whereat hee was ſerued with two thouſand daintie and rare Fiſhes, and ſeauen thouſand as delicate Fowles and Birdes. Which pompe he exceeded in another Feaſt, of more exceſſiue and ſumptuous coſt; which he made at the dedication of the ground plot, that (for the admirable greatneſſe thereof) hee called the Shield of Minerua.

Iosep. in Lib. de bel. Iudaic. 3. Cap. 23.

The Emperour Vitellius and his foure meales daily.

A Prodigall (ſaith Vpian, in the firſt law ff. de cura. furio) is he that hath no time or end of his ſpending: but ſcattereth and conſumeth his goods beyond ſence or reaſon, and is tearmed in Greeke ἀσώτος, becauſe that hee looſeth himſelfe, and waſteth his patrimony. Our graue and worthy fore-fathers, did eſtabliſh Lawes againſt ſpend-thriftes and prodigalles. Solon, the famous Grecian, ordayned, that they ſhould be made infamous. The Areopagites and criminall Iudges of Athens, appealed prodigal perſons in iudgment, and being proued and conuinced for ſuch offendours, were puniſhed accordingly.

A Prodigall defined by Vlpian the Lawyer.

Lawes in ancient times ordayned againſt prodigall perſons.

The Auncients, called the ten men, prohibited by their lawes, that prodigals ſhould haue the gouernment of their owne goods, but all ſuch authoritie was taken from them: and a Guardian or Ouer-ſeer was appointed thē by the Iudge, as is to be ſeene in the law Iulianus. ff. de cura. furio. Therefore they could not ſell or alienate (by any valuable meanes) their Lands or goods, neither make any tranſport of them: moreouer, they were diſabled by the Law, of making any wils or Teſtaments, as appeareth plainly in the Law. Is cui bonis. F. de verb. obliga.

Such a law would now doe well, to curbe the Prodigals of theſe times.

Whereupon, they were compared by the Iuriſconſultes, to madde men; Scilicet, quod furioſum exitum pariat prodigalitas.

And as for the paine and puniſhment due to waſt-full ſpend-thrifts, the Grecians had a law, whereby it was eſpecially ordained, that whoſoeuer conſumed his patrimony lauiſhly; he might not be permitted Buriall in the Graue of his Father, but abroade, among ſuch as were ſtrangers and vnknowne. The Law of the twelue Tables, interdicted all prodigall perſons, from any adminiſtration of their owne goods; and in the end, all the Lenders (by commaund of the Iudges) might let them haue no more monies, on pawnes or otherwiſe: but Suruayers or Comptroullers were ſet ouer them, according to the example and order for mad men or Lunaticks, and all mannaging of their owne affayres, was alſo prohibited them in this forme or manner. Quando bonatua paterna auitaque nequitia diſperdis, liberoſque tuos ad egeſtatem perducis; ob eam rem tibi ea re commercioque interdico. In this very manner, Q. Pompeius, Pretor, perceiuing that Q. Fabius, (Sonne to Q. Fabius the Great, ſirnamed Allobrogicus, becauſe he conquered the * Allobroges, and Bituitus, Captaine and Duke, or King (as ſome write) of the * Aluernes) was extraordinarily diſſolute and prodigall in his expences: depriued him of his Fathers Lands and goods. For euery one pitied, and much lamented, to ſee ſo much Gold and Siluer waſted in lewdneſſe and luxurie; which rather ſhould haue ſupported the ſplendour and Nobilitie, of ſo glorious a race and Family, as were the Fabij.

Alexan. de Alexandrin. in Die. Genial. Lib. 6. Cap. 14.

The law of the twelue Tables againſt all prodigall ſpenders.

Valerius Maximus in Lib. 3. Cap. 3.

* People of Sauoy and Daulphiny.
* People of France.

Dion writeth, that the Emperor Tiberius did ſet a Tutour, ouer a certaine Senatour, who was void of all good gouernement; to order him, as if he had beene his pupill. Iouianus Pontanus, in his Booke of Bounty or Liberallity, maketh a queſtion, to wit: which of the two, either the prodigall perſon, or the auaritious, is worſt and moſt pernitious? Whereunto, himſelfe maketh anſwere thus. This doubt (ſaith he) is very eaſily diſcided. For firſt of all, the Prodigall perſon is benificiall and profitable to many, on whom he beſtoweth his goodes bountifully: whereas the couetous Miſer is not commodious to him-ſelfe, but maketh

Dion in Lib. 57

Iouian Pōtanus in Lib. de Liberalit.

vſe

The Niggard is not good to himselfe, or any other.

vse of his goodes, as if he had them not, at least-wise very sparingly. He will not eate halfe so much, as is needfull for the meere maintenance of his owne life: which makes him looke with a wanne, pale, and meager complection. In the second place, the Prodigall giueth liberally, and guiftes passe from him with a free, generous, and good heart: especially, when he exceedeth not the bounds of reason, and his gifts are giuen to some honest and commendable purpose. But the couetous mans gifts are quite contrary, with a griple and pinching heart, and a villaines disposition. Moreouer, as the greedy wretch encreaseth his store day by day; euen so doth the Prodigall change his naturall inclination and manner of life, as well by course of time, as age drawing on him: which at length letteth him know, that he must needs become poore, and fall into want. Whereby many times it comes to passe, that his manners grow to better reformation then before, and yeares diminishing his lauishnesse; by little and little he recouereth health and strength againe. Whereas (on the contrary) Auarice is an euerlasting and incurable disease. By which reasons it appeareth, that couetous and auaritious Misers, are of a more vile, base, and abiect condition; then those that be prodigall.

The nature of the couetous mans gifts.

Couetous wretches of more base quality then Prodigals.

CHAP. XXI.

The Magnificent Triumphe of Antigonus Epiphanes, made in despight of the Consull Paulus Æmylius his Triumphe, for his victory obtained against the Macedonians.

ANtigonus, King of Syria, sir-named Epiphanes, that is to say, Famous or illustrious, hauing heard recitall deliuered of the magnificent Triumphe, made by the Consull Paulus Æmylius, for the victory which he won against the Macedonians, when Perseus their King was taken Prisoner: he conceiued such enuy and disdaine thereat, that in meere vanity and arrogancy, hee resolued to make another Triumphe, that should farre excell and goe beyond the Consuls. Vpon this occasion, hee made it publiquelie knowne throughout his Kingdome, that on such a day, as he purposely appointed; he would be in person at Daphneia, a Citty of Asia, where wonderfull sports and delights were to be performed. Which caused, that not onely the people of Greece, but infinite numbers also (from other Regions) repayred thither; and the order of the royall intended spectacle began in this manner.

Polybius in the 26. Booke of his Histories, calleth him Epmanes, that is to say, mad, or vnreasonable.

First of all, as the formost leaders to the famous troups following, marched fiue thousand young men, supposed to bee the very Gallantest Spirits in all Greece, they being armed according to the Romaine manner. After them followed as many of Mysia, armed as the Custome of their owne Countrey required: beeing pursued by three thousand Thracians, and fiue thousand Galatians, and they were seconded with many other, who, because they carried certaine Bucklers or Targets of Siluer, were sir-named * Argyraspides. Next vnto these, marched twenty fiue rankes of Gladiatores, Sworders, or Fencers, and subsequently a thousand knights, whose Horses were all barbed and caparasoned with Gold and Siluer, and each of them a Garland of Gold on his head. After them followed another thousand Knights, who were tearmed Fellowes, or Companions, and with them another company, that were called Friends to the King: who likewise had a thousand Noblemen following them, and a thousand other braue Knights, called the Kings Band. In the next place, marched fifteene hundred Knights, armed all guilt with Armor, ouer which Armor, each man did weare a military Roab or Mantle, embroydered all with Gold & Siluer, and enriched with many costlie Figures of Beastes. Then followed an hundred Chariots, each one drawne by sixe Horses, and forty other Chariots, each drawne by foure Horses.

The order & proceeding in this purposed royall triumph

* Some doe hold these Warriours to be of the Isle Taprobane.

Fellows, companions, and Friends to the King.

One wonderfull sumptuous Charior, drawn by ten Elephants, followed next, being pursued by sixe and thirty other Elephants; beside eight hundred gallant Youths, wearing Garlands or Crowns of Golde on their heads, embellished with many precious stones, and then followed a thousand fat Oxen, and 800.

The spare Chariot that was to serue the King whē he pleased.

teeth of Indian Elephants, carryed by Men, purposely thereto appointed. After these, were borne aloft, an infinite number of Statues and Images, not onely of Gods, but of Dæmons likewise, and of many men, that had beene most excellent in any profession whatsoeuer, which Images were attired in rich Garments of Gold and Siluer, beside other costly deckings of vnualuable Stones and Iewels. And at each Statues feete, hung a little Tablet of Gold, wherein was engrauen the Name, Titles, and honourable actions, that had beene performed by the party whom the figure expressed, and for whose sake it was thus dignified. Other Images were carried also; as of Day, Night, Heauen, Morning and Noone, beside an infinite number of Vessels of Gold and Siluer, reputed to be of inestimable worth, al which were carried by Slaues and Bond-men.

Memory continued of worthy deeds, to example others in the like.

Then followed sixe hundred Pages, attending on the King, all cloathed in Gold; next to whom, came two hundred Ladies, each bearing a golden Bottle in her hand, casting perfumes and sweet waters euery way about her: On them attended fifty Litters of Siluer, and as many more of Gold, wherein sate fourescore other Ladies, attyred in most sumptuous manner, exceeding al possibility of expression. This Triumph continued thirty daies, during which time, Antigonus caused diuers kindes of Playes and sports to be exercised, and al this while, it was lawfull for any, that were so minded or pleased, to enter into the publique * Gymnasium, and there to annoint himselfe with fifteene sortes of vnguents; as of Saffron, Spicknard, Cinamon, Telin, Amaracin, Lillies, &c. Beside, in sundry places, were prepared aboue a thousand and fiue hundred Tables, couered most royally, with all possible diuersity of precious dainties and delicates, where euery man might freely feede, without any exception.

The Kings Pages & chief Ladies to beautifie the show.

* A place for all kindes of exercises, either of minde or bodie.

CHAP. XXII.

That Gold and Siluer were not in any frequent vse, among our reuerent Auncestours: And at what time they began to be imployed more largely. Also, what deuises were found out by Timotheus the Athenian, and Condalus, Captaine to Mausolus, for the gaining of Mony.

THE vse of those Mettals, called Golde and Siluer, which were found in Thrace, neere to the Riuer * Pangæus; was very rare and strange among our fore-fathers. For the Lacedemonians, beeing desirous to guilde the Image or Statue of Apollo * Amycleus: made diligent search thorow all Greece, and yet could not finde any Gold: And therefore they were constrained, to send and buy some of Croesus, King of Lydia. Hiero, the Tyrant of Syracusa, hauing likewise vowed to dedicate a Table of Gold, to Apollo Delphicus, caused search to be made throughout Greece and Italie, without finding any: nor euer had done, but of * Architeles the Corinthian, who (by little and little) in a long space had got it together. The people of * Phocus, hauing afterward sacked the Temple of Delphos, and Alexander carrying thence the prey or booty into Asia: the vse of Gold began so fast to encrease, that diuers Vessells were made thereof, euen from such as they washed their handes in, to them that they vsed in the Kitchin. The first stamp that euer was beaten vppon Gold Coine, was at Rome, in the Temple of Scipio the Affricane.

* A Promontory of Thrace, whereof the Riuer receiued name.

* A Citty of Laconia, wher Castor and Pollux were borne.

* He is called (by some) Archimedes.

* A little cõtry of Greece, by the Gulfe, Crissæus.

The first stamping.

The Athenians making long warres against the people of * Olynthus; Mony beganne to faile very greatly in the Armie; which the Souldiours perceiuing, and with what difficultie it was to bee expected from Athens: they entered into a mutinie or tumult, for appeasing whereof, Timotheus, there Captaine, bethought himselfe of a new and sudden deuised meanes. Hauing first couenanted and agreed with such Merchants,

* A Citty of Thrace, neere to the Country of Athens.

The deuise of Timotheus to pay his Souldiours.

chants, as were (in this case) to fit and furnish him, vppon this faithfull promise, of exchange and repaiment when time better serued: he caused Mony of Copper to be made, wherewith he paied his Souldiours. And within no long while after, when Mony of Siluer was sent from Athens; he not onely satisfied the Marchants & Victualers liberally: but also receiued in all the Copper Coyne againe, and gaue due restitution for it in Siluer.

Arist. in Polit. Lib. 7. Cap. 9.

Aristotle writeth in his Pollitiques, that Condalus, Captaine to Mausolus, King of Caria, being in Lycia (a Prouince of the Lesser Asia, scituate betweene Pamphylia and Caria) with an Armie, and want of Mony growing greatlie among them: hee inuented a meanes, though some-what ridiculous, yet well aunswering to his owne expectation. He knew very perfectly, that the people of Lycia tooke delight (aboue all thinges else) to weare their lockes of Haire very long: Whereupon, he called diuers of the chiefest persons of that Prouince to him, and saide vnto them, after this manner. That much against his mind, and to his no little greefe, he was constrained to acquaint them with a Commission, which hee had (that instant) receiued from his King, and which hee likewise knew, could not chuse but be greatly offensiue to them. For King Mausolus (qouth hee) commaundeth, that all the Lycians must be presently shauen, and all their goodlie long Lockes be powled from their Heades, to be sent vnto him into Caria: because hee will haue a new and strange kinde of Apparrell made of them, in honour of the King of Persia.

Condalus his conceite for present supply of mony, by a politique Oratiō made to the Lycians.

Pretended pitty is oftentimes the greatest preuayler, in matters of no meane moment.

Condalus continuing on his speech, pretending much compassion towardes them in this case; further added. That if they would follow his councell, he would finde out a meanes, whereby, not onely their faire Haire should bee saued; but the Kinges intent should also be answered, without cutting them off in any such manner. Whereunto the Lycians aunswered, that they would gladly follow his direction in all things; prouided, that their Lockes of Haire might be kept from defacing. Condalus then aduised them, to prepare Money among them (appointing a round and indifferent summe, which they might gather by the poule, eyther more or lesse, according as their Lockes were in fashion) and then to send that Money into Greece, where plenty of such haire he would easily help them to, and afterward send it to King Mausolus, and cause it to bee receiued, as if it were their owne. The Lycians, with all possible hast that might be vsed, leuyed such a Masse of Mony together; as (without any great dicultie) would haue bought them goodly Perriwigs; yea, if they had beene all of Gold. Which summe of Money they deliuered to Condalus, who, feigning as if he sent it into Greece; discharged all his Souldiours wants there-with, and yet no way displeased the people.

Folly accounteth nothing deare, so it selfe be satisfied.

CHAP. XXIII.

What a commendable thing it is, euermore to speake the truth; And what a detestable vice lying is, with many examples concerning each Argument.

Epimenides the Philopher was asked by the Rhodians, what thing that Vertue was, which Men cald Truth? whereto he aunswered. Truth is that thing, whereof (more then al other) the Gods doe make profession; and the vertue thereof heateth the Heauens; illuminateth the Earth; maintaineth Iustice; gouerneth the Common-wealth, and cannot endure any wicked thing neer it, but maketh all doubtfull matters to bee cleare and apparant.

Epimenides his answere, concerning truth

The Corinthians also demaunded of Chilo the Philosopher, what this Truth was? And he replyed. It is an assured Gage, which neuer diminisheth it selfe: A Buckler or Shielde, that neuer can bee pierced thorough: A time, which neuer is troubled in it selfe: An Armie, neuer daunted or dismaied: A Floure, that neuer fadeth fadeth or withereth: A Sea, that neuer feareth Fortune: And a Hauen, wherein no Man ſhall euer ſuffer perill. The Lacedemonians likewiſe entreated Anaxarchus the Philoſopher, to reſolue them what Truth was, and he made anſwere. It is a perpetuall health and welfare; A life without ending; A Sirope that healeth all infirmities; A Sunne alwaies ſhining; A Moon that neuer ſuffereth Eclipſe; An Hearbe euer growing; A Gate neuer ſhut againſt any; And a iourney, wherein no Man can waxe weary. Æſchines alſo ſaid of Truth. It is a vertue, without which, all ſtrength is feeble and infirme; Iuſtice bloody; Humility a Traytreſſe; Patience counterfeit; Chaſtity vaine; Liberty a Priſoner; and Piety ſuperfluous. And another Philoſopher, beeing demaunded by the Romaines, what he thought Truth to be; gaue them this anſwere. Truth is the Center, whercin all thinges doe reſt; The Sea-mans Card, whereby all the Marriuers doe gouerne themſelues; That Wiſedome, which is the guide and directer to all Men; A height, on the top whereof is all fulneſſe of repoſe; And a light, whereby the whole world is illumined.

Chilo his answere of truth to the Corinthians.

Anaxarchus his anſwer to the Lacedemonians

Aeſchines concerning truth

The opinion of a Romaine Philoſopher.

The Emperour Auguſtus, in the Triumphe which he made of Marke Anthony and Cleopatra; brought with him to Rome a Prieſt of Ægypt, aged threeſcore yeares, who in all the daies of his life, had neuer told any lye. In regard whereof, the Senate preſently ordained, that he ſhould be made free, and ereated Great Prieſt: Alſo, that a Statue ſhould be erected for him, and placed among thoſe of the moſt renowmed mē of all the Ancients. Spartianus relateth an example much diſſemblable from this laſt, and ſaith. In the time of the Emperor Claudius, there died a Man in Rome, named Pamphylus, who (as it was moſt euidently iuſtified) neuer told any matter of truth in all his life time; but euermore had his chiefe delight in lying, which cauſed the Emperour to giue commaund, that no Graue ſhould be graunted to his body: but his goods were confiſcated, his Houſe ruined, and his Wife and Children baniſhed out of Rome, to the end, that no memorie might remain in the Commonwealth, of ſuch a venomous Beaſt. At the time when theſe two notable effects hapned, the Romaines were Mortall enemies to the Ægyptians, whereby may worthilie be obſerued, how wonderful the power of truth is: in regard that the Romaines would aduance a Statue, in the honour of their enemy, onely becauſe he was a Man of truth, and depriue their Cittie-born ſon of a Sepulcher, becauſe he was ſuch a notorious Lyer. It is no way to be doubted, but that a true man may freely walke, and practiſe in all places, without feare of being accuſed by any perſon. He may alſo (in ſafetie & dreadleſſe) reprehend any Lyer, and ſpeake boldly in face of all the world, going alwaies with an erected and dauntleſſe countenance. But the Lyer is fled of all Men, like to a noyſome peſtilence, and ſo long as hee liueth; yea, after death likewiſe, he is infamous to all Poſterity. His reward and wages, is, that if hee chance to ſpeake truth, no man wil beleeue him: For, by being ſo knowne a Lyer, truth (in his mouth) ſtandeth alwaies ſuſpected.

The Emperor Octauius Auguſtus triumphing ouer Mark Anthonie and Cleopatra.

Spartianus his report of Pamphilus the famous Lyer of Rome.

An excellent obſeruation of the power of Truth.

Difference betweene the true man and Lyer.

CHAP. XXIIII.

What a benefit the Inuention of Letters was vnto man: Who firſt found out and deuiſed them. Of the Hebrue Charracters, & what ſignification they haue of themſelues, differing from all other Letters elſe in any Nation.

IF thoſe men may iuſtly be ſaid to merit praiſe & commendation, that were the firſt deuiſers of liberall and mechanical Arts, and they likewiſe, that found out diuers Doctrines and enſtructions, not onely appertaining to the rule and direction of the Soule, but likewiſe for bodily vſe and behauiour: how much more great and eſpeciall honor then is due to him, that was the firſt Inuenter and deuiſer of Letters? Thoſe incomparable Inſtruments, which haue bin the certaine guards and conſeruers, of all other inuentions whatſoeuer: for without them, not any deuiſe could haue beene preſerued, whereto we may adde moreouer, that Letters haue made Men halfe immortall.

Diuerſity of merit, according to the nature and qualitie of things.

Such

The power and prerogatiue of Letters, and what hath enſued (by their meanes) from times of Antiquity.

Such hath bin their power and prerogatiue, that matters of a thouſand yeares paſt, are (by them) ſo familiarly preſented vnto vs; as if there had beene no diſtance or deuiſion of time. By them are apprehended all kindes of Diſciplines. They make knowne to men of this inſtant age, whatſoeuer our graue fore-goers learned and made vſe off, or any famous actions by them perfourmed: And thoſe thinges which theſe dayes affoord (as deſeruing future knowledge) by them, are left as Legacies to vtmoſt poſteritie. They ſhew and repreſent vnto the eye, matters once done, euen as if they were in continuall action, and as full of life in the inſtant, as in the precedent: which neuer could haue beene done, if Letters hadde neuer beene deuiſed. For neither Plato, Ariſtotle, nor a great number of other wiſe Philoſophers, had carried ſuch reputation with vs, as now they doe; but onely by their ſacred meanes. For concluſion then, we may very well ſay; that the onely beſt and greateſt thing (among all humaine inuentions) was that of Letters. Whoſoeuer is doubtfull, or maketh any queſtion in this caſe; let him but reade and conſider what is left written to vs, whereby he ſhall well perceiue: that all thoſe famous memories and antiquities, had beene vtterly loſt, and no record remained of them, but onely by Letters.

No memory had remained but by Letters, for elſe, all precedent accidents had bin vtterly loſt.

Seeing then, that they are the cauſe of ſo great a happineſſe; reaſon (in meere Iuſtice) requireth, that we ſhould know, to whom wee are beholding for them. And yet I finde it to bee a matter of no meane difficultie, becauſe opinions are ſo various and doubtfull in this caſe. The Gentiles doe much diſagree heerein with our Chriſtians, and Chriſtians alſo haue not well concorded together. Pliny ſetteth downe many opinions, and then addeth his owne, which (in my iudgement) commeth much neerer to truth, then the other. Firſt of all he ſaith, that Letters were found out by the Aſſyrians in Aſſyria: but others doe affirme, that Mercury founde them firſt in Egypt. Some (beſide) are of the minde, that the Pelagians brought them into Italy; or elſe that they were carried into Greece by the Phœnitians, with Cadmus, who was their Captaine, who had no more of them then, but ſixteene in number: but in the warre of Troy, Palamedes added foure more vnto them. After Plinies report of all theſe, and ſome opinions beſide, he concludeth according to his owne iudgement: That Letters were eternall, which is as much to ſay, that they had beene from the beginning of the world.

Diuerſity of opinions about the inuention of Letters.

Pliny. in Lib. 7. Cap. 12.

Cadmus Captaine of the Phœnitians, brought Letters into Greece, being then but ſixteene in number.

Now, concerning the bringing of Letters into Greece by the Phœnitians, Herodotus and diuers others doe affirme it. The Egiptians alſo doe make their vaunt, that the inuention of Artes and Letters came firſt from them. Diodorus Siculus is of the minde, that Mercury founde them out in Egipt. Howbeit, the ſame Diodorus ſaith in his 4. Booke, that ſome are of opinion, that the Ethiopians had Letters firſt of all, and that the Egiptians receiued their firſt vſe of Letters from them. Vpon this Argument, there are diuers other, as well Iewes as Chriſtians, who doe plainly auouch, that Moyſes was the firſt finder out of Letters in the world: for he was much more ancient, then any letters or writings among the Gentiles, becauſe the ſame Cadmus (of whom we haue formerly ſpoken, and that he ſhould bring Letters into Greece) liued in the time of Othoniell, Duke and Captaine of Iſraell, and raigned forty ſeauen years, after that the written lawes were giuen to Moyſes, as is euidently prooued.

Herodotus, for the Phœnitians, bringing Letters into Greece.

Diod. Sic. in li. 4

Moyſes ſaid to be the firſt inuenter of Letters.

Othoniell, Duke and Captaine of Iſraell.

They that are of this opinion (among whom were Eupolemus and Artabanus, Ethnique Hiſtorians) doe maintaine, that the Egiptians learned Letters of Moyſes, and that they gaue them firſt to the people of Phœnitia, from whence (afterward) Cadmus tranſported them into Greece. The fore-named Artabanus iuſtifieth, that the man, named Mercurius or Mercury (whom al do affirme to haue taught Letters in Egipt:) was Moyſes, but called Mercurius by the Egiptians. Philo the Iew, a man of great authority, maketh Letters to be more auncient: for he ſaith, that they were found out by Abraham. But the truth is, that they were inuented by Adam, or (at leaſt) by his Sonnes, or Sonnes Sonnes, in the firſt age of the world, and before the Flood. Then were they conſerued to Noah and his Succeſſors, euen to the comming of Abraham, and ſo afterward to Moyſes: And this is the iudgement and opinion of S. Auguſtine. More-ouer, this is yet further verified, by the authoritie of Ioſephus,

The Egiptians learned Letters of Moyſes.

Moyſes called Mercurius by the Egiptians

Adam or his Children the firſt inuentors of Letters.

Auguſt. in Lib. 18. de Ciuit. Dei.

Ioseph. in Lib. 1. de Antiquit.

sephus, in saying; That the Nephewes of Adam, the Sonnes of Seth, made two Collombes, the one of Stone, and the other of Earth, whereon they wrote and insculpted all the Artes. He also affirmeth, that himselfe had seene one of those Pillers in Syria.

We finde also, that Saint Iude the Apostle, alleadged in one of his Epistles, the Booke of Enoch, which was before the Flood. So then, it is not to be doubted, but that Adam and his Sonnes (who were all so wise, and had intelligence in so many thinges) were the onely first Inuenter of Letters. And that Noah also, who was both lettered and learned, preserued them with him in the Arke. Howbeit, that afterward, in the confusion of Tongues, which happened at the building of the Tower of Babell: it might come to passe, that the greater part of the World lost the knowledge of those Letters, which remained onely in the Family of Heber, of whom (afterward) the Hebrues descended, who, as we haue alreadie said, lost not their first Language. Saint Augustine auoucheth as much, in his book before alleadged; the like doth Eusebius also, in his first Booke of the Euangelicall preparation, and the greater part of the learnedst men of our times.

Preseruation of Letters frō Adam and his Sonnes to Noah.

The stock of Heber lost not their first language.

Eusebius in lib. 1. de Præparat. Euan.

Wherefore Philo, and such beside him, as supposed, that Moyses was the Inuenter of Letters; were greatly deceiued in their owne imaginations: because it is a matter most notorious, that the Bookes and Histories written by Moyses, were not the first before all other, nor before the Philosophy and Wisedome of the Greekes, as Saint Augustine prooueth sufficiently in the saide Booke; and Iosephus also, against Appion the famous Grammarian of Ægypt: and likewise Eusebius and Iustine Martire. He and they should haue concluded then, that Letters were before the time of Moyses; because we finde it written, that Moyses learned in Ægypt, all the Arts and Sciences of the Ægyptians, which he could not haue doone, except there had beene Letters before. And yet we know moreouer, that there were Hierogliphicall Figures, whereby (as we formerly prooued in the first Booke) they had vnderstanding of one anothers mind.

Philo the Iew and diuers others deceiued in their opinion.

Iosephus cont. Appion. Gram.

Moyses learnd the Arts of the Egiptians

We will therefore set downe our resolue, that Letters were from the dayes of Adam, and afterward, that Abraham had knowledge of them in Syria: and thence it ensued, that Plinie varried in so many opinions before related. It shall be needlesse therefore, to make any further curious search, as touching the Originall and causes of Charracters and Letters: because they may be made according to any mans mind or will; euen as now-adaies wee see, that Ciphers, Figures, or what else, are formed, after the fancy of the Writter or Deuiser, and sometimes signes or shapes in stead of Letters.

The Authors conclusion concerning Letters.

Originall and causes of charracters and Letters.

So saith Saint Hierome, in his Prologue before the Booke of the Lawes, and that when Esdras, the great Scribe and Doctour of the Law, re-writ and restored them againe: hee found new Charracters or formes of Letters, whereof the Iewes did make, vse to the time of Saint Hierome, euen as yet they doe to these dayes of ours. And those Hebrue Letters or Charracters, haue a secret propriety, not incident to the Letters of any other Nation: for the voyce, sound, or name of each one of them, yeildeth a signification of some thing else beside.

Hierom. in Præfat. Lib. de Leg.

Hebrew Letters haue a priuate propriety to thēselues in signification.

The first Letter, which is tearmed Aleph, doth signify Discipline. The second, named Beth, signifyeth a House. Gymell, which is another Letter, relateth replenishing, or aboundance. And Daleth, Tables or Bookes. All the rest of the Letters, doe interpret some one thing or other, which I forbeare to speake of, to auoyd prolixitie. Such as are more curious Inquisitours into these occasions: let them read Eusebius, in his first Booke, De Preparatione Euangelica.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXV.

How our Auncients wrote, and whereon, before the inuention of Paper, and with what Instrument. How Paper and Parchment were first found out, and by whom.

WE haue ſpoken briefely in the precedent Chapter, concerning the inuention of Letters: it now remaineth, that we ſhould ſay ſomewhat, of the matter whereon our fore-fathers vſed to write. Now, albeit wee cannot exactly ſet downe, what it was that our firſt Fathers (in the firſt Age, and before the Flood) did write vpon, as being a caſe very doubtfull; to wit, whether then they had the vſe of Letters, although we haue made proofe thereof by the authority of Ioſephus, aſſiſted by ſome other reaſons beſide: yet it euidently appears (according to the generall iudgement of Writers) that ſuch as wrote in thoſe elder times, had not, neither knew what Paper was; but onely did write on Leaues of the Palme or Date Tree, from whence followed the common word (yet vſed) the Leaues or Leafes of Bookes. Afterward they wrote vpon other Leaues of Trees, but principally ſuch as came eaſieſt from each Tree: as the Birche, the Platane, the Aſh, and the Elme. From theſe Trees they tooke the inner-moſt Rinde, which groweth betweene the Wood and the thicke blacke Barke, and theſe ſoft skinnes being ſubtillie ſmoothed and plained: of them they formed the Leaues of their Bookes, ioyning them artificially one within another, that they might the more firmely hold together. And becauſe (in thoſe reuerend daies) the Latines tearmed thoſe inner-moſt Rindes of Trees, by the Name of Libri: it thence enſued, that they gaue the Title of Liber to one of their Bookes, though afterward they refuſed all further vſe of thoſe meanes.

Within ſome while after, they found out another helpe for Writing, which was vpon Plates of Lead, ingeniouſlie made thin and plyant: whereof, ſome Men (that were more curious and ſpeculatiue) made likewiſe Collombes or Pillers, as well as Bookes, whereon they regiſtred all publique actions. Thoſe Ancient Fathers, found out yet another manner of Writing, which was on Linnen Cloath, ſmoothed and polliſhed with a certain kind of colour. But heere we are to obſerue, that they vſed not then to write with Pennes; but with a little Cane or Reede, which yet is called by vs (as then) in Latine Calamus, and wherewith ſome doe ſtill vſe to write.

Afterward, another kinde of Paper was deuiſed to write vpon, which they made of diuers little Shrubs of Trees, cald by them Papers: by reaſon of another addition thereto, to wit; of a certaine kind of Ruſhes, growing ordinarily in the Moores and Mariſhes of Nylus, and the name of this Ruſh in Latine, is called * Papyrus. Pliny ſaith, that there is yet growing in Syria, neere to the Riuer Euphrates, certaine Papers or Ruſhes, that haue ſundry little Leaues, Rindes, or Skinnes, growing naturally betweene the Pith and Barke: which beeing cunningly drawne out with the point of a needle, and intermedled with a kinde of Glue, made of Meale (verie finely ſearced or boulted) and tempered with boyling Water and Vineger; Paper is made thereof, apt and very good to write vpon. But that skinne which is neereſt to the Pith, maketh the beſt and ſmootheſt Paper: whereby we may gather, that according to the ſorts and differences; ſo are the Papers diuerſly named. And in regard that this Reede, Ruſh, or little Shrub, was named Papyrus; the Name of Paper hath ſo continued, and was likewiſe impoſed on thoſe kinds of Paper, which were (ſince then) made of Shreds, rags, and ſmalleſt peeces of Linnen Cloath, paſt all kind of ſeruice, and fit for no other vſe.

Marcus Varro ſaith, that the firſt Inuention of making Leaues of Paper, either of Shrubs, Ruſhes, or otherwiſe: was found out in the time of Alexander the Great, and at ſuch time alſo, as the Cittie of Alexandria was firſt founded. Notwithſtanding, Pliny prooueth it much Doubt of that whereon our firſt Fathers wrote before the flood.

Firſt writing was on Palme Tree Leaues.

The firſt manner of writing Bookes.

Liber, the inward peele or rinde of a Tree.

Plates of lead made apt to write vpon.

Linnen cloth polliſhed with a colour, to write on.

No Pens written with, but Reeds.

* Papyrus is a great Ruſh in Egypt, growing in Pennes or Moorish grounds: whereof (in elder times) they made leaus to write on, & whereof the firſt paper was made and now is vſed for printing Paper. Plin. in lib. 13. Cap. 11. 12.

Mar. Varro. in Lib. 7.

much more auncient, by thoſe Bookes which Cneus Terentius found, by digging in one of his Inheritances, which Books had formerly belonged to Numa Pompilius, King of Rome, and had beene hidden in a Temple, where himſelfe was buried, and the leaues of thoſe Bookes were made of the ſaid Ruſhes or ſhrubbes. It is held for a certainty, that Numa liued long time before Alexander. And yet Titus Liuius reporteth otherwiſe of this Tombe, affirming, that two ſuch Tombs were found by L. Patilius. Lactantius and Plutarch doe heerein agree with Titus Liuius: and yet notwithſtanding, the intention of Pliny is moſt approued.

Plin. in Lib. 13. Cap. 11.

Numa Pompillius his Tomb and Bookes.

Tit. Liuius. dec. 4. Cap. 9.

Plin. in Lib. 13. Cap. 9.

Now concerning the word Carta, or Charta, ſome doe holde, that this name came of a Citty, ſcituated neere to Tyre, which was called Charta, or Cartha; whence Dido (altring the name) called it afterward * Carthage. I read alſo, that thoſe reuerend men of former times, did write on waxed Tablet-leaues, made thin ſmooth and ſlippery: they likewiſe formed their letters, with ſharpe pointed Bodkins or Punchions, which they tearmed Table-Pinnes, but others called the Stiles, whereon, he that (by expertneſſe) wrote moſt perfect, was ſaid to haue a good ſtile in writing, deriuing the worde from the inſtrument, and not by the integritie in Art or method.

* A famous citty in Affrica enuironed almoſt with the Sea, and rebuilded by Queene Dido.

Writing Tables vſed in elder dayes.

Moreouer, it is to be noated, that before ſuch Paper (as we vſe to write on) was inuented: an auncient cuſtome was obſerued, (without ſeeing any other help or meanes) to write onely vpon Parchment, which they made of Sheeps Skins, whereof Herodotus maketh relation. The inuention thereof is attributed (by Marcus Varro) to the people that inhabited the Country of Pergamus, or Pergama, who had (at that time) * Eumenes to be their King; where-vpon (in Latine) it bare the name of Pergamenum, which we do commonly call Parchment. And whereas in Latine alſo, it was called Membrana: yet it appeareth to take name of the Inuenter. Notwithſtanding, in my iudgment, ſuch skinnes were written on long before the time aſſigned by Varro; mentioned (after him) in like manner by Pliny: becauſe Ioſephus writeth, that the Bo'ks of the Hebrewes (which were long before the dayes of Eumenes) and many other Bookes beſide, were written on ſuch Skinnes.

Parchment written on, before our kindes of Paper.

* That ouercame Antiochus by Sardes.

Plin. in Lib. 12. Cap. 9.

Ioſephus in Lib. 12. de Antiquit

In like manner, when he declareth, that Eleazer, Prince of the Prieſtes, ſent the Bookes of the ſacred Scriptures to Ptolemeus Philadelphus, with the ſeauenty two Interpreters, that they might bee tranſlated out of the Hebrew tongue into Greeke, he ſaith; King Ptolomy was amazed, and wondred very much, at the ingenious coniunction of thoſe Skinnes of Parchment. Whereby may be obſerued that the lines written on Parchment, were much more eaſily perfourmed, and of longer continuance; then on any other Skinnes or Leaues whatſoeuer, althogh they were of greater antiquity. In regard whereof, vſe of Parchment neuer failed, neither euer will, eſpecially for ſerious ſeruices: albeit, the Paper which is now in vſe among vs, perhaps is eaſier and cheaper to be had, and may better fit the paſſage of infinite Letters, which ordinarily are entercourſed vpon all occaſions, and neceſſitie of haſt.

Ptolomie Philadelphus, and the 72. Interpreters.

Parchment of longer continuance then Paper.

Hauing thus farre proceeded in diſcourſe, concerning the firſt inuention of Letters, Paper, Parchment and writing: me thinkes, I ſhould very much forget my ſelfe, if the famous Art of Printing ſhould paſſe vnſpoken of, whereby ſo many Bookes are Imprinted, with no meane expedition, and which I doe ingeniouſly confeſſe, to be the beſt inuention in the world. By one Authour, the deuiſer therof is ſaid to be an Allemaigne or Germaine, of the Citty of Mentz, named Iohn Fauſtus, (although Polidore Virgill doe call him Peter) yet others tearme him Iohn Cuthemberg, confeſſing him alſo to be a Germaine, and a Knight, and that the firſt impreſſion of any Booke, was in the yeare of our Lord, 1453.

Concerning the incomparable Art of Printing.

At what time the inuention of Printing was found out, and by whom.

About which time alſo, or ſoone after (as Volateranus affirmeth) this worthy Science was brought into Italy by two Brethren, named Conrades, printing firſt in Rome, and in the houſe of the Maximes: where, the firſt Booke that euer was printed, was S. Auguſtine de Ciuitate Dei, & next, the diuine Inſtitutions of Lactantius Firmianus. Exemplaries of them were not long ſince (and I thinke yet are) in the Library of the moſt reuerend Biſhop of Sarno, the Lord Luodouico Gomes, a Spaniard, a man of ſinguler learning, being Auditour of Roua, Regent of the Penetentiarie, and Referendarie of both the Signa-

The firſt Bookes printed in Rome, in the yeare 1465.

Printing began in Venice in the yeare 1483.

Signatures. After that, Nicholas Gerſon, being a Frenchman, honoured Venice therewith, in the time of Duke Auguſtine Barbarigo. And, as an inuention of ſuch merit could not be concealed; ſo ſucceeded it to many Countries, and by diuers worthy men, who beſide their Art of Printing; were learned and iudicious Correcters of errours and falſifications, eaſily ouer-ſlipped by vnskilful worke-men. Among theſe men of noat, are eſpecially commended, Aldus Manutius at Venice, who made a freſh reſtoring of the Latine tongue: Francis Priſcianez, at Rome: Baldus, Colinetus, Frobenius and Oporinus, at Baſile: Sebaſtian Gryphius at Lyons: Robert Stephanus at Paris and Antwerpe; and William Caxton at London in England, beſides many more, whoſe names I omit, for breuity.

Especial men excellent in Printing, in diuers Countries.

By theſe famous helpes, and furtherers of Learning, a number of Bookes hidden, obſcured and vtterly loſt (as it were) receiued freſh life and light again; to the no meane enſtruction and benefit of many men, whoſe learning hath made it ſelfe manifeſt (onely by the meanes of Printing) througout all Chriſtendome, yea, and elſe-where: whereas, before ſo ſacred an aſſiſtant was inuented, much greater paine and labour was imployed; whereof the fruit could neuer be ſo generall, or any ſuch perfection appeare in Learning. And, if we doe graunt, that this deuiſe was not the chiefe and principall cauſe: yet aſſuredly (I am of the mind) it was the very greateſt and moſt abſolute; becauſe, with much leſſe paine and labour, Bookes (full of imperfections) haue beene found to be corrected, and purged from thoſe macculations, blots, and blemiſhes, which ordinarilie doe attend on writing. Againe, if written corrected Copies had paſt from ſom one or two: yet they were ſo rare to come by, and not to be peruſed by many earneſt and deſirous mindes; that it hindered much forward endeuour, which this vniuerſality hath liberally friended. But, to ſpeake truely, ſince immeaſurable Licence tooke hold of Imprinting Bookes, eſpecially of Fables and fruitleſſe labours; it hath beene iudged by ſome (yet none of meaneſt wiſedome) that Printing might well haue beene ſpared from ſo general knowledge, or neuer beene vſed at all; rather then ſuch idle toyes ſhould paſſe the Preſſe, to the preuarication and impoyſoning of diuers good minds, eſpecially the younger ſort, who rather affect ſuch vaine deuiſes, then ſtudies much more commendable, and fitting for them.

Printing was the onely meanes to make learned men euery wher famous.

Very great errors formerly committed in the writing of Bookes, which (by Printing) haue beene iudiciouſly corrected.

An obiection againſt the ouer-general vſe of Printing, where by much hurt hath enſued

But leauing further ſpeech of Printing; Hand-writing muſt not bee condemned, hauing (in theſe dayes) attayned to more intire perfection, then euer was knowne in former times. Whereof Quintillian hath giuen good rules, well deſeruing obſeruation; likewiſe the learned Eraſmus, in his Booke of good and true pronounciation. And heerein Eraſmus muſt be my directour, becauſe he ſaith: Blinde men haue beene inſtructed in good writing. For they had Tables made of Porphirie, Bone, or of ſome Mettall, wherein were inſculpted the letters of A. B. C. D. E. &c. Then the blinde partie tooke ſome ſharpe pointed Inſtrument in his hand (made apt and able to vſe impreſſion, yet with eaſe and facilitie) and his hand being guided by the enſtructers: vſe and practiſe framed a ſhape of each Letter in the blinde mans minde, according to the remembrance of true forme and faſhion, wherof cuſtomarie acquaintaince (by heed and attention) gaue an Image, and of euery Letter really in his memory, which afterward he could (with eaſe) forme vpon the Table, or any thing elſe of reſpect, whereto his minde ſtood moſt affected. Wherin might appeare ſome defect or impediment, but yet it would be well made, and indifferently leageable. After which often experimented proof, he may write vpon Paper, in true order and Method: or any elſe, that (blind-folded) ſhal make vſe thereof, concerning any matter that beſt fitteth his fantaſie.

Of writing, and the perfection thereof in theſe dayes.

Eraſmus Rotterd. in Libde ver. pro.

Blinde men that could write very perfectly, and by what manner of practiſe.

Vſe is the Mother of perfection.

CHAP

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the first Libraries in the world: As also, what Pictures and Portraitures of memorable men, were obsequiously preserued in them.

IT is not to be doubted, but that the first Bookes and Libraries that euer were in the world, must needes bee among the Hebrue people. For, as it is certaine, that Letters were by them first knowne, and vse made of them: so is it likewise to be presumed, that they were not neglect or careless in keeping them, or whatsoeuer they committed to writing. This is iustified by the authority of Iosephus, before alleadged, as also, by that which we reade in the holy Scriptures. Isidorus relateth, that after the Chadæans had burned the Library of the Hebrewes, with all the Bookes of the Lawes: the Hebrewes being gon backe againe to Ierusalem, the Prophet Esdras (being thereto lightened by the blessed Spirit) repaired that losse, by writing those Bookes ouer againe, reducing them into the number of two and twenty Bookes, according to the number of the Alphabet letters. Whereby may be gathered, that after Moyses had written: the Hebrewes had a Library, wherein they preserued the Books of the Law, as well those which we haue of the old Testament, as the rest, whereof wee haue already made mention. Among which, was the Booke of Enoch, alleadged by Saint Iude the Apostle in his Epistle, spoken of also before: And the Book of the warres of the Lord, whereof memory is made in the twenty one Chapter of Numbers: And the Booke of the iust seruants of the Lord, alleadged in the first Booke of the Kings: and the Booke of Samuell, recorded in the last Chapter of the first Booke of Paralipomenon: And the Booke of Nathan the Prophet, with many other beside, which appeared to haue bin burned and lost. Therefore we may plainly perceiue, that the Iewes had Libraries, and that those which appertained to the Gentiles, were both after the other, and of later time.

The first Libraries among the Hebrue people.

The Chaldeans burned all the Bookes of the Hebrues Librarie.

The Prophet Esdras re-writ the Bookes, according to the number of the Hebrue Alphabet.

Iude. Cap. 1. ℣ 4.

Numb. 21. 24.

2. Kings. 1. 18.

1. Chron. 29. 29

The Iewes had Libraries long before the Gentiles.

All the Grecians doe declare, that hee who first made any publique Library, was named Pisistratus, a Tyrant ouer the Athenians: but afterward, it was greatly increased by those people. In following time, when Xerxes came to Athens, he carried thence all those Bookes, and transported them into Persia: but a long while after, the King Selucus (called Nicanor) bought them, and caused them to be carried backe to Athens againe. This affirmation proceedeth from Aulus Gellius and Isidorus; adding moreouer, that this Library was afterward very largely increased. Notwithstanding, that Library of Alexandria in Egipt, which the King Ptolomy Philadelphus made; was (in very truth) the most excellent of all other in the world beside: because therein was the old Testament, and all the sacred writings of the seauentie two Interpreters, and a great multitude of all other bookes whatsoeuer. Yet Pliny auoucheth, that King Eumenes made another Library in the Citty of Pergama, in enuy of that which Ptolomie had founded. Aulus Gellius and Amianus Marcellinus doe say, that in the Library of Alexandria in Egipt, there were seauen hundred thousand Bookes. Seneca doth (in a manner) agree concerning the number, which although it seeme to be excessiue, yet notwithstanding, whosoeuer hath read of the expences and great cost, which the Kings of Egipt haue wasted, in the making of Obeliskes, Pyramides, Temples, Houses, Shippes, and other thinges of inestimable charge (some part of which matters are spoken of by Budeus, in his Annotations on the Pandectes, and Lazarus de Baif, in his Art of Nauigation) this Library will not appeare impossible to their iudgement.

Pisistratus of Athens, made the first publique Libratie.

Aulus Gellius. in L. b. 6. Isidor. in lib. 6.

The Library of Alexandria in Egipt.

Aulus Gellius. in Lib. 6. Amian Marcel. in Lib. 7. Cap. 9.

Budeus in Annot. de Pand. Lazar. de Baif. in Ars Nauals

Bookes were brought to this Library from al the Nations of the whole world, and also in all Languages: and they that had the charge thereof, were all of them very learned men. One part was appointed for Bookes of Poetry, others also for Historiès, and elsewhere for all the Sciences and faculties: but all this learning learning thus brought together, was burned by the Soldiers of Iulius Cæsar, when he pursued Pompey thither, and fought against the people of Ptolomie, who was brought vnto Cleopatra. As for that other Librarie, which was made by Eumenes in Pergama: Plutarch saith in the life of Marke Anthonie, that it consisted of two hundered thousand Bookes.

Cæsars Souldiours burned this goodly Library.

Plutarc. in vit. Marc. Anton.

The Lybrarie which we read of in Greece, Strabo saith, that Aristotle was the first that made a Collection of Bookes together, and framed a Library of Bookes in the Citty of Athens. But therein he contradicteth the other Historians, who doe all maintaine, that it was Pisistratus, who liued long time before Aristotle. Therefore it is to be vnderstood, that Straboes meaning aymed at some one particular Man, who was neither King or Prince, as Pisistratus was: howbeit, it may be pregnantly coniectured, that Aristotle was therein much succoured and assisted by Alexander.

Strabo in lib. 7. Cap. 18.

Strabo contradicteth other Authors.

Later Libraries and Letters, wherein the Cittie of Rome, and the first that erected a publique Lybrarie there, was Asinius Pollio, of whom Pliny saith: That of the Spirits of Men he made a publique matter. The first man that brought thither any great quantitie of Bookes, was Paulus Æmilius, when he had vanquished Perseus: And next to him, L. Lucullus, from the bootie of Pontus. Iulius Cæsar also augmented and enriched the Lybraries, which he committed to the charge and keeping of Marcus Varro: but all the Lybraries in Rome, were afterward burnt and brought to nothing, by the frequent Warres, and often spoyles made of the Cittie. And yet this great losse was repaired againe, by the Emperour Domitian, for he caused search to bee made thorough all Countries, for Bookes of any Nature whatsoeuer; yea, he sent into Ægypt, to haue the Lybrarie that remained there, to bee transported to Rome. Whereby it verie plainely appeareth, that all King Ptolomies Bookes were not destroyed (as formerly hath beene said) because a great part of them were afterward recouered. And Paulus Orosius doth heere perswade me, when he saith; Foure hundred thousand of the Bookes were burned: And by the confirmation of other Historians; we finde, that there were seauen hundred thousand in all, and three hundred thousand doe then appeare to be saued; howbeit, some would faine enforce, that they were all burned.

The first publike Library in Rome made by Asinius Pollio.

Paulus Orosius in lib. 9.

But returning to the Lybrarie of Rome againe, the same Paulus Orosius saith, that in the time of the Emperor Commodus, it was once more burned: neuertheless, Gordianus the Emperour regained a great number of Bookes, to the estimate of seauentie and two thousand Volumes. And that (which is much more notable) hee enioyed them by the last Will and Testament of * Seranus Samonicus, to whom they first appertained, according as Iulius Capitolinus recordeth. There were many other great and goodlie Lybraries among those of elder times, as well priuate and meane persons, as Princes and great Lords. But the first Librarie among the Christians, was that (as Isidorus testifieth) of Pamphilius the Martire, whose life is registred by Eusebius; and that he had thirty thousand volums in his Library.

Romes Library burned again in the time of the Emperor Commodus.

* This man was fetched from the Plough, and made Senator of Rome.

The first Lybrary among the Christians.

We read of a common Custome obserued among those graue Men, chiefely in their Lybraries: where they preserued the Pictures, Portraites, and Statues, of such men as had been most excellent in Learning. Pliny also saith, that Marcus Varro (euen in his life time) so merited by his learning: that his Statue was kept in the Library of Asinius Pollio. Cicero wrote to Fabianus the Gaule, that he should buy him some Statues and Portraites, wherewith to grace and beautifie his Lybratie. The younger Pliny, writing to Iulius Seuerus, saith; that Herennius Seuerus (a very excellent learned man) placed in his Librarie (among other Pictures) those of Cornelius and Titus Arius; sufficient testimony haue we of all those things.

Pictures of famous learned men preserued in Libraries.

Plin. in lib. 9. Cap. 7.

Plin. secundus in lib. 4.

Al the Libraries in Rome burned and spoyled.

Domitian the Emperor restored the Libraries losse.

Now, concerning these recited Lybraries, and those of many other learned men, and of Princes also, in imitation of their example: they were all destroyed and rauaged by the Gothes, Alaines, and Vandales, vntill such time as

(by the goodneſſe of God) both in our daies, and thoſe of our fore-fathers, many learned and ſtudious men liued, whoſe paines and endeuours created infinite others, from whom haue proceeded heapes of huge Volumes; albeit I thinke them not the tenth part, compared with thoſe which their graue Auncients left in Writing. Beſide, ſuch as haue beene found, were ſo vncorrected, corrupted and badlie written: that had it not beene for the indulgent trauaile, of diuers great and worthy perſonages, they could hardly haue beene reduced to any order and perfection.

Who were the notorious deſtroyers of Libraries and Learning.

Our Bookes' not equalling the tenth part of our Ancients.

CHAP. XXVII.

The Interpretation of the Imperiall Titles, heeretofore giuen by the Romaine Emperours, as they haue beene found regiſtred in the Bookes De Iuriſprudentia, abbreuiated and re-collected by commandement of the Emperour Iuſtinian, to wit: Of the Gothes, Allemaignes, Germaines, Alanes, Vandals, Affricanes, Gætes, Girpides, &c. and of many other Nations, appertaining to the ſame kinde of Argument.

THE Romaine Emperors, in their Imperiall Titles of honour and renowne, did not onely obſerue and giue vnto themſelues, the Names or Appellations of thoſe Prouinces wonne by them, and reduced vnder the yoake of their Empire: but likewiſe of ſuch Nations and people, as left their own Countries (in abounding multitudes) and entred on the Landes and poſſeſſion of others, thence to chaſe and expell the naturall Inhabitants, to plant there their owne abiding, by giuing them ſundry battailes, and ſome way ſurmounting, though not wholly exterminating them. Vpon which reaſon, Iuſtinian would entitle himſelfe, of the Goths, Allemaignes, Vandales, and of others. Of which Nations, I purpoſe to ſpeake in ſome meaſure, what people they were, and whence they came: becauſe (at length) they ruined the great Romain Empire. Whereto I am the rather induced, to enſtruct ſuch as are little skilled in Hiſtories (not onely Coſmographicall, but likewiſe Geographicall) how thoſe people did not onely weaken and ruinate the ſaide Empire: but alſo did caſt out the true and naturall Dwellers, of the verie greateſt part of our Hemiſpheare.

Vaine Titles affected by the Romaine Emperours.

Strange people and Nations that weakened and ruined the Romain Empire.

Moreouer, they compelled the Emperours to graunt them places, wherein to liue (afterward) in peace and quietneſſe: for theſe Nations were the cauſe, whereby many Countries changed both their manners, Language, and Religion, which matters are neceſſarie to be ſpoken off, as nerely appertaining to our argument.

We will begin then firſt with the Gothes, becauſe they were the firſt, that forſooke their owne Natiue Country: which was called Gothia, or Gothland, as ſignifying a good Land, it beeing a Northerne Prouince of Germanie. This Land abounded in Graine, Fruites, Cattle, Woodes, Riuers, Mettalles: but eſpeciallie in Copper, and Skinnes ſeruing to make Furres. At all times, and as yet (to this inſtant daie) is to bee diſcerned, the Kingdome of Sweſſia, or Sweuia, hath beene comprized vnder the Dominion of the Gothes. As the Countrey was fertile in Fruites of the Earth; euen ſo were the Weomen thereof likewiſe in Children: for, as they were ſtrong, and of great ſtature, ſo had they vſually two Children at a birth, which was the cauſe then, and ſo it yet continueth, that they had more people, then could well liue together, the Countrey not beeing ſufficient to yeilde ſuſtenance for ſo many. In like manner, they were very great feeders, eating much more then they that liue in the Eaſterne or Meridionall parts.

Of the Goths, their original, Country, and nature.

More plenty of people, the the Country was able to feed and noriſh.

Theſe people of the Gothes, perceiuing, and aduiſedly pondering on the fore-ſpecified reaſons: leuyed the more part of the youngeſt and ſtrongeſt men of their Countrey, to the number of three

A leuy of three hundred thouſand able men among the Gothes.

three hundred thousand; and marryed such as were not, to ridde themselues of the charge of Daughters, as well as of Sonnes, for the Countrey ordinarily abounded in the Feminine, more then in the Masculine Sexe. So, being well prouided of all necessaries for Warre, and leauing a chiefe Commander at home, of the Royall linage: they wandered abroad thorow the Fieldes, to winne by power, or compasse by Loue, some new habitation wherein to liue.

The Gothes wander to seeke a new dwelling.

Trebellius.

Many Authours, and, among the rest, Trebellius saith, that the first rumour of this their straying, was vnder the raigne of the Emperour Flauius Claudius, about the yeare of our Lord Iesus Christ, two hundred seuenty two. And that they passed thorow Germany, Hungaria, Thrace, Greece, Gaule, and so farre as Italie. They lost many battailes, and wonne likewise as many, against the Romaines and other people, maintaining themselues so well: that they raigned in Italie (euen in despight of the Italians and Emperours) the space of seauentie and one yeares; as Procopius auoucheth. At length they went into Spaine, whence (afterward) they would not remooue: for the Catholique Kinges of Spaine that then raigned by succession, and raigne yet to this present, descended from the race and line of their Kinges, who were (indeed) very generous people.

Procopius, concerning the Gothes in Italy and Spain.

Now, it is to be imagined, that in regard of such a mighty muster of men, the Countrey of Gothia, or Goth-land, or the Neighboring Borders, remained not without Inhabitants, or the rule of Kinges: For there were euen then left behind, so many as the Land was able to nourish, who had their Kinges in authority ouer them, and strength sufficient to with-stand any inuasion of the Country. As for the conquering Armies abroad, they continued in honour for a verie long time; albeit, they lost great store of men in battailes, encounters, surprizals, and passages of Riuers: for these disaduantages were still supplyed, by the daily birth of Children among them, because they had their Wiues in all places among them. And perhaps some Straungers mingled among them, who wearing their habites, and learning their Language; helpt still to encrease the frie of this people.

The reason of the Gothes maintenance and continuance.

The conquering Armies abroad in trauaile.

Such as haue beene named Ostrogothes, were a people of the same Countrey of Gothia or Gotteland, from a place which is called Ostrogothia, the principall Cities whereof, are Scheing and Lincops. This people made their warre apart by themselues, beeing separated from the Gothes, yet ranuging abroad in the wide World, according as they did.

Of the Ostrogothes, & their Countrey.

The Westrogothes (in like manner) came out of a Countrey called Westrogothia, among whom, the chiefest Cities, yet to this present daie, are tearmed Scaris and Veruen. Wisigots, or Bisigothes, came forth of a Countrey named Visbi, the very principall whereof, is yet stiled Visbi. I was the more willing to make this description, because I haue heard of diuers (who are but slenderly experienced in Cosmography) that they do term those Ostrogothes, to be Gothes Orientall, or of the East; and the Westrogothes, Occidentall Gothes, or dwelling in the West, and so contrariwise of the other. Albeit, they are all descended, and came out of the Kingdome of Gothia, or Gotteland, according as Munster hath very well obserued.

Of the Westrogothes.

Wisigots or Bisigothes.

The error of some young Cosmogrephers.

Munster.

The Vandals, in the erronious iudgement of Procopius, a learned Greeke Authour, are saide for to be of the verie same Nation; and that all the seuerall people of the Gothes, Vandalles, Alaines, Hunnes, and diuers others, (whom I am heereafter to describe vnto you) were derined out of one and the selfe-same Land, and are all comprehended vnder the name of Sauromates, or Sarmates, and haue no other difference, but onelie by the names of their Captaines or Kinges. But I must maintaine against him, that the Land of the Vandales is distant from Gothland, aboue the space of two hundered leagues, and therefore they cannot bee one people with the Gothes. True it is, that this Nation is Septentrionall, or in the North, as the others are, and in a Maritime Countrey also, named yet to this day Vandalia, as I haue already ſaid, yet very far off the one from the other.

The errour of Procopius concerning the Vandals.

Gothes and Vandals two seuerall people.

The trauailes of the Vandals into diuers Countries.

This people did (almoſt) as much hurt to the Romaine Empire, as the Gothes did, for, ioyning diuers other people with them (as the Alaines, Suabes and Franconians:) they trauerſed the Rheine, Gauderichus beeing then their King, and paſſing among the Gaules, waſted and ſpoyled them very greatlie. Then went they into Spaine, and (in deſpight of the Gothes) tooke poſſeſſion of that part of the Countrey, which ioyneth to the Kingdome of Granada, and is (to this day) called Vandalia, or (by corrupting the Word) Vandaluſia, albeit the Spaniards mince it more nicely, and nick-name it to be Andaluſia. To be briefe, they were (after much waſt and ſpoyle) expulſed foorth of Spaine wholy, in the yeare foure hundred thirtie one, vnder another of their Kinges, named Genſericus, and paſſed thence into Affrica, where they raigned ſeauenty ſixe yeares. From thence they were compelled to auoyde, in the ſeauenth yeare of the Emperour Iuſtinian, in Anno. Domino. 528. by the valour of one of his Captaines, named Beliſarius.

They poſſeſſed Spaine & Affrica, which in the end wer deiected by them.

The Vandals expulſed out of Affrica by Beliſarius.

The Hunnes alſo departed out of their Countrey, for the ſelfe-ſame cauſe as the Goths did, about the yeare one hundred ſixtie eight, onely to ſeek ſome other Land, where they might liue after the Scythians Religion: firſt getting poſſeſſion of Pannonia, where they alwaies ſo ſtrongly kept and guarded it, that (according to their owne name) it became to be called Hungaria. This people came from that part of Scythia, which was tearmed * Hunos, no long diſtance from the Riuer Tanais: but it is in a miſerable eſtate at this day, and vnder ſubiection of the Moſcouite. Hauing vſurped Pannonia, they kept it manfully againſt the Romaines, and two hundred yeares after, Attila their King, accompanied with ſome people of the Allemaignes or Germaines; as Bohemians, Gepydes or Gyrpides, Schleſites, Werlies, Thuringians, Gothes, Oſtrogothes, and others, making (in all) about the number of ſixe hundred thouſand Men: paſſed thorough Allemaigne, which they very much endammaged.

The Hunnes of Scythia, and their trauails.

* Hunos a part of Scythia, inhabited by the Hunnes.

Attila King of the Hunnes.

Then went he into France, where hee loſt a battaile, in which periſhed a great number of his men. This battaile was giuen him by the Romaines, Gaules, and certaine Gothes allyed together, and he loſt (as ſome Authours doe affirme) aboue two hundred thouſand men. At length he iournyed into Italie, which he (wel-neere) vtterlie ruined, and retiring afterward home into his owne Countrey of Hungaria: he dyed within ſome few following moneths, and on the day of his Nuptials, which was in the yeare of Ieſus Chriſt, foure hundred forty three.

The great loſſe that Attila ſuſtained in France.

Of the Lombardes, and whence they deſcended.

The Lombardes were a Northerne people, iſſuing out of Denmarke, as Euſebius maintaineth, and no other reaſon had they to leaue their Natiue Countrey; but onely a deſire to winne ſome other. There happened in the time of one Seno, or Sweno (yet ſome tearme him Snio) a very great dearth or ſcarſitie of victuals in the Land, and becauſe the people endured it verie impacientlie: it was concluded by the King and his Councell (to eaſe the Country of ſo many men as were ready to famiſh) that all ſuch perſons as were vnable, eyther for Warre, or labour of the Ground; ſhould be ſlaine, whether they were old or young. But this ſeuere Edict being reuoked, they then reſolued to make a leuy of all ſortes of people, that (by the helpe of Armes) might trauaile to finde out ſome other dwelling, ſo to diſcharge the Countries heauy burthen.

A very ſeuere and cruell Edict, but ſpeedily recalled, and better meanes deuiſed.

This being put in Execution, they trauailed ſo farre, and carryed themſelues ſo couragiouſlie in trauerſing diuers Landes: that they came at laſt into Italie, and there conquered the Countrey, which was called Iſtria, making themſelues abſolute Maiſters thereof. Now, becauſe theſe people were long and taule of ſtature: the Italians and Iſtrians tearmed them long Barbarians, which by corruption of the Word, and ſucceſſion of times, made them to be called Longbardes, or Lombardes. Some are of opinion, that vnder the raigne of Valentinian the Emperour, they beganne to make themſelues firſt knowne; which was about the yeare of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, Iſtria in Italy conquered & new-named Lombardie.

Christ 385. and that they became Commaunders in Istria, in the yeare 570. Likewise, according to Petrus Diaconus, the Emperours made peace with them, in the yeare, seuen hundred and thirtie, and euer since they haue held that Countrey, which at this day is named Lombardy.

Petrus Diaconus concerning the Lombardes.

Let it heere be further noted, that where (in any Historie) mention is made of people tearmed Daces, or Danians; the Nation of Danemarke, is thereby vnderstood. Out of which Countrey, many great Armies haue trauailed at sundry times, and haue mightily troubled diuers Kingdomes: among which, they continued a long time in England, but were thence expelled, about the yeare eight hundred sixtie, as is generally granted.

Daces or Danians, people of Danemarke.

The Normanes were people of Nordwegia, or otherwise called Normania, a Northerne Countrey, being much addicted to crueltie and inhumanitie, because they vsed many great Piracies on the Seas. An hundred and fifty thousand Men (of this Nation) bestowed themselues in Vessels on the Sea, and tooke possession of that part of Gaule, or France, which was then named Neustria, now Normandie, and this was done in the yeare of Iesus Christ, sixe hundred; and others say, eight hundred eightie foure, and in the time of Charles Le Gros. But be it howsoeuer, they haue (since then) kept it against all encounters of the Emperours, Kings of France and England, preseruing it still by the name of Normandy, and themselues reckoned to be people of vndaunted courage. There are diuers others, that doe sauour of this their first Originall, and doe yet proule vppon the Seas, committing many Thefts and Robberies.

The Normans issued from Nordnegia, or Normania.

Neustria now named Normandy, & hath so continued long time.

The Nation which we call Suisses, Suesses, or Sweues, but more vulgarlie Zuitzers, and are (at this day) auxiliarie vnto the Freneh: came out of Suetia, Sweuia, or Sweueland, a Northerly Region like to the other. They likewise, by reason of the dearth of foode among them: departed foorth of their owne Countrey, about the yeare of Grace, eight hundred, and went so farre as the Rheine, which they would haue passed; but were hindred by the Franconians. Thence went they to the Land of the Heluetians, who despising the Suesses, (because they were poorely and wretchedly apparrelled, rude in their feeding, and not looking like Souldiours) suffered them to wander about their Countrey.

Suesses or Zuitzers came out of Sweuia.

The Suesses despised by the Helueti ans

At length, perceiuing the kinde sufferance of the Helueti ans: they sought to abide in a certaine Canton of their Land. Which when the Helueti ans noted, they demaunded of them; to what end they thus wandered about the World? They answered, That they were poore people, and sought but to weare out their liues in trauaile, by deluing or labouring in the Earth. And seeing that there was wast ground in those partes, vnlaboured, or any vse made of (it being Hilles and Vallyes, enuironed with diuers Lakes) they desired the Helueti ans, to permit them to labour in those rough Fieldes, as yet not cultiue: and they should receiue the gaine and benefit thereof, onely allowing them but nourishment for their paines. This was all that they seemed to pretend, iustifying their requests with many sollemne Oaths and protestations. Their desire was granted, and not long after, the Countrey wherein they liued, was not onely called Suessia, in regard of the Suessians there dwelling: but likewise the Auncient Inhabitants had the same Name giuen them, and (in truth) the Country is very mountainie, and vnapt for riding.

Their pouerty among the Helueti ans, & their request to them.

The Helueti ans did grant the Suesses request.

Iustinian, and other Emperours, (both before and after him) entitled themselues Lordes of the Allemaignes, by hauing receiued some victories against the Allemaignes. But this may not be saide (as some haue done heeretofore) that those victories were obtained against the Germaines: for euen at this present daie, when that wee speake or Write of Allemaigne; therein is comprehended all the Nations, which are contained throughout Germanie, and that doe speake the language of the Teutones. But as concerning Allemaigne it selfe, and Allemaignes; the Romaines neuer vnderstood, or meant any other people, then those

Of the Allemaignes and whence they were derined.

The true Allemaignes were of Suaba.

of Suaba. And, to speake vprightly, they euer haue beene (and are) the true and Auncient Allemaignes; as Cornelius Tacitus plainely confirmeth. Drusus Nero was the first, that styled himselfe Germanicus: for hauing rather angered the Germaines, then foyled them, as diuers other Emperours afterward did. Moreouer by Germanie is to be vnderstood nine and forty great Prouinces, as well of the lower part, as of the higher part of the said Germanie, comprizing the Countries of the Switzers and Heluetians.

Drusus Nero Germanicus.

Germany containeth 49. great Prouinces.

Ouer and beside the fore-named Titles, they vsed the word Analicus, which by translation, implyeth Alaines. Many haue supposed, that these were a people of Germanie, but therein they were and are deceiued: for Ptolomy knew them well, and placed them in a part of Scythia. Capitolinus bestowes them in Dacia; Marcellinus, Pliny, & Dionisius the Poet, doe graunt them a being in Sarmatia of Europe.

Of the Alains, and what people they were Iosephus, in his last Booke, affirmeth their aboad to be betweene the riuer Tanais, and the Palus Mæotides: and saith moreouer, that (in his time) these Alaines or Alanes, accompanied with the Hircanians; both robbed and spoyled all the Region of the Medes. As for my selfe, by that which I haue gathered, from such as haue written on the actions of the Gothes: I am perswaded, that those Alaines were their Companions, and that oftentimes (in their Warres) for their owne aduantage, they sundred themselues from them, as one while they did with the Vandales. But questionlesse, their descent was from Scythia, according to the affirmation of Ptolomy.

The Alaines companions with the Goths in their wars.

If we shall speake of the Gepydes, Gyrpides, or Iupedes, and what people they were: there are opinions enow concerning them. Some say, that they were (at the first) of Scythia, and came thence (as the Lombards did) into Italy. But hauing made a more curious and diligent search; I find, that they were a people of Germanie, being then called Gepudij, or Sepusij, and (according to Ptolomeus Mataueſtus) now at this day, Siebemburgs; who followed the Gothes, the Vandals and the Normanes also, they being erring and vagabond people. Till at length they ventred on the Seas, and went to inhabite the Isles of the Orchades, whereof Thille is the latest inhabited, as Volateranus auoucheth, and now is subiect to the Kings of Scotland.

Of the Gepides, Gyrpides, or Iupedes.

Gepudij or Sepusij.

The Getes haue beene, and are yet a warlike people, instantly much molested by the Turkes; but they found the Romaines work enough to doe, consisting of Transiluanians, Wallachians, Moldauians, and other Countries about the Riuer Ister, which falleth into the Pontick Sea.

Of the Getes, a famous warlike people.

I may not be forgetful of the Bourguignons, because I my selfe descended of that Nation. Orosius holdeth, that they are deriued out of Germany; And Volateranus saith, that Iouinianus the Emperour vanquished such a people, which liued by the Riuer of Rheine. But there is nothing more certaine (according as I haue gathered by the Germaine Histories) then that they issued from some remaines of the Gothes, Vandales, and Hunnes, who beeing altogether chased by the Romaines; threw themselues vpon that part of Gaule, which they stiled after their owne name, and there (perforce) entthroned themselues. For afterward, they could so well resist the Romaines, that they were constrained to yeild them tolleration, and let them liue in the saide Countrey amongst the first Inhabitants. There they builded Fortes, Villages, and Townes, which they tearmed Bourgs or Bouroughes of Gothes and Hunnes. And then coueting (corruptly) to speake it in one Word: from Bourg Goth Hunnes, they came to be called Bourguignons, as much to say, as a warring people.

Of the Bourguignons, and whence they are issued.

Bourgougne named after the Bourguignons.

Ætius, Lieutenant to the Emperour Theodosius, gaue them a battaile in the yeare of Christ. 435. and won the day: but it cost him so deare, that he would neuer after meddle any more with them. About the yeare 430. they receiued and embraced the Christian Faith. These people grew on in great ciuility, and became as much addicted to Learning, as to Armes: For they haue a goodly vniuersity, founded by one of the Dukes of Bourgongne, wherein many Lectures are read of all the Sciences, to Schollers of all Nations, at Dola, the capitall City of that part of Bourgongne, which is vnder commaund of the house of

Of their own first names.

Attius fo'led the Bourguignons.

A faire vniuersity, builded by a duke of Bourgougne.

of Austria, and there they hold a Parliament also. As for the other part of Bourgongne, in obedience to the crown of France: Digeon is the Metropolitane Citty thereof, where likewise is held another Parliament. And these two Bourgongnes are maintained in very good peace, albeit they are in obedience to diuers Princes.

Digeon the Metropolitane Citty.

The fore-named Emperours did also stile themselues by names of Franques, as hauing fought with and repulsed the Franconians, who were risen vp in armes, and departed out of their Countrey of Germany. But so slender were their impeachings, that they inuaded the Gaules, which then were Prouinces of the Romaines, notwithstanding, all the best meanes they could make. They were entitled Affricanes likewise, for hauing obtained some Conquests in Affrica: And Parthians also, for hauing wonne some victories ouer the Parthians. Stephanus ranketh them among the people of Scythia: but I neuer knew, or read, that the Romaines made the Parthians tributary, being their best Friendes, for they had more victories ouer the Romãs, then euer the Romans had against them. They did not leaue their Countries, and sought after a new habitation, eyther for pouertie or necessitie: but rather to conquer Kingdomes and Prouinces; as Media, Hircania, Armenia, Caramania, and many other. The Riuer Euphrates was the limits between them and the Romaines: but those Romaine Emperours, vpon the declining of their Empire, were Princes full of follie and vain-glory, attributing Titles to themselues, without any matter of right or merit.

Of the Franks or Franconians

Affricanes and Parthians.

Stephanus.

Euphrates the boundes betweene the Parthians and Romaines.

They gaue themselues also the Title of Happy and Prosperous, albeit they were (oftentimes) the most infortunate men al of other, as wel in their home affaires, as the Negotiations of the Empire. For (day by day) they lost their Prouinces, which precedent Auncient Captaines (endowed with many vertues) and worthy Romaine Consuls had won, by no meane expence of paines, and effusion of their blood.

Titles full of vanity and fond selfe-conceit.

Moreouer, the most part of the Emperors, beheld their Wiues, Children, and Friends, murdred and massacred; yea, and themselues subiect to no better fortune in the end: as Iustinian, who was cast out of his Empire by Florianus. They would likewise be called Inclytes, that is to say; Princes of glorious renowne, victorious, triumphing, and euermore Augustus, as much to say, as enlargers of the Romaine Empire: but, as I formerly said, these were but such Titles as Flatterers gaue them, for the greater number of those Emperours, after that these stiles of honour were imposed on them; could boast of no such happinesse, but rather came farre short of any such felicities.

The misery of most of the Romain Emperors.

The signification of Augustus.

Thus haue ye briefely seene the originall of all those people, which those Emperours made vaunt to haue foyled and vanquished: howbeit, though they were tearmed barbarous by them, yet (by little and little) they rent and tore their Empire in pieces. At this day they are all become ciuilized, and (well-neere all) Christians: onely the Parthians excepted, who are Mahumetists, partaking in the Turkes Religion.

Those Nations are become Christians.

But hauing spoken of so many Nations, who are al said to be deriued from the Scythians: wee may not omit to say some-what of the Picts, who (by the opinion of most Writers) do beare the name of a people of Germanie, that had their Originall out of Scythia, descending of the * Agathyrsi in Sarmatia, that vsed to paint and couler their faces, and thereupon were named Picts. Before they entred into Brittaine, they inhabited the Isle of Orkney for a long time together, ferrying ouer into Cathnesse daily, multiplying so in power and number: that (getting vp further into the Land) they possessed Rosse, Murreyland, Merne and *Anguss*e, whence passing into Fife and Louthian, they droue thence the Britaine Inhabitants, who were onelie poore people, that liued by nourishing & breeding Cattle This their entrance into Albion (for so was it then called) was in the yeare of the Worlds Creation 3633.

The originall of the Picts, & their comming into the Isle of Orkney

* A rich people bordering on the Scythians.

They were named Picts, of painting their faces.

Cruchneus Camelenus is said to be the first King of the Picts, and that he builded a famous Citty on the banke of the Riuer cald Caron, appointing it to be the chiefe Citty of all the Pictish Kingdom. He builded also the Towne of Agneda, afterward called Edenbrough, of Ethus, King of the Picts, and the Castle, named Cruthneus Camelenus first King of the Picts.

The

The Castle of Maydens, because the Pictish Kinges kept their Daughter there, vnder strict custody, and in all good exercises, till their meete yeares for marriage.

Concerning the warres, strifes, and bloody contentions betweene the Albion Scots and Pictes, thorow all their Kings raigne, till their vtter ouerthrow, and quite dissolation of Pictland, by Kenneth the victorious King of Scots: I referre it to fitter time and place, onely letting ye know, that this subuersion & and vtter ruine of the Picts, happened in the yeare of our redemption, 839. in the sixt yeare of King Kenneths glorious raigne, and 1168. yeares after their first Plantation in Albion.

Kenneth King of Scots quite desolated Pictland.

CHAP. XXVIII.

What benefit Musique bringeth to a Common-wealth; And how it hath beene naturally giuen to al Nations in the world, and (by the iudgement of some Historians) hath cured diuers infirmities and diseases of the mind.

The folly of some ouer-curious Law-makers.

VEry certain it is, that some Law-makers, peeuish, troublesome, and ouer-hard in many matters, whereof Lycurgus was one: did expel Musick out of their Commonwealths, affirming, that it made people effeminate, negligent, and idle. But I am of a quite contrary minde, and dare maintaine, that such as will truely consider Musique, and what it is in it selfe: shall finde, that it can make men bold, hardy, modest, and chast, especially being wel and vertuously vsed. Vnder this kind of Musique, I comprehend not onely that which is sung by Art and mellodiously, as by the voyces of Men, Weomen, or Children: but also I presuppose (within the same compasse) all Instruments; as Flutes, Lutes, Viols, Drums, Trumpets, Organes, Virginals, Harpes, and others. And there is not any thing, that maketh men more ciuilly minded, or preserueth them in better concord and amitie, then Musique.

The Authors comprehension of Musick.

Polybius declareth, that the great Common-wealth of the * Cynethenses in Arcadia, falling from the delight they formerly had in Musique: grew soone after into seditious humors, & ciuil wars among themselues, wherein there wanted not any kind of crueltie. And when all their Neighbors round about them, were meerely confounded with admiration, as wondring how these people should become so harsh, barbarous, and rude, considering that all the other people of Arabia, had by them been reduced to curtesie and humane tractability: Polybius was the first that took notice thereof, and auouched, that it onely proceeded, by leauing the vse of Musique, which (from all Antiquity) had euermore beene prized and honoured in Arcadia, more then in any other place of the World. For it was especially ordained, by the customes and decrees of the Countrey, that euery one should make vse thereof for the space of thirty yeares; yea, vpon very great paines and penalties. And this was the reason (saith Polybius) that the first Law-makers among those people, ordained and appointed continuall vse thereof: onely to cause ciuility & humanity, in regard, that (of their owne naturall disposition) they were wilde, fierce, and barbarous, as all people inhabiting the Mountaines, and cold Countries are.

Polib in Lib. 4. Cap. 7.
* A Citty in Arcadia, nere Lepreum.

A Common-wealth quite ouerthrowne by leauing Musicke.

Lawes and Customes for the vse of Musicke.

Perhaps the like iudgement might passe on the Gaules of former times, whom Iulian the Emperour tearmed the barbarous people of his daies: which Nation (neuertheless) became afterward so courteous and tractable, as any other people whatsoeuer in Europe, whereat all Straungers wondred not a little. And yet it is generally knowne, that no people did more practise Musique, or sung more sweetely, then they: nay, and that which goeth farre beyond this, they could daunce any daunce in France, were it Ionian or Lydian, that is to say; consisting of fiue or seauen notes or strains. Which were expresly forbidden to Youth, by Plato and Aristotle, because they had a great power and preuailance, in softning and humbling the hearts of men. They would also exercise their Children to the * Dorion Musique, which was the first or chiefest note, to maintaine them in an harmonious sweetnesse, accompanied

Of the Gauls

Iul. imp. in Epist. ad Antiot.

The Gaules were generally addicted to Musick.

Plato in Lib. de Leg. et Republ.

* A certaine kind of Musick representing grauity.

panied with grauitie, which was the Dorion proper effect.

Dances vſed in the Leſſer Aſia.

Such prohibition might better haue beene vſed in the leſſer Aſia, where they had no other dances, but of fiue or ſeuen ſtraines, eſpecially in the Countreyes of Ionia and Lydia. But people inhabiting the Northern parts; cold, Mountainous, and Rocky, who are ordinarily more ſauage, or leſſe courteous then the Inhabitants of the South, or dwelling on Plaines, neuer can be better qualified or ſoftened, then by vſing the Ionian & Lydian hermony, which was alſo forbidden in the Primitiue Church: and nothing was there permitted to bee ſung, but of the firſt note, which is now moſt of all frequented in Churches. And like as men do diſarme ſauage Beaſts of furie & violence, to make them of a more tractable Nature: euen ſo, the Lydian and Ionian Muſicke or hermony, diſarmeth the verie rudeſt and moſt barbarous Nations, of all their former, ſauage, and cruell Natures, cauſing them to become milde, pliant, and affable. According as it fell out with the Gaules, who (it may be) could not haue beene tamed & made obedient vnto the ciuill Lawes and Ordinances of a Monarchy, if their former ſterne Nature (which the Emperor Iulian ſaid, was ſo high, and vnſufferable of ſeruitude) had not bin mollified and ſweetned by Muſicke.

Songes of the firſt note or ſound, not vſed in the primitiue church

The ſtern nature of the Gaules, ſoftened by Muſicke.

Muſick, is one of the members of the Mathematickes, as beeing a Science attracted from numbers: becauſe that by them, the proportion Hermonicall is found out. Platoes will was, that Children ſhould learne to ſing, for recreation of their owne ſpirites, and to prayſe God by Hymnes. And in truth, there is nothing that more taketh away offenſiueneſſe, or eaſeth matter of great and laborious trauaile (as woorking in the ground, Maſonry, Carpentry, and exerciſing other Arts, painefull to the bodie) then ſinging doth.

Muſick a mẽber of the Mathematiks

Muſicke maketh all labor ſeeme light and eaſie.

In like manner, all Artezans, following any Trade or profeſsion, doe vſe to ſing: as Hay-makers, Harueſters, Gardiners, Deluers, Children and Weomen weeding grounds, doe weare awaie the irkeſomneſſe of their labour by ſinging, either in heate or colde, Winds or Rain, it maketh paine the more ſupportable to them.

Soldiers, euen when they goe (manie times) to be ſlaine in a battell, will yet ſing by the way: the beating of Drums, and ſounding of Fifes and Trompets, giueth courage to the Soldier for his cariage in Warre, making him hardie, bold, and valiant. Nor is it to bee doubted, that Nature gaue Muſicke and melodie to man, but onely for his good and benefit; as yong Children do apparantly manifeſt vnto vs: for, when their Nurſſes would haue them to ſleepe, and keepe them in their Cradles: euen when they are moſt impatient and froward nothing ſooner aſſwageth and preuayleth with them, then mellodie and ſinging. In ſo manie Barbarour Nations, as haue bin diſcouered in former Antiquitie, and in our dayes, in that part of the earth which is called the New-found World, Flutes haue beene found among them, Drums, Hoboyes, and other Inſtruments, and both priuately and publickely, as alſo in their Temples, ſinging of Pſalmes hath beene obſerued.

Nature gaue Muſicke vnto man for his benefit.

Muſicke in Countries of the Newe-found world.

Many creatures, as diuers kindes of Birds, when they are in any chearfull diſpoſition, will ſing to ſolace and delight themſelues: as the Nightingale, the Tarine, the Thruſh, Linnet, Blackbird, and others; among which Birds, many haue beene taught to ſing by men, as daylie in moſt places is diſcerned. As concerning foure-footed Beaſts, diuers of them doe take much pleaſure in Muſicke, as namely Camels: for if ſuch as guide and Gouerne them, doe not ordinarily ſing or whiſtle to them, they will not trauel with any ſpirit or chearfulneſſe. All ſuch as haue beene in the Eaſt Countreyes, and noted the Carauannes, which are troops of Camelles laden with Merchandizes, haue affirmed as much. Horſes that are dreſſed by their Keepers, and daily ſung vnto as they do it, are made verie manageable, gentle, and apt for the Saddle. Aboue all other Beaſts, the Hart or Stag how wilde ſoeuer he bee, if hee heare a man play on a Violl, or on a Lute, he wil (by ſtealths) draw neerer and neerer, yea and ſuffer himſelfe to bee touched, as I my ſelfe haue ſeene by experience.

Birdes that take delight in Muſicke.

Camelles are pleaſed with ſinging.

The Hart or Stag, a great affecter of Muſicke.

Muſicke hath mighty power and Authority ouer the ſpirits and affections of men: and amongſt many examples, the firſt may be of Timotheus, who by pleaſing ſounds and chaunges of his Inſtrument,

PAGINATION INCORRECT

The reason why Alexander went from a Banquet.

ment, constrained Alexander (as ouerioyed with pleasure) for to depart from a banket. Next, we may speake of Agamemnon, who was loath to part from his Countrey, and go to the siedge of Troy, becausse he was doubtfull of the modesty of his wife Clytemnestra; and therefore, he left a Musition on the Harp with her; the sound whereof, should incite her to bashfulnesse and continence, so that Ægistus could not abuse her, without killing the Musition. But in speaking of this Harper, it maketh me to remember the Royall Psalmist Dauid, who of himselfe, was a man verie strong and seuere, yet much guided and detained by his Psalterion. Nor are we to thinke, that the hermonie of this Instrument, was common or vulgar, whereof the sacred Scripture maketh mention so many times, and which was iudged only (among al other) meete to celebrate the praises of God. It is composed of seauentie two stringes, in forme trlangulare, and the consonaunce thereof, is incompareable.

Agamemnon & his Wife Clytemnestra.

K. Dauid delighted highlie in his Psalterion.

It was ordained by Moyses, that God should be praised in his Temple, with voices and Instruments; and Christians (afterward) made continuance thereof by singing Psalmes, both with voices and Organs, which greatly incited Deuotion in the verie dullest minds. It was an especiall note of ciuilitie among the Grecians, euen as it is to this day after any feast or Banquet, to play vppon some Musical Instrument, or to sing anie Ode melodiously. Which obseruation, reached into Italy, Germany, Spaine, and France, where much more account is made of a cunning Musition that can sing wel, play on Musicall Instruments, Dance, vse lostie trickes, yet keepe both tune and time, that the cadence of his feete may fit with the Instrument, then of any ydle, neglect or ignorant fellow.

Moyses apoin ted Musick in the Temple of God.

Musick obserued amongest the Grecians

Manie haue attributed the inuention of Musicke, and playing on the Lyre or Harpe, to Orpheus; others, to Amphion; the Grecians to Dionysius or Bacchus; but others, to the people of Arcadia, becausse the men of that Countrey, were naturally addicted thereto. The Hebrewes, as Moyses and Iosephus, doe say; that Iuball the Sonne of Lamech (who liued in the yeare of the worlde, 1040. manie Ages before Amphion, and al other Musitions, was the Father of all that play vppon the Harpe and Organs; and that he did first finde out the concords of Musicke; nay more, that hee carefully addicted himselfe, and played both on the Psalterion, and on the Harpe. As concerning my selfe, I will not deny, that all the fore-named men were good Musitions, but that any one man of them should bee the sole inuenter, I can verie hardly therein bee perswaded.

Of the first Inuenters of Musicke and Instruments.

Gen. 4, 21.

That no one man could be the onelie Inuenter of Musicke.

Rather I am of the minde, that euerie singuler man, according vnto the Ages wherein they liued, made addition of their skill and knowledge; and so broght it to the perfection wherein we now find it to bee. And in these verie dayes of ours, there haue liued men so excellent and skilfull, as haue added diuers Rules, which neuer were knowne before, and brought the name of Musick to admired perfection, some inuenters whereof are knowne, but other vncertaine.

Musicke brought vnto perfection in our dayes.

Before the Conclusion of this Chapter, I am desirous to set downe two seuerall experiences, concerning the efficacy and might of Musick: which my self saw practised vpon two Gentlewomen; one of them being de la March, neer to Garet, young, vertuous, and passable for beautie. This Gentlewoman fell into such a furie (by reason of a reporte made vnto her, of her husbandes inclination, to change and nouell affection) that at euery sudden moment of time, shee woulde throw her selfe headlong into the fire, or out at a Window, or into a Fish-ponde neere to her house; out of which, she had beene rescued two seuerall times; and therefore committed to more dilligent keeping.

Two experiments made of the power of Musicke.

A Gentlewoman distracted with iealously cured, and how.

Physitions could returne no good by their paines and endeuours, but a religious Capucine passing that way, and craning his Passade or Almes, at the doore of this Gentlewomans house; and hearing the strange accident befaln her, gaue them aduise, that some skilfull man, well experienced in playing vppon the Lute, should vse his cunning by her, and not to part from her in some prettie length of time, becausse it would proue verie helpfull to her. Further hee added, that in the night time, some pleasing Ditties might well consort with the Musicke, which accordingly was performed; and within lesse then three months space, the violent passion forsooke her; and she remaineth maineth at this time found both in mind and bodie.

The aduise of a Capucine frier.

The Historie of another Gentlewoman of Honor.

I likewise knew another Gentle-woman of honor at Rohen, whose name may best be knowne by du Parreau, that al her life time, did neuer vse the helpe of anie Physicke, how great or grieuous soeuer her infirmities were. But in all hir diseases, griefes, hurts, Childe-weakenesse, and lamenesse, shee neuer desired anie better Physition, then one that could artificially play on the Taber and Pipe, and him shee would entitle her true Physition.

Griefes and great infirmities cured by Musicke.

This Gentlewoman being well entred into Age, it happened, that an extreame paine seazed on her knee, immagined to proceede from some taste of the Gowte. Whereupon, she would haue her Taborer instantly, to play her a pleasaunt and liuely Carranto. The Taborer being verie willing to please his Mistris, made such hast to touch his Taber, and sounde his Pipe in the best manner: that striuing to exceede himselfe in Art and dexteritie, both in readinesse of his winde, and agility of hand, he fell down in a swoond vpon the Floore. Hee being disabled from playing any longer, and all there present wondering not a little, to see him lye in such straunge estate, without anie recouery of strength or knowledge, for the space almost, of three quarters of an houre: the Gentlewoman her selfe, euen then complained, that her paine and affliction was neuer so extraordinarilie on her, as in the time of the Musicks so suddaine cessation.

A strange accident vnto a Taborer.

The Taborer hauing recouered strength and iudgement againe, and indifferentlie refreshed with a sprightly Cup of Wine, fell afresh to his former skilfull Musicall playing, and the Gentlewoman felte her paine immediately to leaue her. I my selfe was in the Chamber when these accidents happened; and do auouch vppon my credit, that the Gentlewoman thus liued an hundred and six yeares.

The Authour auoucheth the trueth of this Historie.

In briefe, in all well pollicied and ordered Commonweales, men should enstruct their Sons and Daughters in Musicke, because it mollifieth angrie hearts, asswageth sadnesse, preserueth people in kinde concord and amitie, healeth many melancholy diseases, and is no mean exciter of the minde to deuotion. Plato was of the minde, that the Heauens (in their motion and stirring) doth make so great and melodious an hermonie, that if man could be able to vnderstand it, he would neuer be wearied with abiding in this world.

The Authors conclusion.

Musicke and melody in the heauens motion.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of Gold, the properties & excellency thereof: Where it is found: How it is extracted, purified: and what paine is bestowed in getting it.

ME thinkes, I shoulde offer great wrong to Nature, if hauing written on so manie sundry things, I shold not say somewhat concerning Gold, it beeing the most excellent of all other mettals, yea (in a maner) surpassing all things created in this neather world. For, it is saide to be immortall, exempted from all rust and corruption; insomuch, that lying hidden in the earth, in the Water, or in the most putrifyed heape of filth, for so manie yeares as any one pleaseth, yet it wil neuer receyue or tast of any imperfection; or let it be continually kept in the fire, yet it neuer diminisheth, neither receiueth any change or alteration.

Gold reputed to be immortal and free from filth or putrifaction.

His colour carrieth resemblance with the beames of the Sunne, which reioyceth or cheareth melancholy people. It hath no euil sauour or tast neither soileth their hands that meddle with it, as all other Mettals else do; which likewise float aloft aboue Quick-siluer, but Gold only goes to the bottome. If it be receiued into the bodie, it neuer offendeth the stomacke, be it either in powder, or solidly in Morselles: but contrarywise, giueth cheerefulnesse to the heart, and comforteth the vital spirits, whereto other Mettals are often offensiue.

The colour, properties, & perfections of Gold.

Therefore, let no man enter into anie meruaile, if the World doth make such estimation thereof, and prize it aboue all other thinges. For, as concerning the matter whereof it consisteth, a Learned Authour sayeth: That it is composed of

The matter wherof Gold is composed, being two Elementarie substances.

of two Elementarie substances, iustlie and equally proportioned. These substaunces then so mingled, being equall and vnited in proprietie, can endure nothing elſe, but this amiable and concordiall Commixtion, which perfecteth it selfe in the fermentation and knitting togither, making such an interligation, and absolute vnion of the one with the other; that it appeareth meerly impossible to dissolue or seperate them. So that, bee it that this ensueth by the influence of the Celestiall bodies, or by the diuturnity and power of time, or by the admirable operation of Nature; or elſe, that all these are therein assisting: yet notwithstanding, these Elementarie substances do conuert themselues into a Mettally bodie, which is tearmed Golde. The temperature whereof, with the Colligation and Vnion, maketh it so firme and solide, that not only it begetteth a common and vulgar permanencie: but receiueth likewise an incorruptible temperature, as it were, hauing (I know not how) some what in him, that enricheth and honoureth him, with al the forenamed excellent properties.

Elementarie, conuerted Metally bodies.

Merchants saile by Sea, trauell on the Land, with infinite cares, dangers, and paines, only to get this Gold. The maine intent of Soldiers, that expose themselus euerie moment into the pawes of death, or danger of her perpetuall thraldome, is only to winne Golde. For be it, that they surprize a Citty by assault, or winne the day by triall of battaile: they wil seeke after no other Luggage or Mooueables, but Gold onely: and if prisoners labor to redeeme their liues, the ransome must be Gold only. Schollers, and men experienced in all Arts, their studie & practise is to no other end, but to gaine Golde. If a payment be made to anyi great person, it must be in faire Gold. If guifts to Princes, none fitter then Golde. If but betweene Friend and Friend, the courtesie doth best expresse it selfe in Gold.

All actions & endeuours tend vnto nothing more, then to the getting of Gold.

Kinges, Emperours, and Princes, by the meanes of Golde, haue made themselues redoubted and dreadfull, and conquered manie potent Prouinces. Let Phillip King of Macedon remaine as a testimonie; who causing a re-search to bee made in the Mines of Gold which were in his Countreyes (that formerly had bin throughly digged, and quite giuen ouer) found yet so much remaining, as yeilded him the whole Conquest of Greece, and Alexander his Sonne afterward, of all the East. And many times, by the meanes of this excelling Mettall, the same King Phillip, caused impregnable places to bee surrendred to him, which he neuer could haue surprized by power.

Kingdomes & great Prouinces wonne by Gold.

To approue the truth heerof, Plutark reporteth of the same Phillip, that he hauing besiedged a place, by Nature so inexpugnable, that his owne followers aduised him to withdraw from thence: he demaunded of him that had best experience of the saide place, if there were no meanes, to let an Asse (laden with Gold) but goe about it. Whereto aunswere was made, yes doubtlesse. Then Phillip assured himselfe of taking the place, for he that was the Commaunder in it, comming to parlie, and touching the Gold, submitted himselfe to King Phillip, & the place also.

Impregnable places made passable by Gold.

The Indiaes, which be so farre off, are sought for with danger of death, and vnspeakable trauails of so manie thousands of men, which the Kings of Spaine haue continually sent thither: onely for the Mines of Golde, and rich sands so frequently found in the Riuers. Which neuer would be so fiercely followed, if I were able to recount, how manie men and women grow negligent of their own honor and good fame, onely by the base affection of Gold. But let vs nowe see, where this Golde is found; and in what manner it is come by: which I will relate in a Chapter by it selfe, least this should be offensiue to the Reader by length.

The reason why the Indiaes are so much trauayled & sought after.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXX.

How Mines of Gold are known where they are: And in what manner the Golde is taken forth & washed.

IT would require too long a labour to relate all those Regions where Golde is found; for I am perswaded, that if men did bestow their paines in seeking, Mines wold be found (almost in euerie Country: yet more in some one, then in other; and of greater ease to be obtained. In manie parts of Germany, Gold is found, as in Bohemia, Transyluania, Lauris, Sibebourg, and many other Countreyes. In England in some few places. In Macedonia in a place called Syderocapsa. In diuers parts of Affrica, as in Ethyopia, and beyond the rest, in the New worlde, which we improperly tearme India, where Gold is had with much lesse labour, then amongst vs.

All Countries supposed to haue Mines of Golde, but not alike in quantity.

Yet howsoeuer it be, nothing can be obtained without labour; and wee must not thinke, that when men are in the Indiaes, they finde Ingots readie made to their hands, and gather vp Golde, as we do stones vppon the High-wayes. Surely it cannot be so, for we finde by the Spanish Histories, that the more part of the Naturall Indians, do meerely dye with labouring in the Mines of Golde, as being ouer-enforced and constrained vnto hard toyles, and verie badly vsed by the Spaniards.

Men find not Ingots of gold ready made to their hãds.

Now adayes, no such plentie of Gold is brought thence, as formerly hath bin, for that which was sent hither, and in so great quantities, had long time before beene gathered by the Indians. And so much the rather, because the greater part of their Idolles, were made of massy Gold; the verie soles of their Shooes, Vessels, and wearing Garments. Their Temples and Royall Pallaces, were all couered quite ouer with Golde, as ours are with Lead, and manie other mooueables, which were too long and tedious to relate.

No such store of Gold now as in former times.

The Newe World emptied of her Gold.

Next, the great and admirable ransomes of manie of their Kinges, I passe ouer in silence, as being at large discoursed in diuers other Bookes. But nowe at this present, a new kind of search must bee made for Golde, with much difficult labour, and great expence of time, especially, to recouer anie such quantitie. Therefore, let vs examine the places where it is to be had, and what proceeding is vsed therein.

Mettally matters haue their propper seating in Mountaines, in the same maner, as Trees haue their roots, Trunkes Braunches, and Leaues. And those hilles, whose toppes tend towardes the South, and their feete stretch towardes the North, dooth giue a demonstration to haue Mettall in them, beecause Mettalles doe engender themselues of a verie thicke and grosse humour, which may bee knowne by the colour and sauour; for, it yeeldeth a Blacke coloured earth, in regard of the Golde and Siluer, and such is the sauour also.

Matters of Mettals, are in Mountains and discerned by colour and smell of the earth.

If yee breake two stones, of one and the same hill, if any Mettall be beneath in the bowelles thereof, yee shall apparantly perceiue, that the Stones will sauour exceedingly of Sulphure. Whereby is to bee vnderstoode, that the first creation or composure of Golde, is in the verie top and highest part of Mountaines, or other loftie places, because the Sunne there purifieth that, which is ouermuch earthy. But when Raynes and Torrents, doe (by little and little) distill vppon the hilles, they beare the Golde along downe with them vnto the lower partes of those hilles: whence likewise ensueth, that the earth rifting by the Raine, Golde therein encloseth it selfe.

Gold is created in Mountains or high Hils, and in what manner

Hauing declared sufficiently (as I think) the true Originall of Golde, and of his Mines, I come now to relate, how it is come by, as wel in Germany, as in Calicut, Peru, and other Prouinces, be they in the East, West, North, or South, in which places there are diuers diuersities of Mines. Because they must either fish for Graines of Golde in the Riuers, or Howe manie diuersities of Mines of gold there are, & how they are seuerally termed.

delue and digge in the Rockes & Mountaines, according vnto the places where such Mines are discouered. For knowledge whereof, it is to bee vnderstoode, that there be Mines, which are tearmed pendant or hanging Mines; others called lying or setled; others, oblique, or winding diuers waies: and others beside, that are streaming or gliding gently along in the earth or water.

Of Pendant Mines.

The pendant Mines, be those which are found in the sommitie or superficies of hilles or Mountaines, and haue (from thence) earth vnderneath them. Those that bee called lying or set'ed, are such as are beneath in the bottome, or playne firme ground, being carried downe thether by torrents and outragious Raines.

Of lying or setled Mines.

Of oblique or winding Mines.

And the other which are sayde to be oblique or Circkling, haue their courses thwarting or trauersing, eyther in those which hang, or in the Lying Mines. And all of these, doo disperse and spred themselues (by the meanes of little Pearling Gullets of Warer) into the neerest neyghbouring Riuers: from whence ensueth, that there are Riuers, generallie thoroughout the World, wherein is Sande and Grauell, appearing as if it were Azure and Golden in Colour, and therein are pure and fine graines of good Gold.

Of riuers that haue pure & fine graines of Golde, and how they wer discerned.

But returning to the pendant or hanging Mine, it behooueth heere to know, after what maner the Indians (and diuers other Nations, where such matter is in vse and practise) do gouerne and carrie themselues, in getting or deriuing this Mettall out of the earths entrailes.

Before we enter vppon the worke, it is necessarie to knowe, that in the Easterne Countreyes, where the people are Idolaters, such men as intend to goe and digge for Gold, and neuer were before at any Mines opening: doe abstaine from their Wiues, & all other pleasures of the body, vsing verie solemne Fastes and abstinences, adoring the Sun with earnest prayers. And this they doe, not onely because they hold a firme opinion, that Gold must needes be a sacred thing: but also to arme and settle themselues against Diabolicall Visions and illusions, which they are often subiect to in solitarie places, where they raise vp and finde so precious a Mettall, as they that haue beene in Peru, and the other Neighbouring Countreyes, confessed to haue seen, during the time of their there present abiding.

Ceremonies obserued by Idolaters in getting Gold out of the earth.

Diuelish Visions and Delusions.

Gold there is found in the earth, and in Rockie places, bee they the plaines or hilly grounds, where there is no verdure, but all naked and bare. In such partes as are without Water, as the experimented and skilful in the Veyns of Mines (knowing for a certainty what can be in such an earth) do first wash the place very cleane where they purpose to digge; which being done, they delue about eight or ten foote in depth, and as much in length and largenesse; then, in a certaine vessell made of purpose, they still doe wash the earth, as it is digged vp. If thus by washing, they finde any Golde, they continue on the labour: but if they find none, they will not yet giue ouer, vntill by digging deeper, they finde out the Rocke, which they breake and pierce thorough with their Instruments, vaulting it daylie as they goe on, with Engines and strong defences of Woodde, that the earth or stones may not fall downe vppon them.

The first maner of digging for gold, in groundes haue no Water.

Of digging til they come to the Rocke, and what is done after.

Concerning such Mines as are sought for in plaine grounds, they beginne digging (so neere as posibly they may) vnto some Brooke, Riuer, Current, or Lake: becausse thereby (in washing the earth) they may the sooner perceiue the Gold; or when any commeth to them, for otherwise, the labour would be too insupportable. And this is the reason, that the richest men in the Indiaes, haue store of Slaues, whom they onely employ in digging and deluing, beside other laborers, that bring or draw vppe the earth in Baskets, and others that carrie it to the Water in Panniers or Dossers. In the Water, bee it Riuer, Lake, Brooke, or Spring, there are diuers other slaues, that stand vp aboue the Knees, washing the saide earth (as it is brought vnto them) in Siues or Searces, making vse of no more water then is needfull, and so dexteriously seperating the Golde from the Earth, that as the earth (by little and little) glydeth away, so the Golde remaineth behinde in the Siue or Searce, then afterward, making (as it were) a second kinde of seperation, it is put into a Vessell by it selfe, and more earth broght to washing in like maner, and vsed accordingly. Heer is to be remembred, that they which wash the Mettall in these Siues or Searces, are most commonly Women, who haue

Of Mines in plaingrounds

Rich men in India, haue storeof slaues and how they are imployed

Of washing the earth in Siues or Searces.

two two men, ſtanding ready to fil their ſiues; two others, which bring the Earth or Oare to them; two more for lading, and two for fetching, drawing it vp from the Diggers. So much ſhall ſuffice for the firſt manner of bringing Golde from the Mine.

Other means and waies for the finding out of Gold.

There are other meanes, and in another manner; as alſo the place where the Golde is founde, is altogether different. Conſidering, that there are riuers, wherin both ſande and Graines of Golde are found; which for the more eaſe in recouering, if the Riuer bee ſmall and little, the Indians labour to emptie and draw it drie. Then taking the ſande and Earth in the bottome, they waſh it in ſuch ſort as hath been declared.

Of Golde found within Brooks or Riuers.

But if the Riuer or Spring bee ſuch, as it cannot bee made drie: they chaunge and turne the courſe ſome other waie, quite from his Naturall Bedde or Current. Which beeing done, they go to ſeeke for Gold in the very middeſt of the Channell, amongeſt the Pebbles and Flintes: and more profite returneth by this kinde of Fiſhing, then by waſhing the digged Earth, as I haue truely found by obſeruation.

Fiſhing for Gold, is better then waſhing the erth

But howſoeuer the Mettall of Golde is thus found out in Riuers, or in the Plaine Fieldes: yet it is helde for moſt certaine and infallible, that it was firſt bredde in the Sommetie and toppes of Hilles or Mountaines; and the vehement ſhowres and falles of Raine (when this Earth was baked and conuerted into Golde, by the radiant and ſplendant beames of the Sunne) by ſofte and ſlow ſlydings, carried it downe into neere adioyning Riuers and Brookes, which lye apt and readie to receyue whatſoeuer is ſent downe by Torrents from the Mountaines; as alſo, into the vnder-ceuen grounds.

The powerfull beames of the Sunne, createth gold

Therefore, there is no further queſtion to be vrged, but that Golde hath his Originall in the ſuperficies of the Earth, and breedeth in the moſt ſecret partes thereof. So that Mines are oftentimes made like vnto Cauernes and Grottes; whereof, and likewiſe of Mines in the Mountaines, wee doe now purpoſe to ſpeake.

Gold hath his Originall in the ſuperficies of the erth.

The Indians, doe vſe another kinde of meanes for the finding of Golde, which is much more daungerous; and is alſo obſerued in thoſe Countreyes, falſelie called the Weſt Indiaes: yea, it is likewiſe vſed in the Northerne Regions, towards the higher Sueſsia, Gothia, and partes of the Varines, all ioyning to the kingdome of Norway.

This manner of emptying Mines, is obſerued in thoſe that are pendant, to wit; Mines of the Mountaines. In which labour, diuers Engines are employed, and vaulted Tables vſed, to hinder the daunger hourely to bee feared, becauſe great perilles dooth ordinarily happen. For, ſome haue beene noted, in VVorking to vndermine the Rocke, to be on the ſuddaine murdered, with the fall of great Stones, breaking out of the hollowe riftes. Others, that climbe and grapple along the ſharpe ſteepie Rockes, with Doſſers and Baskets faſtened vnto their backes, ſeeking for the Oare of the Mines, to carrie it vnto the VVater, by beeing altogether vnable to holde theyr owne waight any longer, fall downe and are deſtroyed.

Mony Gold is gotten out of pendãt Mines which properly are called Mines of the Mountaines.

Great danger in the pendãt or Mountaine Mines.

But, that this buſineſſe might be put in execution, with much leſſe daunger, ſome haue inuented a verie great wheele, guided and directed (in ſome places) by Horſſes: but for lacke of ſuch help, men do therein employ their ſtrength and induſtrie. By the meanes of this wheele, they let downe and mount vppe againe, the Deluers and Diggers in the Mine; and thoſe alſo that carrie the Oare to waſhing. This VVheele ſerueth likewiſe, to conuey away the VVater which the Diggers happen to light on, verie deepe in the Earth. Another great daunger which I do obſerue in this ſearch, is the noyſome exhalations yſſuing out of the Mines, whereby many people haue been ſtifled, not being able to endure ſo groſſe an Ayre. Many times alſo, rauines and invndations of water happeneth, ſuddenly breaking foorth, by ſome ouerture of the ſounſe or Spring, and ouertaketh or rather ſurmounteth them ſooner, then they can haue reſpite for giuing warning to them aloſte, for drawing of them vppe. And therefore, thoſe as bee employed in this laborious paines & trauaile, commonly are ſuch as haue deſerued the Halter: or elſe, theyr owne Slaues, whoſe Liues are of leſſe eſteeme vnto them, then are ſome of theyr beſt Beaſts.

A commodious Wheele for eaſe of Workmen in the Golden Mines.

The noyſome ſauors & exhalations in Mines.

The qualitie of ſuch as vndergoe the greateſt danger.

Wee are further to knowe, that the Golde which is found in the Indiaes, is not so much charged with Mettalles, as that which is hadde in Europe, Asia, or Affrica: becauſe it is farre more pure, and yeeldeth not ſo much labour to the Purifier. For that Golde of the Indiaes, is fined or purified only by fire: but that elſwhere (ouer and beſide the fire) is beaten and re-beaten with the ſtrokes of hamours; and then in the end, refined with ſtrong Water. Alſo, rarely or ſildome do they find any pure Gold in the Mine: but it is intermedled with Siluer, or ſome other Mettals.

Gold in graines being founde in Riuers.

As for the Golde in Graines, which is found in Riuers and perling Brookes, they vſed (in ſome parts) to gather it with the helpe of Sheepes skinnes, that hadde the Wool on them: but becauſe it appeared to bee ouer-laborious, the vſe of Quicke-ſiluer was deuiſed; whereby it is eaſily knowne among the ſand. From which maner of trying or finding Gold, the Fable of the Golden Fleece was inuented, which Iaſon and his Argonantes, ſayled for to Pontus. And hauing attained ſo farre as the Riuer Phaſis, where the Countrey people found out and gathered their Golde, with ſuch Wooll skinnes: they deriued thence, many good Golden Arguments, and could tel ſtore of Tales, at their returning home. But bee it howſoeuer Iaſon and his followers Fleeced, and got all the Golde from the Colchians, which they had gathered for manie yeares together, with their ſheepskinnes: And then gaue it out in a mockery, that they had conquered and woonne the Fleece of Gold.

The Interpretation of the Fable of the Golde-fleece

CHAP. XXXI.

Whence the diuerſitie of Golde proceedeth: His Medicinable Vertues. Of viſions and illuſions that are mette withall in Mines. And of the deceite that is committed in the compoſition, which is called Aurum potabile.

Opinion conceiued of one kind of Gold only.

SOme do hold, that in the whole vniuerſall Worlde, there is but one kinde of Gold only; and that (generally) whereſoeuer it is found, or whence ſoeuer it commeth: if it be well refined and purified without anie commixtion, it is continuallie good Gold. Alſo, that that which is drawne out of the verie coldeſt Regions in the world, is as good as that of the verie hotteſt parts. And that of the Eaſt is no more excellent, then the other of the Weſt. But when Finers, Gold-ſmiths, and Monnoyers, do attribute diuerſitie of Names thereto, eſteeming one kinde to bee of much greater price and value then another (as we may note for example; one is tearmed Ducate Golde, another Crown Gold, another Maille Golde, or Or de Maille, another Piſtolet Gold, valewing xxi. Carrats, another eighteene, and ſo of others; ſome more, ſome leſſe:) Queſtionleſſe, theſe Names and dignities, did receiue their birth and Original in diuers Countries, where Gold had beene adulterated and ſophiſticated, by the vnfaythfulneſſe of Workemen, and multiplyed with other minglings of Metals, of much leſſer value, and farre inferiour in puritie to the other. Which multiplication, hath beene inuented, according vnto their will and humour, that laboured to augment our moderne Moneyes. As for Ducates, Crownes, * Philippus, * Angelots, and * Portugaloiſes, they were diuerſly forged of pure and impure Gold, and the inuention hath not beene Moderne.

Original of the diuers kinds of gold, and of their ſeueral terms by valewatiō.

Multiplication began in Moderne monies.

*A Golden Coine worth iii.s Sterling.

*Our Engliſh Angell.

*The Portegue, worth iii. li.x.s.Sterling.

For wee finde, that from the time of the Romaines Greatneſſe, the Commonwealth mon-wealth being not able to supply the expences of their warres: did sometimes diminish the prices of their moneyes, for an ouer-plus gaine and aduantage. Likewise, they sophisticated their purest Siluer, enter-mingling it with an eyght part of Copper, onely because they wold encrease it.

Opinion contrary to Antiquity & men of skil in Metals.

Some (neuertheless) contrarie to the opinion of Antiquitie, and of many, verie skilfull in matter of Mettals, doe say the conttary, to wit; That the Easterne Golde is much better then the Northerne; and better in one Country then in another. But as for my selfe, I holde the first Opinion, as beeing perswaded, that Nature neuer tooke delight in making one Elementarie substance of gold, more fine or perfect then another. For, hee is so much the neater and purer in his qualitie, as the Elements are simple, whereof hee is framed or composed.

There is only but one kind of Gold, and the reason to aproue it.

It is no shame then to vs, if we hold Golde in such excellent estimation, farre aboue all other Riches, and valew it in our iudgement, to bee more precious then all other Mettalles whatsoeuer. For, Nature consulting with her selfe, to compose it of an equall quantitie, truely correspondent to the Symmetrie and iust proportion of the Elementes, yeeldeth it readilie purifyed from the verie Originall, according as the selfesame Elements were truely simple. And by Coniunction of those Elements, beeing in Vertue equall together, was engendered such a Delicate and perfect mixtion of indissoluble Vnion, composing the Connexion so intirely and faithfully: that it formed an incorruptible Paste or substaunce, which is permanent vnto all Eternitie both in goodnesse and excellencie.

The purity of Golde from the first Originall therof.

Gold cannot endure an excrescence of fowle Commixtion.

And this is the cause, why it cannot bee Conquered by the iniuries of Antiquity, and that it will not containe in it selfe, neyther endure anie excrescence and superfluity of fowle commixture. For, although it remaineth as buried in the Water, or in the Fire, for some long space of time: yet notwithstanding, it is neuer blemished, neyther receyueth anie other qualitie or defect, as I haue formerly sayde. This is the priuiledge, which is alone perticuler vnto Golde onely, aboue all other Mettalles whatsoeuer.

Now, albeit the Græcians haue spoken nothing of his properties and Medicinable vertues: yet the Arabians were not therein forgetfull, because they appointed it in prepared Medicaments, to euacuate sullen and Melancholie Humors.

The Medicinable properties & vertues of Gold.

Item, to make an actuall Cautere, especiallie in his Soueraigne qualitie, it must onelie be done with Golde: for the Wound which it maketh and Vlcerates, is much more the sooner healed. Golde held within the mouth, maketh the breath good and sweete. The File-dust of Golde, pounded or beaten smalleſt on a Marble stone, is verie good in such Medicines, as are giuen for the re-growing of Haire againe, after it hath been formerly lost: or for Ring wormes and Tetters, when it is so small beaten, as it may bee scarse discerned vnder the Thumbe Naile: then putting it into the eyes, it is very soueraigne for clearing of the sight. It is drunke also, for a preseruatiue against the accidents and dauntings of the heart.

Cauterizing with Golde.

Gold maketh sweet breath.

Gold restoreth lost haire

Gold preserueth the eye-sight, & comforteth the heart.

Water, wherein an Ingot of Golde (made red hotte in the Fire) hath beene some few times quenched: or, wanting an Ingot, a Ducate, Portugue, or some such other thick and great piece of gold: that Water, mingled with wine, helpeth the Quartaine Feauer, purgeth the Melancholy humor, diminisheth the puft vp Spleene or Milte, and is also a singulare remedy against the Dropsie.

Gold quenched in Water, helpeth the Quartain Ague & Dropsy

Nor are those reports to be reputed as Fables, concerning euill Spirites or Dæmons, which haue bin seene and hearde in Mines: for this is the most irkesom and dangerous thing, that hurteth and offendeth the poore Mettally Pioners. And manie times, they behold the rowling of great stones from the maine Rocke, their Engines suddenly broken all to peeces; their Ladders ouerthrowne, and the Cords (whereby they holde) broken in sunder; so that the parties fall beyond all recouery.

Spirits haunting Mines, are verie dangerous to the poor Pioners.

Others haue bin rapt and transported suddenly away, and neuer after eyther seen or heard of. These hurtful spirits, are thought also to do them infinit small seruices, as to them that draw vp the Mine, and cleaue the great stones of the Rock, (which is thought sometimes impossible to be done, without such strange help) & counterfetting a thousand voices, with as manie Apish and fantasticke trickes, for the pastime and pleasure of such poore people in their labour. But verie soon after, except they be aduised and careful of themselues, a peece of the Rocke fals on their heades, and then this ioy is conuerted into teares and sad complaintes. And this happeneth more in the Indiaes, and amongst those Idolaterous people, then where any Christians are, or frequent.

Spirites seruiceable for a while, and hurtful afterward.

More among the idolatrous Indians, then any wher els.

Belonius reporteth, that when he was in Greece, at the Mountaine of Syderocapsa, where the Mines are, that appertaine to the Turke: himselfe went to peepe in, at one of the spiracles or breathing holes of a Mine, which had formerlie beene, (but not for a long while) of great reuennew to his Maister, who was a Iew; but as then hee was constrained to forsake it, because it was haunted with a Mettallie Spirit. And because he had very often shewne himselfe, in the forme and likenesse of a Goate, with faire and goodlie Hornes of Golde, they called that hole or Spiracle, Hyaris Cabron, which was at the top of a Village, named Pianits, in the same Mountaine, and neer to the Brook, tearmed Rotas. But this was such a discontented Deuil, as none might be suffered to labour there, neither in company, nor alone.

Belonius his Historie of a metally spirit.

An angry discontented spirit.

He affirmeth also, that in other Mines, there were diuers other mettally Spirits, that would doe no harme to anie of the Workemen, but helpe them many waies in their labours. Munster, who had visited sundry Mines in Germanie, records the verie same. To yeelde a reason for these matters, I cannot: but referre it to such as are better seene in such thinges, then I am my selfe: yet Saint Augustine speaketh verie amply thereof, in his book of the Cittie of God.

Aug. in lib. 9. de Ciuit. Dei.

But before I end this Chapter, I wold aduertise the well minded Reader, to beware of certaine gadding Emperickes or Mountebankes, making profession of Physicke, who giue vnto sickely people a kinde of powder, or a certaine liquor to drinke, which enforceth the bodie for to purge so violently both vpward & downward, that verie many haue died thereby. Concerning mine owne iudgment heerin, I take it to be Antimonie, though they please to tearme it, Aurum Potabile. For, if it were Gold, it could not do any harm: for whatsoeuer proceedeth of Gold, cannot but be good, and free from hurt. But vnder the shaddow of his Sacred vertue, such Conseruers haue taken occasion, to commit thereby verie great abuses. As there are some also, that Nursing young Children after their owne manner, doo let them champe double Ducats in their mouths: and then their slauer or spettle is to bee preserued: affirming it to be verie helpeful to diuers diseases.

Deceite committed by Quacksaluers & Empericks.

Aurū Potabile.

Yong Children driuell or slauer.

But because these are euident and apparant tromperies; I am of the minde, that it wil not passe any long time vnpunished.

Thus you see, what I haue Collected out of manie good Authors, both Ancient and Moderne; as also the iudgement of approoued good Metallers, concerning the true History of this so excellent & much affected Mettal: which althogh it looke sometimes verie pale, it only proceedeth thorough the enuie and desire, that euerie man (Naturally) beareth vnto it.

CHAP. XXXII.

The Interpretation of these three seuerall Titles, Democratia, Aristocratia, & Monarchia, which are three diuers kindes of Gouernement in a Commonwealth, to vnderst and which of them, is the best and most expedient.

I Did purposely insert this Chapter, to declare the great errour of manie in these our dayes, who beholding seditious troubles to offend the authoritie of Soueraign Princes (without any cause or subiect) in too manie countries, and parts of Christendome; would haue Common-weales formed, according to their perticuler affections, some being Democratiques, others, Aristocratiques, and are all vtter Enemies vnto absolute Monarchy. Nowe, beecause these three three wordes are not easily vnderstood, except it be by such men as haue knowledge in the Greeke tongue; the courteous Reader shall finde my honest furtherance therein; albeit Monsieur du Verdier, Lord of Vauprinaz, hath written and related somewhat thereof, yet very succinctly. But I will alleadge the reasons both of the one and other, to the end it may be knowne, which of these kindes of Common-wealth is the best, and likest to be of longest continuance.

The Authors reason for this Chapters inserting.

These three words not easily vnderstood by euery man.

Democratia, or popular estate and preheminence, is a Common-weale, where the free and poorest (beeing the greatest number) do ouer-rule and commaund all the rest. Aristocratia, is that which we may interpret in our language, to be the power of the most vertuous, and in Latine, Optimarum Principatus: in regard, that they are reputed to be very good and vertuous, as commonly wee hold our best Gentlemen to be. This forme of gouernment taketh place, when as few Noblemen are approoued vertuous, either in learning or good manners; to sway the Soueraignetie of the whole body, and minister Lawes to the rest of the people, as well in generall, as in perticular. Monarchia, is that awefull authority, when one alone hath the sole power ouer all the people, both Nobles and others, commaunding absolutely.

The definition of Democratia.

Of Aristocratia

When this kind of gouernment is allowed.

Of Monarchia

This forme of gouernment in any Common-weale, is called Royaltie. And me-thinkes, now that I haue giuen yee the signification of these three Titles: it would not much varry from our purpose, to set downe which of them is the most profitable to the people, tollerable, and of longest continuance. For many reasons and Arguments may bee produced on either side, some whereof will seeme to be receiueable: which neuertheless are not, and therefore I hold it fittest, to let them bee tried by open euidence.

The Soueraigne authority of Royalty.

Many thinges seeme good, that are not so indeed.

First then, such as approue the estate of Democratia, or popularitie, will alleage vnto vs: that there haue been Democraties, of the very worthiest men in Armes, and that by the Lawes of the very greatest Iurisconsults, Oratours, and Artezans, there should not be any other Common-weales, where the faction of a few Lords among them, or the iealousie of one sole Monarch, should hinder the subiects in any great attempts. And, which is more, it appeareth, that the true note of a Common-wealth, should consist in a popular estate onely: for then, all the people enioy the publike good, each man partaking in common good fortunes, spoyles, wages, and conquests. Whereas a few Lords in Aristocratia, and one alone in Monarchy; conuert the publike benefit to perticular interest. In briefe, if there be nothing more to bee desired, then that Magistrates should be obedient to the Lawes, and subiects to Magistrates: it appeareth also, that these may be best obserued in a popular estate, where there is nothing else but Law, who is the Lady and Mistresse of all. These are the principall points that can be alleaged, to vphold popular authority, which carrieth a goodly luster in apparance: but indeed, all these reasons are nothing else in effect, but meer Spiders webs, soft, gentle and cunningly wouen, yet of no validity or strength at all.

Their reasons that defend the sway of Popularity.

Generall benefit of the people.

Law the Lady and Mistris of all.

To refute that which hath been said, of a popular estate, or Common-wealth, we will begin with the first Allegation: that therein hath been found more Law-makers, Orators, good captaines, and Handy-crafts men, then in any other. It is very certaine, that the cause of so many Law-makers in this estate, proceeded from the contrarietie of Lawes, one repugnant to another, which Magistrates suffered to liue in suspence, during the time as they exercised their Offices; neuer caring or respecting, whether they were beneficial or hurtfull, but onely that some memory might remaine of them, after the expiration of their authority. This was an ordinary custome in Rome, as may be noted, when the Consull Cassius proclaimed by the sound of a Trumpet; that all the Latines and Hernians, which had no Houses in Rome, should auoide and get them gone. Virginius, his companion in rule, caused the contrary also to be published, to make the people capable of such a Law as he would promulgate, and to flesh the Inhabitants (in the hart of the Citty) against the Strangers. By reason of these two contrarie Lawes, some were found, that studied

A refutation of the reasons formerly alleaged.

The cause why there were so many Law-makers.

Example of the Consull Cassius, and Virginius his associate.

The cause of such store of Captaines.

studyed how to glose and accord these differences, and they that medled most busily therein, were termed great Lawmakers. If (in this condition) such great Captains haue bin found; it grew by nō other occasion, but that in such popular estates, ciuill Warres were orderlie very frequent. Heereof let Rome be a Witnesse, where oftentimes the people were beheld in a heape on the one side, and the Nobility on another side, sometimes in three deuisions. Or, if they had peace among themselues; then they were at Warre with their Neighbours. And indeed, through this continuall exercise of Armes, there were many good Captaines and Souldiours made; but with the dear expence of the Cittizens blood and liues.

War is more beneficial for Souldiours, then Citizens

Of Oratours, and eloquent Speakers.

For Oratours, because any people that commonly are without Letters or learning, or any store of iudgement, doe affect such as praise them; he that can best please by those meanes, tickling the eare with finery wordes: shall be sure to be esteemed among such people, and eloquence is very dangerous, except it be well vsed. For the attaining of which degree, Oratours haue ordinarily no other obiect, but contend in the Art of Rhetoricke, who shall speake smoothest. And it is no matter of meruaile, if excellent Orators bee found in popular estates: for there was a Demosthenes in Athens, and a Cicero in Rome. Moreouer, to aske counsell of the people, as anciently it was don in popular Cōmonweales: were nothing else, but to request Wisedome from furious mad men, and it hath long past as a well knowne Prouerbe; Wise Men propound, and Fooles giue resolution. Moreouer, we know very well, that in an assembly of people; nothing can be kept secret, which is a most pernitious thing. The difficulties ensuing, by conuentickling a multitude of people in one place, the disorder among croudes and throngs, the variety of voyces, and inconstancy of men of many minds; all these I passe ouer.

Ignorant people affect praises.

Confusion is among multitude of people.

Titus Liuius in Lib. 7. & 8.

The people, of their owne Nature (saith Titus Liuius) are insolent and excessiue in all liberty and licence, when matters goe well with them; and as deiected or downe-pressed are they, vpon the least losse: for vicious and impudent men, are aduanced among them, but the honest and vertuous are thrust out by the eares. As for in-Iustice, the people say, let no care be had thereof: prouided, that profit may bee deriued from iudgements, and sold to the faireſt offerer: that good meanes may bee had, to ruinate, Rich, Noble, and honest men, hurrying them without any cause, but meere capitall hatred to such good mindes, contrary to the many-headed humour and Nature. For this cause, the popular estate or Common-weale, is the sourse and refuge of all turbulent spirits, mutiners, seditions, and exiles: who giue councell, comfort and resistance to the sillier sort, to make hauocke and spoile of the greater.

Bad men aduanced, and good men no way regarded

A popular estate is the Nurse of infinite mischiefs

But yet there is a more capitall plague, attending vpon those popular Commonweales, to wit: impunity of wicked persons, prouided, that they bee Cittizens, that is to say, petty Kinges. For in a popular estate of the Romaines, it was prohibited to all the Magistrates, on paine of death: to condemne a Cittizen to naturall or ciuill death, or to depriue him of his libertie or Bourgeship, or to whip him with Rods, were his offence neuer so foule. Yet we read, that Verres was accused, attainted, and conuinced, to haue robbed, stolne, and committed an hundred thousand concussions, or publike extortions, and false iudgements: neuertheless, by parting out of Rome, & leauing a good moity of those thefts behind him; he was quitted. And yet Rutilius, Metellus, Coriolanus, the two Scipioes, and Cicero, they could haue no better fauour then banishment. Ephesus also could banish the vertuous* Hermodorus: Athens expulsed iust Aristides: Themistocles died in exile; Miltiades in Prison; Socrates was put to death; and * Phocion, the most intire and vertuous man of his age, after he had bin chosen fiue and forty times chiefe Captain and Commaunder, neuer receiuing any blame or taxation; yet notwithstanding without admittance of any answere, he was condemned to death, with forty other famous men, onely because they were his friends. States & degrees were there sold also, euen as they did at Rome: for Marius durst boldly bring Sumpters laden with Money, to buy the voyces of the people; and Pompey did the like.

Titus Liuius in Lib. 7. et 8.

Vices which doe ordinarily accompany popular Common-weales.

Offenders spared, and Innocents banished.

*He caused the twelue Tables to be made.

*He was Scholler to Plato and Xenocrates, and of wonderfull constancy & grauity.

Degrees and Offices bought with Mony.

The

The concuſſions beſide were an incredible matter, made in the face of iudgement, and before the eyes of all beholders.

Extortion & in-iuſtice committed in the iudgment place.

Much conformable to this, was that of Statocles, and Democlides, Athenians, who when they took poſſeſſion of their Offices. Come on (quoth they) let vs now goe to the Harueſt of Gold. If then ſuch eſtates, degrees, and Iuſtice it ſelfe were ſo vnworthily ſold, in two ſuch great Common-weales, enriched with the ſpoyle of other people: what then may men iudge of the popular preheminence, where the poore are alwaies needy, wretched and indigent? Wee haue an example of the Megarences, who hauing expulſed their Prince Theagines, eſtabliſhed ſuch an irregular popularе gouernment, that it was law full for the poore to liue in rich mens Houſes, as Plato hath very well recorded.

Example of the Megarences to their Prince.

Plato in lib. de Leg.

Now we are to know, that if the Common-weales of the Romaines, Athenians, or others, hadde ſome time of flouriſhing: it was onely occaſioned, by hauing (in thoſe tempeſtuous daies) a Senate, full of men of honour, as alſo of worthy and vertuous Captaines, that kept the people from diſordering themſelues, and ſerued (indeed) as a bridle to them; As in Rome there a Mennius Agrippa, a Camillus, a Papyrius Curſor, a Fabius Maximus, a Scipio, a Cato, a Scaurus, and a Pompey. In Athens, there was a Senate of the Ariopagitæs, And a Pericle (ſaith Thucidides) who was the true Monarch thereof, though in apparance it was meerely populare. In briefe, the popular eſtate can haue no long ſubſiſting; if there be not ſome eſpeciall Wiſe-men, that haue an eye to the gouernment.

The reaſon why any popular eſtate hath ſome time of continuance.

Thucidides in Lib. 4.

But ſome will obiect vnto me, and ſay: doe we not ſee the Lordes of Leagues and Confederacies, that they haue built vp a goodly popular eſtate, and continued in the gouernment therof, more then three hundred and fiftie yeares? Are they not alſo (by theſe meanes) warranted not onely from tyranny, but likewiſe haue giuen chaſe to Tyrants, inſulting on their Neighbors? To a double demaund, we muſt needes returne a double anſwere. Firſt, the Country it ſelfe, and naturall diſpoſition of the people, is very conuenable for a popular eſtate. In the ſecond place, they that are moſt quarrellous & mutinous, doe goe to the ſeruice of other ſtrange Princes: the reſt of the milder people, apt and eaſie to be ordered, they haue no great care how the State ſtands.

Lords of Leagues and Confederacies, in their gouerning.

Moreouer, all the Lords of Leagues, and popular Common-weales, do enter into confederation offenſiue and defenſiue, and are vnited ſtrictly together: Not much vnlike to ſuch as walke in darke nights, or goe ouer ſlipperie places, where is danger of downe-fals, they hold one another faſt by the hands; and in this manner they maintaine themſelues, againſt the power of Monarchies, as the Athenians and Thebanes did in thoſe elder daies. Yet one thing more may not bee forgotten, the foundation of their popular eſtate: was builded and cimented with the blood of Nobility, and of thoſe that were the very richeſt.

A very apt comparſon.

Our auncient Predeceſſours, for the better aſſurance of their eſtates, did ſtriue to equalize all their Cittizens in Goods, Honours, Power, and recompences, and if there were ſome one, more iuſt, more vertuous, and more wiſe then the reſt: if he were not baniſhed, he was vſed as badly, for al things poſſible was taken from him, euen as it was a common practiſe in the Common-weale of Athens. It is an act of great in-iuſtice, to take away the goods of a rich man (which he hath obtained by his care and induſtry) and make them equall to another, of no merit or worthy qualitie. It is alſo contrary to the Law of God, who hath expreſly commaunded, that the proprietie of mens goods, ſhould be kept to themſelues. It behoueth not then to ſay, that nature made al things in common: for the law of the Mother, can no way be contrary to the commaundement of the Father.

Equality is alwaies moſt reſpected in a popular Common-wealth.

Gods law for the propriety of mēs goods.

And as for the power of commaunding, wherin popular men would equal one another: there is much leſſe apparance then in goods: for wiſedome and prouidence is not giuen by an equall diſtribution, and therefore (on meere neceſſity) election muſt bee made in a popular eſtate, of the moſt ſufficient Magiſtrates, for the better commaund and Danger of electing Magiſtrates and Officers in a popular eſtate.

The reaſon why the common wealth of the Switzers hath continued ſo long.

and deliuery of Iuſtice. But who is he then, that perceiueth not at firſt ſight, that among men there are ſome, who haue leſſe iudgement then brute beaſts: yet others againe, who haue the diuine Carracter ſo clearely, that they appear rather to bee Angels, then Men? All which notwithſtanding, they that ſeeke after equality; would haue authoritie giuen to furious, ignorant, and inſenſible Men, as well as to the wiſe, and beſt vnderſtanding. For the voyce of ſuch aſſemblies is not poyzed by weight, and euermore the number of Fooles, wicked and ignorants, is a thouſand times greater then people of reſpect: therefore Salomon ſaid truely, Hardly ye ſhall finde one among a thouſand.

Equalitie of Authority in all men.

For concluſion, ſeeing it is not in the power of good Cittizens and wiſe politiques, to change the populer eſtate into Monarchie; the principall foundation of popular ſway, conſiſteth in the ſtrict obſeruation of Edicts and Ordinances. For in as much as the popular eſtate is eſtabliſhed, contrarie to the courſe and order of Nature, which beſtoweth commaund and preheminence on the verie wiſeſt: this appeareth incompatible to the vulgar people, who will not receiue any commaund in a collectiue name, neither ſet good lawes and ordinances before their eyes, as bright Torches for their better direction; therefore ſuch an eſtate muſt needs be quickly ouerthrowne. And this is the reaſon, why thoſe Lordes of Leagues doe ſo ſtrictly keepe Edicts and Ordinances: otherwiſe, their eſtate had long ſince beene ſunke. Now, in regard that this Chapter ſeemeth ample enough, and (I hope) not wearyſome to the Reader: the matter of Ariſtocratia and Monarchia, ſhall be handled (by themſelues) in the following Chapter.

A remedy for the maintenance of popular eſtate.

Where lawes and ordinances are not ſeuerely kept, the ſtate can hardly indure

CHAP. XXXIII.

That Monarchia ought moſt eſpecially to be preferred, before Democratia or Ariſtocratia.

BY naturall reaſon, that Seigneurie or Dominion is cald Ariſtocraticall, where there be many Cittizens, and the leſſer part of them doe hold the eſtate: or more properlie, where the beſt and woorthieſt people are onely receiued and aduanced. And yet it may be ſaide, that ſoueraignetie ought to be giuen to the richeſt perſons only, as to them that haue therein the greateſt intereſt: conſidering alſo, that they beare much heauier charge then the poorer ſort, who hauing nothing to looſe, meere neede maketh them to forgoe authority. It appeareth then, that Ariſtocratia ſhould be preferred before the popular eſtate, but not before Monarchia. And yet doubtleſſe, they that doe well conſider what Ariſtocratia is; will finde it full of maine incommodities. That it muſt needes be ſo, make ſome obſeruation. In a great Common-wealth, ye ſhall haue many Lords that wil command, and the more Lords there be, the greater ſtore of factions: among whom, deliberations being difficult to reſolue on, they rather vaniſh away like ſmoake, then are ſeriouſly conſidered. For this cauſe is it, that Ariſtocraticall authorities haue bin much longer durable and aſſured, wher there haue bin the fewer Lords: As the Lacedemonians with thirty Lordes, and the Pharſalians with one and twentie, did long time maintaine their rule, but others not halfe the while.

The meaning of the Ariſtocraticall gouernment.

The reaſons of them that maintaine Ariſtocratia.

The fewer Lords, the firmer gouernment in Ariſtocratia.

It may be obiected vnto me, that they which gouerne the Ariſtocratical eſtate; muſt be prouident, valiant, wiſe, and rich. I anſwere, that it is very hard to finde ſuch men there, but at length they will be touched with ambition: and if there happen any to be conſcientious, or religiouſly affected; as commonlie they are the feweſt in number, ſo ſhall they

An obiection and anſwere thereto.

they be ſure to haue the leſſe reſpect & partakers. In which regard, wicked and ambitious men gaining eminency; their concluſions paſſe for autenticall, and they may the eaſier tyrannize ouer the people.

The inconueniences happening in the eſtate Ariſtocraticall.

But to be briefe, it is daily ſeene, that the more heads there are in gouerning, the more diſputes there will be, and the leſſe reſolution. For this cauſe, and to ſhun the inconueniences before alleadged; the Seigneury of Venice, doe refer the managing of their State affaires to a dozen perſons, but more often to ſeauen: eſpecially, for the deraining of matters in ſecrecy, wherein lieth the ſoule and ſafety of any Eſtate.

The Seigneury of Venice.

Let vs put the caſe, that the priuate Councel in Ariſtocratia ſhould be ſo ſecret, that nothing could touch the ayre or wind: yet it will bee a very difficult thing, for ſo few Lordes, to maintaine their eſtate againſt all the people, that haue no part at all in their honourable qualitie, conſidering, that euen the Lordes themſelues doe continually deſpiſe popularitie, and the poorer ſort alſo cary as cõtemptible hatred againſt great men. So that, thorough the meaneſt ſedition of Lordes among them, (which is ineuitable, if they bee people of martiall ſtomacke and diſpoſition) the moſt ambitious and troubleſome, will fall into the peoples mercy, and then comes the downefall and ruine of Ariſtocratia. And this was the onely occaſion that ouerthrew many Seigneuries and Common-weales; as of Gennes, Sienna, Florence, Coloyne, Zuricke, Straſbourg, Lindaw: And the ancient * Phocenſes, * Samians, * Cnydians, * Mytileni-ans, and many other.

An allegation concerning councell.

The ruine & ouerthrow of an Ariſtocraticall eſtate.

If an Ariſtocraticall Common-weale haue warre againſt a Stranger, and doe come to the loſſe of a battel: the eſtate ſtands in danger, and as little aſſurance haue the Stangers alſo, fearing to bee foyled by the other. To which dangers the popular eſtate is not ſo much ſubiect, each man hauing a part & intereſt in the State. Ariſtocraticall gouernment then, is not onely in danger of Straungers as enemies: but alſo of the people, who muſt be contented, or reſtrained by power. To content them, without giuing them part in the eſtate is verie difficult: and impoſſible alſo to accept them in honorable charges and offices, without changing the eſtate of Ariſtocratia, into popular rule. To reſtraine them by might, is no matter of certainty, or eaſie when to be performed: becauſe it were an open entrance into feare and diſtruſt of them, that rather are to be won by benefits and courteſie. For otherwiſe, the leaſt warre of Strangers againſt the Seigneury, or of Lords among them; will make the people vndertake Armes, onely to throw off the yoake.

People very hard to be ordered and kept in quiet.

For this reaſon, the Venetians (to maintaine their Ariſtocraticall eſtate) do beſtow ſome ſmall Offices on part of the people, contracting loue and alliance with them, & vſe borrowings of them; to binde them the better for the States maintenance, yet wholely diſarming them. And to the end, that they may be the more milde and plyable: they grant them freedome, and all kindes of pleaſures, yeilding ſometimes the right of Bourgeſhips, to the richeſt Cittizens. Alſo, if they haue War againſt a Stranger; they haue appointment therein, at what rate ſoeuer it be. But aboue all thinges elſe, they labour to quench partialities and hatreds among their Gentlemen, which procureth: that the rich beeing drunke with pleaſures, and the poorer ſort hauing meanes to Traffick, and exerciſe thẽſelues in all Mechanical Arts, with commodity of the Maritime partes, and naturall ſtrength; they can haue no great occaſion, but much leſſe the power of rebelliſhing among themſelues.

The wiſedom and diſcretion of the Venetians among themſelues.

Partialities and hatreds qualified among Gentlemen.

Theſe are the onely meanes, which (next vnto God) hath principally maintained their eſtate: and not the Nature of Ariſtocratia, as many haue imagined. And yet notwithſtanding, within theſe foure hundred yeares, or there-about, they haue hardly out-ſtood many ciuill Warres and ſeditions, of the Bocchouians, Falerians, Tepolians, Baiamontanes, and cruell factions of the Iuſtinians, Sceuolaes, Selians, Baſſianes; the murders of eighteene Dukes, and a great number of Senators, as may be read in their own Hiſtories.

Troubles happening within foure hundred yeares.

If the worthy men that gouerned this Common-wealth, were generous and martiall minded: they ſeized the State, as Cæſar did at Rome, and as Sylla before him.

* A Ilde country of Greece, by the gulfe Criſſeus.
* An Iſle before Ionia, ouer againſt Epheſus.
* A Citty of Caria.
* A Cittie in Lycaon.

him. Or as Hanniball at Carthage, who mooued Warre against the Romaines, whereby he became the cause of ruinating the estate of his Countrey: in regard of the Barchian faction, which was quity contrary to him, and hindred, that men and succour should bee sent vnto him in Italy. We may perceiue then, that the principall foundation of Aristocratia, consisteth in the mutuall amity of Lords: for if they agree and consent together, they will maintaine and gouerne much better then the people. But if there be any faction among them, there is no estate more difficult to be kept, for the reasons before specified; and namely if the Lords be Martiall, for men of war doe brooke nothing so badly, as peace.

Daunger of Martial Commaunders in an Aristocraticall estate.

The principall foundation of Aristocratia.

It is no maruaile then, if the Aristocratia of the Venetians, Ragusians, and Lucanes haue continued some ages: considering, that they doe not addict themselues to armes, neither hold any thing in more recommendation, thē Trassick, and vse of Mony. And, to speake all in one word, there is not any forme of Aristocratia more sightly or assured, then that which maketh choise of Lordes of reputation and vertue, or (at least) that are not infamous: especially when due care is had, of substituting another honest man, in the place of him that dieth, and by true election, as continuallie is done in Venice. Thus you see the commodities and discommodities of the Aristocraticall estate: Let vs now speake somwhat concerning Monarchy, which all the best and chiefest men haue commended before al other commonweals.

The long continuance of some Aristocraticall Common-weales.

Care of new election is an especiall matter.

It may be obiected vnto me, by such as approoue Aristocratia or Democratia, that in Monarchia, when the death of the Monarch happeneth: new desseignes doe thereon ensue, new Lawes, new Officers, new Friends, new Enemies, new Habits, and new forme of life. For Princes delight to please themselues, by changing and remouing (well-nere) all things, to make speech of their own nouelties: which oftentimes causeth great discommodities, not onely to the Subiects in perticular, but likewise to the whole bodie of the Commonwealth, holding the forme of Monarchy.

The discommodities ensuing by Monarchia.

If things do not fall out in this manner, but that the Prince is the wisest that can be wished: yet the alliances & loues made with the Predecessor, do vsually end in him. And such fauours and respects beeing finished, Princes doe thereon betake themselues to Armes; and then the strongest assayleth the weakest, or (at the least) will giue him Law. Which cannot so fall out in Estates Popular and Aristocratical, where perpetuall alliances are made, considering that the people dye not. This occasioneth, that those other Princes, and particulers, do continually affect rather to contract with a Seigneury, then with one Prince, for the assurance of Treaties and Obligations, whereto the Successours of Princes stand not obliged.

Fauours of one Prince, sildome succeede in another.

The affection of Princes & perticulars.

Moreouer, Monarchies that make their Kings by election, do oftentimes fall into ciuill Warres, by diuisions among such as aspire to the Crowne, which draw after them the ruine of the whole Estate many times: considering that euen in the right of succession, there is no meane perill, if there be diuers in the same degree, who sometimes do murder one another, or make diuision among the Subiects, whereof too many examples are extant to our eyes; yea, it often falleth out, that the lawfull Successour is expulsed, by him that hath no right at all. But admit we the case, that there is not any contention in Monarchia, yet if the Monarch be a Child: there will be deuision for his gouernment, betweene his Mother and the Princes, or else among the Princes themselues. And if the Child haue a Tutour or Guardian, by ordinance of the Predecessour, or else by Custome: there is then some daunger, least this Guardian should make himselfe Sole Commaunder, which is the most to be feared, if he marry with the Mother of his Pupill. And although (to auoyde this daunger) the gouernment be giuen to the neerest, and the Childes Nursing to his Mother: yet notwithstanding, there haue some Mothers beene found to be Murderers, and haue not onely made sale of the estate, but also of their Childrens liues. And sometimes the Tutour continueth in the gouernment, and leaueth nothing vnto the King but the bare Title: as the

Of wars and their sources in Monarchia.

If the King be a Childe, what dangers are depending thereon.

Danger in the Mother of the Prince.

The danger in Tutors and Guardians.

the Duke of Northumberland did to the K. of England, Edw.6. And as Apelles did to yong Phillip King of Macedon; who could not enioy his owne eſtate, till hee had ſlaine his Tutor. I know likewiſe, ſome one will tell mee, that many times it commeth to paſſe, when a yong prince attaineth to the Crown, he wil not alow the gouerment of Maiſters, that are placed neere him for inſtruction, but bee ruled by his owne fanſy, being addicted to Playes, Maſques, and ſuch like. In briefe many times his Court ſhews like a meer Burdellae, falling into a thouſand Vices, and the people following their Prince in imitation. If the Prince be a Soldier, he may expoſe his perſon and kingdome to many hazards. Admit that none of theſe aforeſaid things doe happen, yet it hath bin obſerued, that Princes being wiſe & well mannered, when they ariſe to the Monarchie, Soueraignty hath had this hard fortune, that the very wiſeſt haue proued fooles, the moſt valiant turnd coward, and the very beſt to be moſt bad.

Vices whereunto Monarchies are oftentimes ſubiect.

Of a Martiall minded Prince.

A wiſe & well ordred Prince

Contrariety in the natures of Princes, & their ſeuerall dangers.

If the Prince be ſubtle and wicked, he will eſtabliſh tyrany; if cruell, he makes a butchery of the Commonwealth; If couetous, he will haue both the haire & the hide of his ſubiects; If Prodigall, he will ſuck both the blood and Marrow, to glut ſome dozen of Horſe-leaches that attend about him. And if he be ignorant and ſottiſh, then is tiranny ſo much the more to be feared, when as he hath neyther Maiſter nor Companion that dare make head againſt him. Theſe are the dangers that attend on Monarchies.

Tyranny ſildome dreameth on maiſtry.

But yet there is much more perrill in the Eſtate Ariſtocraticall, and a great deale more too, in the popular condition: for theſe daungers which wee haue propoſed, ceaſeth for the moſt part, wher the Monarchy is deuolued by ſucceſsiue right. But ſeditions, partialities, and ciuill wars are ordinary, and continualy (as it were) ariſing in greatneſſe, for the vnher-handing of Offices in the commonweale Seigneurall and Popularly, then in the eſtate of Monarchy, which will endure no ſedition for Offices, or for anie Eſtate, except after the Princes death, and but ſeldome then too. But the principall point of a Commonwelth, which is the right of Soueraignty, cannot bee, neither ſubſiſt (to ſpeake properlie) but only in Monarchy: for none can be Soueraigne in a Commonweale, but one only. If there be two, three, or more, the one is no Soueraigne, becauſe one can neither giue, or yet receiue lawe of his companion. And although we may imagine a body of many Lords, or of a people, to hold Soueraignty: yet it is moſt certaine, that there is not any true ſubiect, or any ſupport, if there bee not one head with Soueraigne power, to vnite one with another, which one ſimple Magiſtrate neuer can do, without Soueraigne Preheminence and authority.

Seditions, ciuill wars, and partialities for Offices, in Democratia & Ariſtocratia.

The right of Soueraignety is onely in Monarchia.

Imaginations are alwayes irregular and offenſiue.

The difficulties are daily noted, which continually haue accompanied popular Commonweales and Seigneuries, when both the one and other do hold contrary parts, and by diuers Magiſtrates: Some calling for peace, others war; One will haue this law, another a quite contrary; One wil haue this man to be chiefe, another aimes at his friend and partaker, and the like in diuers other matters.

Contrary opinions in popular Common weales, very hard to be reconciled.

Moreouer, in a Seigneurall and Popular eſtate, the greater part are continually made to beleeue thinges, howbeit, the wiſe and vertuous are alwaies the leſſer number: by which means (diuers times) the more ſound and better ſort of people, are conſtrained to ſtoope vnder the greater, to pleaſe the appetite of ſom ſeditious fellow, or effronted Oration-maker. But the Soueraigne Monarch, hee can alwayes ioyne with the more healthfull ſpirited and meaner part, making choiſe of wiſe men, and ſuch as vnderſtand the State affaires: wheras quite contrary, neceſsity compelleth the popular and Ariſtocratical eſtates, to entertain and embrace both fooles and Wiſemen together.

Wiſe men cõſtrained to ſtoupe to Parаſites.

Monarchia alwayes alloweth the beſt councell.

When the Common-wealth of the Romaines was in perrill, they made a Soueraigne Magiſtrate, according to which dignitie, hee had no Appellation, but commanded ſoueraignely, and they tearmed him Dictator. The Venetians created a Prouidadore; the Lacedemonians an Harmoſte, & each of them did ſo, conſidering Monarchia to bee the moſt aſſured eſtate. Me-thinkes, that theſe reaſons, and manie other, which might bee drawne in perticulerly, are ſufficient to ſhew, that amongeſt the three kindes of lawfull Common-wealths, the right of Monarchie is moſt excellent; and among them of Ryot and Diſorder, the popu-popular eſtate is the moſt vicious. Lawfull borne Monarchie, as a ſtrong and potent bodie, may eaſilie maintaine it ſelfe: but populare qualitie, and Dominion of a few people (as being very weak and feeble) are ſubiect vnto many diſeaſes, and muſt of neceſsity bee gouerned by dyet and preſcriptions. Neuer were Ariſtocratiaes and Democratiaes ſeene to continue ſo long as Monarchiaes, which we finde (by writing) to haue endured a thouſand or twelue hundered yeares, as thoſe of the Perſians, Aſſyrians, Medes, and others: but the Popularly or Ariſtocraticall, three or foure hundered yeares onely.

Comparиſon by diuers cõmon-weales.

Monarchia is more durable then all other kinds of Common-wealth.

Compariſon of both kinds.

Therefore, it ſhall be needeleſſe to inſiſt any longer, in approuing Monarchia to be the moſt aſſured eſtate: conſidering, that a Family (which is the true Image of a Common-wealth) can indure to haue but one head only, as wee haue approoued. And all the Lawes of Nature are our guides to Monarchy; be it, that wee reſpect the little Worlde Man, who hath but one bodye, and but one Head, as chiefe of all the other Members: on whom, dependeth the wil, motion, and vnderſtanding. Or bee it, that we looke vppon the great world, which hath but one Soueraigne God. If we eleuate our eyes to Heauen, wee ſhall ſee there but one Sunne. If we deſcend to ſociable Creatures, we may plainely perceiue, that they cannot ſuffer many kinges, or many Lordes, how good ſoeuer they be.

Monarchia is figured and repreſented in the Stars, and in other Creatures.

This is the very ſame example, which Solyman, King of the Turkes, vſed in Anno Dom. 1552. hauing heard the lowd acclamations and ſhouts of ioy, which the whole Armie made for the Sultane Muſtapha his Son, at his returning from Perſia. Commanding him to bee ſtrangled in his Chamber of preſence. When he was dead, he threw his bodie foorth before the whole army, and cried out a-lowd, There is no more but one God in heauen, and one Sultan on Earth. Two dayes after, he did put to death Sultan Gobrus, becauſe hee wept for his Brother, and Sultane Mehemet the third, becauſe hee fled away for feare, and would leaue no more but one only, to ſhun the inconueniences enſuing by many Lordes and Commanders. Euen ſo we haue beheld all the people vpon Earth, from the ſurtheſt date of Antiquity, and when they were guided by one light onely: to like nor allow of any other forme of Commonwealth, but abſolute Monarchy.

Read the Hiſtory of the Turkes, and there this example is at large related.

An example deriued from Antiquity.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the Vertues & ſecret properties of the Nut-megge: That it was vnknowne to our ancient predeceſſors, vvith diuers obſeruations, worthy due regarding.

THERE are manie things, which beeing ordinarily worn or carried about a man, do impaire & grow vnto leſſe eſtimation: as ſom precious ſtones, which though they are of a hard and ſolide matter: yet notwithſtanding they waxe old, and looſe much of their valew.

There are very few things but they growe aged by vſe, and loſe their vertue.

Cinnamon, Cloues, and Pepper, borne about vs, do drie of themſelues, and looſe their ſweet ſauour. Contrarywiſe, the Nut megge (on whoſe behalfe I haue written this Chapter, termed by the Latines, Nux mixſtica) being worne or carried about a man, doth encreaſe it ſelfe, and becommeth much the better. I found this rare effect of Nature, in the lower Germanie, where the Inhabitants of thoſe Countreyes, doth vſuallie hang Nutmegs about their Childrens necks; and beeing ſo worne fiue, or ſixe yeares together: they were then much more Oyly and moyſt, then they were the firſt yeare. After I had conſidered on diuers reaſons inducing to this purpoſe, I could finde but one eſpecially which I will declare: ſubmitting my ſelfe neuertheleſſe, to any other, that can alleadge a better, and more profitable.

Where the Author made his firſt obſeruation of the Nutmegge.

Nutmegges (doubtleſſe) beeing long time kepte in Spiceries, bee it in places dry or moiſt, and well packt vp togither, do yet dry of themſelues, become fuſtie, full of holes, and of bad taſt, euen like to worme-eaten and rotten wood. Neuertheleſſe, a young man bearing a nutmeg about about him, & expoſed to the open aire; dooth encreaſe and make it much the better thereby.

How Nutmegs looſes their Vertue and ſauour.

The reaſon how a Nut-megge is bettered by wearing, about a Child & yong man.

Now, to comprehend whence this proceedeth, we muſt vnderſtande, that this is not proper to all Nutmegs, worne by all men indifferently: but it is to bee conſidered, of ſuch as is about an infant or elder Childe, a youth, or anie other young man, not hauing attained to the age of fortie yeares, as commonlie the Belgians are, and thoſe of the nether Germany, beeing of verie good habitude, euen as vulgarly they are. This is eaſilie knowne, by the goodlie proportion of their bodies, the chearefull countenance and complexion of their faces, and firm fleſhineſſe of their limbes, by their Ordinarie appetite to feeding, ſtrong digeſtion, and beeing liuely diſpoſed in all their ioynts and members; alwayes trauailing couragiouſly, rarelie troubled with ſickneſſe or diſeaſes, ſhunning and auoyding the riotous exceſſe, and lauiſh deſire of gourmandizing, whereof they are verie carefull, mingling wholeſome Spices continually amongſt their meats; and ſcarſely anie one of them, but wearing ſome about them, eſpeciallie Nut-megges.

The ordinary diſpoſition of the Belgians.

The yonger ſort do weare them about their Neckes, becauſe they hold opinion: that they make ſtay of the Rheume which falleth downe on the ſtomacke, and is a griefe enſuing by ouermuch eating and drinking; ſuffocating thereby, the Naturall heate. And becauſe ſuch Nutmegs as are worne about the necke, for the ſpace of foure, fiue, or ſix yeares, (ſome more, ſome leſſe) do neither waſt or conſume, but appeare to bee more weighty and Oily: it ſeemeth to proceed by this commendable temperance, from whence it exhaleth a vapour ſomewhat delicate and humecting, wherewith the Nut-megges (which they weare) are plenteouſly ſtored, which cauſeth that their Oyly nature, cannot by no meanes becom dry, but rather is much the more encreaſed.

The reaſon why Nutte-megges are worne about the necke.

Nor is this to bee accounted any way ſtraunge, becauſe wee finde in Learned mens writings, that from the bodies of diuers perſonnes, haue yſſued very ſweet and odoriferous ſweats. Among whom we read of Alexander the Great, whoſe Garments receyued a wonderful ſweetneſſe (as one recordeth) from his verie bodie, and ſo continued in them moſt pleaſingly, without any other Arte or cunning. I my ſelfe ſawe an Indian at Nantes, who though he was ſtark naked, and his bodie ſeeming of a wilde Oliue colour: yet, when mens handes were ſtreaked thereon, they brought thence a ſweete ſauour, very anſwereable vnto Ciuit.

The Sweates of ſome mens bodies are very ſweete and pleaſant.

A naked Indian at Nantes.

As for Maides and young Women, ſuch matter is not acknowledged of them: and therefore I thinke, that the hinderance proceedeth from this, that Naturall heate is more imbecille, and of leſſe power in them, then it is men; and their exhalation is nothing ſo temperat; and in regard alſo, that they are fuller of Excrements, as hath beene declared in the precedent Chapter. But if wee ſhall ſpeake of aged people, they do reſemble trees ouer ſpent with yeares, full of Putrifactious humors: which maketh them white-headed, wrinkled, and full of defects, hauing no more ſtrength to grow or encreaſe, whereby to produce matter of anie worth. Otherwiſe, they are ſo drie, that no exhalation at all commeth from their bodies; for age is nothing els but a meere exſiccation of the Radicall humour, and an extinction of the Naturall heate. Whereby may appeare, that they can no way better a Nutmeg by their exhalation. The Reader may content himſelfe (if he pleaſe) with this reaſon, which many learned men haue approoued, ar well as my ſelfe. It ſhall now not be much amis, to diſcourſe a little further of the Nut-megge, concerning the manner of his growth, in what Countreyes; and likewiſe of the faculties thereof.

Concerning Maids and young Weomen.

Aged men or weomen haue loſt their temperature.

A definition of Age.

That Nutmegges were vnknowne to our reuerend Auncients, is verie eaſie to be comprehended: becauſe, neyther Theophraſtus, Dioſcorides, nor Galen, did euer make any mention of them. And it ſerueth to no purpoſe, to alledge, that they haue ſpoken of Macer: for, I ſay, that the * Macer of the Greekes, was not the Maces of the Arabes, which is a hide or skinne that dooth couer the Nutmegge. And it is verie likelie, that if they had hadde anie knowledge of the Maces, queſtionleſſe they woulde haue lefte ſomething Written thereof. Neyther could wee attaine vnto anie know-

Nut-megges and Maces vtterly vnknowne vnto our Auncients.

* Not Maces, but a reddiſh Aromaticall and aſtringent Rinde of a certaine Indian roote.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

knowledge in this caſe, till after that the Arabes had gotten vnto ſome authority, who taught manie medicines, vtterly vnknowne to the Grecians, becauſe they were much neerer vnto the Indiaes then they.

A deſcription of the Nut-megge and Mace Tree.

The Tree which beareth theſe Nutmegges, and the Maces is as great as a Peare tree, hauing the like Leaues, but ſhorter and rounder. It carryeth his Nutlike fruite, couered with a very hard rinde: which (when the ripening ſeaſon is come) cleaueth or openeth of it ſelfe; and ſheweth the filme or skinne, that encloſeth the Nut-megge, like a ſcale or ſhell; and that is it which wee call the Maces or Mace. I meane not the exteriour or outward rinde, albeit (in diuers parts) they vſe to Confect it with Suger, and is much commended in the Countrey where it groweth, that the ſmell & taſte thereof, is verie wholeſome againſt the paine of the Collicke, and the diſeaſe of the Reines.

The outward Rinde of the Nut-megge.

The fruite being ripe, and the ſayde rinde exteriour opening (like to the ſhel or ſcale that encloſeth the Cheſtnuts of Lymoſine:) the Mace appeareth as red as Scarlet, wonderfull goodly to beholde, eſpecially, when the Trees are wel charged and laden, and beare more then is their vſuall cuſtome. The Nutmeg drying, the Mace ſtill keepeth cloſe and faſt about it, till looſing his red colour, hee begetteth another, which is like a Golden Complexion: And theſe Maces are ſolde at three times dearer rate, then the Nutmegges.

The firſt appearing of the Maces, & alteration of their coullour afterward.

This Tree that beareth theſe Nuttes, groweth in one of the Iſlands of the Molucques, which is called Bandano. It is found alſo in diuers other places, as in Banda, Bandornica, Herma, Tharod, Machedad, Lyzamath, Cares, and in Zeylan, which are the moſt fruitfull Landes, and better then anie other. The people of the Countrey do vſe to gather them, ſome more in one place, then in another, according as they can get them: for, in the moſt parts of all the Iſlands, all thinges are in common, without any priuate claime. This is affirmed by Garcias d' Horta, who trauailed himſelf into thoſe parts.

In what places the Nut-megge Trees doe vſually moſt grow.

They that be freſh, and not drie, withered or worme-eaten, are the beſt nutmegs; likewiſe, they that were waightie, maſsie, oyly, & abounding in moiſture: ſo that by pricking them with a pinne or Needle, they ſend forth a ſweete ſauour. Nutmegges (according to the Arabians opinion) are hot and drie, in the ſecond degree compleat: they are aſtringent, & (by champing in the mouth) doe make the breath ſweet: they take awaie ſpottes and blemiſhes out of the face, ſharpen the ſight, and ſtrengthen the Liuer and ſtomacke: they diminiſh the Spleene or Milt, prouoke Vrine, ſtay the courſe and Flux of the Belly, expelling all Windineſſe, and helpe greatly againſt the Diſeaſe of the Mother, proceeding of Frigiditie. In briefe, they haue the very ſame Vertues and properties, as the Cloaues haue. Nutmegs do yeilde a licquor or iuice, being freſhly pounded, heated in a pan, and preſently preſſed: which iuyce being let ſtand til it be cold, becommeth like virgin wax, and ſenteth very ſweetly. This vnguent is very ſoueraigne for cold Gowts, and to make a man gracious in the fauor of Ladies. Thus much haue I gathered concerning the Nut-meg.

The choyce of Nut-megs.

Naturall properties of the Nut-megge.

A ſoueraigne Oyntment made of Nutmegges.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

A Paradox purpoſely written in the defence of Warre, approuing and maintaining it to be much more famous, honorable, & meritorious of commendation, then Peace.

BEcauſe many ſufficient men haue (heeretofore) verie plentifully diſcourſed on the praiſes of peace among which, wee haue Eraſmus Roterodamus, Romulus Amaſeus, Claudius Ptolomeus, and Adriano Bentiuoli; all of them (with others of no leſſe elegancy) hauing ſpoken ſoundlie, and to the purpoſe, as being Orators of no leſſe learning, then fluent and eloquent in the tongues: the two firſt in Latine, and the other in the Tuſcan language, all hauing diſcreetely employed their paines: yet notwithſtanding, all their defences beſtowed on the behalfe of Peace, I cannot forbeare to maintaine the contrarie, and Such Authors as haue written in the defence of Peace.

Opposition made against the former defences.

and will approue with resolued corage, that they haue done mightie iniurie vnto themselues, in making such description of commendations, by multiplicitie of ydle arguments, which now I will not trouble my selfe withall, either to improue or confute. But so many onely will I produce and aduertise yee of, as shall happen to my memorie, in fauour of honourable combustion & war, and appeare to the manifest discredite of Peace.

The apparant harmes and iniuries ensuing by Peace.

For the first of my reasons, I say, that in the time of Peace, Millitarie Discipline is lost, and commeth to nothing: which (neuertheless) hath beene at all times in reckoning, and allowed as a matter most necessarie, for Conquest, enlarging and conseruing of Empires, Prouinces, and the verie greatest and ciuillest Iurisdictions thoroughout the world.

* A Field ten miles distant from Athens, where Theseus slew a terrible Bull.
* A long Mountaine passing from Leucadia, through the midst of Greece
* A Towne of Bœoti a by Cytheron neere to Thebes.
* A Towne in the borders of Ionia, and an Isle called Achillea in Pontus.

Witnesses hereof, are * Marathon Salamina, * Thermopylæ, * Platææ, * Leucæ, and many other places, not meanely renowned by the Heroycall Actions of Armes. By the meanes of warre, Horatius Cocles was made immortall; and the three Decij helde for three Demie Goddes. Hence arose the great & infinite praises (so sweetly sung and Celebrated by Poets, and our ancient Historians of both the Scipioes and honourable Marcellus. To whome, I would gladlie see who can be iustly compared, vnder Correction of whatsoeuer hath beene said by fore-named Authours, in honour of their Gowne-men, the onelie especiall louers and fauourers of peace.

Auncient customes for the habits of Cittizens.

We see also by experience, that (welneere) all auncient Statues or Figures, both were and are formed in military habits. And it was not lawfull (by the customes of all elder and noble Nations) for a Cittizen to weare any other Garment, then a party-coloured coate: vntill hee had slaine, or (at least) vanquisht two of his Countreyes enemies. In this case, the Carthagenians had a most notable obseruation; for, looke how manie times a Soldier had beene seene in the face of the enemy so many Plumes, helmets, or Horsses, should bee bestowed vppon each seuerall man: but contrarywise, as often as they were absent from the field, so manie Lambes and Capons were sent them, as remembrances of their Worthy encouragement for Souldiers: and as great disgrace to Cowards.

crauenly cowardise. Likewise by publick agreement, it was not lawful for any mã to marry, except hee had first serued in sundry foughten battailes, or performed some one or other honourable exploite, in the defence of his Country.

Law for marriage.

Let vs consider the great honor which Warre maintaineth euen to this verie instant, to such as either haue or do bear Armes for safety and defence of our holy Christian faith. In memorie whereof, Noble and famous Orders of Knighthood were auncientlie established. As Knights of Ierusalem, of Rhodes, of Malta, of Saint Iames, of Holie Lazarus, of Iesus Christ in Portugall, of the Round Table, and of the Garter in England, with diuers other Dignities for Religious warfare, onely for the performance of meruailous and excellent Actions. Whereas contrary-wise, the mindes that were thus fired to haughty atchieuments, in the sloathfull times of peace, would too easily (euen of themselues) be conuerted to proud and insolent attempts.

Honour perpetuated by decrees of Armes.

Orders of Knight-hood to entermize the memory of Armes.

To prooue this true, that they which in the times of Warre, doo accomplish deeds of Vertue, and in the dull daies of peace) fall into quite contrary behauiours, we may perceiue by great Marius, the Conqueror of the Cymbrians. When warre did set an edge vpon his true temper, he had not his equall for valour and prowesse: but, in the trifling times of peace, he was the most wicked and dangerous man in all the Countrey. In like manner, wee shall finde it for most certaine, that Peace quencheth whatsoeuer is good in anie man; and quickneth or giueth life vnto all such thinges, as are in him most hurtfull and dammageable.

Examination of the seuerall times of Warr and peace.

Peace the quencher of all goodnesse in men.

Let mee moue a question (in meere Courtesie) vnto such as are the greatest blamers and deprauers of warre. What can they call Hatreds, Quarrelles, and Seditions, but the onelie true and perfect Instruments, whereby Nature oftentimes helpeth to perfourme manie verie lawdable actions? Ye may immagine, that it was not without very great reason, that VVarre (by the Latines) was called Bella, Fayre, Pleasaunt, and Commodious: for such indeede is the true Nature thereof, albeit our new vpstart gaine-sayers dooth affirme, that Concerning Hatreds, Quarrels and Seditions.

The name giuen to warre by the Latines

PAGINATION INCORRECT

it is meant in a contrarie ſence. But if it were lawfull, to compare the loſſes in peace, with them that enſue onely by warre: the report would be pittifull, and the remembrance verie Tragicall.

Famous Armies deſtroyed by the meanes of truce.

How many goodly Armies haue bin broken, defeated and deſtroyed, by the meanes (I will not ſay of peace) of truce onely? Which, though it bee Warres neereſt Kinſman, yet it is ſworne enemy vnto all Vertue and Valor. The ſtrength and powers of Truce, miniſters the meanes (euen as Peace doth) to leſſen and impaire Citties, Townes, and whole Prouinces, by ſtraunge Lawes and Ordinances: beſide, it engendereth infinit ſecret hatreds, and vpholdeth Princes in roughneſſe and ſeueritie againſt theyr Subiects. In time of peace, the diſpoſitions of men, which (but for it) would be highly exalted with enflamed deſire to expreſſe their brauerie and roialty, do become ſleepie, drowſie, penſiue, ſlothfull, laſciuious, and effeminate.

Princes made rough and ſtearne to their people, by peace.

Warre, fauoured and allowed by god himſelfe, and what names were giuen him.

But to prooue that Warre hath bin fauoured and eſteemed by our Lorde God himſelfe, tell mee (I pray yee) was he not called by the Children of Iſraell, The Great God of Battailes, The Lorde of Hoſtes and Armies? Looke in the Olde Teſtament, how manie mightie ouerthrowes and ſlaughters were executed in his Name, vppon them that were the Aduerſaries of his people? Howe manie were ſlaine by Moyſes, Ioſuah, Gedeon, Sampſon, and diuers other? Howe manie ſlew Abraham, Dauid, Iudas Machabeus, and they that wer in thoſe times? What ſhall wee ſay of Saint Michaell the Arch-Angell; who (euen in Heauen it ſelfe) made ſuch a ſharpe Conflict againſt the Draggon? And, to continue on this diſcourſe, euen to the New Law, if GOD had beene diſpleaſed with Warre, would hee haue commaunded his Apoſtles to ſel their cloaks, and buy each of them a Sword? If Saint Iohn Baptiſt, had hated Soldiers, or Militarie Diſcipline, would he haue apointed them this Law and Ordinance (when they demaunded of him, what way they ſhould take, whereby to attaine to the ſaluation of their ſoules) That they ſhould content themſelues with their Wages, and not rob or pille from the poore people. Hee woulde then rather haue commaunded them, to leaue that eſtate, and betake them vnto ſome Hermitage; or elſe, to deale in ſome affayres of Merchandize, or in ſome ſuch like employments. No, content your ſelues (quoth hee) in your Garriſons, with your ordinarie pay, and offer no ſhame, violence, or extortion, to any one. For your calling (which is the Art Militarie) will not let or hinder ye from your ſaluation: becauſe manie of your profeſsion, haue thereby wonne their ſafeſt ſecurity.

Examples alleaged out of ſacred Scripture in the old Teſtament.

Examples out of the new Teſtament.

The implication of S. Iohn Baptiſts words to the Souldiers, according to the authors interpretatiō.

This in briefe, and in my conceipt, is that which bleſſed Saint Iohns words intended, if I bee no bad Paraphraſtor Interpreter. If hee had beene willing to diſcommend Warre, yet he wold haue forborne it: perceyuing what pride and inſolence was crept into rich mens mindes, during the pampring daies of peace and no way ſo ſoone to be cured or corrected, as by the worthy diſcipline obſerued in warre.

Warre is the only bridle to many notorious inſolencies and abuſes.

How many haue beene obſerued, of great Gentlemen, Merchants, Countreymen, and other of all conditions, who were woont to bee moſt proud and arrogant: ſuddenly to become kind and tractable, onely by meanes of the bridle of Warre? This is it, which deliuereth vs from a number of miſhaps by theeues ydle Vagabonds, Gameſters, Pipers, Players, young Rogues, Cozeners, Ruffians, and High-way watchers. It ſerues to whet and waken the ſpirites of Men, making their bodies to become more ſtrong, light, nimble, pacient; yea, and emboldened againſt all hard and ſiniſter fortunes.

The Cimbrians had a great felicity in Warre.

Conſider the ſweetneſſe and delight which the Cymbrians founde in VVarre, vſing it as the Conſeruation of theyr Countrey: and when they went to fight, they woulde ſing as chearefullie, as if they had beene going vnto a wedding. Immagine what pleaſure was taken therein by furious Hanniball, Valiaunt Marcellus, Vertuous Scipio, Courageous Camillus, and that Victorious Alexander.

Warre the Schoole for publique affaires, and ingenious prouidence.

I ſay moreouer, whoſoeuer is ignorant in taking good order for publique affayres, there is no place or Schoole, wherein hee may more eaſily attaine thereto; then by noting the preparation and conducting of an Armie. Beſides, whoſoeuer knoweth not the deceiptes, ſleights, and trickes of ingenious prudence, dence, or how to ſtand vpon his guarde, to know what he ſhould auoyd, and what he ought principally to followe: let him but liue in war a month or two for pleaſure; and in that time he ſhal lern more then all the Bookes of Peace ſhall euer be able to teach him.

Lessons to be learned in a Field of Battaile, for any mans benefit during life.

Furthermore, hee that couets to vnderſtand the true Nature of inuiolable obedience, ſtrict diligence, incompareable vigilance, vnſpeakeable promptitude of heart, and ineſtimable ſtrength of the bodie: let him but vouchſafe ſo much leyſure, as (for a while) to follow a field well manned and prepared, there to obſerue carefully, what hee may behold for his owne benefit. If hee finde not himſelfe well ſatisfied; yea, & more then contented in verie few dayes, I will yeeld, and looſe my credite in this cauſe. Which therefore ſhall ſerue me to conclude withall, maintaining ſtill that war is to be preferred before peace, as deerly beloued, and with choiſeſt praiſes commended. Beſide, our Prayers ſhould continually bee made to God, to create ſuch chearfull hearts in our Princes, that wee may not any long time, remaine in want, of ſuch a precious and vnvaluable Iewell.

The concluſiō

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Indian Beare: And of thoſe Beares in our owne Natiue Countreyes, howe different they are in their ſeuerall Natures.

All kindes of Creatures haue their contraries appointed, to appeaſe their hurtfulneſſe.

NAture hath verie many times expreſſed hir care and prouidence (as a dutifull handmaid atending on God) whē there are any ſtore of hurtfull creatures in ſome country, that may impeach the inhabiting of men, or Liues of other beaſts and animals, to engender ſome other of contrary kinds, to deſtroy the ouer-abounding of ſuch harmefull things. As we may obſerue in Serpents, which do deuoure vp Toads & Lizards: Serpents alſo themſelues, are eaten by Storks, and many times they themſelues do feede one vpon another. Cats alſo do deuoure Rats, and ſo in diuers more beſide. I ſpeake this the rather, becauſe we finde recorded in the generall hiſtorie of the Indiaes, that in Quiloa, a certaine Countrey of the New-world, there are ſuch extraordinarie ſwarmes of Antes, that they conſume the ſeeds and rootes of all Trees and plants. So that, if there were no Beares (which Nature in eſpeciall fauour hath there appointed, and in great plentie) ther could not be any poſſibilitie of dwelling there, becauſe they would make the Countrey to bee quite barren.

Quiloa a Region in the New-found World.

The Beare of this Region, liueth only (without anie other foode or Paſtorage) by eating thoſe Antes, whoſe beddes and Neſts hee eaſily findeth, and ſo with his tongue (which is verie broade and large) hee is ſo quicke and readie in licking of them vp, that hee is onely nouriſhed by them. There are alſo great ſtore of thoſe Bears, but they are not fierce, wild and harmefull, as thoſe of other partes: for they will not ſet vpon men, neyther mount vppe vpon Trees, to deuoure the young ſprouts and fruites, but are verie eaſily made tame and tractable by the Indians.

The Indian Beare feedeth on Antes only.

The Indian Beare is gentle and tractable.

There is no need of plucking out their eyes, or boaring their lippes, to thruſte Rings of Iron thorough them, onely to tame them. For euen of themſelues, they are (well-neere) Domeſticall: and, if it were not for theſe Beares, neither men, and great ſtore of other creatures, could not liue there: but they encreaſe in thoſe parts ſo aboundantly, that they ſuffice to deſtroy the plentie of Antes; in which reſpect, the Countrey may well account it ſelfe to be moſt happy.

The errour of Ariſtotle and many other learned men beſide.

I haue not well beene informed, whether it bee the Nature of the Beares in this Countrey; that (according as hath beene reported) the ſhee-Beare yeildeth or whelpeth a Male of Fleſh, vvithout anie forme or apparance of life: and that the Damme, onely by the Vertue of licking, giueth it true ſhape.

Of this opinion, were manie Learned and graue men, as Ariſtotle, Plutarke, Plinie, Elianus, and Du Bartas: but it is a manifeſt errour, as experience hath plainly declared vnto vs, becauſe in manie encloſed places of Germanie, and of Fraunce alſo, Beares of both ſexes are kept, which haue engendered young ones, verie well formed in all their members. For, it is an order, obſerued by nature verie ſtrictly in our terreſtriall Animalles, that in theyr paſſage out of the Matrixe, they are fully compleated in all their parts, without any need of further forming, encreaſing verie well in thoſe three dimenſions, length, largeneſſe, & depth.

A ſtrait obſeruation by Nature.

Concerning teeth in yong Infants, that they are not bred after their birth.

It ſerueth to no purpoſe, to alledge, that Childrens teeth are engendered or formed after their birth. For I anſwere, that they bring then with them from the Mothers wombe: as I haue ſeene in the diſſection of many young infants, newly borne and dead, whoſe gummes beeing opened in the pitches and hollowes of the Iawes, the Teeth haue beene plainely found.

A view of young whelps in the Dams belly.

But indeede, no outward appearance is made of them, vntill certaine moneths determined by Nature; in which time, they grow greater and ſtronger, & pierce their paſſage through the gummes For mine owne part, in the Mountaines of Saint Claude, in La franche Counte de Bourgongne, I haue ſeene a ſhee-Beare ſlaine: whoſe Belly being preſently opened, three young Whelpes were there found, fully formed and hairy, and (as I thinke) verie ſoone to haue beene whelped, and that which is affirmed by eye-teſtimony, I hope hath no neede of further probation. The teſtimonie of Scaliger

The teſtimonie of Scaliger, a great Phyſition and Phyloſopher, alſo affirmeth; That he being once at the taking and killing of a Shee-Beare on the Alpes, the young Whelpes in her belly were found to be wholly formed, as I haue formerly iuſtified by mine owne ſight.

How long time the She-Beare goeth with her yong and manner of her whelps.

Plinie ſaith, that the thirtith day after her conception, the ſhee-Beare deliuereth her young ones: but Elianus ſayeth, within three moneths after, which is the more likely and credible, becauſe all great creatures, do beare their burthens longer, then ſuch as are ſmall and little. When they are broght into the world, they are about the bigneſſe of Weezels: and there is good apparance, that they can be no bigger, becauſe they are carried no longer time, as Kine doo theyr Calues, Mares their Foales; and other great Beaſts their young ones; and theſe Shee-Beares hath commonlie three or fiue.

How the She-Beare coupleth with the Male.

So ſoone as ſhee hath conceiued, ſhe commeth no more into the males ſight. When deſire of coupling with the male is kindled in her, ſhee is ſo greatly aſhamed thereof: that ſhe hideth her ſelfe in the remoteſt obſcure places, and the male neuer ſeeketh after her. At length, being preſſed by Nature, and deſire of generation, ſhee commeth to finde the male, and tumbling and playing before him, lyeth directly vpon her backe; and ſo hee coupleth with her, euen as men and women vſe to doe. And this is the reaſon, why it ſhould not bee accounted ſo ſtraunge, that Beares haue had actuall dealing with VVomen, wandering thorow the Forreſts and Mountaynes, and coneeyued by them, as I ſhall declare more at large in the next following Chapter.

Beares haue dealt carnally with women.

Actions performed by Beares.

They helpe themſelues with their Pawes and Feete, euen as men do with their handes and feete; for, they can goe vpright along while together, and hurle or throwe ſtones with theyr formoſt Pawes, ſmite with a Staffe, and whatſoeuer elſe themſelues will doo, as well as we.

Beares troubled with head-ach.

They are a'moſt continuallie troubled with paine and Ache in the head, and in ſuch violent manner, that oftentimes (as madded therwith) they throw themſelues downe from very high rocks their heads going forwardes, couering their eyes with their pawes, beecauſe their ſight is verie feeble, and by couering their eyes, they ſeeme to find ſome eaſe.

Beares haue bad eye ſight, and how they helpe it.

They eſpie out ſuch places, where Bees doe make their Honie and VVax, onely to make them angrie, and to the end, they may bee pricked and pierced by the Bees ſtinges, both in their heade, and about their eyes: wherby their ſight is amended, and their head greeſe much aſſwaged.

The feeding and hunting of Beares.

They feede indifferently on all kindes of Foode, be it Fleſh, Fruites, Hearbes, ſprouts of Trees, and Honey. They will aſſaile and kill (if they can) all wild and ſauage Beaſts; as Harts, Hinds, Boares; yea, and VVilde Bulles manie times.

When the Female is bagde with young.

The Shee-Beare feeling her ſelfe to be bagde, or conceyued with yong (which moſt commonly is in the winter time) with-draweth her ſelfe into her Caue, which ſhee prepareth in a ſtrong defenced

How long time the She-Beare fasteth, and of her comming forth of her Caue.

fenced place, far from common resort, and well couered with earth, boughes, and braunches; entring thereinto alwaies backward, because it should not be knowne, or found by Huntsmen. There she remaineth forty daies together, without any food or sustentation; doing nothing else, but licke her right paw, whereby she liueth all that while. Afterward, she commeth forth againe, and then eateth all the Antes she can come by: yet not for any nourishment (like to to the Indian Beare) but onely to prouoke her to vomit, to the ende that she may feed the better. Which when she hath done, she then seeketh after food, and because she hath continued the space of forty daues, and eaten nothing: her intestines are fast clunged together; so that, no meate can haue entrance, but is instantly cast vp againe, and therefore she eates the Hearb called * Aron, which giueth dilatation and open spreading to her bowels againe.

*Calues foot, Ramp, Starch worte, or Cuckoe-pint.

As for her Whelpes or young ones, they do not teate or sucke, like to other Creatures, because Munster reporteth (but I know not from whom) that one Demetrius a Moscouite, who was sent thence as an Ambassadour to Rome, declared for a certainty to some perticuler Men of credit: that in his Countrey of Moscouia, there were great store of Beares, big in stature of body, and very fierce, that after their birth (for the space of foureteene daies) liued without eating any thing, continuing in so profound a sleepe, that nothing could waken them, no, though they were prickt and pierced very deepely. After that time is passed ouer, they do then awake, and fal to licking of their formost paws, and liue (onely by this licking) till the Spring time, when they begin to come abroad with their Dammes, and nibble on tender Hearbs, as they see them do.

Fables reported by Demetrius a Moscouite Ambassadour to Rome.

Nature hath giuen breasts or dugges to She Beares.

Now, to speake vprightly, I can hardly be induced to beleeue this, because Nature hath giuen Breasts, or Dugges to She-Beares, as I my selfe haue seene, and then they should haue their Milke in vaine.

When a She-Beare & her young ones are pursued.

Moreouer, that if they be pursued by Hunters, hauing their young ones in their company, and they vnable to escape, in regard of their weakenesse: the Damme carryeth some on her back, and one in her mouth, and so climbeth vp vpon a high Tree, to preserue her selfe and them in this manner. This maketh me to remember, that which is recited by Ælianus, of a She-Beare and two Lyons.

*Aelianus in lib. 3. cap. 30.

He saith, that he heard it reported by one Eudemus, that a She-Beare of * Pangæus, a Mountaine in Thrace, chanced to finde a Denne; wherein were young Lyon-whelpes, and neither the Sire or Damme there present, to defend them from this She-Beare, therefore she killed them, & afterward departed thence. Within a short while after, the Lyon and his Lyonnesse returned to their den, bringing preyes to nourish their young Whelpes withall: but finding them dead, and gathering (by their sente) how they were murthered; they instantly pursued the Shee-Beares footing by the smell, and discerning her a farre off, drew neerer and neerer still, deuising their best meanes, how to entrap her. Which the She-Beare also perceiuing, and knowing her strength farre in-sufficient, to deliuer her from these displeased Lyons: forthwith shee began to climbe a Tree, and got vp to the very top thereof. These enraged Beasts seeing they could compasse no amends from the murdresse; tormented themselues exceedingly, and the Lyonnesse lying downe at the foote of the Tree, kept it as besiedged, to be reuenged on her Enimy. But the Sire or male Lyon, he ran vp and downe from Hill to Dale, making the Mountaines to tremble with his loud out-cryes, and all the other Beasts to be very fearefull. At length, hee lighted on a man a Woodseller, who was hewing downe a Tree in the Forrest, and perceiuing the Lyon to make towards him; with extreamity of dismay, the Axe fell out of his hands, and faigne he would haue fled for his owne safety. The Lyon approaching neere vnto him, made signes of humble and gentle fawning on him, and in such pleasing manner, as we see Dogges to do: licking his hands and garments, oftentimes prostrating himselfe at his feete, euen as if he implored his help in some vrgent occasion.

* A Promontory of Thrace

A strange History of a She Beare and a Lyonnesse.

Beasts discouer the killers of their young ones, by their sente or smel that did the deed.

The Lionesse lyeth downe to beleager her enemie.

Admirable humanity in Lyons, to doe themselues good.

At length, he took him by the cloaths with his teeth, as if hee would bee his guide and conduct to some place, often parting

The Lyon giueth directions to the mã, to goe along with him.

patting his paw vpon the Axe, that the Wood-feller ſhould take it vp againe: which the fearefull man being not able to comprehend (though the beaſt ſtill vrged it by diuers perſwaſiue ſigns) the Lyon took it vp with his teeth, and carried it himſelfe. So, winding his taile about one of the mans legs, he conducted him, firſt to the place where the young whelps lay murdred, which was not far from the Tree whereon the ſhe-Beare was mounted. Thither alſo he brought him, and the Lyonneſſe ſeeing them comming, ſhe aroſe (with chearful diſpoſition) to meete them, equalling, or rather exceeding the Male Lyons affability to the Man. In briefe, both the beaſts made ſuch apparant ſignes to the Carpenter, that hee not onely ſaw the She-Beare aloft on the Tree; but gathered alſo by their moanes, that ſhee had killed their young Whelpes, and therefore they would haue him to cut downe the Tree; becauſe, by no means elſe, they could be auenged on her. The man did quickly cut downe the Tree, & as it fell, ſo did the She-Beare: which was ſo ſooner on the ground, but inſtantly they rent her in infinite peeces, returning many gratefull ſignes to the poore Carpenter, and conducting him ſafely to his former working place againe.

As expreſſing what loſſe in nature he had ſuſtained, by ſo euident a teſtimony.

The She-Bear diſmembred in many pieces.

But returne we now againe, to the naturall diſpoſition of the Beare. He will neuer eate the Fleſh of any Beaſt, which he findeth dead, or readily killed for him. It is ſaide alſo, that if a man counterfeit himſelfe to be dead, and retaineth his breath while he ſmelleth to him; hee will not doe him any harme. He driueth all Rats out of his Denne, and will not abide therein, if there bee but one left in it. He will neuer eate any Hony out of the Hiue, where he findes the Bees to be dead.

The Beare vſeth to eate the fleſh of no beaſts, but ſuch as he himſelfe killeth.

Munſter, ex Demetri.

Munſter declareth (by direction from the fore-named Demetrius) that a Beare ſaued the life of Man, in the very remoteſt and vaſteſt Forreſt of all Moſcouia, in the yeare, one thouſand fiue hundred and thirty, and after this manner. A man inhabiting in a neighbouring Village, went into the Forreſt to gather Waxe and Hony: becauſe in thoſe Countries, the Bees vſe to make their Hony in hollow Trees in the Forreſts, whereof there are no meane number, and hee thereby maketh his beſt benefit, that is moſt diligent in ſearch, and getteth the greateſt quantity.

A prety Hiſtory, and no way vnlikely, of a mans life ſaued by a Beare.

The poore Countrey-man, ſtanding with his Legges extended abroad in a hollow Tree, for his better gathering of his Hony-Combs: the ſlender hold (which ſupported his feete) chanced to breake, and downe he fell further into the hollow of the Tree, till hee was vp to the Chin in Waxe and Hony; deſtitute of all ſtrength for helping himſelfe, or hope of any ſuccour, becauſe no Paſſengers frequented that way (at leaſt-wiſe, very ſildome) that might heare his wofull complaints, ſo that he continued there for the ſpace of two daies.

The poore Country man in great diſtreſſe in a hol low tree.

Now, it fortuned, or rather, the eſpeciall Grace of God ſo directing, that a Beare came by the Tree, and ſmelling the Honny, climbed vp the Tree, and deſcended downe to the place where the poore man was. The Beare beeing fearefull when he beheld the man, turned to get vp againe out of the Tree: but the poore man caught hold on one of his hinmoſt feet, and held ſo ſtronglie with both his hands, that the Beare brought vp himſelfe and the man out of the Tree, and both fell downe together on the out-ſide of the Tree, ſomewhat aſtonied with the fall, but no way hurt, the Beare returning into the Woodes, and the man to his home. Thus the Beare ſaued the poore Countrey-mans life, without declaring any ſigne of hurting or offending him.

When hope is weakeſt, heauen is the ſtrongeſt.

A very great and memorable deliuerãce

Bachiles Anchiſius ſaith, that in the Northerly Countries, there are white Beares, that liue both in Waters, and on the Land: beſide, that either with hurling ſtones, or branches of Trees, or with their clawes, they will break open the Ices in Riuers, and in the Sea, only to catch Fiſhes to feed on. Moreouer, that they are not ſo malicious or harmfull, as other Beares are, neither are luſtfull, or ſeeking after women: As one, whereof I am now to ſpeake, and wherby a Lady conceiued, after the maner of women, witneſſed for truth, by Ioannes Saxonius, in his large Hiſtory, and Ioannes Magnus, Arch-biſhop of Vſpalia in Swetia; & laſtly, by Arch-biſhop Olaus, his Bachiles Anchiſo, or Anchiſius, concerning white beares.

Ioannes Saxonius. Ioannes Mag. Epiſc. Vſpal. Olaus Epiſc. Vſpal.

his Succeſſour, who in his Writings auoucheth the very ſame, according as I haue ſelected it from them in this enſuing Chapter.

CHAP. XL.

Of a Lady of Swetia, that was conceiued with child by a Beare, and afterward what enſued thereon.

IN a part of the Kingdome of Swetia or *Sweuia, there ſtood ſometime a goodly Caſtle, builded neere vnto a Mountaine, by a wealthy Lord, and one of great authoritie. This Lord had a very faire Daughter, who walked abroad in an euening, accompanyed with ſome other Gentlewomen, to take the open ayre in the Fields. As they walked together, pleaſantly talking and diſcourſing; a Beare (by chance) had ſtrayed abroad from the thickets on the Mountaine, of verie huge ſtature, fierce and terrible, making directly towards this faire troup, who (in great feare) when they eſpyed the Beare, fled, ſome one way, and the reſt another, for their beſt deliuerance. The Beare laying hold on the chiefeſt Ladie of all the reſt, lifting her forcibly vpon his backe: ran (ſo faſt as he could) into the thickeſt of the Forreſt, not meeting any reſiſtance by the way, becauſe the fore-ſaide Ladies came foorth alone of themſelues, not hauing any man in their company.

*Swetia borderеth on Bauaria, Haſſatia, the Riuer Rhene and the Alpes.

The lady ſurprized by the Beare, and carried away to his Denne, notwithſtanding all her vttermoſt reſiſtance.

Now, albeit the Beare had thus wandered abroad, in ſearch of ſome prey, for appeaſing his hunger: yet (referring the maine point heerein, to Gods mercifull and omnipotent preſeruation) the Beare, mooued by ſome inſtinct of nature (farre differing from that in Beaſts of the ſame kind) would not kill her for his foode, but carried her to his Caue, which was in a very darke and deep vally. There his wonted, rough and ſterne nature, became conuerted into louelike embracings and careſſes, which were ſo extreamely purſued and continued: that the Lady apprehended his luſtfull intention, which, though it was monſtrous and vnnaturall, yet it qualified ſome part of her former feare. And, as ſhe durſt not (in this extreamitie) reſiſt the fury and power of the Beare, dreading each houre the loſſe of her life: ſo (queſtionleſſe) much againſt her will or liking, ſhee was enforced to conſent, and endure ſuch companying with him, as you may better imagine, then I expreſſe.

Behauiour of the Beare to the Lady whē ſhe was in his Den.

The Beare would daily iſſue forth of his den, hunt and kill all kinds of Beaſts, and bring them home as food for himſelfe and the Lady: who (in this vrging neceſſity) was glad to eat raw fleſh, wilde Fruits, and ſome other foodes familiar to men; as Cheeſe, Bread, and ſuch like victuals, which he would get from thē that kept Cattle in the fieldes, or ſuch as trauailed to Faires and Markets. Her daily drinke, was Water of a cleare running Brooke at the Caues entrance, ſhaddowed with a louely thicket of young Trees: and thus ſhee liued, in hope that (one day) God would deliuer her. Many times (while the Beare was abroad at his prey and purchaſe) ſhee purpoſed to make an eſcape thence: yet durſt not attempt it, leaſt hee ſhould againe recouer her, and then kill her; beſide, ſhe feared the rauenous fury of other ſauage Beaſtes, whereof no meane ſtore frequented the Mountaine.

What kind of nourishment the Lady had in the Beares Denne.

The Ladies diuers determinations to eſcape from the Beare.

As thus ſhe ſpent ſome moneths in this hapleſſe manner, it fortuned, that certaine Huntſmen (purſuing their delightfull ſporting ouer the Mountaine) with their Grey-hounds and Beagles, followed this Beare ſo mainly; that he being falne into their ſnares, they there ſlew him. And although this was vnknown to the Lady, yet when ſhe heard the voyces of men, and they appearing to be neere the Caue: ſhe came foorth vnto them, to their no little dread and admiration. Yet looking more aduiſedly on her, they perfectly knew her, and had heard of her loſſe, with generall ſuppoſition of her death: whereupon they conducted her home to her Father and Mother, who ſcarcely knew her, her complexion had been ſo greatly altered. In this time, Nature (who ſometimes worketh wonderfull things, and

The happy manner of the wofull Ladies deliuerance from the Beare.

The Lady was brought home to her Father and Mother.

and contrary to common order) had disposed to of the Beasts seed in her bodie; that she being growne great, and generally expected to be deliuered of a monster: it prooued to bee a goodly Male Childe, not any way pertaking in the Sires bestiall forme or appearance, saving that his body was much more hairy all ouer, then is seene in other Children. He was carefully nursed, and the name of Beare imposed on him: but when he grew to mans estate, hee became so strong and powerfull, that euery one stood in great feare of him. The Huntsmen that killed the Beare, his begetter, would often boast in his company, after what manner they had deliuered his Mother: but hee was the Deathsman of them all, saying; Albeit, he had receiued such a fauour by them, yet notwithstanding, he stood bound in nature, to reuenge the death of his Father.

The Lady was deliuered of a goodly Sonne, and he was named Beare.

Beare slew al them that killed the Beare his begetter.

This Man begat Trugillus Sprachaleg, who was a very valiant Souldiour and Captaine; and he begat Vlfen, a man of high deseruing: of whom, the Chronicles of the Countries of Dannemarch, Swenia, and Gothia, doe make most large mention, for he was the Father of Suegus, who was King of Dacia; whereupon, all Histories doe affirme, that al the Kings of Dacia, and of Swenia, proceeded from this race, and all the fore recited Authours (who are of the same Countries) doe maintaine as much. Concerning my selfe, I haue seene many tame and domesticke Beares, amourous of Women, and She-Beares to be the like of Men, although their eyes haue beene pluckt out, and very few are ignorant of the truth in this case: therefore this history sufficiently approueth, that these beastes doe couple after the manner of men.

The discent of Beare, according to the reporte in Chronicles.

The Kings of Dacia and Swenia descended of a Beare.

The Authors affirmation out of his own knowledge.

Now, let vs admit the Beare to bee cruell and vile in all his actions; yet notwithstanding, Nature hath bestowed diuers medicinable properties, on some peculiar parts of his body. His head is held venomous, to such as eate thereof, and to procure raging madnesse: in which regard, the Inhabitants of these Northerly Countries, doe vse to burne those heads, and the Ashes of them are exceeding good, for them that haue the Foule-euill, or Falling-sickenesse, by often washing the diseased parties head, with Lye, made of the saide Ashes or Cinders. If they be mingled also among Hony, it will cause Haire to grow againe, where it hath long time wanted: euen as the Fat or Grease of the Beare doth the like, when men haue lost their Haire; helping likewise the paines of the Sciatica, and other Gouts. Also his Flesh is wholesome to bee eaten, and hath no euill tast. The Scythians, Getes, and other Notherne Countries, do fasten Beares heads on the Gates of their Cities and Townes, perswading themselues; that they doe preserue them, from being hurt by their enemies. Thus you see, what I collected out of good, ancient, and approoued Authors, concerning the Nature of the Indian Beare, and those of other Countries, better knowne to vs.

Sundry medicinable properties belonging to certaine partes of the Beare.

For the foule euill or falling sickenesse.

For restoring lost haire, & helping the Sciatica and Goutes.

The Scythians, Getes and Notherne Nations.

The End of the Eight Booke.

The Ninth Booke.

CHAP. I.

Of the Great Turks Court, more commonly cald (in these daies) the Court of the Gret Signior: His Pompe, State, Officers, and Attendants; As also their daily Wages and Allowances, according to their degrees, and places of Seruice, &c.

WE haue alreadie spoken sufficiently (though briefely) concerning the Originall of the Turkish Empire, and in what manner they attained to such height and greatnesse: Our purpose therefore, in this present Chapter, is, to discourse onely of the Gouernment, and Order obserued in the Court, vsually tearmed by themselues, the Porta or Court of the Grand Signore; whereto I am the more willingly induced, because the Pompe, Might, and Maiesty thereof, may bee publikely discerned.

In the 25. Chapter of the first Book.

The great Signior maketh his most abiding in Constantinople, with some briefe discription thereof.

The Cittie of Constantinople, wherein the Great Signior Turke (with his Court Royal) maketh his most residing; was in former times called Bizantium, and new Rome, containing now in circuit, about eighteene Miles. It hath seauen small Hils, not of any great height, and it is rounded with old ruined wals, being full of Houses, though none of the best, yet composed of Clay, wood, and some few of stones. There are many Groues or Thickets of Trees in the Citty, vn-inhabited, consisting of Cipresse Trees, and diuers others there growing in like maner. In Constantinople is the Serraglio of the Signior Turke, which is a singuler thing, & very great, as we shall relate hereafter. There is the Serraglio of Weomen, for the Great Signior; The Serraglio of Ianissaries; The Patriarkes Pallace; The Pallace of Constantine the Emperor, which is partly ruinated; The Church of Saint Sophia, which was builded by the Emperour Iustinian, of admirable fine stone, and curious Marble, as yet (though very ancient and excellent) is to be seene, part whereof, the Great Signior imployeth as a Stable for his Horses. There is also the Moschea of the Sultane Mehemet, which hath an Amarato (that is as an Hospitall or Almes-house) ioyned vnto it, wherein is entertained and lodged men of all Nations and Religions, that will enter into it, and there they are allowed three dayes acceptance and food, as Hony, Rice, Bread, Water, and a Chamber to rest in. There is belonging to this Hospitall, goodly Bathes, and rare Fountaines or Springs of Water, very delightfull to behold. There are also the Moscheaes of Sultane, Baiazeth, of Sultane Selim, and of diuers other Lords, which are very beautifull and and costly builded: whereby it appeareth, that when they pleased, they knew how to make houses, and Pallaces most magni-

Il Serraglio del Signior Turco.

The Pallaces in Constantinople.

The goodly Church of S. Sophia.

An Hospital for people of all Nations, and three dayes entertainement.

Diuers Moscheaes in the Citty.

magnificent and sumptuous.

There is likewise the * Hippodromo, which is a place, where anciently they vsed to breake and run their Horses, in the forme of a Theater or circle in the midst of which Hippodromo, there standeth a sharp Spire or Pinnacle, being an ingenious Piller, made in the fashion of a Needle, very faire, well wrought, and without any Lime or Morter: yet made of fine Stone, and framed in such manner, that it riseth aboue fifty fadome in height, obseruing still the true shape of a Needle, and resting vpon foure round Bals of Marble. There is also a Piller of Brasse, in forme of a Serpent with three heads: and a Hercules of Brasse, brought thither from Hungaria; and in the midst of all these, standeth a frame or deuise, made like a Colossus, of diuers kindes of beautifull Marble, whereon is curiously engrauen, the Histories of all the forenamed thinges; and others, that were wont to be in the Theater or Hippodromo. Thorow the Citty, there are diuers tracts or pathes of Antiquity, Arches, Colloms of Porphiry, Springes fetcht from Danubie, & other neere neighbouring Riuers: many Gardens with goodly Houses in them; many Moscheaes belonging to priuate Lordes, and great store of Bathes, annexed to the Moscheaes of publike Magistrates, and other priuate persons.

On the other side of the Sea, and at the head of the Serraglio, are the hils of Asia, containing the iourney of two miles, little more or lesse: which Asia, vnder one name only is now cald Natolia, and there (on the shoaring banckes) are diuers little Castles, termed Scutari. Next, there is that which they call Chalcedonia, seated in a corner of the Hellespont; where diuers notes of Antiquitie are to be obserued, and (in many places) the foundation of auncient Churches may be seene, as well of Christians, as of the Gentiles, being now goodly places, and abonnding in Fruits. The site or scituation of Constantinople is such, as not only it exceedeth all description, equal to the due merit thereof: but also can as hardly be conceiued in thought, in regard of the beauty and delicate composure therof, so that (vndoubtedly) it may rather be reputed diuine, then otherwise, and whatsoeuer hee be that shall behold it, will iudge it worthy to be preferred, before all other sited Cities in the world.

In the Citty, beside Turkes, there are Iewes, being * Marrani, fled, or repulsed out of Spaine; and these are they that haue taught, and do yet teach, all kinds of Trades to the Turkes, and the most part of all the Shoppes and Boothes for Trades, are kept and exercised by those Marrani. There is a place named Biscstano, where is bought and sold all kinde of Cloathes, and Turkish Commodities, Silkes, wollen and Linnen Cloath, Siluer and Gold wrought into all formes, Bowes, Slaues, Horses, and all kinds of thinges else to be had in Constantinople, which continually are brought to this Market, and which is euery day kept open in full sale, except Friday onely. Constantinople is in Thrace, and the terminations thereof are in this manner. On the East, is the Propontis, and mouth of the great Sea, from the streights of Hellespont, to Bosphorus Thracius. On the West, is part of Bulgaria, and part of Macedonia. On the North, Bassina; And on the South, Ægæum Mare, with part of Macedonia, which turneth towardes the Riuer Nessaua, anciently called * Nessus Fluuius. This most Noble Citty is inhabited with Turks, who (by the writings of diuers approoued Authours, for confirmation, and many of the Turkes themselues also) had their Original from Scythia, which now is part of Tartaria, a Northerly Region, and deuided into two parts by the Riuer * Tanais; one part whereof is in Europe, & the other in Asia. That part of Europe is confined (on the one side) with Pontus, and on the other side, with the Riphean Mountaines, being backed also with Asia it selfe, and with the Riuer Thaspis. By Ptolomie, these two Scythiaes are named, the one, Intra * Iamnum montem, and the other, Extra Iamnum, as is more at large elsewhere to be seene.

This people, being parted from Scythia, as formerly hath been said, and beginning (in their own confines) to make commodities and irruptions, proceeding on still further: in short time they ouer-ruled a great part of Asia; but in regard they knew not how to maintain themselues vnder one Head or Commaunder, they could not make any firme

* A counsing or running place for Horses.

The curious Needle in the Hippodromo.

The three headed Serpent of Brasse

The great Colossus.

Antiquities in passage thorow the citty.

Gardens and goodly Houses.

Priuate Moscheaes.

The hils of Asia, now called Natolia.

Castelles Scutari, Chalcedonia in the Hellespont.

The site or seate of Constantinople exceeding description.

* A Nickename for Infidell Renegado Spaniards.

The Biscstano or chief Market-place in Constantinople.

In what manner Constantinople is bounded or limitted on all sides.

* Wher stood a Citty of Thrace, built by Constantine.

*: A Riuer of Scythia, parting Asia from Europe

* In the lesser of the Isles called Baleares.

The Turkes issuing forth of their owne confines.

firme or ſetled foundation. Which being well perceiued and conſidered by one, who was named Ottheman (a man of more condition then common baſeneſſe, being of high ſpright and valiant minded) he conſulted with his owne thoughts, that if he could compaſſe the arme and furtherance of ſome ingenious man that had authority: hee might eaſily haue the people and whol Country vnder obedience, and encreaſe the fame as occaſion ſtil ſerued. Hereupon, he diſcouered his priuate intention to three men, whom he thought more apt and conuenient for this buſineſſe, then any of the reſt: promiſing them, that if he could compaſſe the hope he aymed at; both they and their of-ſpring ſhould be continued and maintained in ſuch high ſtate and dignity, anſwerable to ſo great a benefit as he receiued by them. Moreouer, that not any one of their poſterity, ſhould be vnder-handed, or left to the mercy of Law, except they offended very grieuouſly. The conditions were accepted by theſe men, and they conſpired together againſt the chiefeſt Soueraignety: in which progreſſion, what by art, craft, threatnings, & much expence of blood, all was obtained to their full deſire. Theſe three men, one of them was named Michaele Greco, made a Turke: of whom are deſcended the Marcalogi, & one of them (is at this inſtant) Saniack of Boſsina. The ſecond was called Malco Greco, a Renegado: of whom alſo came the Malcozoli, and there is but one onely left of them, who is Saniack in Grecia. The third was Aurami, a Natiue Turke, the deſcendants of whom were tearmed Euracaſſi, and it is not knowne, whether any of them bee left, or no. When the Race and Family of Ottheman failed, theſe other pretended right to the principalitie, and therefore they were very highly reſpected. This Ottheman came to the Gouernment, in the yeare one thouſand, three hundred, or there-about, and liued in the regiment, twenty eight yeares. After whom ſucceeded Orchanes, who liued twenty two yeares in the dominion. Next, Amurath raigning twenty three yeares. After him Bauazeth; Then Cyrſcelebes, or (as others will haue it) Calapine, who liued ſixe yeares. Next him was Mahomet, who raigned foureteene yeares. Then Amurath the ſecond, who ruled one and thirty years. Then Mahomet the ſecond, who raigned two and thirty yeares, and was called the firſt Emperour of the Turkes in Conſtantinople. Next, Bauazeth the ſecond, who raigned one and thirty yeares. Then Selim, eight yeares; To whom ſucceeded Sultan Soliman, who raigned forty ſeauen yeares: And after him, Selim the ſecond, raigning eyght yeares. Then Amurath the third, who raigned one and twenty years. Next to him, Mahomet the third, ruling nine yeares: And laſtly Achmeth, or Achmet, who came to the Empire, being but ſeuenteene yeares old, and raigneth yet at this preſent.

Ottheman, a man of bold and ſprightly courage.

Ottheman diſcouered hiſe cret purpoſe.

Very liberall and large promiſes.

The conditions accepted and proſecuted.

The Marcalogi deſcended Michaele Greco

The Malcozoli, of Malco Greco.

The Euracaſſi, of Aurami.

Succeſſion that enſued after Ottheman.

Orchanes. Amurath. 1.

Bauazeth. 1. Calapine.

Mahomet. 1.

Amurath 2. Mahomet. 2.

Bauazeth. 2.

Selim 1.

Soliman

Selim. 2. Amurath. 3.

Mahomet. 3.

Achmeth or Achmet, the Turke or great Signior now raigning. 1613.

1 THE Great Signior hath a Serraglio in a part of Conſtantinople, at the two Seas deuiſion, which containeth (in circuit) about three miles: and therein is his chiefe Seat and Court, which is called the Porta. This Serraglio, becauſe it was begun to be builded by the Soldane Mahomet: when hee dyed, hee would haue it leuelled with his Moſches, and that a thouſand Aſpers ſhould be dailie paied towards the charges, which Aſpers doe amount to twenty Ducates, and this payment is as yet obſerued. In the ſaid Serraglio are very many goodly Chambers, but one (aboue all the reſt) appointed for the Great Signior, and wherein he ſleepeth, where doe attend ſixe Youthes (ſuppoſed by ſome to be Weomen) who onely doe awaite on his perſon. Of theſe ſixe, two are appointed daily for ſeruice in the Chamber, and of the Signior, and by them at night time, the Office of Guard is performed, one ſtanding at his head, and the other at his feete (continually vigillant) with two lighted Torches in their hands.

Of the Porta or Court, wherin is the great Signiors chiefe State.

Six youths that wait on the great Signior in his Chamber, & order of their ſeruice.

Theſe two doe helpe in the morning, to put on the Signiors Garments, the vppermoſt whereof being called Caſtanno; hath two Pockets: into one whereof, the Pages do put a thouſand Aſpers, and into the other, twenty Ducates of Gold euery morning, which Mony, if (in the day time) it bee not giuen away by the Signior; it remaineth to them that maketh him vnreadie at night,

The guarding and watching of him in his ſleeping in the night time.

What Money he daily carrieth about him, being put into his pockets by his Pages.

for he neuer putteth on thoſe garments againe, neither weareth any twice, as is credibly affirmed. When he rideth abroad on pleaſure, either to hunt, or any other ſportfull exerciſe, beſide the forenamed Mony which he carryeth about him; the Caſnadar-Baſhae, who is his chiefe Treaſurer, rideth next behind him, who carrieth great ſums of Mony, which the Signior commaundeth to be giuen away. The Offices of the fore-named ſixe young Pages, are altred according to the Signiors will and pleaſure. One of them is called the Chiuchter, that is he which carrieth the Pantofles of the Signior; The ſecond, Scilichtar, who beareth his Bow and Arrowes; The third, Chiocadar, who carrieth his cloak or Mantle; The fourth, Saraptar, who carieth his Vial of water; The fift, Schemeligh, who beareth his ſtoole or ſeat; And the laſt is Oda-Baſhae, who is chiefe of the Chamber. Theſe Pages haue firm and ſetled allowance of Wages; ſome fifteen, and others twenty, but the Oda-Baſhae thirty Aſpers daily.

The Turke Capagaſſi Eunuch, that is he which is chiefe of the Porta or Court, hath threeſcore Aſpers daily.

The Caſnadar-Baſhae Eunuch, chiefe of all the other Treaſurers, hath threeſcore and ten Aſpers daily.

The Chilergi-Baſhae Eunuch, chiefe of all the other Diſpenſers or Stewards, hath forty Aſpers daily.

The Saraidar-Baſhae, Eunuch of the Serraglio, when the Signior is in Prograce, hath fifty Aſpers daily.

Twelue Eunuches, ſubiect, or at commaund of theſe fore-named, haue ſome ten, and ſome fifteen Aſpers each man daily.

In the next place, we are to ſpeake of fiue hundred young Women, from the age of eight, to the yeares of twentie, who are kept in a Serraglio, and are the choiſe delights of the Grand Signior. They haue ten and twelue Aſpers daily each one of them, and are enſtructed in diuers Arts, according to their ableſt apprehenſion: but moſt eſpecially in Reading, Writing, and Doctrine of their Law or Religion, and in riding. Their Maiſters or Tutours, are ancient Taliſmani, called Cozza, that is to ſay, Doctours of the Law.

Theſe young Women, at the time of Bairomo, which is (among vs) the Feaſt of Eaſter, are all allowed Garments by the Great Signior, which are of Silke and of Cloath, without any forme of Liuery. Their Head Attires are all of Gold, and they haue Semitaries and Bowes, like Amazones: but they neuer go foorth of the ſaid Serraglio, till they attaine to ſuch yeares, as the Signior thinketh them apt for ſome Office, and then they are made eyther Spacoglani, or Scilichtari, or of ſome greater degree, according to their carryage, or grace that they haue won with the Signior. Euery tenne of theſe Women are kept by an Eunuch, called Capoglano, that is to ſay, chiefe of the younger Women, and euery one of them hath a night-Slaue, and toucheth not him that lyeth neereſt him. They lodge in goodlie Roomes, like great and ſpacious Hauls, verie full of lights, and their Eunuches doe ſleepe in the middeſt of thoſe Roomes. There is a Garden belonging to the Serraglio, containing in compaſſe more then a mile, whereto appertaineth fiue and thirtie Gardiners, called Boſtangi, who are decayed and aged Ianiſſaries: and theſe Boſtangi haue (from three to fiue Aſpers) each man dailie, and euery one hath a Liuery of Turkiſh Cloath, and a Shirt yearelie allowed him. When they depart out of the Serraglio, they remaine Ianiſſaries, or Solachi, or Capigi, or otherwiſe, according to their qualitie.

The Boſtangi-Baſhae, who is chiefe of the Gardiners, hath fifty Aſpers daylie allowed him, and many other royall fauours beſide.

The Protogero, who is as Lieutenant to the Gardiners, hath twentie Aſpers daily, and euery ten hath a chiefe, called Boluch-Baſhae. Out of this Garden, which is very great, well laboured, and full of excellent Fruits of all ſortes, there is yearely gathered ſuch plentie: that the benefit made onely thereby, ſufficeth for the Signiors expences in dyet, beſide a good ouer-plus remaining for other vſes. Neere to the Garden, doe two Foyſtes or ſmall Barkes continually attend, which are rowed by the Gardiners, when the Signior pleaſeth to ſollace himſelfe on the Water, and the Boluch-Baſhae gouerneth the Helme.

There

The Caſnadar-Baſhae, the Signiors chiefe Treaſurer.

The ſix yong Pages, and what belongeth to their ſeuerall Offices, and their wadges.

Capagaſſi Eunuch.

Caſnadar-Baſhae, Eunuch.

Chilergi-baſhae Eunuch.

Saraidar-Baſhae, Eunuch.

Twelue Eunuchs.

Fiue hundred young Women, who are Concubines to the great Signior, and kept in an eſpeciall Serraglio.

Taliſmani Cozza, Doctour of the Lawes, Schoole-Maiſters to the Concubines.

Offices beſtowed on Concubines when the Signior pleaſeth.

Eunuchs and Night-Slaues that attend on the Concubines in their Lodgings.

Boſtangi, Gardeners belonging to the Womens Serraglio, and their daily allowance.

Boſtangi-Baſhae chiefe Gardiner.

Protogero, Lieuetenant to the Gardeners.

Boluch-Baſhae.

Foyſts for the Signiors recreation on the Water.

Aſſi Baſhae, chiefe of the Cookes.

There is one called Aſsi-Baſhae, who is chiefe of the Cooks, with fifty Cooks vnder him, that haue each man fiftie Aſpers by the day, vnder Cookes four, who haue ſixe Aſpers; and ſixe others, eight Aſpers each man.

Canalgi Baſhae Maiſter of the Confectionarie.

Canalgi-Baſhae, is chiefe of the Confectionarie, hauing forty Aſpers daylie allowed him: and he hath thirty other Companions, who haue ſome fiue, others ſixe Aſpers each man.

Caſnagir-Baſhae, the chief Butler.

The Caſnagir-Baſhae, who is Maiſter of the Butlers, or chiefe Butler to the Great Signior, hath forty Aſpers daily. Morning and Euening hee bringeth in his hand, the Cuppe which the Signior drinketh in, and hath an hundered Caſnegeri vnder him, who haue from thirtie, to ſixtie Aſpers each man daylie.

Mutpachemin, the chiefe Steward.

The Mutpachemin, who is the chiefe Steward, hath fortie Aſpers daily, and keepeth a Clearke vnder him, that hath twenty Aſpers daily.

Ianiſſarie-Wood-carriers.

An hundred decayed Ianiſſaries, which with Carts doe carry Wood to the Serraglio, they haue from three, to fiue Aſpers a man daily, and are cloathed alſo.

Sacca, water-bearers.

Ten Sacca, which carry Water on Horſes in Bouges, haue each man from three, to fiue Aſpers daily.

The Signiors daily expences for his women, &c.

The expences which is graunted by the Grand Signiors allowance, to his women and their Eunuches, with other perſons, to the number of a thouſand, or thereabout, amounteth to fiue thouſand Aſpers euery day.

His Stable of Horſes in the Serraglio.

There is a Stable in the Serraglio, with two hundred Horſes for the Signiors perſon, and two hundred men to manage and keepe them, who haue from fiue, to eight Aſpers each man daily.

Capigi-Baſhaes, Captaines of the Gates, who cõmand ouer the Capigi.

Three Capigi-Baſhaes, who are Captaines of the Portes or Gates, that haue an hundred Aſpers by the day, and are cloathed yearely. Vnder them they commaund two hundred and fifty Capigi, that haue each man from fiue, to ſeauen Aſpers dailie. Each Capigi-Baſhae, ſtandeth obliged (with a third nũber of the Capigi) to keepe a Guard at the Gate of the Grand Signior, beeing changed ſtill day by day. And when Ambaſſadours, or others doe come to kiſſe the Grand Signiors hand: all of them are preſented with Garments, or elſe Money, according to the degree of him that is brought to that honor.

Capigichecheſſi, Protogero to the Capigi.

A Capigichecheſſi, who is as Protogero of the Capigi, and hath forty Aſpers daily.

Baſhaes Viſirs, chiefe Counſellors and States-men to the great Signior.

Foure Baſhaes, called Viſirs, that is, chiefe Councellers to the Signior. He that is greateſt in authority, hath foure and twenty thouſand Ducates by the yeare, and the other of them, haue ſixteene and eighteene thouſand yearely each man. They hold (beſide) ſo much Land of him, as yeildeth three times more benefit, then is their allowance and prouiſion of Money: whereto are added the rich garments giuen them by the Signior; the great preſents of Suters, and others; beſide the royalties held by their Offices, which are infinite. Theſe Baſhaes liue and goe cloathed very pompouſly, hauing Slaues, both Men and Women, to whom they giue Wages, Horſes, Garments, Head-attires of Gold, Girdles of Siluer, according to ſuch Office and degree, as they hold about them: and by theſe (with his owne prouiſion) is each Baſhae ſerued, euen as the Signior is ſerued by his attendants. They haue fiue and twenty, or thirty Secretaries granted them by the Signior, who are men of good eſteem, and haue fiue and twenty or thirty Aſpers ech man daily, beſide Slaues, ſome more, ſom leſſe, according to ech mans quality and eſtate. Theſe Baſhaes doe go in and out to the Signior, about matters and occaſions of State, & are they (in briefe) that gouerne and manage all things after their owne liking.

Secretaries allowed by the Signior, to attend on his foure Baſhaes Viſirs.

Mophty, the chiefe Prieſt or Biſhop.

Next, there is the Mophty, who is the Interpreter and chiefe of the Law or Religion: And he is not troubled with any other matters, but in caſes belonging to Religion, and concerning their Faith. His Office and Dignity is, as preſenting the perſon of the chiefe Prieſt or Biſhop.

Cadi Leſchieri Taliſmani, Doctours of Law for the Army.

Two Cadi Leſchieri Taliſmani, who are Doctors of the Law for the Armie, one of Greece, the other of Natolia, and they hold very worthy Offices. They ſit at the Court gate, and do proceed or go before the Baſhaes Viſirs, albeit the other are more eſteemed. They are Executors of the Lawes, and with conſent of the Baſhaes. They place and diſplace the Cadi, who are as Poteſtates and chiefe Magi-

Magiſtrates thorow the Countries. They hold in Lands (each man) about ſeauen thouſand ducates yearely, and do keep two hundred or three hundred Slaues ſeuerally: being alſo allowed by the Signior, ten Secretaries, and two Mochtur-Baſhaes, who performe the Office of Cauallery, and liue on the royalties, whereof they haue good ſtore.

Cadi, Maiors or Poteſtates through the Land.

Mochtur-Baſhaes, as Maiſters of the Horſſe.

There are two Diſterdari, or rather, (as we vſe to tearme them) Gouernors of the rents and reuenues. One of them hath the collection, & keeping of thoſe accounts, which come from one third part of Greece: to wit, thoſe parts which are towardes Danubie; and next, from Aſia, Soria, and Ægypt, with Landes of ten thouſand Ducates yearely, albeit, (with their royalties) hee raiſeth three times as much. The other hath charge of the other two third partes of Grecia, but when the great Signior goeth forth into the Field: he remaineth as his Vicar and Lieutenant in Conſtantinople, and hath ſixe thouſand ducates in lands, whereof he maketh three times the value, and their ſeuerally Offices are of great dignitie. They keepe vnder them fifty Clearkes, with many coadiutores, who haue care of the Caſna accounts, that is, of the Signiors Treaſure: and theſe Clearks are allowed wages by the Signior, from fifteene, to fifty Aſpers each man daily. Alſo theſe Diſterdari, each one of them hath 1000. Slaues, & the other fiue hundred: Likewiſe, the Clearkes, they haue from two, to twenty Slaues, each man allowed him.

Diſterdari, Maiſters of the Rents & Reuenues.

The great Signiors Vicar and Lieuetenant in Conſtantinople.

Caſna, the Treaſure belonging to the Signior.

Two Roſunamegi, Maiſters of the Clearkes, that receiue the Monies, and make diſburſement thereof again when need requireth, who haue xxv. aſſiſtants betweene them. Theſe two men are allowed forty Aſpers apiece; and the fiue and twenty haue from eight, to ten Aſpers each man daily.

Roſunamegi, Maiſters, or Clearke-Comptrollers

Deſnadar, weighers of Money.

Deſnadar, wherof there are two, whoſe office is to weigh the Aſpers and Duckates, with fiue and twenty Aſpers allowance daily for the one, and thirtie for the other.

Saraffieri, bankers or Money-Changers.

Sixe Saraffieri, as Bankers or Lombards, who know the true eſtimate of Gold and Siluer, and haue from ten to fifteene Aſpers, each man daily.

Then there is a Neſſangi-Baſhae, who ſigneth the Commaunds, and publique Writings, with the Signe or Marke of the Signior. His Office is, as Great or chiefe Chancellour, and he is a man of much reputation. He ſitteth in the Porta, next to the Beglerbey, and hath eight thouſand ducates of annuall Lands, beſide very honorable places, with aboue three hundred Slaues.

Neſſangi-Baſhae, the Lord high Chancellor.

There is a Caſnadar-Baſhae abroad, or at large, as common Treaſurer, with ten Caſnadri vnder him: himſelfe hath fifty Aſpers daily, and the ten other fifteene each man.

Caſnadar-Baſhae, Treaſurer at large.

The Deſtermin, who is as Surueyer of the Lands, and keepeth a Regiſter of them all. He hath forty Aſpers dailie, and vnder him are ten Clearkes, rewarded from ten, to fifteene Aſpers dailie each man.

Deſtermin, Surueyer of the Lands.

Then there are foureſcore Mutaſerache, who are as Demy-Lances or light Horſemen to the Signior, carying their Launces alwaies, whenſoeuer he rideth abroad, and acknowledging no other Head or Commaunder, but the Grand Signior himſelfe onely. Afterward, when either by art or deſert, any one of them can attaine ſo farre into his fauor; he is made Aga, that is a Captain. The meaneſt of them haue ten, and the better ſort, foureſcore Aſpers a man daily.

Mutaſerache, Demie-Launces or Light-Horſſe-men.

There is a Chiaus-Baſhae, who is chiefe of the Sergeants for the Army, and holdeth ſuch credit with euery man: that when he is ſent by command from the Signior, to any Baſhae, Saniack, or Cadi, with order, to cauſe the head of any one to be ſmitten off: he is obeyed, without receipt of any Letter by him, or commaundement in writing, and euen no otherwiſe, then as if the Signior himſelf were there in perſon, and commaunded it to be done. This man hath an hundred Aſpers by the day, and keepeth an hundred Slaues vnder him, for whom he is allowed from fiue & twenty, to forty Aſpers for each man daily.

Chiaus-Baſhae, as Sergeant Maior.

A very great and eſpeciall preheminēce.

The Mechter-Baſhae, is Maiſter of them, that doe diſplay or ſpread abroad the Tents or Pauillions, and the Tapeſtry that couers the Floores in the Court, with ſuch like buſineſſes thereto belonging. He hath forty Aſpers dailie; one Protogero, and fiue and twenty Aſpers allowance: threeſcore Mechters, waged from fiue, to eyght Aſpers Mechter-Baſhae, Maiſter of the Tents and Tapiſtry.

Aſpers each man, and their yearelie Lieueries from the Signior.

Aga, Captain of the Ianiſſaries.

The Aga, that is, Captaine of the Ianiſſaries, who hath a thouſand Aſpers and more daily, and ſixe thouſand Duckats in Lands yearely. This Aga, when Court is kept, which is commonly twice or thrice euery weeke, ſtandeth obliged, to feede the Ianiſſaries, with Bread, Rice, Mutton, Hony, and Water. He hath a Checaya vnder him, or rather a Protogero of the Ianiſſaries, who is as his Vice-gerent, and hath two hundred Aſpers daily in ready Mony, and thirty thouſand in Lands yearely. He alſo hath a Clearke of the Ianiſſaries, called Ianiſſariaßis, waged with an hundred Aſpers daily.

Checaya, Vicegerent of the Ianiſſaries.

Sechmem-Baſhae, Maiſter of the hunting Hounds.

The Sechmem-Baſhae, is Maiſter of the Hounds for Hunting: he hath an hundred Aſpers daily, and to the number of almoſt two thouſand Ianiſſaries vnder him.

Zagarzi-Baſhae for the Beagles.

The Zagarzi-Baſhae, is Maiſter of the Beagle-Hounds, beeing allowed fiftie Aſpers daily, and hath about ſeauen hundred Ianiſſaries vnder him.

The number of the Ianiſſaries, and their allowances & Commanders

There are to the number of twelue thouſand Ianiſſaries, that haue from three, to eight Aſpers wages, each man daily allowed them. Euery ten haue their Oda-Baſhae, and euery hundred haue their Boluch-Baſhae: but theſe chief Men of the tens and hundreds, do ride on Horſebacke, the Oda-Baſhaes beeing allowed forty Aſpers each man dailie, and the Boluch-Baſhaes ſixtie, the reſt of the Ianiſſaries doe goe on foote, beeing cloathed once ayeare by the Signior, in coorſe Azure cloath.

The Ianiſſaries dietting together.

Their dwelling is in two partes of Conſtantinople, freely giuen them by the Signior, wherein dwell they that haue no Wiues; but ſuch as be married, do inhabite diuers places of the Citty. For their liuing together in friendly manner, euery Man layeth downe his perticuler proportion; And they haue a Steward, and a Cooke, who make preparation of their dyet: but ſuch as come ſhort in ſtipend to the reſt, are bound by obligation to attend on the other, and take their leauings.

How they go to the Field by hundreds.

Euery hundred of them, when they go to the Field, do carry their Tent or Pauillion with them, being all Foot-men: and part of them Shot, other Halbardiers, and ſome that vſe the Semitary onely, euery three Men hauing a Horſe, for carriage of their neceſſaries. When they grow into yeares, or (in ſome other reſpects) their ſeruice ſeemeth not pleaſing to the Signior: they are caſhiered out of the Ianiſſaries Booke, and are tearmed Aſſareri, that is to ſay; Guards for Caſtles, & then they haue Commaders appointed them for that purpoſe, who are called Caſtillians, with equall allowance to the wages which formerly they had, ſo that no one of them falleth into diſtreſſe.

Aſſareri, keepers of Caſtelles.

Some of them there be who ſpeede ſo ſucceſſefullie in the Warres: that they come to be made Vauoides, and exalted to great Dignitie. They begin the exerciſe of Armes when they be but young Lads, and are enſtructed by the moſt expert: beeing choſen of healthfull diſpoſition, ſtrongly limbde, yet quick and agile, but (aboue all) courragious, and much rather to bee cruell, then any way pittiful. In theſe men conſiſteth the ſtrength and full firmeneſſe of all the Turkiſh Armies: who becauſe they are continually exerciſed thereto, and (altogether) become one ſole body as it were, are (indeede) to bee feared and doubted.

Vauoides are ſubordinate Rulers or Lords, aduanced by their merits in ſeruice.

Solacchi Foot-men to the Signior.

Of Ianiſſaries there are elected an hundred and fiftie Solacchi, who are as Foot-men to the Signior, with allowance from fifteene, to twentie Aſpers each man daily: and they go euermore about his perſon, at all times when hee rideth abroad.

Solach-Baſhaes, Maiſters of the Solacchi.

Two Solach-Baſhes, are chiefe of the Solacchi, and ride on horſebacke; being allowed thirty Aſpers daily each man, and the Solacchi are vnder obedience to the Aga of the Ianiſſaries.

Aga of the Spaccoglani.

The Aga of the Spaccoglani, a very honourable Office, hath in Lands and day Wages, ten Duckets continually, and great ſtore of Slaues, with a Checaia vnder him, or elſe a Protogero; who hath (betweene Lands and Wages) an hundred Aſpers daily, beſide a Ianzgi, that is, a Clearke, hauing thirty Aſpers, and ſufficient regalities.

Ianzgi, an attendant Clearke.

There be of the Spaccoglani, who are young luſtie men on horſebacke (for ſo meaneth the Word Spaccoglano) three thouſand, beeing waged from twentie, to fortie aſpers each man daily, & euery

Spaccoglani, young Gallants on Horſbacke, and their ſeruice.

Education of the Spaccoglani from their Child-hood.

twenty hath a Boluch-Bashae. These do serue on Horse-backe, with fiue or sixe Slaues, and as many Horses for each man; giuing their attendance alwaies (and lodging likewise) on the right hand of the Signior. They are men of sufficiency, ouer whom the Signior appointeth no head or Controller, but onely himselfe. They are first brought vp or educated, in the Serraglio of yong Boyes, and as they grow in yeares and goodnesse, choyse is made of them, and so they do attaine to this degree, which serueth as a Ladder for them, whereby to mount to much greater grace, fauor, and preferment.

Aga of the Silichtari.

The Aga of the Silichtari, who hath thirty Aspers by the day, and vnder him a Protogero, a Cleark, and a Checaia, that are allowed thirty Aspers each man daily, and more.

The differēce betweene the Silichtari and the Spaccoglani.

Of these Silichtari, there are three thousand, who ride on horseback likewise, and lodge on the left hand of the Signior, hauing from twenty, to fiue and twenty Aspers each man daily: with foure or fiue Slaues, and as many Horses, beside Lands for their better maintenance. These men are educated in the same manner, as the Spacchi or Spaccoglani, and there is no other difference betweene them: but that the Spacchi attend on the right hand, and these on the left, of the Signior.

Olofagi-Bashawes, Commaunders ouer the Souldiers.

Two Olofagi-Bashaes, who are chiefe of the Souldiours, with two thousand Olofagi, that serue on the right and left hand of the Signior. The two chiefe Commaunders, haue an hundred and twenty Aspers each man daily, and the other, from eight, to sixteen each man. Moreouer, the two haue vnder them, a Checaia, a Clearke and a Protogero, with Slaues and Horses, the one more, the other lesse.

Agaes of the Caripoglani, poore young men.

Two Agaes, Maiesters or Rulers of the Caripoglani (who are poore young men) with fourscore Aspers of allowance for each man. Their Protogeri haue thirtie Aspers, their Clearks fiue and twentie: And they haue vnder them, about two thousand Caripoglani (who are waged from seauen to foureteene Aspers each man) and they haue Slaues and Horses beside.

Bracor-Bashaes chiefe Groome of the Stable.

Two Bracor-Bashaes, who are Maisters or chiefe Quiries of the Stable, one aboue the other in Office. The better hath fiue hundred Aspers by the day, & the other two hundred; beside Protogeri and Checaiaes, and others that are waged from thirty, to forty Aspers dailie each man.

Seracchi, as Sadlers.

Then there are to the number of sixteene thousand; some tearmed Saracchi, who make Bridles and Saddles; others Ceissi, Seruants or Groomes of the Stable; others Carmandari, that attend on the Mules; others Denegi, that waite on the Camels; and Caurilagi, that feed the Heards of Horses in diuers places, who are waged from two, to twentie Aspers each man daily.

Ceissi, Grooms of the Stable. Carmandari, Muletters. Denegi, Cammellers. Caurigili, Herds for Horses.

Peichi, Foote-Poasts or Lackies.

Next there is betweene thirty and forty Peichi, Foote-Poasts, or Lackyes, who were brought vp (from their younger yeares) in knowledge of the miles, & dispatch much ground in short while, and with wonderfull swiftnesse. When the Grand Signior, is to ride abroad, they are continually ready, because they are imployed still in many businesses.

Foure thousand choice Horses for the Signior.

Of elected and choise Horses, there are about foure thousand, for the person of the Signior: which are ridden by the youthes of the Serraglio, and by the Eunuches, as a daily practise and exercise.

Zachergi-Bashaes, chiefe Faulconers.

There is a Zachergi-Bashae, Maister of the yong Hauks, and another Zachergi-Bashae, Commaunder of all the Faulconers. The first hath an hundred and fiftie Aspers daily, and the other but fourescore; with their Checaiaes, Protogeri, and others, that are waged each Man daily, from ten, to fiue and twenty Aspers. Vnder these, are about two hundred Zaniglieri, one hundred wherof, haue onely tenne Aspers each man daily: but the rest hold Landes, or else exemption from taxations, and follow the fields as pleaseth the Signior.

Zaniglieri, attendants on the chiefe Faulconers.

Gebegi-Bashae, Maister of the Armour.

The Gebegi-Bashae, is Maister of the Armour, hauing threescore Aspers daily, a Protogero, and Clearke, with twenty Aspers each Man dailie. Vnder him are a thousand and fiue hundred Gebegi, waged from seauen to foureteene Aspers dailie each man, and they all goe on foot with the Signior to the Field.

Topci-Bashae, Maister of the Musketiers.

The Topci-Bashae, is M. of the Musketiers, hauing threescore Aspers dailie; a Protogero, and a Clearke, with twenty Aſpers, each man daily. And vnder him are two thouſand Topci, waged from ſix, to ten Aſpers, each man dayly going on foote.

Arabagi-Baſhae Maiſter of the Cariages.

The Arabagi-Baſhae, is Maiſter of the Carts, Waggons, and Carriages, hauing fortie Aſpers daily, a Protogero and Clearke, at twentie Aſpers allowaunce, each man daily: & vnder him, are 3000, Arabagi, waged from three, to ſix Aſpers each man daily.

Mechter Baſhae, Maiſter of the Drums & Trumpets.

A Mechter Baſhae, is Maiſter of the Trompets and Drummes, hauing thirtie Aſpers daily allowance, a Protogero and Cleark, at twelue Aſpers a man daily. Vnder him, are a thouſand and two hundred Mechters, partly on foote, and partly on horſebacke, from three to fiue Aſpers, each man daily.

Imcrelem-Aga, the Signiors Standard-Bearer.

Imcrelem-Aga, who carrieth the grand Signiors Standard, hauing two hundred Aſpers daily, and he is (beſide) Captaine ouer all the Mechters.

Arpaemin, Purueyor of grain and Corne.

The Arpaemin, hee is Purueyer for Corne, hauing a Protogero, and a Chancellor: himſelfe hath ſixtie Aſpers, the Protogero thirty, and the Chancellour twenty daily. This Arpaemin hath xx. perſons vnder him, who are allowed dayly amongſt them, eight hundred Aſpers.

Saraemin, Prouider in generall.

The Saraemin, is Purueyer or prouider in common: for hee looketh to the ſtreets of Conſtantinople, and al the waies whereby the Signior paſſeth foorth to Warre. He hath charge alſo of publick Buildings; of Springs, Wels, and Water-conduct. He is allowed fifty Aſpers daily, and hath foure hundred men vnder him: among whom, is giuen a thouſand Aſpers: hauing a Protogero, and a Clearke alſo, with 38. Aſpers, allowed each man daily.

Baratemin, Steward of the Signiors commands.

The Baratemin, who is appointed to deliuer the Signiors commands in writing, and to receiue his houſe moneyes: hauing fortie Aſpers daily, and attended with two Clearkes, and two Ouer-ſeers, with twenty Aſpers daily each man.

Dragoman, the Interpreter of Languages, or Maiſter of the Ceremonies.

The Dragoman, who is Interpreter of all Languages, which Office is as highly reputed, as is the Vertue and Wiſedom of him that exerciſeth it. He hath fiue hundered Ducates in firme Prouiſion euerie yeare, beſides, his enioyning as much in Landes, and aboue foure times as much in extraordinarie fauours, being alwayes verie eſpeciallie reſpected of them.

The Womens Serraglio, differing from the other.

The great Signior his ſecond Serraglio of weomen & for his Children.

2. OVer and beſide all the forenamed matters, there is another Serraglio of the Signiors Women, containing in circuite more then a mile and a halfe: being richly furniſhed with diuers goodly Chambers, and other retirements, wherein the Signiors Children are kept, ſeperately one from another, with their Mothers, and a great number of Eunuchs allowed for their keeping & ſeruice. There is alſo the Sultana, that is to ſay, the chiefe Mother, or the Signiors Wife, by whom he is ſaid to haue his firſt Child.

The Sultana or the Signiors wife.

In this place alſo, are three hundered young Damoſels, brought thither Virgins, and deliuered to the gouernement of many Matrons: which Virgines, are enſtructed in al kinds of curious imbroidery and workes: and euery one is allowed from ten to twentie Aſpers daylie, as wages, and euery yeare, at the two Bairanoes, they haue coſtly Garments of ſilk giuen them. Among theſe, hee maketh choiſe (to his owne liking) of ſuch as hee will admit to his priuate companie: and when he hath lien with any of them, hee giueth her a rich head attire of Golde, & ten thouſand Aſpers, placing hir then in another lodging, ſeperate from the other Virgins, encreaſing ſtill hir ordinarie wages.

Three hundred Virgins for the Signiors vſe.

His reward to each virgin after her company.

To this Serraglio belongeth an Aga of the Eunuches, who hath an hundred ſcore Aſpers for him & his: three Capigi-Baſhaes, and a hundred Aſpers amongeſt their Capigi Ianiſſaries at the Gates: among whom are daily giuen ſix hundered Aſpers. The Saccaes, that bringeth in Water, who haue in al forty aſpers daily. Theſe Damoſels are thus ſerued and enſtructed, till they be fiue and twentie yeares of age, the Matrons beeing their Miſtreſſes, and the ſeruants are the verie yongeſt of them. When they are fiue and twenty yeares olde, if the Signiour pleaſe to make no more vſe of them, they are then married to the Spaccoglani, and ſom other of the Slaues about the court, according to the qualitie and degree on cyther Attendants on the Serraglio, and their wadges daily.

How long the Damoſels continue for the Signiors vſe, and what becommeth of them afterward.

either part, and insted of the ones losse, another is admitted.

The Serraglio of Children.

THere is another Serraglio neere to* Pera consisting of about foure hundred Children who are waged each one from sixe, to ten Aspers daily, and are cloathed with Silke twice euerie yeare. These Children haue an Aga and Eunuches, euen as the great Serraglio hath, with Capagi, young Ianissaries, and an hundred Maisters of diuers Artes and professions: amongst whom, are giuen eight hundred Aspers daily. They are not so Nobly borne, neyther of so seemelie presence or ingenuity, as these that bee with the Signior: and yet neuertheless, many of them do attaine to greatnesse: and choise is made among them of many, that are admitted to the great Serraglio. Especialy, in Adrianople, called by some Andrianople, there is a Serraglio of three hundred Children with Wages, Aga, Eunuchs, Capigi, Ianissaries, & two hundred Maisters, that haue amongest them, two thousand and eight hundred Aspers daily.

These children are of a third or more inferiour quality; and therefore, are the more respectiuely enstructed and restrained, euen as all the rest (in ciuill manner) are of them, according vnto their spirit and behauiour, choise is also made for their further aduauncement. There is likewise in the same Countrey, another Seraglio, newly made with a goodly great Garden belonging to it, and seated on the Riuer Mariza: wherin ther is about three hundred yong Ianissaries, who dispend each man yearely, a thousand and two hundered Aspers. They haue an Aga, allowed fortie Aspers, a Protogero, and a Clearke, each thirty Aspers daylie. In diuers other places of Adrianople, there are Gardens, continually belonging (euen as in Deposito) to a thousande and fiue hundered young Ianissaries, selected out of these youths, as they grow to yeares and qualitie: hauing Agaes, and Clearkes on whom are bestowed six thousand Aspers euerie yeare, or very little lesse.

There is then an Aga of the Azamoglani, called young vntutord or vnciuill Ianissaries, that abide in Constantinople, and haue threescore Aspers dayly: there being vnder his commaund, about fiue thousand of these wilde-headed Ianissaries, who are cloathed twice euery year, and haue Maisters for their instruction; among whom, is spent tenne thousande Aspers yearely. These do attend about the Ship-wrights, bringing them wood to supply their building, and diuers other affayres beside. Some practise Cookerie, and so become seruants to the Ianissaries, whereby (at length) they attain to bee Ianissaries themselues. Euerie fourth yeare, the Signiour sendeth into Greeia and Natolia, to take and surprize Children from the Christians, and then ten or twelue thousand of these men are sent out at a time, that doth bring verie many christian children back with them: who are then conueyed vppe further into Natolia, towards Bursia, now called* Mysia, or into* Caramania, where they are brought vp in digging the Ground, because they may bee invred to labour, and also to learn the Turkish Language. These Children are thus kept three or foure yeares; and then sent out to allure other in like manner: being then giuen to the gouernment and Discipline of the Aga Azamoglani. No wages or allowance is granted to these by the Signieur, so long as they abide in Natolia, because they are both fedde and cloathed at their cost, in whose seruice, they delue the grounds, or doo any other labours for them.

I thought good to make mention (in this place) of all the Serraglioes, because they are as appendixes on that belonging to the Signior, and reckoned in the whole expences, returned into the books of charge, belonging to the great Serraglio of the Signior. Into which accounts are also called the Moneyes laid out for cloathing (twice yearely) the Bashaes, the Cadileschery, the Defterdari, the Beglerbeyes, and the Nessangi-Bashaes: which expences, allowed to them that be in extraordinarie, do amount to, and exceed the summe of a Million of aspers yearelie.

Of the Arsenale, or Store-house of Munition.

3. THere is also an Arsenale on that part of Pera, not of anie bigge

* Galatea or Galatia in Gallogreecia, in Asia the lesse, ioyning to Phrygia and Lydia.

Maisters for enstructing the youths in the Serraglio.

* A Citty of Thrace, built vpon the Riuer Hebrus. The Serraglio of Adrianople.

* In Thrace, rising out of Rhodope by Adrianople, into which Riuer the head of Orpheus was cast.

Gardens belonging to young Ianissaries.

Azamoglani, are young Ianissaries, that be (as yet) rude and vntutord.

Attendants on the Ship-wrights.

Ianissaries imployed by the Signior for the stealth of Christians Children.

* A Country in Asia by Hellespont, bordering on Troas.
* Now called Narsinga, in Asia minor, betweene Persia and India.

Aga Azamoglani.

All the Serraglioes are limbs or branches of the Signiors great Serraglio.

Charges allowed extraordinarily.

The Arsenale in Pera.

bigge or large circuite, which hath on the Sea-shore, to the number of ninetie two Arches, and containeth so little ground within: as not onely the Galies, but also their other appurtenances, and Timber for worke, can hardly bee there placed. In this Arsenale, do about two hundered men labour ordinarily euerie day; who, with their Maisters and Ouerseers, haue daily two thousand Aspers among them. There are a thousande Asapi, who haue foure thousand Aspers among them.

Workemen in the Arsenale and their wadges in their seuerall degrees and places.

Proti, or Workemaisters, to the number of fiftie, who when they are idle and labour not, haue sixe Aspers dayly, but when they work, twelue Aspers each man.

The Emino hath fortie Aspers, the Clearke fiue and twenty, with ten clarks more vnder him, that haue an hundered Aspers daily. All these, when neede requireth, do performe their seuerall Offices. But if they intend badly vnto theyr Trades, or labour not effectually in the building of Gallies, whereby no such benefit ensueth on their paines, or like expedition as is vsed among vs: if the fault be found by any Christian, he is well recompenced, and the other verie seuerely punished.

Care for furtherance of labour.

Of the Beglerbey.

4. AS Commander ouer the Arsenale, and all the rest, there is one that is called the Beglerbey of the Sea, as much to say, as Lord of Lords, an Office newly created: for, in times past, he was alwaies woont to bee called Captaine of the Sea. He that was Saniack of Callipolis, and is now the first that had the degree of Cairedinbei, was called Barbarossa, and afterward created the 4. Bashae. To him is giuen the gouernment of all the Nauie, and he hath in prouision euerie yeare (both in Lands and Ducates) fourteene thousand, collected on Rhodes, Negropont, and Mytelene, albeit he gathereth a double aduantage. There is not any other especiall man, appertayning to matters of the State, and charge of the Sea, that deserueth Annotation, and therefore comming to land affaires, I will proceed in this manner.

Beglerbey of the Sea is chiefe Commander in the Arsenale.

His authority and yearely allowance.

There is one called the Beglerbey of Graecia, wherein is comprehended all the Countreyes which the Great Signiour enioyeth in Europe. This Beglerbey, is the greatest of all the rest, hauing in Lands sixteene thousand ducates yearely, but his benefite amounteth to twice as much more.

Concerning the Beglerbey of Grecia, and his authority.

Hee sitteth in the Porta, behinde the chiefe Bashae, and is of great reputation with euery one. He hath beside his slaues (which are aboue a thousand) a Defterdaro, Landed at three thousand Ducates yearely: An hundred Clearks, that keep the Bookes and accounts of the Landes, assigned to the Sub-Bashaes, Cadi, Spacchi, and others; among whom, is yearely giuen ten thousand Ducats. Thirtie seauen Saniacks, who are al vnder his obedience: and haue each man from fiue to twelue thousand Ducats yearely

His dignity in the Court, & his attendants A Defterdaro.

Sub-Bashaes Cadi Spacchi, &c.

Saniacks.

These men, are distributed into the Prouinces, where they remaine so long as pleaseth the Signior; and are thence translated or changed (as hee thinketh good) into some other Prouinces. Their Office, is to gouerne the Spacchi, to see them well exercised in Armes, and to be kept in due obedience. Foure hundred Sub-Bashaes, who haue in landes among them, foure hundred thousand Ducates. Thirtie thousand Spacchi, who are Souldiers on Horsebacke, diuided for best order of seruice: partly of the Beglerbeis of Grecia, and partly of all the Saniacks of Grecia. They haue (one by another) in Lands, two hundred Ducats, and each one of them, for euery hundered of Ducates, is bounde to keepe a man armed on Horsebacke, with his Launce: and beside the saide armed man, they haue, some two, some foure, and others fiue Seruants and Horses. These Spacchi, are all slaues to the Signior, and the sonnes of slaues, and of Spacchi.

The Office of the Saniacks.

Exercise of the Spacchi, and their employment.

The Beglerbeys and Saniacks of Grecia.

Next, there are twentie thousand Timariotti, who haue from tenne to fortie Ducates in Lands, each man yearely: but because their compensation ariseth not to an hundred Ducates each man, they are not called Spacchi. These haue a horse and two or three seruants for each man, seruing distributiuely to all the Saniacks of Grecia. That which they call Timari, is the assignation or appointment of lands, the Rents, Fees, or Reuennews of which assignations are deriued, partly from the Fee-farme, letting, or deuising: but the greater Timariotti, are such as liue vpon timarros, holding Land in Knight seruice vnder the Signior.

Timari, assignation of Lands, Liuings, Farmes or States, lately conquered by the Signiors Forces.

greater part, is from the tenths of all the reuennewes granted from the Turkes as well as Christians, and from the leauies which are fiue and twenty Aspers (Per poule, as we vse to say) of the Christians onely, and from the impositions on cattell, Trees, and other things, which taxes are ouer and aboue those, that are paied ordinarily to the Signiour. Sixteene thousand Archengi, those are aduenturers on horsebacke, set downe thorough the Countrey of Grecia, and bounde to follow the warres without any pay; and therefore are empted from all taxations: the Cities and Townes are tied to find their prouision of victuals onely, from place to place where they serue.

Archengi, are aduenterous seruitours on Horsse-backe.

What number serue the Signior thorow Grecia.

There are in Græcia, that is, throughout the whole Country therof in towns, Villages, and other places, as well of Turkes and Christians, enioyned to seruice, about the number of threescore & eight thousand.

Next, there are six Beglerbeyes in Asia, and one by himselfe in Egypt. The first, is called the Beglerbey of Natolia which (in elder times) was Asia minor: he hath fourteene thousand Ducates in Landes annually, but hee maketh much greater benefit thereof. This man hath vnder him, and in his gouernment, Pontus, Bythinia, all Asia, Lydia, Caria, and Lycia; all which Prouinces (vnder one Name only) is at this day cald Natolia. His place in the Porta, is next to the Beglerbey of Grecia, and he hath (beside his own proper Slaues) aboue a thousand more vnder him; and twelue Saniaks landed from foure to six thousand Ducats each man; Spacchi, ten thousand; from fiue to ten Aspers, each man dayly, besides much more in Landes, and those serue vnder him, according vnto euerie ones degree.

1 The Beglerbey of Natolia, and the places vnder his cõmaund.

His place in the Court.

The Beglerbey of Caramania, which aunciently was Celicia and Pamphilia, with tenne thousand Ducats in Landes. Hee hath vnder him seauen Saniackes, from foure to fiue thousande Ducates, each man in Lands. And fiue thousande Spacchi, from fiue to tenne Aspers, each man daily beside their lands.

2 The Beglerbey of Caramania and his command.

The Beglerbey of Amasia and Toccato which was Cappadocia and Galatia, with eight thousand Ducates in Landes. Of Saniacks he hath eight from six, to eight thousand Ducates each man in Landes: Spacchi, foure thousand, from fyue to ten Aspers daily each man, and lands.

3 The Beglerbey of Amasia and Toccato.

The Beglerbey of Aladula, which is a place betweene Soria, Caramania, and Toccata, anciently called Paphlagonia, & is the one halfe of the lesser Armenia. He hath ten thousand ducates in landes, and Saniacks seuen (sometimes four, & sometimes six) from foure to six thousand ducates in lands: Spacchi six thousand, from 5. to ten Aspers daily each man & lands. In this Prouince of Aladula, it is sayde, that when the Signior was there, beside the stipendarie men; thirtie thousand other personnes were obliged to ride on with him, at the charges of two villages onely.

4 The Beglerbey of Aladula, and his command.

The Signiers being in Aladula.

The Beglerbey of Mesopotamia, vnder whom is the rest of Armenia Minor, and part of the greater, the other appertayning to the Sophie, and the Cords, which confyneth with Bagadeth, or Baldacco, anciently called Babylon. His Landes amount to aboue thirtie thousande Ducates: and beside his owne slaues, hee hath more then two thousand. Vnder him are twelue Saniackes, landed from foure to sixe thousand Ducates yearelie each man: Spacchi, ten thousande, from ten to fyfteene Aspers each man daylie, and verie well landed, because they liue on the Sophies Confynes, with whome they haue continually bickerings.

5 The Beglerbey of Mesopotamia, and his command.

The Beglerbey of Damasco, Soria, and Iudea, Landed foure and twentie thousand Ducates. Hee hath aboue two thousand slaues, and twelue Saniackes vnder him, Landed from fyue vnto seauen thousand Ducates: Spacchi, twentie thousande, with Aspers from tenne, to fyfteene each man daylie, and good Lands.

6 The Beglerbey of Damasco, Soria, and Iudea, and his commaund.

The Beglerbey of Cairo, whose iurisdiction extendeth so farre as Ameth, that is in Arabia, and the Arabiaes are possessed by the Signiour, in the same manner as hee is possessed of Albania, where hee challengeth no such obedience, as all other States and Countries doo yeelde vnto him of his owne: yet, Arabia Fœlix is nowe in farre more subiection to him, then the other. He hath thirtie thousand Ducates in Lands, and Slaues aboue foure thousand. Sixteene Saniackes, Landed from sixe vnto eight thousand Ducates each one of them; and sixteene thousande Spacchi, from fifteene fifteene, to twentie Aſpers daylie each man.

7 The Beglerbey of Cairo, & his large extendure.

Betweene Amech, and the Countrey of the Sophie, there are ſome Arabian Lords, that owe no obedience to anie bodie. The reſt of the Sophies land, confineth on Meſopotamia, wherein is Maldacco, paſsing Meſopotamia, the Sophye alſo confineth the plaine of Naſinam, then toucheth Eſdum and Erſum, which are principall places in Armenia Maior, and confine with the Hyberi* and Georgiani*. In theſe Armeniaes, both the great and leſſer, are many of the  Cordi*, people liuing in the Mountaines, yet warlick and Martiall: thoſe of the greater Armenia being in obedience, partly to the Signior, and partly to the Sophie, but thoſe of the leſſer, not to any one. Trabiſonde* confineth with the Georgiani and Mengrelli, and part of the Hyberi, which people were anciently called Colchians.  Azemia*, which in elder times was Aſſyria, belongeth to the Sophie, and hee is the abſolute Lord thereof.

Lords vnder no controule.

* A Region in Aſia, enuironed with the Hill Caucaſus.
* People of Scythia in Aſia.
* Mountaine people of both the Armeniaes.
* In the edge of Macedonia by the Euxine Sea.
* Aſſyria.

In this Natolia, I mean in the whole Country which the Signio poſſeſſeth in Aſia, Citties, Townes, and Villages belonging both to Turkes and Chriſtians, are ſeauenty two thouſand, beſides them in Egypt, whereof there are great ſtore.

The whole Country of Natolia.

Of the Saniacks.

5. THe Saniacks aſſuredlie (as I haue alreadie ſaide) haue gouernment in the Prouinces, committed vnto them by the Beglerbeys, and are men of much reputation and great eſteeme, eſpecially in warlicke occaſions, whom I will alſo ſet downe, by the names of thoſe places, which are giuen and aſsigned vnder their regiments.

The Saniacks are warlike men and of great account

Firſt, the Beglerbey of Grecia, apointeth his Saniacats to theſe places: firſt toward Solonichi, & then follow the other of Caffa, and of Siliſtria, Nicopolis, Vidin, Samandria, Seruia and Belgrada, Sournich Boſſina, and Erſech, which is Seruia, and called a Dukedome; Scutari, Valona, Iauina, Carlali, Lepanto, Morea, Negropont, Trica'a, Callipolis, Chricheliſſa, that is, forty Churches, Viſa, Cirmē, Chioſtandill, Volcitrin, Priſdren, Ocria, Alazaaſſar, Elbaſſan, Voinug, Cinghene, and Taiazza. Theſe are thirty, which were wont to be fiue and thirty; but the fiue are vnited to the propinquent places, as Philippolis, Sophia, Dyrrachium or Durace, Albania, and Scopia.

The Saniacats of the Beglerbey for Grecia, according to their names and places.

Natolia, that is Aſia Minor, hath Pontus, Bithinia, Lydia, Caria, and Lycia. The Saniakats of this Beglerbey, are in Chiothachia, and the reſt in Chiogaeli, as Bolu, Caſtamoni, Anguri, Cangri, Therchieli, Mateſſeli, Aidineli, Hallaice, Buga and Magneſia, which appertained to the Sultane Maſtapha, the Signiors firſt borne ſon, and which place is halfhemd in with the ſea.

The Saniackats belonging to the Beglerbey of Natolia.

Amaſia and Tocatto, that is Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Cappadocia. The Saniakat of the Beglerbey, is in Amaſia, and the reſt in Chiorma, Gianich, Charaiſſer, Saſum, and Trabiſonde.

Saniackats of the Beglerbey of Amaſia.

Caramania, that is Cilicia by the midſt of Cyprus and Pamphilia. The Saniakat of the Beglerbey is in Giogna, and the other ſtretch into Naranda, Axar, Eſchiſſar, Verſageli and Siuraſſar.

Saniackats of the Beglerbei of Caramania.

Aladula, that is Armenia Minor. The Saniakat of the Beglerby is in Maras, & thoſe of the other, in Sarmuſſacli, Albiſtancraſsi, Adana & Terſis.

Saniackrs of the Beglerbey of Aladula.

Dierbech, which is Meſopotamia, and part of Armenia Maior, for the reſt belongeth to the Sophy, and to the Cordi. The Saniakat of the Beglerbey, is in Dierbech: and the reſt haue their abiding in Charaenit, Argui, Tolgich, Caſſanchief, Meridin, Charput, Muſſul, Eſrum, Payburt, Eythlis and Maxiuancuaſsi.

Saniackrs of the Beglerbey of Dierbech.

Soria and Iudea. The Saniakat is in Damaſco, and the other in Melathia, Diuitghi, Antep, Antiochia, Aleppo, Tripoli, Chama or Aman, Camps, Scepheto, Ieruſalem, and Gazara.

Saniackats of the Beglerbey of Soria and Iudea.

Egypt, with part of Deſert Arabia, to Alziden l'Almach, with all Arabia fœlix, where are many Arabian Lords, which are partly at the deuotion of the Grand Signior, and partly to no bodie. The Saniakat of the Beglerbey is in Cayro, & ſome other places.

Egipt and the Saniackats of her Beglerbey.

All the fore-recited Saniacks, Beglerbeyes, Baſhaes, and other Officers, haue Lands and Wages (as hath beene ſaide) firmely in ordinarie pay: and get much more extraordinarily, liuing chiefely by the benefit of their ſlaues, whome they muſt of neceſsity cloath, and allow ſome Wages to keepe them from ſtealing. What the Rents and Reuennews of this Signior is, may bee conſidered by the mighty

A brieſe Summary of all the forenamed Officers and Offices.

Yearely Reuenues comming into the the Grand Signior.

mightie expences he is at daily, the whiche reuennewes is collected of the Carazo or impoſitions, procceding frō thoſe ſubiectes that are not Turkes, yeelding yearely a Million and a halfe of ducates. The Cuſtomes or towle for cattell, yeeldeth eight hundered thouſand Ducates; and the Mettall Mines affoord ſixe hundred thouſand Ducates.

There are infinite other Cuſtomes and payments, impoſed on Salte, Commands, dead folkes goods, guifts, the reuennewes of Egypt, beſide other Moneyes, Rents, and Tributes, which are ſo much, as not only do ſupplie the expences ouer and aboue the Landes and readie Moneyes, and bringing daily into the great Caſnar or Treaſurie, aboue twelue thouſand Ducates, beſides other great aduantages, and ouerplus ſummes of Moneyes. And it is ſuppoſed, that the leaſt reckoning of the ordinary reuenues, may be about fyfteene thouſande Millions of Gold: Fiue whereof onelie enter into the Caſnar, but the other ten remaine for the Miniſters of the warres employments.

An ineſtimate of the whole in generall.

CHAP. II.

Of the Lawfull meanes, whereby to compaſſe the eſteeme and reputation, of beeing truely and excellentlie Couragious & valiant.

A demaund made to Auguſtus, and his worthy anſwere.

IT was demaunded of Auguſtus, in what hee could beſt obſerue the valour of a man of war. Thus (quoth he) vvhen his effort and endeuour, hath reliſh (in common) with that of his Fellowes, but that ſome perticuler matter appeareth in his attempt, which is no vvay due to the Armies general victory, wherein himſelfe fighteth vnder the Captaynes charge, yet as if himſelfe were no chiefe in reſpect. Such a man among the Albanians, was George Caſtriot, who hadde to deale with two of the verie greateſt, and moſt dreaded Princes of the Eaſt, againſt whoſe Iniuſtice he oppoſed himſelfe onely, and manie times wonne verie goodly victory ouer them: yea, and compelling them ſometimes to require peace, yet without anie other aide, then his owne perfect valour, accompanied with Diſcretion and Equity. Which yet (neuertheleſſe) at length hee loſt, both to his owne ruine and all Albania, by the entermiſes and medlings of the Pope, and of the Byſhop of Durace, who conſtrayned him (iniuriouſly) to breake his faith promiſed vnto Mahomet the ſecond, being at that time in Warre againſt the Venetians.

George Caſtriot, ſurnamed Scanderbeg.

The Pope & Biſhop of Durace medled in Warre matters.

He could freely auouch, that (as naked and all alone) hee vndertooke warre againſt the Great Signior, and that hee did it onely by the bright beautie of his courage: which could no way gather apprehenſion of ſurmounting, fighting in ſo iuſt a cauſe as the Chriſtians generall quarrell againſt the Turk. And he might alſo as freely confeſſe, that the loſſe of his eſtates, and of his ſonnes (which hee had not till after his death) was onlie conceiued in the wombe of a Popes and Byſhoppes raſhneſſe, who more enflamed with ſpleene, then ſtrengthned with men of armes, ouer bare the modeſtie of this poore Lord, who died in a weake eſtate, yet not wholly troden downe; but in leauing nothing to his heires, whereby to make a freſh reply vpon Mahomet. Hee ruined Chriſtianity in Greece, thorough the inſolencie of theſe two men of the Church, who were more apte to command a ſedition, then anie way to apeaſe it, and had more Cowardiſe in giuing bad counſell to their friends, then corage to helpe them out of the loſſes bredde by them, euen as in a fourſe of infallible and vndrainable misfortunes. Whereinto alſo they threwe Hungary headlong, hauing counſelled a young King vnaduiſedly to violate peace with the Great Turke: who (thorough this error onely) is at this day victorious, and remayneth poſſeſſor of the Hungars whole eſtate; & afterward fell vpon Auſtria, where hee hath (almoſt) as great a ſhare as the Emperour. And he, though endued with perfect valiancie, hath had much payne and care to repaire thoſe wide gaps and breaches, which theſe raſh & preſumptuous men made, without any neceſſitie or ouuert profitable conſideration vnto Chriſtendome, but well-neere to the vtter

The freedom of confeſſion imputed to George Caſtriot.

Chriſtianity ouerthrowne in Greece, by two Church mens meanes.

Further harmes that enſued by them, in Hungaria, and elſe where.

ter subuersion of the Easterne people in those parts.

Leonides also is one of them, to whom iustly may be attributed the glorie and perfection of intire man-hood, considering, that without any curious inquisition for himselfe, eyther of good or euill, and careleſſe of any intention for prayse or misprision: he vndertooke to oppose himself (at the Thermopyl'e) against great king Xerxes, the astonisher of the world, who had filled all Greece with horrour and affrightments, both of Soldiers and horses, hauing no lesse prouision (beside this equipage) of power & fighting men on the Sea, which they did nothing else, but meerely smite and beate with their Oares, euen as if hee would haue compelled the insensible Elements, to the vnderstanding and fauouring of his enterprizes.

Leonides, King of Lacedemon slaine at Thermopyle fighting against Xerxes.

All which notwithstanding, the worthy Leonides, accompanied onelie with foure thousand men, fought against him with such sprightly resolution and Vertue: that he left vs more matter and subiect of amazement, then capacity of immitation. I must send ye amongest the Greekes, there to admire the whole History, which is the most remarkable in al Antiquity.

Leonides vndertaketh the fight with 4000. men.

Brasidas must not be forgotten, who trauersed the Campe of the enemie, at the siedge of * Methone, and by a necessary endeauor, accomplished and woon immortall Fame and Renowne, which serueth yet (to this day) for a common Prouerbe, by the wonderfull perfection of his courage, whose picture is plentifull among the Greekes, only with this Motto.

A valiant Captaine of Lacedemon. * The Citty Modon by the Sea side in Peloponnesus.

Be as valiant as Brasidas.

Hysparmenes, Captaine to Darius, is woorthy to holde ranke amongst them, that not onely had a beame, but an entire Starre of true valiancy. For, his Master, and the fortune of all Asia, bowing vnder the yoake of Great Alexander, he would not yeeld himselfe vnto the Conquerour, though his Castle was no longer holdable, the Cittie of Susa beeing brought in subiection to the Macedonians, to whom he made this answere. I do not resist against Great Alexander with any hope to ouercome him: but only to Conquer mine owne misfortune, which may well suffer me to dye, yet not at the discretion of any other, then of my selfe, who would force the fortune of your Master, if hope were answerable to my dutie. Yet, all that I can hope, is now not lawfull, because the royal Darius is dead.

Darius conquered by great Alexander.

* A noble Citty betweene Persia and Babylon, where was the sumptuous Pallace of Cyrus.

Hyrtius Mela, purchased most signale glorie, in perfection of courage, when seeing the Cittie wherein he dwelt, called * Praneste, wholly destroyed from the toppe to the bottome, and by his Guest Sylla, who (in the right of Hospitality) graunted him both grace and life: hee valiantly made refusall with this exclamation against the Tyrant. Is it possible, O thou most barbarous and cruel of all men, that thou wou'dst be so bloody to thine Hoste, as to let him liue, after so many cruelties which thy rage hath exercised on an innocent people? Thou art not pittifull to me, but onely to afflict me more, & wouldst bestow life on me once, to make me thereby dye a Million of times. Hast thou slaine my Companions, Fellow Cittizens, Kindered and Friends, and wou'dst thou now compel mee to liue? Speaking these words, hee stabbed with a Poniard, Mutius Listrio, the principall Instrument and Organ of Syllaes cruelties; yea, the only Authour and motiue of Prænestes ruine. To whose Ashes, this good and Famous Cittizen, sacrificed his owne life, by the death of the deerest Friend vnto the Tyrant, who instantly commaunded, that hee should be massacred & thrown into the common Sinke, or Lay-stall of the Citty.

* The Citty Palestrina of Latium in Italy.

The couragious wordes of Hyrtius Mela to Sylla.

Hyrtius Mela slew Mutius Listrio, the causer of his Citties ouerthrow.

Quintus Curtius, that Honourable Romaine Knight, did a deede of absolute and respectiue manhoode. For, when he had Learned from the Oracle, that the wide gaping Gulfe in the midst of Rome, which infected the Cittie with pestilence and most noysom aires, could no way be closed againe, but by the Voluntarie leaping of a man into that infernall and darke downefall, he gladly threw himselfe thereinto, for to end the Romaines miserie, and saue the liues of infinite people of all degrees. The Inscription on his Brasen Statue was thus.

The memorable act of Quintus Curtius, for the deliuerance of his Country.

This was the acceptable Sacrifice to the Goddes, and the Sauiour of his Country. This was the Heire to the vertues of the chiefest Romaines, and the scandal of al cowardly men. This was he that could not die, but by being profitable to the liues of his Fellow-Cittizens.

His Statue of Brasse yet standing in Rome.

Cneius Cepio, made his manly corage to appeare, in a matter worthy to be obserued. For, when hee beheld a huge mighte Elephant, stouping and make offet to seize on Domitius his Captaine: he preuented him quickly, by throwing himselfe vnderneath his bellie, which he stabd with so many stroakes of his Poniard, that the Elephant being faynt with paine, violence of his wounds, and losse of blood, fell downe dead, and with his fal, crushed him also to death, who made no spare of his owne life, to speede his Generals with safety.

Domitius rescued from a dangerous Elephant.

A Noble nature in a true hearted Souldiour.

Fulnius Nassus, was carefull to winne himselfe faire reputation in Arms, when the Romaines his Companions and warfellowes) being vanquished by Hannibal at the Lake of Thrasymena, and flying away like Cowards, hee stept betweene their pursuite and attaint, allowing them time for running, by making a wall, as it were, of himselfe and his horse in a narrow passage, where the flight of the one side, and following of the other, was meerely logd vp. The death of his horse was frightfull and terrible to the Horses of his enemies, and a safegarde also for himselfe, that he could not suddenlie bee surprized by many Numidians. So that, thorough his long resistance, euen vnto death, he saued the remainder of the Romaines liues, that fled from foorth their owne field of battell.

Fulnius Nassus an honourable Romaine. *A Lake in Hetruria.

The liues of many preferred before any care for his owne.

The valour of Mutius Scæuola cannot be conflicted by eternity of ages. For he (all alone) amazed a victorious Prince, ready to possesse himself of Rome, which must needes haue yeilded in verie fewe dayes, or be compelled to render or ruin it selfe. by falling into the Tarquins handes, and the people of Hetruria, verie desperate enemies.

Mutius Scæuola, a perpetuall mirrour to all posterity.

This braue and Couragious Scæuola, (without any communication of his desseigne) threw himselfe into his Enemies Army, not as a friend, but as an open enemy. He fought for King Porsenna in all places of the field, he found his Royall Pauillion, and slew the intendant on his affayres, as guessing by the riches of his habite, and the honour generallie done vnto him, that it had beene the King himselfe. Hereuppon, hee was apprehended, and brought before the King Porsenna, who suddenly conuerting rage into admiration, and admyration into pardon, sent backe Noble Scæuola to Rome. And which is much more, he raised his siedge, as beeing fearefull, that some other courage, more fortunat then that of Mutius) should make a second attempt, and so prooue to bee his death indeede. But what gratitude did Scæuola returne for this high fauor? that you shall perceiue by his owne wordes, which are these: Sir, for the kindnesse I haue receyued from your Maiesty, I purpose neuer to rest vnthankfull. Let me then tell ye, that there are yet in Rome, foure hundered gallant young men, who haue proiected how to kil you, or else to loose themselues in the aduenture.

He slew the Secretary to King Porsenna, as taking him to bee the King.

The gratulation of Mutius Scæuola to K. Porsenna.

Androcides the Samian, made the most aduantageable essay in Courage and perfection of valour, that anie of vs can desire to accomplish. For, being prisoner vnto Eupolemus the great Pyrate, who (vnaduisedly) had tolde him, that the verie next Night, hee purposed to surprise the Cittie of Samos (as doubtlesse the enterprise would haue beene infallible, because all the ablest fighting Samians were restrained in Peloponnesus) hee preuented him halfe a day before, by giuing him so strong a blowe with a Candlestick e vnder the eare, that so dyed the losse of his Countrey, and he together that had intended it. A matter questionlesse exceeding beleefe. that a man to saue a Cittie, and the Inhabitantes, would run into such a certainty of death, whereto hee meerely prostituted his life, because hee would not behold the place of his birth and Natiuitie, in the mercie of such an infamous and outragious Pirate.

Eupolemus the proud Pirate, that intended the subuertion of Samos.

It is in such actions (you my braue masters, & dainty sweet perfumed Courtiers, that true courage makes it selfe to be best seen: and not in committing effronteries and impudencies in our publicke streets,

To such as are rather dishonour to Princes Courts, then any credit at all.

A noated humour in ouer-many idle Gallants.

A deuise how to be beneficiall both to Prince and Country by care, forward ne∫∫e & manly behauiour.

The vſuall brauadoe of Scipio Africanus.

The worthy anſweres of Seleucus to his Paraſites and Flatterers.

Bertrand du Gueſclin a famous Souldiour of France.

Practiſe and example are the beſt noats of good men, and to renowne their names to endleſſe poſterity.

Courage cannot be reproued by weakneſſe.

Sophoc in Trag. de Antiq. Pomp.

Of a vertuous Souldiour and man indeed, how he maketh his beſt appearance.

A very excellent compariſon.

ſtreets, in bawdy-houſes, yea, and in the frequent company of our beſt friendes. We are like to Lyons, that make no acknowledgement of their foſtering nurſes, Gouernors or Guardians, if the colour and faſhion of their garments be neuer ſo little changed. If all their humors that keepe vs company, do not iumpe and correſpond with ours; immediately one is an Aſſe, another a Nouice; this fellow hath no complement, that neuer came where courage was; either hee is too ſad, or too merrie, or elſe he hath no taſte of our Court ayre: theſe are our moſt familiar diſcourſings; yea, and (many times) all that we can ſay. Make a little better ſearch into your ſelues henceforward, for ſom ſuch faire occaſions to appeare in, and that our outward ſhewe may not be by ſtarts and paſsions, but on well formed and compleat deſſeigns. Regard aduiſedly, wherein we may be profitable to our Prince and Countrie; and thereon immediately reſolue, to effect ſome ſuch one thing or other, as may be worthy each of the other. Let it appeare (then) that we are Captaines indeed, leſt we be not reckoned worſe then ſilly Soldiers: and let it be ſeene, that we are neceſſary helpes then, when men woulde iudge vs vtterly vnprofitable. Let it bee noted, that we haue courage then, euen when it faileth in our fellowes: and yet without accuſing them of any cowardiſe but onely by attempting and executing more then they. Let vs then (in good earneſt) performe the Rodomontado of Scipio Affricanus, who was wont to ſay: I ſeeke not to be known to man by man, but I wou'd only make my ſelfe known to al the world.

Seleucus hearing and perceiuing, that euery man boaſted and flattred him, that he was worthy to inherit the fortune and vertue of Alexander, returned this aunſwere, You ſhould bid me ſatiſfie the credulity, which you haue conceiued of my valor, and then you would quickly emptie mee of courage in aſſyring, when you but make me to remember Alexander, who perfourmed more then a man can thinke, or ante way is able to do. He alſo ſaid, Aſia is yet the ſame field of battaile, where his Captains diſputed about his heritage: but no man was to bee found, that could anſwere his deſeruinges. Let vs ſtriue to imitate the valiancy, and neceſſarie courage of Bertrand du Gueſclin, who conquerd the fortune, enuy, hazards of war, and furie of the victorious. Let vs read the hiſtories of ſuch as (heertofore) oppoſed themſelues, againſt the good ſucceſſe and vertue of the Engliſh men. Let vs not make eſteeme only, but forme in example and ſinguler ſtudy, the valor of thoſe ancient knights, that made this State of ours inuincible, and drew it out of decayed ruines, yea, out of a bottomleſſe gulfe, wherin it appeared to be ſunk, and (welneere) wholy ſwallowed. In dooing ſo, it is not to bee feared, that although we were no more then perticuler men, or Gentlemen, or Capitaines, or Soldiers, yet we ſhould attaine to worke woonders, and to arriue before the eyes of Commonweals, of Empires, Monarchies, and of their Princes, by whom (at length we ſhould be admired, ſought for, acknowledged, and recompenced, acording to our owne wiſhes, and contrarie to the mediocrity of a wel gouernd hope Aboue all, our courage declares it ſelfe, not-checkable by a weake man, or one that is not ſo valiant as our ſelues, prouided, that it be ſtil vnder our own charge, and can commaund in ſome ſuch caſe, where it may well come off with dutie diſcharged. Otherwiſe, it will happen to vs, as Sophocles ſaid:

> Who lets his furious tongue walke liberally,
> In checking ſome diſordered quality:
> And hath no reaſon but his owne bare braine,
> Muſt looke himſelfe to finde the like againe.

I haue ſeene ſome to miſprize their own companions ſo mainly, that they offred much iniurie to Armes, and to the whol companie, whereof themſelues were but poore dependants, ſeeming more in outward ſhew, then inward ſubſtance. For, a Vertuous Souldier, or he that is a man indeed, ſhould alwayes bee conſorted with iudgement, to ſupply the defects of ſuch as are leſſe then himſelfe, and ſay; that although they bee not qualified in ſome one kinde, yet in ſome other, they owe nothing to him. One may bee a worthy Seruitor on Horſeback, another on foote, euerie way equall to him, and ſo likewiſe in the other degrees of Manhood.

The eie is the moſt excellent part of the countenance, yea of the whol body: and yet notwithſtanding, if a man were compoſed of eies only, he would rather be a monſter, then any piece of perfection & excellencie. Let vs neuer note then, whether a man be inferiour to vs in anie one vertue: but rather consider, that manie other Vertues are needfull for vs, which we bestow no paines to purchase. Let vs expresse contempt of vile and detestable men, that serue as spurs to whoring, Sodomy, Flatterie, and softnesse, which (among vices) are not onely enemies to true and perfect valour, but to the generall society of men, and Authours of scandall to all Nations. Ignorance is not to be counted as a Vice, when it is accompanied with simplicitie and naturall care for the auoyding of euill. But mispriſion of Vertue, and disdayne to compasse it, is not onely an odious brutality amongest true men: but (which is much more) a crime punishable by fyre and sword, and all other inflictions Customarily due, to the perseuerance of foule and guilty offenders or euil doers.

What kind of men are most to be contemned.

When Ignorance is not to be reckoned as a vice.

There is no necessity, that a valiaunt man should be apt to spleene or offence, through the riots of a Court Minion, of a Buffone, or of some young Sir, that hath not as yet learned how to be silent, or when to speake to purpose. A Gentleman of couragious perfection indeed, should bee of the humour of inuincible Hercules, of whom Homer deliuereth testimony in the first Booke of Odissaes.

Of taking offence or displeasure.

He made no more account of frowards words,
Then of the Flie, that filly harme affords.
He differed (in all) from common kinde:
And Fortunes frownes with him were as the wind.

Homer in Lib. 1 de Odyss.

Hee ought likewise, in all his other actions, to correspond with these precepts.

The constant wise, is euer like himselfe,
And neare shrinkes courage at the losse of pelfe:
The death of Children cannot make him dye,
But, when help fails, Hope doth the place supply.

The picture of a constant wise man.

He should not conceite, that he is to deale with some small enemy, but rather to crie out with couragious Brasidas, of whom wee haue alreadie spoken. O God, there is not anie thing of so weake power; but, if it durst defend it selfe: it could finde meanes whereby to preserue it owne life. Hee vsed these Words, in regarde of a Mouse that bit him by the Finger, as he thrust his hande into a Fraile of drye Figges.

The words of noble Brasidas.

Demetrius beeing at Thebes, aduisedly noted a man that was Lame of all his Members; and of whom, a Court Musk-Minion, made a subiect of scornefull Laughter, saying: This is not he, that hath (til this day) tarded our victorie, for Nature hath made him a Cripple. It is true (answered Demetrius) but how dooſt thou know, whether reuenge and disdaine haue any other weapons then hands onely, considering that mine haue done no seruice at al for the surprizing of this Cittie?

That the meanest or silliest creature is not to be despised

CHAP. III.

Of those meanes which Princes ought to obserue, for beeing well attended with Gentlemen and valiaunt Captaines of true perfection.

RInces that seeke the Conseruation of their subiects, and to leaue peaceable estates and dominions vnto theyr Children, ought Religiously to ordaine (next to the establishment of Iustice) that lawes should be allowd to perticuler families, wherby children may bee educated euen from theyr infancy, as destenied to the inclination of such Artes, as (by manifest experience) their nature is subiected vnto, by the secret power of the more or lesse great blessings of God, and as it pleaseth him to extend or shut vppe his graces in one more then tn another. Yet notwithstanding, as accommodating the diuers inclinations of men, to perfect that great hermony which maintaineth the world, and combineth humain societie with so strict a bond, that (as it often commeth to passe) the very greatest haue neede of the meanest mens help, & al sciences, yea, euen the silliest, do tend to one selfesame end, by diuers precepts & contrary manners, yet all for the seruice of nature. For otherwise it would fal out, that common weales would conuert into deserts: and men (being apt but to one exercise only, how excellent soeuer) should haue no commerce togither, but only in words & vse of the Elements, which being wholly contrary (as it seemeth) in that common concord, Lawes for the education of Children, euen frō their Infancy.

The blessings of God not limitted to any bounds or measure.

No one exercise, how excellent soeuer, is fit for all men.

concord, for fortifying and maintaining this great building; and the lesser also, which boasts his owne mirror and liuely figure: doth teach vs, that wee ought to haue a generall vertue of profiting: and yet neuertheles, that it is necessary therein to make vse of diffrent effects and proprieties. This was well knowne to Hesiodus, when he said:

Hesiodus his verses, thus translated out of Greeke.

The very darkest sullen night,
Helpes Nature with as deere delight,
As the brightest Sun-shine day,
That the Gods most honor may.
They both most necessary be,
Healthfull alike in each degree.

Let me then tell ye, that neuer (throughout all the ancient Monarchies) was the like inuented, for the institutiō of youth; as the Discipline vsed by the Great Signior, towards the Amasoglants, and children of the tribes. The only euill (which is great, in regard of God, yet litle acording to his estate & maner of gouerning) is, in that Christians are compeld to renounce their Religion, to imbrace that of Mahomet, which (at this day) is the verie greatest, and most respected in all the East. Take off this defect, and thēn there is not any thing (I say) in the worlde, neither did all former ages euer afford the like For you may behold in Constantinople, a Carauani or numberlesse troope of yong Boies, that are carefully tended by Maisters of all estates in al such things as they are most apt vnto, without any constraint of Nature, and for the space of a yeare, they are permitted all kinds of exercises; to the end, that becomming iudges of themselues, each one may afterward pursue his owne instinct, and best inclination. Some are found to be fit for warre, and they are as quickly recommended to Maisters meete for such enstruction: yet with so great an obseruation, that time shall rather bee wanting, then care of their employment. Such as are noted to please themselues, in the composing of ships or gallies, with paper sailes, and packthred tacklings, or anie other stuffe, more assiduate to their yong fancies, then other; they are forthwith bestowed in the Sea Arsenale, & instructed in al affaires fit for the sea. These docible and debonaire spirits are differently employd: some to Phisick, others to priesthood, & som beside to iudiciary seruices. Finally, such as are of so grose tēper, that no faire apprehension shineth in them, are imployed in Gardening, a midle sort in Architecture, Painting, & Horology. They that seeme wholy disgraced by nature, are instructed in Carpentry, Taylory and twisting of Cables, making of sails and many other mean offices: which are by their aptnesse (in them) very gracious in the great Signiors respect, & begeteth them both lands & perpetual pensions.

The institution obserued by the great Signior for youth.

How young Boyes are tended by diligent Maisters.

The pursuite of seuerall inclinations.

For Warre.

For making of Ships and Gallies.

Phisick, Religion, & Law.

Gardening, Painting, and Clocke making.

It is necessary in a Christian Oeconomy, to make the like practise, as we plainly behold in the fabrick of man. If we look vpon our bodies, or those of beasts, wee may perceiue many members to haue their distinct operations; without the intrusion of any others office, or that the enuy of inferiors discontent themselues at the dignity of their superiors, or any of them (either through discord or partiality) do refuse to lend one another their assistance. It behoueth I say, that in well ordered Commonweales but especialy among Christians, the same course shold bee kept and maintained one with another: and although our charges and estates are different, yet that wee should euermore continue vnited in our spirits; and with a iust desire, to supply the defects of our associates, and also to assist them. For it is very requisit, that we shold be all like to trauailers, wandering by diuers wayes, yet all to arriue at one hauen in the end.

Our Christian rule or disposition, compared to the body of man, or of Beastes.

Gouernmen in Christian Commonweales.

The stronger are to support the weaker.

But aboue all, a King ought to constrain his Nobility, to cause young Gentlemen to be enstructed in good Letters, for Capacity of administring the great and soueraign Magistracies of his kingdom: for therby must needs ensue, that dignity wil be more venerable, iustice in better respect, and iudgements more legittimate. We may see (to our shame) that at this day the greater part of Magistrates in all our Parliaments of France, receiue their originall from plaine Plebeians and Yeomen, who neuer could haue honour so liuely imprinted in their brows and souls; as they that naturally are heires, to I know not what admirable and holy vertue, which (with no meane aduantage) appeareth rather in young spirits of Nobilitie, then in them of the thirde ranke, who alwayes haue but feeble Conceptions, and neuer eleuate or rayse their thoughts, except it bee to euill, as either to sedition, or infamous and dishoneſt

The especiall Office and duty of a King.

The disgrace of France at this present day.

Owles are no way to bee compared with young Eaglets.

againe. Whereto wee may ad alſo, that their courages are cowardly, ſtanding amazed and confounded at the ſmalleſt accidents; neyther are they ſo apt to outſtand tumults and ciuill inconueniences, as Sun-bright Nobility, which euen of it ſelfe is engirt with ſome celeſtiall flame, that cauſeth the vulgar people to apprehende more in their oppoſition againſt them, then in thouſands of poore ſpirits that are of their owne quality, whoſe fathers at the beſt, were but Farmers, keepers of Granges and Dairies, which they helde at a certaine price, and annuall Rent.

The worth of Sunne bright Nobility.

Nobilitie then doth ſhame to it ſelfe, by not ſeeking to appeare in the venerable authority of the Senate: conſidring, that Preſidents and Counſellors in Courtes Soueraigne, ſeeme to be voluntarie Tutors to the Prince, and as Noble Guards to his inuiolable Greatneſſe. By this meanes they would free them from the gripes of a huge heape of wretched Officers, and they ſhould neuer be ſubiected to the mercenary iudgment of their ſubiects, who miſtake themſelues verie ſuddenly, and diſpoſe both of the liues and goods of Gentlemen drawn into action: euen like to their Shop keeping fathers, in their eſteeme of paltry wares. In this manner, the King ſhould haue a more ſound, ſure, and ſtrong election of men meete for warre, which now adayes hee cannot haue: becauſe Gentlemen doo (indifferently) imploy all their ſonnes to ſuch trades, as is impoſsible in conueniency for them, conſidering the diſsimilitude of their natures, repugnancy of their humors, and contrariety of their ſpirits, which is more, or which is leſſe apt vnto one office then to another. I doubt not, but at length thorough the great ſcarſity to be found of martiall minded men: all ſorts of Gentlemen will not know howe to appeare in the diuerſitie of warre hazards, whither they be ciuill or ſtraunge. Yet I may verie well ſay, that there are many carried thereto, contrarie to the firſt conception of their Genius, who (neuertheleſſe) being apt to diuers thinges: can accommodate their ſpirits therto, albeit it is much leſſe natural to them, then ſomthing els. This is the reaſon why Ariſtotle ſaide, that lukewarme water was cold, in regard of that which is boiling, and yet eſteemd hot, in conſideration of that which is ycie. This is asmuch to ſay, as that the moderat ſpirits of gentlemen, pertaking in the thirde or fourth degree of heat, may ſerue for warre. If ſo, much better then ſhould they be apt and profytable for the affayres of State and pollicy. Such alſo, as encline to the fourth or fift degree, do pertake of an influence more ſtrong and pregnant for war, then anie other exerciſe elſe. This is to bee diſcerned in the Nature or caſe of our infancie, which telleth vs by our yongeſt carriage, what will be the inclination of our moſt ſolide age, and inciteth, nay, meerely exalteth vs (with a certaine violence) to acknowledge that which ſhall (one day) be either neceſſary or profitable at the leaſt. According to the ſaying of Heſiodus.

Of preſidents and Counſellors in the Courtes of Kings.

Heſiodus, concerning our yeares of infancy, expreſſing thereby, what our ſtroger age will be.

All Infant Pleaſures, Playes, and Ioyes,
All youthfull Apiſh trickes and toyes,
Our Cradle power, which breaks no bands:
Our firſt eſſayes in riper houres,
Our weakneſſe, ſtrength, or what elſe ours,
As in a painted Table ſtands:
For following yeares therein to ſee,
What good or bad ſucceſſe will bee.

Baſe gripple Slauery, is alwayes enemy to Gentility.

How Princes and Lords ſhould educate their Pages.

Princes and great Lordes ought to enſtruct their Pages in ſuch exerciſes, as do beſt anſwere vnto the condition of true Gentlemen, and ſhould make no vſe of their ſeruice, in ſeruile, baſe, or abiect occaſions: as in theſe daies they do, without any care of gouernment, or preſcribing them ſome honeſt forme of conduction. I proteſt, as I ſee the carriage of theſe ill taught times, I had much rather place my ſon or Kinſman, with a Spittle Maiſter, or Hoſpitall Keeper, then with a Prince: conſidering how badly Pages are entertained, and ſo ſlenderlie enſtructed in anie vertuous actions, as wee cannot diſtinguiſh them from common Lackeyes, but by the outward appellation, beeing elſe employed for all vſes; euen all one, with the verie fouleſt condition Varlet of the houſe. One while they are Gourmands, by ſome Groome of the Chamber; another while beaten by a Scullion of the Kitchen: and beaten they bee at euerie moment, but not to any good purpoſe; and more for Ceremonie, then with any vertuous intent of their Correction. They are baſelie reputed, and badly nouriſhed, whereby they conſtraine them, yea, and of themſelues are meerely conſtrained to forget and

A great error in the Gentry of theſe daies.

Pages very hardly diſtinguiſhed from common Lackies.

Many are made capable of warre, againſt their naturall inclination.

What ſpirits are reputed fit for Warre, by pertaking in the degrees of heate.

The little care and respect that Gentlemen haue of their Pages.

and declines, from their owne first faire and naturall disposition, to shake and get by vnlawfull meanes, such things as are most needfull for them. Some teach them how to be dissolute at their Table, for a Trencher can be no sooner offered: but it is presently swept ouer with the Nailes and Fingers; yea, with the whole hand, and tongue too sometimes. Afterward, perhaps Nature beeing scarse halfe contented: poore Youthes, they trot after their Galloping Maisters, who rid a great deale of ground in a very short while, whē their Pages follow not so fast with their feet, as with frequent and disordred passions. By which meanes, Youth neither do or can learne any thing among them, but forgetfulnesse of vertue and good manners, by the example of indiscretion & folly in their Maisters.

The Page is heere put to the Lackies Office.

These are tearmed our graceless Gallants.

Moreouer, we may see our streetes crowded with a heap of young Gentlemen, who haue much adoe to maintain themselues: and yet they must haue attending Pages, to trudge with Tokens or Loue-scripts, to Madame or Mistris Many better. And then come they poasting after, euen through the chiefest parts of the Citty, not shaming to let the world see their graceless insolence. Now, the very great hurt of all, consisteth in this, that the whole multitude of Pages (as well those about Princes, as them that follow great Lords and lesser Gentlemen, beeing themselues ill bred, and worse disciplinde:) are compelled to bastardise their naturall splendour, by putting on a new habite, of disordred, shameless, and monstrous behauiour; that (afterward) they looke rather like wilde and barbarous Albanians, then any true borne Gentlemen of blood. By which meanes, Commonweales are afflicted, Kinges lewdly serued, Magistrates scarcely obeyed, the Lawes dispised, and confusion embraced.

The maine & chiefest inconuenience aboue all other.

Of Gentlemen, still in the Princes sight.

Beside, a Gentleman brought vp out of the Princes eye, beginneth to grow disdainefull of him, when hee once apprehendeth (and malliciously enough) that he is not in any obligation to him: he waxeth proud, and such a man soone forgetteth al proportion and measure. The very highest degree of such a mans seruice, is to domineere and rule, to mount into the Seat of his Maister, Lord, or Prince: for, whatsoeuer hee seeth beneath, or on either side, is nothing to him, and the World (all this while) honoureth none more, then such a man.

The nature of an ambitious man.

The Pagans opinion concerning Generosity.

An especiall duty imposed on Princes.

What endeauors are blessed of God.

Vertue the onely first mouer of Courage.

The ouermuch neglect of Princes in these dayes.

The checkroule should be held in the Kings owne hand, for the election of his followers.

How beit, the Paganes did euermore acknowledge, that Generositie is more familiar with good, then vicious men, and, that valour is more domestick and naturall to a man that is temperate, peaceable, and milde, then the proud and ambitious, who is of the condition of a weake stomacke, which coueteth more meat, then it can resolue and digest. Princes ought to be respectiue, of such a rich and sanctified enstruction, and not admit such ouerture to the desseignes of Gentlemen; ouer greedie and couetous, in aspiring daily to some nouell degree, yet no one of them seeing the way, by the eye of his owne power, or Iustice of his merit. Thus all runs wrong, for God blesseth no Mans actions, but his that doth well, & withdraweth his eye from wicked inclinations: who wil haue no other King, then the State, or any Law, but such as may bring him in some benefit. Vertue is the Primum mobile of courage, that seemeth (by his owne power) to attract all things to it selfe, that is required in the perfection of valour: which is onely borne to be enstructed, and enstructed to serue, and (by seruice) to yeild it selfe not onely beneficiall, but necessarie also.

Princes in these daies, are faultie of too little care, that Nobility should be more forward in the exercise of vertue: and themselues also doe lend most imployment, to such as are more commēded to them, then fit for vse. Vertue giueth no more hire to the intercessions of a Courtier, made honorable and rich altogether; then to one of her owne breeding and bringing vp. Hence should arise all the Officers of a Crowne, and hence are aborted all the Creatures of a King, that leaneth wholly to passion, & nothing to vertue. He ought then to hold the list in his owne hand, to foresee each man in his profession and degree, and hence he will deriue: that his Financiers or Cherker-men, shal bee without fraud, his Councellours free from partialitie, and his Gouernours voyde voyde of faction. All their ayme and ſcope, will be to iuſtifie by their effects, the good choyſe and lawfull election, which the Prince hath made of ſuch perſons. And although they ſhould come ſomewhat ſhort of merit, yet would they ſtretch their endeuour; to deſerue the voyces of the honeſteſt Men, and the grace of their ſecond Creator.

Such as ſerue God and their Prince.

Honor aduanced, is the peoples beſt contentment.

When a Man of Honor is aduanced, the people doe looke on it with a pleaſing eye, and diſcerne (therein) the wiſdome of their Prince: who inſtantly is exalted to admiration; from admiration, to intire loue of his Subiects; and from thence to the bleſſing of GOD, who plauſibly entertaineth the ſuffrages of the Common-weals ſuppliants, for the health and preſeruation of their Prince. Contrariwiſe, all is in diſorder, when bad men hold the beſt places of credit: then the people mutiny; the Princes iudgement is ſcandalized; common affection cooleth; the curſſe of God embraceth, and bringeth the lateſt cauter that cleaueth to this euill. Aboue all, I wiſh that he, of whoſe ſeruice a Prince ſhall make vſe, ſhould haue the feare of God before his eyes, without which: all Wiſedome will eaſily bee conuerted into craft; valour into violence; Iuſtice into Crueltie; Pollicy into Monopolies; and without which (I ſay) all thoſe things which heauen hath beſt beſtowed on vs for the beſt, will only be Inſtruments of the worſt. Without this, our very affections, are as ſo many violent torments, and cruell Hels both to the Soule and Body, and our reaſon is nothing elſe, but meere trumpery and deceipt. O what inflictions could I wiſh to ſome Machiauelliſts, who maintaine, that ſuch as bee bound to Conſcience, reaſon, and Lawes, are no meete Seruants to attend on Princes: but that flattery is to be preferd, both aboue Lawes and Nature.

The Seede that yieldeth Kings the beſt encreaſe.

What enſueth by the aduancement of bad and vnworthy men.

The feare of God is to be preferred before all things elſe whatſoeuer.

The opinion of ſome wicked Machiauelliſts.

If it be ſo, that thoſe bleſſed Quires of Gods Booke, do beare witneſſe, that No Man can ſerue two Maiſters. Commaunding vs alſo elſe-where; To feare God, and honor the King: it is then a matter very euident, that the moſt part of all other Seruants, doe yeilde nothing elſe but eye-ſeruice onely. And this is the reaſon, that Kinges are euill ſerued farre off, and betrayed in ſecret. They that being Seruants to their King, will alſo do ſeruice to God; they euermore walke after one manner. They ſerue to content their Conſcience, and not they eye of their Maiſter. They propoſe God before their eyes, as both the Beholder of their actions, and ſearcher of their harts. They waite for his grace and Wages: being aſſured of recompence and reward on his part, when they doe their dutie, although it bee to vnthankfull Maiſters. This is the Seed from whence Kinges ſhould gather all hope, of being maintained, ſtrengthened, and wel ſerued. From hence ought they alwaies to chuſe their Councellors of State, and al thē, to whom they will communicate their power and authoritie.

Inſtructions giuen out of Gods Booke, for the ſeruice of Kings.

The Prince that deſireth to accompliſh all theſe things, both for the quiet of his owne Conſcience, and happy adminiſtration of his Eſtate: muſt be ſure to haue no Flatterers about him, vnprofitable perſons, Loue-Brokers, voluptuous and Epicurian Courtiers, that make the publike Purſſe, ſerue for the expences of their perticular Luxurie, gurmandize and pomp, while (in the mean time) the vertuous, and ſuch as haue deſerued much better of the State: remaine far enough off, ſlenderly known, without Grace, and without Honour, (I meane no other, then that of their owne proper merit) who neuertheleſſe are (oftentimes) ineſtimable, and more worthy of adminiſtration; then of the blind and briske (let mee not ſay faint-hearted) fauours, which the Princes of theſe times vſe towardes ſome young Gallants, that ſmell more of Ciuet, then the Cannons Powder, and much more of the Woman, then Man: yet vnworthy of eyther Sexe, their depraued Natures are ſo highly ſubiected to infamous Vices, which ſunder them frō thoſe common proprieties, that do let vs know a Man, to be truely a Man, and a Woman, truely a Woman. I am perſwaded, that it was of them, which that Great Man ſpake, on the Grecian Theater, ſaying:

Especiall obſeruations for a Prince, that would be ſerued with good men indeed.

These are Carpet Squiers, not Knights fit for a Field.

You Swiniſh men, that haue no other care,
But onely for ſuch food, as you prepare
To gorge your foule polluted trunkes withall:
Meere Swine you are, and ſuch your actions all.

A Mirrour for many, that dare not behold it.

Like

Like them you run, such is your leaden pace;
Nor Soule, nor reason shineth in your face.
Stabled you are within the Courts of Kings,
Not fit for Councell, Armour, or such things
As to your Natures are contrary quite.
Easily you can faire Ornaments disgrace,
Therefore you fit not such a royall place:
Kings loose themselues, that doe in you delight.

Great men will not willingly looke vpon serious and weighty considerations.

But why do I seeke to enstruct Gentlemen, seeing they striue (as much as possible that they may) not to behold any lawfull action: because their Soules should bring no iudgement against themselues for the excesses which they haue committed? It is enough for them, to make some essay of that which is written in Saint Iohn, to wit. That if all Testimonies of Scripture, and lawfull imitations doe faile vs: yet notwithstanding our Conscience, and Nature it selfe doth sufficiently shew, what is our dutie. Looking thorow all Windowes of Equity, Iustice, and Reason; Pagane Authours tooke knowledge, yea, and did set down in Writing: that there were Furies, who inflicted reuenge on the iniuries, as also on the sinnes of Men, which is nothing else, but the torments of vile and wicked Consciences.

The Window of Equity, Iustice, and Reason, acknowledged by the Pagans.

This is the worme whereof the Prophet Esay speaketh; it is the Worme (I say) that neuer dyeth, but byteth and teareth without intermission. These are the Tapers and Torches, which terrifie and burne our harts: This is that which is called, the remembrance of our wicked and abhominable liues. Epicurus himselfe, being an enemy to the Deitie, could yet confesse, that the very great paine of such as sinned, was, that they had sinned: for the punishment of wickednesse, is wickednesse it selfe. The Man that is attainted with this great scruple in his Soule, is of no worth, neither can be valiant, or come any thing neere to that happy quality. For he that is a perfect knight indeed, ought not onely to win the Conquest of his Enemies: but must also triumphe ouer the Passions of his owne Soule, which must be cleane, and exempt from all vnlawfull desires, or absurde and base villainies. That which was presented to the Emperour Theodosius, is well worthy to be followed by him, in whom I would decypher perfect valiancie, as thus.

The confession of Epicurus concerning Sinners.

The Anatomy of a true and perfect Knight indeed

Though in rich India, or a further Land,
Thou art adorde, and dost o're men commaund,
Although the Medes and Arabes stoupe to thee:
Yet, if not iust, valiant thou canst not be.
Thou art no Man, if terror sway thy Soule,
Nor can be valiant, if weake thoughts controule.
Such follies leaue thee to thy selfe alone,
In torment, sadnesse, and despairing mone.
But when thou dost o're-maister fond desires:
Then thy faire Soule to her true pitch aspires,
And makes thee meet for Kingdomes, or all Nations;
Hauing once conquerd thine owne priuate passions.
,, Vertue doth neuer fight, but for successe.
If then base thoughts the Soule of Man possesse,
And be not trod downe, at their first rise:
In suffering them, the greatest perils.
Then boldly check thy inward dull conceaits,
Shun those deepe blames that on neglect awaites,
Let not the Lawes reproue thy care and heed:
So shalt thou be a Man, in name and deed.

The present, giuen to the Emperor Theodosius.

This other of Claudian, is very little different.

If that action, which is tearmed valiance,
Be not in vertue: then tis impudence.

Knights of greatest courtesie, Captaines most remarkable, and Kinges of highest fame, did euermore accompany their Armes, and strengthen them by a gentle and liberall knowledge in Vertue: whereby they could best decipher such about them, as were most or least apt for Warre seruices, making distinction of their valour, according to the circumstances and ordinary manner of Souldiours; were it in apparrelling themseluss for fight, or in firming the breaches happening in their Field, or in exercising and applying themselues to some other seruice, conuenable to the time, place, and commaundement giuen them. By this meanes, Men of merit addressed themselues vnto the Prince, who made profession to be carefull and respectiue, of euery perticular wise and hardy mans courage, and vpon good note thereof: to render double recompence, that is to say, by benefits, and by iust commendations. For hee must neuer hope to see vertuous Men flourish, or their actions in true apparance: if they be not recompenced, and some way satisfied.

Vertue hath alwayes bin the best ground to builde all actions on.

The eye of the Prince to be fixed vpon each mans due worth and merit.

The Prince that desireth to finde valiancy in his men of Warre, ought to imitate the discipline of Alexander Seuerus, the Romaine Emperor: who would haue his Souldiours to be well armed, wel enstructed, and continually to haue some Mony in their Purses, but (by no meanes) of that humour, as Iphicrates the

The Warre-discipline of Alexander Seuerus, Emperor of Rome.

Iphicrates of contrary mind to Alexander Seuerus.

the Captaine wished his Warre-followers to be, to wit; auaritious, amourous, and full of voluptuousnesse. For he was wont to say, that as they were persecuted by those three violent passions; euen so would they prostitute thēselues, and forsake all perill, to satisfie their own desseignes, and the free compassing of their base desires.

Iulius Cæsar concerning his Souldiers.

True it is, that Cæsar wished his Souldiours, to haue faire and rich Armes, because they might haue the more occasion to be knowne, for auoyding the shame of flight; & not to fight so much for the worth of their Armes, as for their liues. But he was deceiued, considering as Thucidides saith. The valiant Man is alwaies himselfe, and his vertue appeareth much more, when he is disaduantaged and afflicted: then when he strengtheneth himselfe with some apparance, if it be not necessary.

The saying of Thucidides.

The Great Turke, who continueth (euen at this day) the Military Arte of the Romaines, and causeth it to be much more obserued, then the Spaniards doe, (who are in very deede, but Apes of the Turkes conduct) hath so admirable an obseruation: that a troupe of an hundred thousand men, do resemble rather a peaceable Congregation of people, assembled together to heare a Sermon; then an Army to fight against the World. The Great Turke (I say) is euermore accompanied with an incredible multitude of valorous men, which he winneth out of Tartaria, and areat his Wages and endlesse pay; like as the Switzers are in France. He helpeth himselfe also with the Souldiours of Mysia, of Europe; of the Albanians, sometimes called Epirotes; of the Thessalians, now called Fullaires; and of the Arabes, that tearme themselues Alarbes. All these glorious Nations (for their Armes) are so cherished hy the Othomans, that there is no day ouer-passeth them: but they doe receiue some honourable and notable reward and respect, from the Generals of the Turkish Armies, who imploy them at euery moment, in verie great and perilous enterprises, wherein (neuertheless) all these Men do carrie themselues, with such prudence and iudgement, as is not to be a little wondred at.

The Great Turkes ordering of his Souldiours now adayes.

Tartarians continually in pay with the Turke.

The only encouragement of Souldiours, when they are well payed and respected.

New and fresh Armes is prouided them, vpon the quickest and suddainest returne, and albeit their successe hath not answered to the premeditated desseigne: yet, in the very least performance of well doing, they are not lest vnacknowledged, but vsed, as if the attempt had beene happily ended. Hence ensued those great Stratagems at Modon, Chaly, Siget, Schaffarin in the Georgie, and at Traueils. In all which places, they surmounted the valour and fortune of the Romaines, the hardinesse of the Parthians, and the cunning and industry of the Christians; whose troups resembled Carauans of Goates, that make motion with their mouths on all thinges indifferently, how profitable or hurtfull soeuer they be.

Good will wanteth not though successe oftentimes faileth.

The Persians, who seeme to be more ciuillized then the Turkes, and yet (notwithstanding) are lesse prouident and capable of great matters, doe shut vp their Children of good Birth, in certain places of the Field-Countrey, which they call Spitaf Kier Belti, that is to say; The entrance into the Signeury of vertue, where they haue Maisters to enstruct them, according to their inclinations: but at the charges of their Parents, vntill such time as it may be known, whether the Youths wil afterward be beneficiall to the Sophy, or no. For thenceforward, they are taken and maintained at his expences, to the number of two thousand, and are then called, Spiers Kiram Sophi, that is to say; Children of the Signior Sophy.

Comparison of the Persians with the Turkes, and the education of their Children.

Children of the Signior Sophy.

These people, whom we tearme barbarous, and their Kings, called Tyrants by vs; I feare shall find (at the latter day) more grace in the grace of the Soueraigne Iudge: then the Princes and people of Europe, who make no account, or verie little (at the most) of the Youth that is vnder their Empire, or the order and discipline Oeconominall of the State, which is much lesse obserued with them, I will not I say then among the common people of Asia; but euen among the Toupinambous & Magistrats, who doe enstruct their Children in the Historie of their Ancestours, the Father telling to his Sonne; what fights they haue had against their Neighbors; what victories were obtained; and the routes which they endured. All these thinges are deliuered with fatherly exhortations, Christendom hath lesse care of youth, then Heathen Nations haue.

Enstructions of Pagane Fathers to their Sonnes.

hortations, to continue them in well doing, for publike benefit, and to shew themselues iealous imitaters of their fore-goers, who (they tell them) are in Heauen, full of Glory and Triumphe: because they continually maintained the cause of their Countrey, and defended their poore Cottages, from the inuasions of their ordinarie Enemies.

The care of the Parthians for their yong Nobility in former times.

In former times, the Parthians had such diligent care, for hu-banding the Spirits of their young Nobility, that the more part of their Lawes discoursed on nothing else. By which meanes they were inuincible, and euermore equall to the Romaine Empire, yet there was more Soueraignety, and lesse Barbarisme, in the commaundes of the Arsacides, their Kinges: then in the Empire of the Cæsars, who were (almost all of them) so abhominable, as all the Vices of the World, did beget their most monstrous qualities, from the imperfections of those Tyrants of Europe.

Comparison of the Parthian Arsacides with the Romane Cæsars.

Finallie, they lost Europe at length, yeilding it to the transport of the Mahometanes, who keepe it (at this day) more stronglie, then we doe the rest. And, if we obserue no better discipline, then that which now wee doe: it is to bee feared, that before many yeares passe ouer our heades, the Rheine will scarcely serue for Frontiers to the Othomans Monarchie, who extend the Threds of their ambitious couetousnesse, not onely vpon Germanie, which can hardlie defend it selfe; but on the rest of Christendomes happinesse; yea, ouer all that is further off from the East, then the East is from their felicitie, and the West from ours. Because it is impossible, yea, almost vniust, that the hand of God should bee succourable to such, as obserue no Equity; but contemne his Lawes, despise Soueraigne Magistracy, making themselues in all, and by al, vtterly vnworthy of his diuine blessings, which must be sought for with humble and lowly harts. The Paganes themselues do confesse.

The couetous ambition of the Othomans, for enlarging their Dominion.

The writing and confession of the Pagans.

The Goddes, by prayers are satisfied,
When some iust Soules are applied,
To satisfie their Deities:
For generall iniquities.

Ouer and beside all, the onely meanes to haue men valiant, is, to make no account of Cowards, and such as are but prating companions, nor to admit them (in any manner whatsoeuer) to any Offices and dignities of War: though (in these daies) the quite contrary is practised: for Regiments are giuen to simple Clearks, that surrender them againe the very same day; Treasurers places are bestowed on impudent persons, and the Princes lodging is kept by such, as scarsely are any found well willers. All degrees are valued by Mony, buying & selling are openly allowed, so that there is no recompence or respect made of true valor; onely hee that hath wherewithall, may bee a Gouernour in some place, which he may likewise sel again, to the most-giuer. In all the Empire of the Turk, which is more (by halfe) then ỹ the Romans had: there are but 210. Forts or Holds, which also are seated on the Frontiers, as well of the Sea, as of the firme Land. At euery three yeares end, the Gouernors are changed, or receiue new power to bee longer continued. They can receiue no other dead-payes, then the Soldiers of the old bands, who being ouer-spent in war, or laden with wounds, or crazed by age: are to be receiued into the Grand Signiors fortresses, where an honorable pension is bestowed on them, which they tearme Timar. Hereby ensueth, that all men are made vse of in this bright Monarchy, for such as are aged people, gouty, or lame, do keep the walles, while the younger doe fortifie the Prince and his Lieutenants in the Fielde, hoping (one day) to haue entertainment in those Fortes. By this means, Souldiers are neuer in miserable quality in the great Turks iurisdictions, which maketh them the more hardy & valiant: knowing, that (in their retreat from seruice) they shall neuer want, by any discommodity (whatsoeuer) happening to them.

The only meanes to be assured of such as are valiant men.

All degrees and Offices passe currant for mony by buying and selling.

The Turkes Fortresses, and Gouernours of thē.

All men are made vse of in the Turkes dominions, that no one may be seene in any miserable condition, for the discouraging of others.

For, beside those Fortresses on the Confines of Asia, and Europe, there are fiue Mosquaes in Notalia, some whereof were builded by the Mahometane Emperors, and others by their Bashaes, and the least reuenues belonging to any one of them, is forty thousand Ducats of annuall Rents. There is a publike Schoole, where the poore are enstructed, and beside, there is a verie goodly House, well fitted with most exquisite Bathes, where, Fiue Mosquaes in Natolia, for young and old, that none may be seene in pouerty.

where, all that are billeted by the Aga, Colonell of the Infantery; are nourished, maintained, and well tended, being sickly, weake, or aged, and al things are so well ordered, as no one can bee wearie, or dislike of their entertainement, or iudge it other then it ought to be.

The bestowing of honourable charges for the wars.

All honourable charges of men for the Warres, are imparted to such, as haue best reputation among the Souldiours. If at any time some offence be committed, vnworthy of the former opinion conceiued of mans valour, he is dismissed from his authority: yet without any infamous note, or desperate hope of being againe reintegrated, by course of time, which moderateth all thinges, and changeth the councels and humours of Princes, who appeare (by an indifferent chastisement) to haue satisfied both the Law and their owne lenity, in one selfe-same subiect.

Abra-Bashat, repealed frō his place, and Sinan-Bashae aduanced thereto.

Thence came it, that Bashae-Abra, hauing disordred himselfe in the Georgie, was repealed and disgraced, and Sinan-Bashae placed in his stead, who succeeding in the room, of a Man ill handled for his faults: stood bound (by all these considerations) to behaue himselfe so well, that the Great Signior could receiue no mislike in his cariage, for hee regained what his Predecessour had lost, beating and chasing the Persians with so large an vsury of vengeance; that his Military seruices performed in the vpper Asia, were little indebted to thē of Alexander the Great, although he was of no such temper. Long time after, returning home with triumphe and victory, in the Cittie of Constantinople: he was slaine by a Foole, that begd an Almes of him, and which Sinan made himselfe ready also to giue him. Wherein may bee obserued, that this great and fortunate Mirrour dyed, in doing the Office of a Christian, and not of a Turke, that is to say; in giuing an Almes, and rendring Iustice to the Porta. After his death, the other was admitted to his charge againe; and then he redeemed the iniuries formerly receiued, by such worthy actions of seruice, as surmounted the obliuion of his first defects.

Sinan-Bashae cōming with triumph and victory to Constantinople was slaine by a Foole.

Sinan-Bashae being dead, Abra-Bashae was readuanced.

I referre now to your owne iudgements, if these people (which we call barbarous) may not iustly (and in good earnest) make vs blush, considering, that the greater part of them, which hold great charges among vs in these daies: doe declare themselues vtterly vnworthy of them, and because there is no punishment for them, men are as little regarded, as a Varlet of the Chamber. Hence ensueth it, that the Prince is miserable, and confusion is so great among his Followers, that were it not for the huge throng and multitude of Noblemen, which ardently accost and company him, to couer this imperfection: within short while we should be buried in the State ruines, which in the end must needes fall out, if no better order be prescribed for Souldiours, and some endeuour vsed, for maintaining daily a sufficient number, that may serue as a bound or banke, against the tempestu ous billowes of Strangers, who doubtlesse will triumph ouer vs continuallie, vntill we haue prouided for this important necessity, wherof (notwithstanding) no account at all is made.

Barbarous Nations may iustly make vs Christians to blush at our behauiour.

Danger of Buriall in the ruines of the State.

Though it bee most true, that the Romaine Empire began to loose it selfe, from the day when Millitary pollicy was violated, for afterward, they that durst not so much as dreame of Italie: made no doubt at all to assault it, yea, and to force it, to the shame and confusion of them, that contemned the order religiously obserued by their Predecessours. The infamous corruption in State Councellours of Princes, was the only cause thereof: yet some others are perswaded, that the vniuersall generous ruine, ensued perticularly to them; when they sold their Country to their enemies, as Æneas and Antenor did, of whom (I think) they are descended. For all was set to sale for Money, both the offices of Magistrats, and seats of Iudges.

By what meanes the Romain Empire began to confound it selfe.

The infamous corruption in Councellors of Estate to Princes.

And euen so is it in these daies, honours of Warre cannot be had, without such manner of commerce, so that (at length) publike commoditity wil be brought into a monstrous Caos, the first Sepulcher of the Elements. Armes will be made subiect to Mony, euen as they were among the Romaines, whose Prætorian troupes sold the Empire for good ready Mony, as bringing it to the common Out-cry, faireſt offerer, and lateſt

Warre honours are bartered, bought and sold, euen as they were among the Romains.

lateſt Purchaſer. So that, it may be ſaid of France, as a Prince of Affrica was wont to do of Rome: Oh goodly City to be ſold, if any man had Mony enought to buy it. And very certaine it is, that if the King of Spain had neuer ſo little intelligence in this Kingdome, as hee hath had too much: he ſhould not neede to deſire it. He can forme Creatures enow heere, to be buyers for him, and (it may bee) that haue long ſince bought the Pillers of the State, with Monies meete for ſo glorious an exploit. We are all carried thither, the Market beginneth to open, the Traffiques hope is not a little, neyther is there any danger in the delleign, for impunity raigneth generally. The wicked doe thruſt good men out of all fauour, accounting them vnprofitable Members, and deſertfull of no Name, among ſuch a number of ſtrange Cabaliſts, who thinke France to be no better then a Mart or Staple: where gaine is preferred before Honor; Mony before Merit; an Enemy before a Friend; a Seruant before the Son of the Family; and a Seruant, before a Domeſticke borne.

The ſaying of an Affricane Prince, concerning Rome.

Bad men thruſt better deſeruers out of all fauour and reſpect.

Behold what may be ſaid, on the behalfe of perfect valour, and the ſolid or neceſſary meanes, for the gaining of worthy men: to make Kinges triumph, perpetuate their eſtates, and leaue eternity to their Monarchies. My hearty wish and deſire is, that ſome benefit may enſue by my poore trauaile (as infallibly will) to our French Nobility, if this may be communicated (how little ſoeuer) to the eyes of their ſouls, which hauing heretofore been eleuated to the honeſt ſearch of vertue, and eſpeciallie that which ſhold be moſt familiar with them: will render them abſolute in the perfection of this diſcourſe, whereof I couet more to be the God-Father, then the true Father indeed. Becauſe all the wonders of honor, grace, and valiancy therein alleaged, haue beene ſelected from the Oracles and Miracles of the onely renowned Princes in the World, of whom I haue figured the very faireſt conditions. To the end, that ours of this Age, may commendably enuy ſuch glory, and go as far beyond theirs, as they did all other whatſoeuer.

The Authors Concluſion and wiſh, to the Nobilitie of France.

The vertues of other Princes, ought to be a ſpurre to ours in theſe dayes.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Wiſedome, Prudence, and Pollicy; and what difference is betweene them. Alſo, a conſideration of the difficulties & dangers, incident to matters of State.

BEcauſe our preſent intended diſcourſe, may ſtand cleare from obloquy and detection: we wil firſt declare what Wiſedome is, and wherein it conſiſteth. For Pollicie being but (as it were) a branch thereof; it ſhall therefore be conuenient, firſt to conſider the nature of the root or Tree, that thereby we may know the property of the braunch. And to this end, it is to be conſidered, firſt whence wiſedom is, and afterwards, what it is: whereby it will appeare, that true wiſedome, and (conſequently) true Pollicy, can no way ſtand with wickedneſſe.

Pollicy is but a Branch of wiſedome.

For the firſt, it is euident, by the doctrine as wel of the beſt Philoſophers, as of our holy Scriptures; that wiſedom is the eſpeciall guift of God, which Plato taught, not onely concerning abſolute wiſedom (conſiſting in the ſpeculation and knowledge of diuine things) but alſo of ciuill or politicall Wiſedome and Prudence: which he ſaith. Is neither giuen to man by nature, nor taught by Philoſophy, nor got by induſtry or experience. And therefore in his Book of Politicall Lawes, he craueth it of Almighty God as his eſpeciall guift, acknowledging: That no humain wit can (without his perticuler inſpiration and aſsiſtance) ordaine ſufficient Lawes for the gouernment of a Common-wealth, as partly hath beene elſewhere approued.

Wiſedom the eſpeciall gift of God, according to Plato.

Plato in Lib. 4. de Legib. & in Minoe.

Wiſedome not giuen by Nature, nor taught by Philoſophy, nor got by induſtry.

This alſo our Scriptures doe aboundantly teach, deriuing al wiſedom from Almighty God, as from the Fountaine thereof, ſaying. Omnis ſapientia à Domino Deo eſt, All Wiſedome commeth of the Lord. Et à Deo profectaeſt ſapientia, &c. Wiſedome came from GOD, and it ſhall abound in the mouth of the faithful man, and the gouernor or Lord of all will giue it thee. And againe, Fons ſapientiæ verbum Dei in excelſis. The Fountaine of wiſedome Eccleſ. 1. 1. 6. God the only Author and giuer of wiſedome, according to the Scripture. Eccleſ. 25. 3.

is the word of God on high. That is to say, the Son of God, who is therefore called Sapientia Patris, The Wisedome of God the Father. For this cause S. Iames aduiseth vs. Si quis vestrum (saith he) indiget sapientia, postulet à Deo, & dabitur ei. If any of you lacke wisedom, let him aske it of God, and it shall be giuen him. And Salomon craued it of Almighty God, and obtained it. And Iesus the Son of Sirach saith of himselfe. Cum adhuc iunior fum, &c. When I was yet yong, or euer I went abroad, I desired wisedome openly in my prayer. And I profited by her, therefore will I ascribe the glory vnto him that giueth me wisedome.

Iames. 1, 5. 1 King. 3, 9.

Salomon and Iesus the sonne of Sirach obtained wisedome of God by Prayer. Eccles. 51, 13. 17.

Seeing then true wisedom is (according to the opinion both of Philosophers and Diuines) and especiall gift of Almighty God: it must needes follow, that it haue no communication with sin and wickednesse, or with any thing offensiue to God. And therefore Plato (with all his followers) doe teach, that for as much as true wisedom is nothing else, but (as it were) The light of the chiefe and true good (that is to say, of Almighty God) reflected vpon the soules of Men: no Soule defiled with sinne, is any whit more capable of this light of true Wisedome, then the ayre (beeing ouer-cast with Clouds) is capable of the Sunne. And this Doctrine of Plato agreeth notably with our holy Scriptures, which teach, that In maleuolam animam, &c. Wisedome wil not enter into a wicked soule, nor dwell in the body that is subiect to sin. And therefore it is said, That God giueth wisedome to such as feare him.

Plato in Timæo, et in Epist. ad Syracusin. What wisedome is, according to Plato.

A soule defiled with sinne not capable of wisedome. Wisd. 1. 4. Eccles. 43, 33.

This will be more euident, by the consideration of what Wisedome is, and wherein it principally consisteth. Therefore, first to speak of the Doctrin of our holy Scriptures, and after, of the opinion of Philosophers: Iob hauing asked, Where is Wisedome found, and where is the place of vnderstanding? Answereth himselfe, saying; Ecce timor Domini, ipsa est sapientia, & recedere à malo intelligentia. Behold, the feare of God is wisedom it selfe, and to forsake euil is vnderstanding. Thus saith Iob, which the Preacher confirmeth, saying. Omnis sapientia timor Dei, et in omni sapientia dispositio legis. The fear of God is all Wisedome, and the performing of the Law is perfect wisedome. That is to say (as we read in the Greeke Text) Factio et operatio legis, The doing & working of the Law, signifying: That all wisedom consisteth in the feare of God, and in the execution of his Law, which is as much to saie, as in the keeping of his Commaundements; whereof three reasons may well be giuen.

What wisedome is, and wherein it consisteth, according to our sacred Scriptures. Iob. 28, 12, 13, et 28.

Eccles. 19, 20.

True wisedome consisteth in the feare of God, and the execution of his Law.

The first, because hee which feareth God, & fulfilleth his commandements, hath the ground and principall part of wisedome, for in all his actions he principally respecteth two things: the one, the glory of God (for which, Man and all other creatures were chiefely ordained) and the other, the eternall good of his owne soule, which most importeth him. For, as our Sauior saith; What shall it profit a Man, though he should winne the whole world, if he loose his own soule. Therfore the Preacher saith well, Sapiens est animæ suæ sapiens: He which is wise, is wise for his Soule. The second reason is, for that he which feareth God, and keepeth his commandements, doth therin work wisely, not onely for his eternall good, but also for his temporall and worldlie good: Seeing thereby hee conserueth himselfe, in the protection and fauor of him, who is the Authour and Giuer as well of the one as other, and hath an especial care of such as fear and serue him. For, as the Psalmist saith, Oculi Domini super metuentes eum; The eyes of the Lord are vpon them that feare him. Et aures eius in preces eorum, And his eares are open to their prayers. Such also is his loue towards them, and the regard he hath of them, that, as our Sauiour saith; Hee numbreth the very haires of their heads. Et custodit (saith the Psalmist) omnia ossa eorum; He keepeth all their bones, to the end, that there shall not any one of them perish.

The principal part of wisedome, to respect in all things the glory of God, and our eternall good.

Mat. 16, 26.

Wisd. 37, 18.

He which truly feareth God, is wise, for his temporall good, and why.

Psalme 33, 17. Psalme. 34, 14

Math. 10, 30. Psalm. 34, 19.

Therefore, as no man is, or can bee counted wise or happy, who (by contempt of Almighty God, and breach of his Commaundements) exposeth himselfe to his indignation, whereby both he and his may vtterly perish: so he likewise, that by the feare of God, and obseruation of his law, obtained his continuall fauour and protection, is not only truly wise, but also truly happy. Which Aristotle himselfe acknowledged, who teaching, that true wisedome and felicity, doe chiefely consist, in the contemplation of God and heauenly things: affirmeth the wisest man to be the happiest of al other, because he is most grate-

No man is wise in exposing himselfe to Gods indignation.

Arist. in lib. Ethic. 10. Cap. 7. Idē Ibid. cap. 8.

full

The law of God, is the rule of all prudent actions.

The difference betwixt wisedome and Prudence.

The object of wisedome.

The diffinition of wisedome.

Cicero. in Lib. 2. de Offic.
August. in lib. 14. de Trinit. Cap. 1.

The Office of Prudence.

Basil. in princip. Prouer.
Arist. Moral. Nicom. Lib. 7. Cap. 5. & Ethic. Lib. 6.
Tho. Aquin. 22. q. 47. 2.
Cicero de nat. Deor. Lib. 1.
August. Lib. 83. quest. 31.

The definition of Prudence.

Arist. in Lib. 6. Ethic. Cap. 4.

The end of euery action truely prudent, must needs bee good.

The meanes of euery prudent action, to be good and iust.

Arist. in Ethic, Idem. l. 6. ca. 12.

full to God, best beloued of him, and protected by him continually.

The third reason, why the fear of God, & the keeping of his commandements, is true wisedome, is: because the Law of God is the true rule, whereby al prudent actions are to bee measured, for it comprehendeth in it selfe, and teacheth all true vertue and goodnesse, without the which, there can be no true Prudence, as shall appeare by the circumstances due and requisite thereto, according to the Doctrine of Philosophers. Wherein is to bee noted, that though Wisedome and Prudence (in common speech) are commonly confounded: yet there is betwixt them this difference, that Wisedome hath for her object, not only humaine, but also Diuine things. And therefore is defined, both by Philosophers and Diuines, to be Scientia diuinarum humanarumque rerum, et earumque illarum rerum sunt causæ. The knowledge of things diuine and humaine, and of their other causes. Whereas the office of Prudence, is duely to consider, and wel to direct humaine affaires, and is called by Thomas Aquinas, Sapientia in humanis rebus, Wisedome in humaine things: consisting, as Cicero and S. Augustine teach, in the knowledge of Things good, bad, & indifferent, and is defined, Rerum expetendarum, fugiendarumque Scientia, The knowledge of things to be desired or fled. Or as S. Basile saith, Eorum quæ agenda et non agenda sunt cognitio; The knowledge of those things which are to be done, or not to be done: whereto three circumstances are principally required.

The first is, that the end of euery action bee truely good, which Aristotle teacheth, to be the first & principal circumstance requisite to Prudence. And he affirmeth, that whosoeuer applieth his wit to worke for an euill end: although he haue neuer so good successe therein, yet he cannot bee called truelie wise or prudent, but crafty and subtile.

The second circumstance is, not onlie that the end of euery action bee good; but also, that the meanes to attaine to that end, be correspondent therto, that is to say, that they be all good and iust, yea, wel and iustly done. To which purpose, Aristotle prescribeth circumstances, of due time, place, and manner, to be considered in euery Prudent action.

Teaching withall, that whosoeuer fayleth in any one of the circumstances: is not vertuous, nor (by consequent) prudent, because Vertue & Prudence are so ioyned, that the one cannot possibly be without the other. Macrobius assigning (out of Plato) six parts of Prudence; accounteth circumspection for one, which (he saith) consisteth in consideration of the circumstances of euery action, that the same be most lawful good, and iust. Whereupon Saint Basile saith. Quisquis prudentiam recte sectatus fuerit, &c. Whosoeuer followeth the rule of Prudence truly; he shal neuer swerue from vertue, nor fal into vice. The third circumstance to bee considered in euery prudent action, is, that whereas there are certaine degrees of goodnes in things, some being good, others better, and one the best of all, (wherto all other things are to be referred, which is called by the Philosophers Summũ bonũ, The chiefe good; And also, Finis bonorum, The end of al good things) it is (I say) especially required in Prudence: to make a true estimate of the worth of euery thing, & not only to reiect things absolutely euil, or of euils, to chuse the least (as the Lacedemonians said, he had done, that married a very little wife) but also of good thinges to chuse the best: preferring those things which are absolutely good, before all other goods whatsoeuer, and making the chiefe good, the scope & end of al his actions.

Now then, seeing these three circumstances are requisite to true Prudence, to wit; to chuse a good end; to practise good & vertuous means; and to esteem euery good thing in the degree that it deserueth: it is euident, that he who feareth God, and keepeth his Commandements, performes all these three things, not only in euery particular action, but also throughout the whole course of his life, tending in al things to goodnes and vertue, vsing al iust & vertuous means, and esteeming euery thing according to the true worth thereof. For, he preferreth the Soule before the body; eternall things before temporall; the goods of the body, before the goods of Fortune; and the goods of the mind before them both. Finally, he referreth and directeth all his actions, and the whole course of his life, to the seruice and glory of God, whom both diuines and Phi-

Vertue and Prudence so ioyned, that they cannot be seperated.

Macrob. in somno Scip. Lib. 1.

Basil. in princip. Prouerb.

Cicero de finibus. Lib. 1. 2. 3. 4. & 5. Et Offic. Lib. 3.

Prudẽce preferreth the greater good before the lesse, and the chiefe good before all other.

Plutarch. de amore Frater.
Arist. Ethic. Lib. 6. Thom. Aquin. 2. 2. q. 47. ar. 1.

How he that feareth God, practiseth the three chiefe pointes of Prudence.

losophers do teach; To bee the beginning and end of all Creatures, as partly hath bin before declared.

Apoc. 1. 8. Arist. Metaph. Lib. 1. Trismegist. in pœman. Cap. 3.

But here (perhaps) some will say, that there are necessarily required to Prudence, certain other parts, which I haue not yet mentioned: As sagacity of wit, a good memory, and a sound iudgment, whereby wise men do prudently consider, iudge, councell, ordaine, and execute, and that these partes (as Aristotle teacheth) proceede partly of a naturall hability, and partly of long experience. In which respect, he most approoueth the iudgement and councel of old men. Whereupon it followeth, that it sufficeth not to Prudence, to feare God, and keepe his Commaundements: except a Man haue (withall) the other partes aboue mentioned, which many good & holy men want, either in respect of som naturall defect of Wit, Memory, and Iudgement, or for lacke of experience.

A difficulty proposed concerning other parts of Prudence. Arist. Ethic. lib. 8. Cap 9, et 10.

For the better satisfaction hereof, one thing is to be considered, to wit, the naturall imbecility of mans wit, which is such in the wisest worldly man that liueth; that he knoweth not what is conuenint for himself, and much lesse for others, whereby he seeketh (many times) that which turneth to his owne ruine. Therefore, the most necessary part, for consummation & perfection of humain Prudence, is some supernaturall and diuine light, to illuminate the vnderstanding of men, to moue and encline their wils to make choice of that, which may be most conuenient for thē and others. Without which light, the wisest worldly men (I mean such as haue most excellent talents and parts of nature, and are wicked withall) are but like to blinde men, and go (as it were) groping in the dark. Wherefore the Preacher saith, Error and darknesse are appointed for Sinners: that is to say, ignorance and blindnesse are connaturall to wicked men. And againe. The way of the wicked is as the darknesse, and they know not where they shal fal. Whereas on the contrary side, The way of the righteous (that is to say, of those that feare God, and keep his commaunments) shineth as the light, that shineth more and more vnto the perfit day. And for this cause, the Psalmist saith of the Law of God; That it is cleare and bright, and shineth light to the eies. That is to say, the light of grace, whereby the naturall good abilities of Gods Seruants are encreased and perfited: doth also prosper their actions, so farre forth, as God Almighty thinketh it necessary for their good, his glory, and the execution of his will. Whereto I adde, that also the defects of nature may be, and many times are, supplyed by the light of Grace, in such sort, that Gods Seruants do many times, attaine to performe all the parts of Prudence, though they haue no natural ability for the same, such being the effectes of Grace, that it perfecteth humaine nature: which although it aspire and tend to perfection, yet it cannot possibly attaine thereto, without some supernaturall help. And for the better proofe of the matter in hand, I will lay down some examples of Gods seruants, who, notwithstanding either their naturall defects & imperfections, or their want of experience: haue (by the conduct of Gods grace) most wisely behaued themselues, in most important matters. Who seemed more vnfit to vndertake the iudgement of great causes, then Daniel, whiles he was a child of 12. years old (as Theodoret testifieth) or, as other ancient Fathers affirm, not much older, and therefore no lesse vnripe in experience, then in yeares? And yet neuertheless, being assisted by the spirit of God, he confounded the adulterous Iudges in the cause of Susanna, which he most prudently determined. Besides, the Scripture witnesseth, that God gaue such profound knowledge and wisdom, not only to him, but also to Ananias, Misael, and Azarias, while they were all Children: that they far surpassed all the wise and learned Chaldeans.

The good abilities of nature are encreased and perfected by Grace.

The defects of Nature may be, and often are supplied by the light of grace.

Examples of diuers, in whō grace supplyed naturall defects.

Daniel being but a Child of twelue yeares olde, iudged the cause of Susanna. Dan. 13. 7 heed. in Cap. 1 Ezech. Ignat. Mart. in Epist. ad Magnes. Sulpicius Seuerus in Lib 2. Sacræ Histor. August. in Ser. 242. Dan. Cap. 1. Ananias, Misaell and Azarias.

And was there euer any glorious enterprise, more wisely continued, more couragiously attempted, or more heroycally performed, thē the ouerthrow of Holofernes: slaine by a holy Woman, no lesse timerous of nature, then weake of iudgement, and void of experience, through the infirmity of her Sexe?

Iudith heroycally and wisely perfourmed a glorious enterprise Iudith. Cap. 7, 8, 9, &c.

Againe, what sufficiency was there in Moyses, for the performance of so great a charge, as Almighty God laid on him; first, in his ambassage to Pharao, and afterward in the gouernment and conduct of his people, thorow so manie kind of daungers and difficulties? This Exod. 3, 10, 11. Moses acknowledged his insufficiency for the conduct of Gods people.

was

The satisfaction of the difficulty proposed.

No man is so wise, that he alwayes knoeth what is conuenient for himselfe.

The light of Gods grace necessary for the perfection of Prudence.

Eccles. 11, 16.

Prouer. 4, 18, 19.

The wisest worldly men are as it were blind-fold.

Psalme. 19, 8.

was acknowledged by Moyses himselfe, who confesseth his owne in-sufficiencie and weaknes, saying to Almighty God; Quis sum ego, &c. Who am I ô Lord? That is to say, what is there in mee? That I should goe vnto Pharaoh, and that I should conduct the Children of Israell out of Egipt? And againe afterwardes, being vtterlie discouraged, with the consideration of his want of eloquence and vtterance, & of his other infirmities; he desired to be excused, saying. Obsecro Domine, mitte quē missurus es, I beseech thee, ô Lord, send else whom it please thee. Wherupon God did not only promise him his owne continuall assistance: but also appointed Aaron to help him, and to speak for him to the people in al occasions, promising withall, to be the mouths of them both. Besides, Iethro, Father in Law to Moyses, did also afterwardes (by Gods great prouidence) teach him a notable point of pollicy, for gouernment of the people. Wherin may be noted by the way how sweetely Almighty God guideth his Seruants concurring with them, and mouing them sometimes immediatlie by secret iuspiration, and sometimes by the help and meanes of others. Whereby, Moyses being (as it seemeth) altogether vnskilfull, and vnexpert in matters of State: did (neuertheless) many years most prudently and happily gouern the people of God, as well in warlike, as in other ciuill affaires.

In like manner, if we consider either the yeares of the education of Dauid, when (being very young) he was called from the Sheep-coat to the Court, and shortly after annointed King. If we weigh withall, his wise, victorious, and glorious gouernment for forty yeares together: we must needs confesse, that the same proceeded of Gods assistance, and not of his own sufficiency, whereof Almighty God admonished him by Nathan the Prophet, saying. Ego tulite, &c. I tooke thee from the Pastures, when thou followedst thy flockes, and made thee King of my people of Israel. And I was with thee, and assisted thee in all things whersoeuer thou didst go. I kild all thine enemies before thy face, and haue magnified thy Name among the great ones of the earth. Thus spake the Prophet Nathan in the person of Almighty God: and this Dauid himselfe, (who best knew himselfe, & the fauors which God had done him) gratefully acknowledged: calling almighty God His Protector, his stay, his refuge, his buckler or shield, his strength, his hope, his glory, and humbly beseeching him in all his occasions; to illuminate him, to protect and defend him, to direct his course, & to guide his steps. I omit diuers other examples for breuities sake, seeing by these it sufficiently appeareth, how true that is which the Psalmist saith Lex Domini sapientiam præstat paruulis, The Law of GOD giueth wisedome to Children. That is to say, to simple and ignorant men, & the reason is, for that the Law of God containeth the precepts of all true Wisedome and Prudence: teaching vs, what is our duty to God, to our Neighbour, to our Superiors, Inferiors, & equals: how to command, how to obey; to what end to direct our intents and our actions; how to liue, how to die; and lastly, how to arriue (after the storms and tempests of this life) at the secure port of eternall felicity, whereto true wisedome directeth and addresseth her whole course.

And this is not only to be vnderstood of the written Law of God, that is to say, the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament (in the which as Saint Chrysostome saith, Non est syllaba vel apiculus, &c. There is not a sillable, nor so much as a tittle, wherein there is not hidden some great treasure) but much more it is to be vnderstood, of the Law of God vnwritten, infused into the harts of Gods Seruants. Whereof Almighty God said by the Prophet: Dabo legē meam, &c. I will giue them my law in their bowels, and I will write it in their harts. Which vnwritten Law, is (as S. Augustine saith) nothing else, but Ipsa præsentia Spiritus Sancti, &c. The very presence of the Holy Ghost, &c. by whom Charity is spread and printed in our harts, which charity is the consummation of the Law, and end of the Commaundement.

Thus saith S. Augustine of the infused law of God, which doth not only teach men true wisedome (as doth the written Law) but doth also giue it them: making them the temples of God, and habitacles of the Holy Ghost. By whose Grace, the good Talents of many Seruants of God are encreased and perfected, their defects supplied, their infirmities cured, the eies of their vnderstanding illuminated, and their iudgements dire-

Glossa interlin. How God supplyed the defects of Moses.

Exod 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. &c.

God concurreth with his seruants sometimes immediately, and sometimes by meanes of others.

1. Sam. 16, 11, 12.

2. Sam. 2, 4. Dauid directed and guided in all his Gouernment by Almighty God.

2. Sam. 7, 8, 9.

Dauid gratefully acknowledged Gods assistance.

Psalme. 17, et 143.

Psalme. 17, 16, 15, 24, 133.

Psalme. 10, 8. How the law of God giueth wisedome.

The written law of God full of all wisedome. Chrisost. in Psal. 14.

The infused law of God.

Ierem. 13, 12.

August. in Lib. de spir. et Litera. Cap. 21.

The infused Law both teacheth and giueth true wisedome.

directed. By meanes whereof, they are replenished with heauenly Wisedome, and enabled to performe all the parts of true Prudence, to wit; to deliberate maturely; to iudge soundly; to counsel securely; to ordaine and commaund exactly, and execute effectually. And so they work in al things, no lesse prudently then happily, being mooued and led by the onely Author of wisedome and happinesse: in whose hand are the harts of all men, and vpon whose wil, dependeth the successe of all actions whatsoeuer.

The parts of true Prudēce.

Therefore I will inferre heereupon certaine conclusions. The first, that, as the Preacher saith, the fear of God is not onely Initium & radix; The beginning and roote; but also Plenitudo sapientiæ; The consummation and perfection of Wisedome. For those that sincerely fear God, haue (consequently) the light and helpe of his grace, whereby they may, and many times do arriue to the perfection of Wisedome and Prudence: whereas otherwise, there is no possibilitie of attaining thereto, all humaine wisedome being (of it selfe) lame and imperfect, vncertaine, and subiect to infinite errors. So that, wicked men, though they haue neuer so good partes of wit and iudgement naturally, and may by the force and meanes thereof, doe many things prudently and wisely: yet, forasmuch as they alwaies play the Fooles notably, in that which importeth them most, to wit; in thinges pertaining to their eternall good or euill, and do also erre very blindly and absurdly (many times) in temporall affaires; they neuer haue any perfection of wisedome, nor can be counted truely wise.

The first conclusion.

Eccles. 1.15. 20. The feare of God is the beginning & perfection of Wisedome, and why,

All humaine wisedome is of it selfe lame and vnperfect.

The wisest worldly man is a foole in that which most imports him.

Whereas on the other side, the Seruants of God, who haue alwayes good naturall parts, and the light and help of grace withall, do not onely worke most prudently alwaies, in matters that concerne their eternall good or euill: but also deale in all things whatsoeuer, with farre more light, certaintie and securitie, then wicked Men, of like good parts and Talents naturall. And although the Seruants of God haue (sometimes) some naturall defects of wit and iudgement; yet forasmuch, as such also doe alwayes discharge the partes of true Prudence, in matters which import thē most, and may haue also, and many times haue (with the help of grace) such a supplement of their naturall imperfections, that all of them may, and many of them doe, performe the Office of prudent and Wise men in all affaires, which wicked men neither do, nor possibly can doe: I will therefore conclude, that the perfection of humaine Wisedome, consisteth in Gods grace, and that the very simplest Seruant of God, may more truely be accounted Wise, then the wisest, I meane the subtilest and craftiest wicked Man whatsoeuer.

How the seruants of God are wise.

Why the simplest seruant of God is wiser then the wisest wicked man.

The perfection of humane wisedome consisteth in Gods grace.

This the Royall Prophet acknowledged in himselfe, comparing the Wisedome and Prudence which God had giuen him, by the obseruation of his commandements; with the Wisedome and Prudence of his Enemies, and of the wisest Worldlings, saying. Super inimicos meos, &c. Thou hast made me (ô Lord) wiser then mine enemies, through thy Commandement or Law, and I haue vnderstood more, then all they which taught me. I am wiser then the aged, because I haue sought to keepe thy Commaundements.

Dauids acknoledgement in himselfe.

Psalme. 119. 2. 3.

The second Conclusion is, that (as the Booke of Ecclesiasticus signifieth.) Non est sapientia nequitiæ disciplina, & non est cogitatus peccatorum prudentia. The knowledge of wickednesse is not wisedome, neither is there prudence whereas the counsell of Sinners is. For, seeing true Wisedome consisteth in the feare of God, & in the obseruation of his Commandements: nothing that is offensiue to God, or contrary to his Law, can stand with true Wisedome. And againe, see in Prudence and Morall Vertue are so conioyned, that they cannot be separated; yea, and that not onely the end of euery prudent action, but also the meanes must necessarily bee good and vertuous: it must needes follow, that whatsoeuer is vicious, impious, or wicked, is excluded from true Prudence. In which respect, Prudence is called in the Scriptures, Scientia Sanctorum. And therefore Salomon saith. Principium sapientiæ timor Domini, & scientia Sanctorum Prudentia. The fear of God is the beginning of Wisedome, and the knowledge of holie things is Prudence. Hereupon also follow two other Conclusions, concerning policy. The one that no true pollicy can admit

The second conclusion.

Eccles. 19, 22. Nothing that is offensiue to God, can stand with true wisedome or Prudence.

Prouer. 9, 10. Prudence called in Scripture the knowledge of holy things.

The third Conclusion.

No true Pollicy admitteth any impietie.

admit any impiety, wickednesse, or offence of God. The other, that all policy humaine (without the light and help of Gods grace) is vncertaine and defectuous. And for the better vnderstanding heereof, it is to bee considered, that as Prudence is a part of wisedome: so Pollicy is a part of Prudence, and that Prudence also is diuided into three partes. The first, Personall; the second, Oeconomicall; and the third, Politicall. Personall Prudence, consisteth in the speculation and practise of such things, as belong onely to perticuler men. Oeconomicall prudence, respecteth all thinges belonging to housholde affayres. And Pollitical prudence is that, which considereth matters appertaining vnto commonwealth, and this kind of Prudence is properly called Policy.

Pollicy a part of Prudence.

Prudence deuided into three parts.

Personal Prudence.

Oeconomical Prudence.

Politicall Prudence.

Pollicie cannot disagree from Prudence.

Therfore, as Prudence (being a branch of Wisedome) cannot disagree from the Nature thereof, no more then the braunch from the Nature of the tree; so also, Pollicy being a part of Prudence, must needs bee conforme and agreeable together; in which respect, euerie Politicall Art must needs bee prudent, and euerie prudent act (concerning Commonwealth) must needes bee Politicall. Whereuppon it followeth, that seeing true Prudence excludeth all wickednesse and impiety, true Pollicy also dooth exclude the same.

The fourth Conclusion.

All humane pollicie is vnperfect and defectuous, without the light of grace.

And againe, seeing true Wisedome and Prudence are the especiall guiftes of God (as I haue shewed) and that without the light and helpe of Gods grace, al humaine wisedome is full of imperfection, obscurity, vncertainty, and error, it followeth also by the like consequence, that the like iudgement is to be giuen of all humaine policy, to wit: that it is (of it selfe) imperfect, vncertaine, obscure, and erroneous; and to be perfected, assured, rectified, and guided by the light of grace, which is the point that I haue especialy laboured to proue th roughout this whole discourse.

The imprudence of those that presume to meddle in matters of State, without any regard of Gods assistance.

Therefore, to conclude this Chapter, I cannot but lament and wonder at the imprudence of two sorts of men. The one is of those, who make no doubt to deale in matters of Policy & State, without any care or regard of Gods help and assistance; yea, and with offence of god. Whereby they expose not only the matters (which they mannage) to dangerous errors, yea, and to all euill successe: but also, the Princes whom they Councell, and the Common-wealthes where they gouerne, to Gods indignation, and consequently to vtter ruine, as hath beene formerly proued.

The imprudence of those that presume to meddle in the greatest matters of State, without experience.

The other sort of impudent men (in my fancy) are those, who are so far transported, eyther with conceit of their own wit and sufficiency, or with a desire to deale in great matters, that they aspire to nothing more, then to meddle in matters of State, yea, and boldly embarke themselues in the very greatest that doe occurre, before they haue any experience or practise thereof in the world, or haue so much as reflected vpon the Naturall imbecility of mans wit; and the weakenesse of humaine pollicy, or of the insuperable difficulties and dangers incident to matters of State; which are such, as do many times, ouerthrow & disgrace the most wise and experteſt Negotiators.

What happeneth to those which vnaduisedly seeke great imployments.

And therefore it happeneth verie often to those, who so greedily and vnaduisedly seeke such employments, as it doth to man, that (in faire weather) putteth himselfe to Sea, in a little Boate or Frigot for his recreation; and vpon the sudden there ariseth a storme which carrieth him into the miane Sea, and so tosseth him too and fro: that he not onelie looseth all the pleasure which he expected, but also escapeth verie hardlye with life. And therefore, with many a sighe and heauy grone, he looketh back to the Land from whence he came; but neuertheles is forced to go whither the winds and tempest carry him, and perhaps perisheth in the ende, by violence of the storme. Euen so I say, it fareth manie times, with those that embarke themselues vnaduisedly in matters of State: for, within a while, they find themselues so perplexed, that they desire to returne to their former repose and quietnes. But yet they are forced to goe, whither the course, streame and current of theyr affaires doth carry them; yea, and sometimes perish amidst the manifolde dangers, which commonly doe accompany State-matters, the practise whereof may well be compared to the practise of Phisicke. For, althogh some Physitions exercise their Science, with more iudge-

Expectation of pleasure endeth often times in paine

The danger of dealing in matters of State.

The practise of matters of State like the practise of Phisick.

ment

ment and better successe then others: yet none is so skilfull and fortunate, that he can alwayes warrant the cure of his pacient, and young beginners many times kill three, before they saue one. Euen so, young Statists, how expert soeuer they be, can neuer warrant the good successe of their plots and designments: but (for the most part) at the first do marre many matters, before they make one. Insomuch, that I account him no lesse happy then wise, who can be the wiser not only by other mens errors, but also by his owne. And, as I hold him for the Wisest man, which erreth the least: so I take him for the happiest & best at ease, who meddleth the least, or not at all in matters of State, seeing there was neuer any that dealt in many, but he erred in some. And sometimes we see, that the least errour worketh both his ouerthrowe who committed it: and also, the ruine of whole Kingdomes and Commonweals. Wherefore, I conclude with the Spanish Prouerbe, A quel es Rey, que nunça vio Rey, Hee is a King that neuer sawe King. That is to say, hee is a happy man, who neuer had to deale with the affayres of Princes, or State-matters.

Young Statists marre many matters before they make one.

He is the wisest that erreth the least, but he the happiest, that medleth least in matters of State.

I speake not this, to dehort or diswade all men from the dealing with matters of State, which is a thing so necessary for the seruice of God and Princes, and for the good of a Commonwealth, that it is both honourable, yea, and highly deseruing, when it is done with circumstance conuenient and requisit thereto. But my meaning is to signifye with what great consideration and circumspection all men ought to vndertake such Negotiations especially young men, who haue not had any experience or practise thereof, and therefore cannot haue the mature and ripe iudgement, which is necessary thereto. For which cause, the Athenians did ordaine, that no man (vnder fifty yeares of age) should bee called to giue aduise in the affaires of their Commonwealth. And although a man may be (as verie manie are no doubt) sooner ripe and able, to mannage anie matter whatsoeuer: yet reason and experience teach, that the yonger a man is, and the lesse practise he hath, the more he is like to erre. Wherefore I craue thy patience (gentle Reader) while I set downe heere a few general Rules for yong beginners, as well for their enstruction: as also, for the discouery of the difficulties, which occurre in the gouernement of a Commonwealth.

Dangerous for very yong men, to deale in matters of State.

Plutarch in his Treatise, whether an old man should deale in matters of State.

CHAP. V.

Certaine general Rules or Aduises, no lesse pious then Politicall, for the instruction of such as desire to manage matters of State, and haue no experience thereof, to the end, that they may deal therein with lesse danger and difficulty.

FIrst, hee that meaneth to apply himselfe to matters of State, must see that his intention be clear & pure, that is to say: that hee bee not moued thereto by vainglory, ambition, couetousnesse, or any vicious or vnlawfull desire, because they are ouerweake foundations to vpholde waightie affayres, being accompanied not onelie with the offence of God; but also, with passion; whereby mans iudgement is blinded, and many times drawn to error. And therefore, the chiefe and principall intention of a Statist ought to bee, the seruice of God and his Prince, and the publicke good of his Country, whereto euery man ought principally to direct & leuell all his actions, which otherwise, cannot be truly vertuous and wise, nor yet haue the assistaunce and blessing of Almighty God, which for the good successe of all mens affaires, is most exquisite. For, as the Royall Prophet sayeth: Nisi Dominus ædificanerit domum in vanum laborauerunt qui edificant eam. Except the Lord do build the house, they labor in vaine which build the same.

A pure and good intention most necessary for a Statist.

What the intention of a Statist ought to be.

Psalm. 127, 1.

This foundation being laide, any Negotiation, be it neuer so waighty and important, may be built thereon, for foure reasons. First, for that a mans reason and iudgement being free from passion and selfe loue, he shall the more clearlie and soundly both deliberate and worke in all occasions. Secondly, for that it is most likely, that Almighty God (seeing his good good and holy intention) will concur & co-operate with him in all his Negotiations.

The commodities of a good intention in vndertaking matters of State. Foure especiall Reasons.

Thirdly, though it would not please Almighty God (for his secret iudgements) to blesse and prosper his actions: yet vndoubtedly, his good intentions shall not faile of their due recompence and reward.

Lastly, for that in case hee fall into the great difficulties and dangers, which are incident vnto dealing in matters of State, yet he shall haue the comfort and consolation of a good and cleare Conscience, which as the Poet could say, is Murus ahæneus, A Brazen Wall, and the most assured Anchor in all the stormes and tempests of this life. Quæ etiam obruta delectat, saith Seneca, which euen when it is oppressed or ouerwhelmed, dooth then delight. Thus much concerning the first rule.

Horat. in Lib. 1. Epist. ad Mecenat. A cleare conscience is a Brazen wall. Seneca, in lib. 4. de Benefic. Cap. 21.

Secondly, it shall be conuenient for a young Statist, well to weigh and foresee the difficulties and daungers, which he may (by all likelyhood) incur by dealing in matters of State, either thorough the nature and condition of the matters which he is to handle, or thorough the treachery and perfidiousnesse of those, with whom he is to deale; or thorough the malice and emulations (either publicke or priuate) which in Courts neuer want; or thorough the iealousy of Princes, who (as Comineus well noteth) Doe easily suspect and distrust their best Seruants, in matters concerning their State. Or lastly, thorow the vncertaintie of the successe of businesse, which is in no mans hand to warrant, as hath bin sufficiently proued. By all which meanes, we see (many times) most important matters miscarry, to the great grief, disgrace, yea and vtter ouerthrow of the Negotiators, especially if they haue not foreseen the same. Whereas, by consideration and foresight, they might perhaps haue preuented inconuenience; or, at the lest, haue bin better armed, to beare their misfortune with patience.

The difficulties and dangers to be considered in matters of State.

Phil. Com. Cron. Lodouic. 11. Cap. 26.

The benefit of fore-sight and prouidence in Statists.

Therefore, Plutarch worthily compareth improuident and vnaduised Negotiators, to one that shoulde fall (before he were aware) into a Coal-pit or Mine; where, though perhaps hee escape with life: yet commonly hee receyueth some hurt, or (at the lest) is wonderfully astonished and amazed, not onely with the fall, but also with the obscurity and horror of the place, which, to those that go in of purpose, and with resolution to endure it, is nothing so offensiue or noysome.

Plutarch in his Treatise of instruction for Statists.

Three things to be considered of Statists.

Thirdly, he ought alwayes to obserue three things. The first, is the imbecility and weaknesse of mans wit: the second, the vncertainty of the successe of al mens actions. The thirde, the prouidence of God, in the disposition of all humaine affaires. These three things I say, euerie Statist should haue continuallie before his eyes, to the end, that seeing his own infirmity, and vncertainty of the successe of all his designments, hee may consider his danger, as well of error in his determinations, as of euill hap in his actions; and consequently, haue recourse to the remedies ordained for the same, by the prouidence and mercy of God. According to the aduise which old Tobias gaue to his son, for the direction of his whole course of life, to whom (amongst manie other notable precepts) hee gaue this. Aske Counsel alwayes of the wise, and despise not any counsel that is profitable. Blesse thy Lord God alwayes, & desire of him that thy wayes may bee made strait, and that all thy purposes & councels may prosper. Thus said Tobias, or rather the Holy-Ghost by his mouth, aduising notably two things, necessary to be practised of all men, for the remedy of their naturall imbecilitie, to wit; to aske councell of wise men, and to craue the assistance of God. Because we are neither so absolute of our selues, but that we neede (in all thinges) Gods helpe and assistance; neither yet so gouerned and guided by Almightie God, that we ought to contemne the helpe of man, such being the course of his diuine prouidence in humaine affaires, that hee doth his will not only in men, but also by them, and with their co-operations. In which respect, Saint Paul did not stick to call himselfe, and the other Apostles, Adiutores Dei, The helpers of God, in the conuersion of the Gentiles.

The counsell of Tobias to his Sonne. Tob. 4, 18. 19.

Two things to be practised of all Statists.

1. Cor. 4, 9.

Therfore, as it were great folly, pride, and presumption in man, so to trust in himselfe, or in humaine Wisedome or power, as to neglect the prouidence and assistance of God: so wer it on the other side, extreame negligence, yea, and a tempting of God, so to relie vpon him, Extreame folly in man, to trust wholy in humane wisedome & power. A tempting o God, to contemne humaine helpe and counsell.

as

as to contemne all humaine helpe and councell. Which we may learne by the example of Moyses, who though he was enstructed, inspired, and conducted by almighty God himselfe: yet refused not the good councell of Iethro, for the maner of his Gouernment, which almighty God also allowed in him.

1 Reg 20. 2 Reg. 19, et 16. 1. Reg. 21. 22, 22.

On the other side also, King Dauid, although hee tooke the councell of his Friends, Councellers, and Seruants, as of Ionathan, Achitophel, Ioab, and others; and vsed also his owne prudence, as well in the deliberations, as in the execution of his affaires: yet hee neuer omitted to consult with almighty God by his Prophets and Priests, when he might conueniently do it, yea, and as I haue signified elsewhere, continually craued the assistance, illumination, and direction of almighty God in all his actions whatsoeuer.

Concurrence of humaine diligence with diuine helpe necessarie. Iudg. 7, 18, 20.

And this concurrence of Diuine help with humaine diligence, is notablie expressed in the Scriptures, where it is signified, that Gedeon gaue order vnto his Soldiers, to crie in their conflict with the Madianites, Domino & Gedeoni, For the Lord, and for Gedeon. And Gladius Domini, & Gedeonis, The sword of God & of Gedeon. And againe, in the relation of the great victorie, which Asa K. of Iuda had against the Ethyopians, the Scripture saith: Cadente Domino contriti sunt, et exercitus illius præliante, They were vtterly ouerthrowne, the Lord God smiting them, and the Army of Asa fighting, which is as much to say, as man doing his endeuor, and God giuing the successe. This also the very Paynims knew, and obserued so well, that Plutarch noteth it seriouslie, in the battaile betwixt Perseus King of Macedon, and Paulus Æmilius the Romaine.

Paralip. 14, 11, 13.

Plutach in vit. Paul Æmyl.

For, whereas Perseus when hee should haue fought, withdrew himselfe from the fielde, vnder colour of Sacrificing to Hercules, he saith; That God doth not fauour such ydle fellowes, as presume on his helpe, and wil do nothing themselues. For God (saith hee) hath so ordained, that he which wil hit the marke, must shoote, & hee which will winne the Goale, must run, and hee which wil haue the victorie, must fight. And therefore, God fauoured and helped Paulus Emilius, who craued force & victory with his weapons in his hands:

Presumption is no way permitted by God.

Gods assistance blessing mans endeauour.

A Dios rogando (as the Spanish Prouerbe saith) y con la maça dando, Praying to God, and laying on load with his Club.

But to say somewhat heere perticularlie of an especiall meanes to winne the helpe and assistance of GOD, nothing behoooueth a Statist more, then daylye to re-commend his actions vnto his Diuine Maiesty, by feruent and deuoute Prayer, the force and benefit whereof, is vnspeakeable, no lesse in all kind of temporall matters, then in spirituall. For the which, wee haue not onely our Sauiours Doctrine and warrant: but also, infinite examples of holie and wise men, both in Diuine and humaine Histories. While Iosuah fought with Amalek, Moyses prayed vpron the Mountaine, and obtained of God the Victory. The two Annaes beeing barren, were by Prayer made Mothers; the one of the Prophet Samuel, and the other, of the Virgine Mary.

The benefit and necessity of prayer, for the good successe of matters of State.

Math. 6, & 7. Marke. 11. Luke. 11. Exod. 17. 12. 1 Sam. 1 12. Luke 1, 13. Examples of the great force of deuoute prayer Ioan. Damas in Orat. de nat. B. virg. Aug in Lib. 5. de Ciuit. Dei. Cap. 26. Procop de bel. Goth. Euagrius in lib. 4. cap. 23.

Salomon, by Prayer obtained Wisedome. King Hezekias recouered health, and had victorye against the Assyrians. The three Children also (by praier) were deliuered from fire. And to speake of later times, Theodosius the Emperor, sirnamed the Great (as Saint Augustine witnesseth) preuailed against the Tyrant Eugenius, more by Praier, then by force. And the like also is testifieth by Graue Writers, as of Narses the Eunuch, Lieutenant to Iustinus the Emperour, whose great victories were attributed vnto his zealous prayers, and manly endeuours exercised in armes.

In like manner, the famous victories which Heraclius the Emperor gaue vnto Cosroes, King of Persia (of whom hee recouered Ierusalem and all the East parts) are ascribed by the best historiographers that write thereof, to the earnest Deuotions and Prayers which hee dailie vsed; and commaunded also to be performed, for his good successe in that warre. We read in our English Histories, that King Ethelred, elder Brother to the famous Alfred or Alured, founder of the Vniuersity of Oxford, beeing encamped against the Danes, and aduertised by his Captaines (when he was going to heare Diuine Seruice, and to perfourme his duty to God, as dayly hee was accustomed to doo) that his Brother Alfred, with the residue of his Captaines, had ioyned ioyned battail with the enemy, and were in great daunger to be ouerthrowne: he had no sooner ended his Diuine Orisons, but he came himselfe in person, and finding his Soldiers ready for flight, recalled them backe to the battel, thrusting himselfe into the middest thereof. Cum virtute (saith the Historie) & Dei miraculo: By whose valour, and the myraculous helpe of God, the Danes were put to flight, and their King slaine, with diuers of their Nobility, and manie thousands of the Soldiers.

Paul. Diacon. Lib. 18. Cedren. Theophan. Naucler. Baron. Anno. 621. 622 623. Guliel Malmesb de gest. reg. Angl. Lib. 2. Cap. 3. Roger de Honeden. Annal. par. 1. An 871. Baron. An. eodem.

Guliel. Malmes. vbi supra.

To this purpose also may serue, those examples of the famous victories of Edward the third, King of England, against the French, at Cressie in Piccardie, and of the Christians against the Turkes, at Lepanto in our dayes; as also, of manie other admirable victories which I refer the Reader vnto. And will end concerning Prayer, with this sentence of Saint Chrysostome. Vis orationis (saith he) Vim mignis extinguit, &c. The power of praier hath extinguished the force of fire, shut vp the mouthes of Lyons, giuen victories in warre, appeased stormes and tempests, expelled Deuils, opened the gates of Heauen, broken the bands of death, cured diseases, reconciled enemies, deliuered Cities from Earth-quakes, and defended them as well from the punishments of God, as from the Treasons and attempts of men. Finallie, it hath ouercome al sorts of euils. Thus saith Saint Chrysostome, of the wonderfull efficacy of prayer, and thus much concerning Prayer and Diuine helpe.

Chrysost. de nat. Dei Hom. 5. The testimony of Saint Chrisostome concerning the force of Prayer.

Now, to speake a word or two more, concerning humaine councell, the Holyghost giueth a notable aduice, saying: Fili sine consilio nihil facias, & post factū non penitebis. My Son, do nothing without aduice and councell, so shall it not repent thee after the deed. And againe, Qui agunt omnia cum consilio, reguntur sapientia. They which do all things with Councel, are gouerned with wisedome. And this point I hold to be absolutely necessarie, not onely for young men, or others of small experience: but also for the eldest and most expert. For, Nemo omnibus horis sapit, No man is wise at all houres. And as the Prouerbe saith, Two eyes see more then one.

The necessity of humaine Counsell. Eccles. 32,20.

Prouer. 15,31.

Therefore the famous Scipio Affricanus, did euer consult all his affaires with Caius Lælius. And Cicero confesseth, that in his Consulship, hee did nothing without the aduise of the Phylosopher, Publius Nasicius. And for this cause, Princes haue diuers Counsellors, to the end, that matters being pondered by diuers, all circumstances may be duly examined and considered. For as Salomon saith, Vbi sunt plures consiliarij, confirmatur cogitationes. Plots and designments are confirmed and established, where there are many Counsellors. For some find out one inconuenience, and some another; some one remedy, and some another; whereof I shall haue occasion to say more heereafter.

Plutarch in his Treatise intituled, whether an olde man should deale with matters of State.

Prouer. 15,22 Many Counsellors necessary for Princes.

Therfore, I conclude for the present, that a yong Statist following the rule and councell of Tobias, that is to say, fixing his heart and hopes vpon Almightie God, adding the continual vse of deuout and feruent Prayer, to humaine councel and diligence; and ioyning thereby, The Wisedome of the Serpent, with the simplicity of the Doue, Piety with Pollicy, guiftes of Grace, with ability of Nature; and finally, the Wisedome of God, with the Prudence of Man, shall deliberate and worke in all occasions, no lesse happilye then wisely. And this shall suffice for the third rule.

The conclusion concerning the concurrence of deuoute praiers and humane councell. Mat. 10,16.

Fourthly, it importeth greatly, that after mature consultation of any matter of State, and serious re-commendation thereof, to Almighty God, no time of action be fore-slowed with needlesse delayes, after the matter determined. For time may so alter the state of any affaire, be it neuer so well and wiselie resolued: that the opportunity of execution may be vtterly lost, and the businesse it selfe withall: And therefore, the common Prouerbe aduiseth, To strike vvhile the Iron is hot. For the Poet could say, Nocuit differre paratis, Delay is alwayes hurtfull, to those who are ready to execute. But especially in matters, wherein there is any competence of enemies, who euer watch diligently to take all opportunities: and do often helpe themselues very greatly, by the negligence and delayes of their aduersaries.

Time not to be fore slowed or lost.

Lucan. in lib. 1. The danger of needlesse delay.

And although this aduise is necessary in all matters of State, yet is most behouefull and requisit in warlick affairs, wherein we see many times, that speede and diligence is more important, then great force. For speed being commonly accom-

Speedy execution is most necessary in matters of Warre.

accompanied with sudden terrour and feare: doth open the way to small force, and enable the same to woorke great effects. And therefore Agathocles, one of the Tyrants of Sicily, hauing but a few Soldiers, and exhorting them vnto the speedie and sudden inuation of Carthage, said: In repentino metu non modicum victoriæ momentum. Sudden feare will be of no smal moment and importance, for obtaining of the victory. Which was proued to be true by the euent, and is dailie seene by the experience of surprizes, camisadoes, and all other sudden enterprises of warre.

The force of sudden feare.

Iustin. in lib. 42.

To conclude this aduise, one generall rule is to be held, that to temporize or delay time is neuer good, but in three cases. The first, when matters are not maturely consulted, and well digested: wherein (neuertheless) al due diligence is to be vsed, least time and opportunitie of action, bee lost and spent in consultation.

In what cases delay is necessary.

The first case.

The second case is, when there is som iust and important impediment of the execution. The third, is in cases of extreamitie, which surpasse a mans power and wisedome to helpe; for then the only remedy is to temporize and win time, which produceth many accidents, that could neuer be foreseen or immagined, and discouereth soueraigne remedies, for the most desperate diseases. And therefore Pericles was wont to say, Time is the wisest Councellor that is. Thus much for the fourth aduise.

The 2. case.

The 3. case.

Plutarch in Pericle.

Time the best Councellour that is.

Fiftly, let euery young Statist consider, and measure his owne ability, to the end, that he do not vndertake anie matter aboue his reach or capacity: for no man (how excellent soeuer he bee) is so perfect, that he excelleth in all thinges. And therefore the Poets faigned, that the Goddes themselues had not al giftes alike; but that some excelled in one, and some in another. And the Apostle saith, that God distributeth his gifts vnto men, diuersly. Diuidens singulis prout vult. Diuiding them to euery one as pleaseth him, to the end we may haue need one of another. And this also, common experience teacheth; for some excell in depth of iudgement; others, in sharpenesse of wit; others, in eloquence; others in memory; others, in Science and learning; and of them, some in one kind, and some in another.

A mans owne abilitie well to be weighed

1 Cor. 12, 11.

Now then, it is conuenient for euery one, as well to weigh his owne Talents, and how they sort with the businesse in which he is to be employed. As if he be to perswade, whether hee haue the guift of vtterance and eloquence. If he bee to passe Couenants and Conuentions of Leagues or Marriages; whether he be a Lawyer. And if he be to treat on matters of warre, whether hee be a Soldier, and so in like cases. For otherwise, hee shall proue, Asinus ad Liram, An Asse at an Harpe, as the Prouerbe saieth, and not only disgrace himself, and them that sent him: but also, loose his labour and businesse.

A Statist ought to measure the matters he vndertaketh, with his owne ability.

They that erre in this point, are those (commonly) which either haue such an inordinate desire to be medling in great matters, that they care not what they vndertake, so they be doing; or else haue an extraordinary conceit of their owne wit and sufficiency. And therefore, it shall be good for euery one, to moderate in himselfe, as for the first, the desire of dealing; so for a remedy to the later, it shall be secure for any man in my fancy, not to relie wholly vppon his owne opinion, concerning his sufficiency, but partly vpon the iudgement of others, receyuing rather imployment from his Prince, or other superiours, then offering or intruding himselfe thereto, til he haue made some good triall of himselfe. For by that meanes, if the busines speed well, hee shall haue the thankes and honor of it: and if it succeede otherwise, hee shall auoyde a verie great part of the blame.

Who they are commonly that vndertake greater matters, then they can performe.

A young Statist should not make him self Iudge of his owne sufficiency.

But if he find, that his superiors know him not so well as he doth himselfe, and yet would employ him in matters, wherin hee hath neither experience nor abilitie, it shal be lesse shame for him to confesse his defect, and either to refuse the Commission, or to craue an associate, furnished with the parts that he wanteth then to accept the charge, and so faile in the performance.

Better for a Statist to acknowledge his owne defect, then to accept a charge which he cannot performe.

Moses being commanded by almightie God, to go in Embassage to Pharaoh King of Egypt, for the deliuerie of the Children of Israel, humbly excused him selfe, as vnfit for such a waighty charge, by reason of the impediment of his speech: for the remedy whereof, God

Exod. 3, 10, 11 12.

gaue

Instruction both for Princes and Subiects.

gaue him an assistant, to wit; his brother Aaron, who being verie eloquent, might speake for them both. Whereby, not onely Subiects, which are to be employed, may learne to consider and acknowledge their owne defectes: but Princes also may learne so to employ their Subiects, that one may haue the partes another wanteth, and supply each one the defects of another.

A yong Statist ought to begin his practise with small matters.

Sixtly, it shall not be amisse (in mine opinion) for a young beginner to enter into his first practise, with matters of small importance, and to proceede vnto greater by degrees, as his experience and ability shall growe and encrease. Like vnto the wise Physition, who when hee beginneth to practise, taketh easie cures in hand, and medleth not with inueterat and dangerous diseases, vntill hee hath got both experience and credit. And so woulde I wish a young beginner in matters of State, to flye businesse of great weight and difficulty; and rather to procure at first, some honorable Commission or Embassage of congratulation, or condoling, including some ouerture of an important treaty, rather then to deale in the treatie it selfe, which requireth great practise, Experience, and Wisedome.

A yong Statist like to a Phisition.

A yong Statist compared to the Iuie Tree.

The assistance of wise & sincere friends, most necessary in great imployments.

And, if hee be imployed in any such treaty, I wold wish him to be contented, rather to be a second or an assistant, then chiefe in Commission, and so to growe (for a while) like the Vine or Iuy, by the support of another tree. Or, if his dignity be such, as cannot admit a seconde place; then, to procure (so much as may be) to haue such assistants, as are not only men of sounde iudgement and Wisedome, but also his sincere friends. Such being commonly the emulation and ambition in Courts, that he may otherwise make account, that his owne associates and Companions, will curiously obserue euery little errour of his, and take aduantage thereof for their owne better credits.

The practise of the Lacedemonians in great employing Ambassadeur. Aristot. in Lib. Polit. 2. Cap. 7.

To which purpose is to be considered that the Lacedemonians vsed to choose such to send on their Embassages, as wer eyther publicke, or at least of secret enemies: to the end that one of them might serue as a spie ouer the others actions. And the like may still be vsed, and is (no doubt) many times. And Philip de Commines noteth of Lewes the eleuenth King of France, that he was woont sometimes when hee sent a great Ambassadour, to giue secret Commission (apart) to some meaner man in his company, vsing the other for a shew, and for matters of complement; or perhaps to the end, that he should beare the greatest part of the embassage charges, as commonly great men do, rather then for the dispatch of important affaires. And the like of both these examples may well be practised by Princes, when they send great Ambassadors, and especially when he that is chief in commission, is raw & vnexpert. And therefore, it shalbe conuenient for such a one, to consider the same, to the end, that hee may the better looke and regard his owne carriage, and procure (as I haue alreadie said before, to haue about him, wise and assured Friendes: least otherwise, his owne assistants, may let him commit some grosse and absurd errors; and so handle the matter, that all the Negotiation, shall turne to their owne Honour, by the discouerie of his imbecility.

Phillip. Com in Cron du Roy Lewis. Cap. 16.

The practise of King Lewes 11. of France, when he imploied a great Ambassadour.

The danger of associates in Commission, when they are not sincere friends.

And this hee may feare, not onely in his associates and fellowes in Commission, but also in his followers and Seruants: among whom, some one of more spirit and talent then the rest, may seeke to make aduantage of his maisters weakenesse. As chanced to an Ambassador (whom I knew) whose Secretary noting in him some negligence in the dispatch of aduises; when occasion required, preuented commonly his Maisters Letters with his owne. Besides, being imploied by his Maister, to procure aduises and intelligences, he concealed the most important matters from him, and VVrote them himselfe to some principall Councellours, whose good grace hee gayned so farre thereby, that they procured his aduancement at his home return: whereas, the Ambassadour himselfe, was helde altogether vnworthy of further honor and preferment, and liued euer after in disgrace.

The treachery of seruants to be feared in weighty imployments.

Many matters not to be vndertaken at once, by a yong Statist.

Seauenthly, I would aduise a young beginner, not to charge himselfe with many matters at once, as some do, that that cannot endure to see any man employed, but themselues. Whereon it followeth, that some one or two businesses succeeding il (as cōmonly among many some do) do) they receiue more disgrace thereby, then reputation or thankes for all the rest, though they succeede neuer so well. Therefore, it is wisedome for anie man (especially for such as be Nouices in affayres of State) to take but fewe matters in hand, and to dispatch them well. Like to a man that hath but a weake stomack, who is to take heede, that he neuer ouerlay it with quantitie: nor yet to pester it with diuersitie of meates, because one thing will let and hinder the digestion of another.

PAGINATION INCORRECT

A yong Statist like to a man of a weak Stomack.

An aduertisement to the Fauourites of Princes.

And this I wish to bee considered especially, by such as are the fauourites of Princes, who (manie times) desiring to haue al in their owne hands, do not stick to charge themselues with much more, then they can attend to dispatch in due manner and season, to the exceeding great detriment, as well of perticuler men, as of the State ingenerall. Whereby also, they expose not onely themselues, but their Princes likewise, to such hatred of the Nobilitie and people, that thereon doth follow (manie times) commotions, and rebellions, insomuch, that their Princes are either forced to abandon them to their enemies, or else to perish with them. As to omit forraigne examples, we haue seene by experience in England, in the times of King Edward the second, and King Richard the second against whom, the Nobilitie and Commons did take Armes, for the hatred they bare to their fauourites, Pierce Gauestion, the two Spencers, Robert de la Vere, Earle of Oxford, and others theyr Adherents: vpon whose persons they discharged their fury, exercising all kind of cruelty on them, except vpon the Earle of Oxford, who saued his life by flight into Holland, and ended his dayes in banishment. And heereto also may partly bee ascribed, the vnfortunate endes of both those Kinges, who were afterwards deposed, and cruelly and Treacherously murthered.

The danger that the Fauourites of Princes doe incurre by hatred of the people.

Polidor. Virgil. in Hist. Angl.

Secrecy in matters of State, most necessary.

Eightly, nothing is more necessary in handling matters of State, then Secrecy, I meane matters intended and consulted, before they come to execution: for, they are like to a Mine, which hauing any vent, is wholly frustrate, and of no effect. Therefore, Peter King of Arragon, being demanded of Pope Martine the fourth, what hee meant to do with the great Fleete, wherewith hee afterward recouerd Sicily from the French, made this aunswere vnto him: That if he thought his Shirt did know it, hee would burne it.

A generall rule to bee held concerning Secrecy.

But, because I am to speake of this point of Secrecie heereafter, I wil heere onely giue a generall rule to bee helde and practised by young Statistes: which is, not to communicate anie important matter of State, to any man whatsoeuer; except he is to be imployed, or his councell to bee vsed therein. For, whosoeuer fayleth in this point, is not fit to handle any matter of importance, nor shall euer haue credit with Princes, who esteeme nothing more in their Seruants, then Secrecy. Insomuch, that a Prince in these dayes (whom for some respects I forbeare to name) caused a faithfull seruant of his (whom he also loued dearly) to be killed, for feare he should reueale a secret, which (by chaunce) hee came to know: whereby we may perceiue, howe dangerous a thing it is, to bee pertakers of Princes secrets. And therefore, Philippides the Comedian, beingwilled by king Lysimachus to aske some fauour of him, beseeched him to doo him what fauour else he pleased, so that he imparted none of his secrets vnto him. And thus much for this point.

Princes esteeme nothing more in their seruants then Secrecy.

Dangerous to be pertakers of Princes Secrets.

Plutarch in his Treatise of talking too much.

